Whilest the King was resident at Peronne, an Ambassage comes to him from the Infant of Bourgongne, consisting of the principall men about her: as namely Chancellor Hugonnet, a very wise man, and honorable: Himbercourt, a gentleman experienced in matters of waight: Vere, a great Nobleman of Zeland: Cripture, (otherwise called Grutse or Grutur): with other Ecclesiastical and secular men. They intreat the King to retire his armie, & that all controuersies might be quietly ended, according vnto right & reason. They shew, that by the customes of France, & the ordinances of his Predecessors Kings, the women did succeed in the Counties of Flanders, Arthois and other prouinces there abouts.

That remaining but one only daughter of the deceased Duke of Bourgongne, yong, & an orphan,

A orphan, he should rather protect, the oppress her. That the marriage of the Dauphin with her, should be more proportionable, then with the daughter of England. And for the more credit, they brought a letter, writt part of it by Mary the Infanta of Bourgongne, and some part by the Douager her Mother in lawe, Sister to Edward King of England, and some part by Raualstein brother to the Duke of Cleues, and neere kinsman to the yong Ladie: yet none of any credit but that of the Infanta. This letter gaue authority to Hugonnet and Himbercourt, and fayed moreover: That Mary Duchesse of Bourgongne, was resolved to gouerne her affaires by the aduice of foure persons, The Douager, Raualstein, Hugonnet, and Himbercourt. Mary beseeched the King, that whatsoeuer it should please him to negotiate with her, should passe by their hands, and that hee should not impart it to any other.

The King (foreseeing that by the confusion of this people hee should settle his affaires) will cunningly make his profit of this letter, but not thinking it should cost two so vertuous heads, in sowing diuision betwixt the Duchesse & her subiects. Yet before he giues audience to these Ambassadors, he treats priuately with eyther of them, Hugonnet and Himbercourt, (whereof the first had all his liuing in Picardy and the other in Bourgongne.) & they desirous to be continued in their ancient authorities, giue care to the Kings offers: they promised to serue him; so as the foresayd marriage might take effect.

The rest, whose Estates were not vnder the Kings command, would not tie themselves by promise, but with the alliance of the houses of France and Bourgongne. This was most expedient for the King: but the violent conditions they propounded, withdrew his loue much both from her & them in particular: supposing he should soone haue all, without accepting of a part by an accord. Moreover he was possessed with a wonderfull desire to conquer Arras. The Lord of Cordes might do much. Hee was Lieutenant in Picardie vnder the deceased Duke, Senechal of Ponthieu, Capitaine of Courtray, Boulougne and Hedin, Governor of Peronne, Montdidier and Roye: he was younger Brother to the Lord of Crenecour, and already did these himselfe to bee french, his estate lying within the territory of Beauuais. The Townes vpon the riuer of Somme, by the death of Charles (the last issue male of the house of Bourgongne) returned to the King, & so des Cordes became the Kings liege man. His duty then bound him to yeeld vnto the King such other places as he commanded, but he was bound by oath to his mistresse senice. A dispensation will saue it. There is no hoale but Lewis finds a piane for it. Vpon his motion to the Ambassadors, that the deliuey of Arras would make the way plaine for a good peace: and request, that they would be a meane to Cordes to open the City of Arras vnto him, (for in those dayes there were both walles and ditches betwixt the Cittie and the Towne) Hugonnet and Himbercourt dispense des Cordes of his oath, and consent to the deliuey of the sayd Cittie.

Hee doth it willingly, and sweeres fealtie to the King, who presently stoppes vp all approaches to the Towne: then he goes to incampe before Hedin, leades des Cordes with him: whose men made a shewe to defend the place, as engaged by oath to their Ladie: for their credits sake they endured the battery some dayes: then seeing their defences taken away, and their loope-hoales battered, Rasse of Launoy looses que care to his Capitaine, and yeelds the Towne. The King for his reward gaue him a chaine of twenty linkes, and euery linke worth twenty Crownes in gold, and a good pension for his mainteynance. The taking of Hedin, brought the King to Therouenne and Montreuil, the which easily yeelded to his obedience. Boulogne being summoned refuseth, but being battered, it yeeldes the fift or the sixt day.

The Towne belonged to Bertrand de la Tour, Earle of Anuergne: the King, finding it commodious for the State of his Realme, compounded, giuing him a sufficient recompence, and as newe Lord of the Towne he did homage, without sword or spurs, bare headed & on his knee, before the virgin Mary, offering (as a duty to the sayd image) a heart of massie gold, weighing two thousand Crownes: vpon condition that he and Should be betwixt Mary and the Gains.

Lewis's estate changed from Mary by the violent conditions that were propounded.

1477. his successors Kings after him, should hold the County of Boullen of the sayd virgin, & do homage vnto her image, in the Church dedicated to her name, paying at every change of a vassal, a heart of pure gold of the same weight.

Disimulation of the Arrasians. While the King remains at Boullen, those of Arras seeing themselves environed on all sides, write to their friends of Lisle and Douay, to succour them with some numbers of men, and moreover they send to the Duchesse of Bourgogne, to furnish them with some succors, meaning to put themselves into her hands. The Deputies being two or three and twenty in number, make shew to go to the King, to treat with him, and vnder this colour they obtaine a passport of the bastard of Bourbon Admirall of France.

The Deputies of Arras taken and many of them executed. But being discovered vpon the way to Flanders, they were taken, brought to Hedin, & deliuered to the Prouost of Marshall, condemned, and eightene of them beheaded: the rest were saued by the Kings arriuall. Amongest them that were executed, there was one Oudard of Buffy borne at Paris, and married at Arras. The King had in former time offered him the place of a Counsellor of the Court of Parliament at Paris then void, and since he gaue him the office of maister of the accounts at Arras. Hee caused his head to bee vnburi'd, and set vpon a pole in the market place, with a red hooded furred with menier, like to the Counsellors of the Parliament. A worthy punishment for so malicious an ingratitude.

The succors of Arras defeated. There were some fewe horsemen at Douay, of the remainders of Nancy: they arme three hundred good & bad, and some fewe foote: and march at noone day in the fight of Arras. The Lords of Lude and Fou: with the company of the Marshall of Locheat, aduertised of their approach, go to meete with them: they fight with them, kill and take in a manner all of them. The King at his arriuall, caused foure score of these prisoners to be executed, to terrifie those fewe men of warre that remayned in the Country. Some of them enter the Towne, but they were not able to stand out against so great forces. So as after a hard battay they yeeld by composition: That they should remaine vnder the Kings obedience, as their Soueraigne, for want of heires male, rights and duties being not performed. That the subsidies and tributs should be leuied by the Kings officers, and deliuered by them to Mary the heire of Bourgogne, untill she had doone homage and taken her oath of fealtie to the King her Soueraigne Lord. During which time the Inhabitants should receiue no garrison from the King. This was the 4 of May.

Arras yeelded. These things thus concluded, the King sent the Cardinall of Bourbon, the Chancellor of Orléans, de Cordes gouernor of the Towne, and Guilot Pot Bayliffe of Vermundis, to take the oath of fealtie of the Inhabitants. But after this oath, holily and religiously receiued by the Deputies, who tooke their repast in the Monastery of Saint Vast, behold an insolent troupe of desperate people comes crying, kill, kill: yet they were but terrified, and saued themselves presently in the City. This terror, together with the greedinesse of the Commanders, was the cause the composition was but ill obserued: for in the presence of Lude and Cerisy, many good Citizens and other rich men were spoiled and slaine, and the City set at threecore thousand Crownes fire to the King: the which they pay was afterwards restored. And to keepe these mutinies in awe, the King transported most of the Inhabitants of Arras, and planted it with a new Colony of French, commanding it should be called, Ville Francoise.

A mutiny at Arras and the Deputies in danger. At the same time the King aduertised, that the Flemings were in troupe, and lodged at B'anc-fosse, he sent to charge them: but they dislodge at the brute thereof: yet not so speedily, but they leaue about two thousand men slaine at the first charge, and the like number in the chase, being pursued eight Leagues within the County of Flanders. The French in their returne, razed Mont-Cassell, Fiennes, and some other places. The Gantois, (whome the seuer punishment of the Liegeois had kept in awe, (nowe breake. They make a ward of their Duchesse, force her to restore their ancient priuileges, which Philip and Charles had taken from them: and sodenly they retolue a deadly reuenge, vpon such by whome they say they had beene controuled. They lay hold vpon those whom they called their twenty & six Lawiers, whom Charles had established 1477. A established in the gouernement of the City, and puts them all, or the most part to death. They haue (saie they) cut off ones head without any authority, for their power ended with the death of Charles. And moreover they slew many good men within the City, that were wise and faithfull friends to Charles in his life. But they proceed yet farther.

Their barbarous cruelty.

The happy course of Lewis his Conquests doth much amaze them, wherevpon they assemble some forme of a Parlement by aduice whereof they make a motion of peace to the King, by an Ambassage, giuing him to vnderstand, that the Infanta of Bourgogne is determined to gouerne her selfe hereafter by the aduice and Counsell of the three Estates of her Countries: they request the King to desist from making of warre, and to appoint a daie when they may quietly pacifie all controuersies. There was nothing at that time able to withstand the violence of the Kings army. The lowe Countries were left naked of soldiars: those which suruiued, being inconstant, had forsaken the Infantes seruice. He was well acquainted with the inconstancie of this people, not able to digest any man of iudgement that had bin in any authority with their deceased Prince. Hee knew, that their inclination was to loue the declining of their Lord, so as it were not with the preiudice of their Countrey. And therefore he forecasts, if he might, to sow some seeds of diuision amongst them, wherby he should greatly incombere them. Hee staies the Ambassadors vpon their speeche, That their Princeesse would not conclude any thing without the Counsell of the three Estates of the Country: wherevnto he replies, that they spake without warrant, and that he is duly informed, her meaning is to gouerne her affaires by priuate persons, who desired no peace. And vpon their protesting to the contrarie, affirming that they were grounded vpon good instructions, the King opens Maries letters, brought by Hugonnet, Himbertcourt, and other Ambassadors, at their first Ambassage, and they returne with no other dispatch then this letter.

Ted by Lewis his policie.

Behold here a company vnexperienced in affaires, returne light with care, but fraught with reuenge and diuision: they make their report vnto their Ladie, assisted with the Duke of Cleues, the Bishop of Leege, and many other great personages. They strike on that string which they ment to play vpon: That the King had proued them liars, in that they mainteyned constantlie, that she referred the gouernment of her affaires to the resolution of the States. And for prooffe, as they maintained the contrarie, not imagining her letter to had beene produced, behold the Pensionarie of Gand, a brutish man and without respect, draws the said letter out of his bosome, and confounds this bathfull Princeesse before the whole assemblie.

The Dowager, Rausselein, Hugonnet and Himbertcourt were likewise present. The Duke of Cleues treated the marriage of his eldest sonne with the Infanta: hee sees himselfe now frustrate by the aboue named, so as he presentlie becomes a mortall enemy to Himbertcourt, from whome he expected fauour in this sute. The Bishop of Leege complained of manie disorders committed by him at Leege, whereof he had the gouernment. The Earle of Saint Paul sonne to him that was beheaded, loued neither Hugonnet nor Himbertcourt, for they had deliuered his father to the Kings seruants. The Gantois, according to their humors, hated them deadlie, for that they were men of merit, and had beene good and loiall seruants to their master.

Great enmities against Hugonnet and Himbertcourt.

To be short, the night after the letter was deliuered. Hugonnet and Himbertcourt were tumultuously seized on, and deliuered to suborned men of their Lawe: and so that they had caused the City of Arras to be yeelded by the Lord of Cordes, as they saied, or rather vpon certain corruptions in iustice, and bribes which (they saied) had bin receiued by them of the City of Gand, in a sute against a priuate man, and vpon many extorsions in their charges, and other things contrary to the priuileges of Gand (against the which (saied they) whosoever offends must die, these two reuerend and graue personages, were with a shadow of Lawe, condemned by the Sheriffe of Gand, and notwithstanding their appeale before the King in his Court of Parliament at

They are supposed crimes, or damned and beheaded.

Paris,

1477. Paris, supposing that this respect and delay, might giue their friends meanes to procure their deliuerie, they were vnworthily put to death. Oh vniust, barbarous, and inhumane people; That the humble and earnest supplication of thy Princeesse, being in the Towne house, nor her weeping, and desolate presence before that mountefull scaffold, were not of force to preserue and keepe the liues of these her two faithfull seruants.

Moreover ruled by the Gantois.

This execution ended, they sequestred from this poore Princeesse, the Dowager and Rauaflin, who had signed the Letter, they disposing absolutely of her. Poore without doubt, hauing not onely lost so many good and great Townes, but also sees her selfe now in the tyrannicall possession of the ancient persecutors of her house. A great corrosiue, to bee commanded by such as should obey. Afterward they banished whome they pleased, placed and displaced officers after their owne appetites, chate away indifferently all such as had best deserued of this house of Bourgogne. And to continue their popular furie, they deliuered out of prison Adolfe Duke of Gueldres, whom Charles had long detained, and making him their head, they made a leue in Gand, Bruges, and Tyre, of about twelue thousand men, the which they sent to Tournay, and burnt the suburbs, and then they retire. But the garrison issuing forth, put wings to their feete: so as Adelf a valiant Prince of his person, turning head to fliuour them that fled, and to make the retreat, was ouerthrowne and slaine, with a great number of his people with him. The Infanta was nothing greeued: for if this stratagem had succeeded for the first fruites of his armes, some hold they would haue forced her to marry this Adolfe.

The Gantois ouerthrowne, and Adolfe Duke of Gueldres slaine.

But we haue wandred long enough in Arthois and Flanders, let vs retire a little into Bourgogne, and consider how this Duchie became French. John of Chalon, Prince of Orange, was in great credit there. Hee possessed much land, both in the Duchie and Countie, he was a man of action, and much esteemed in the Countrie, and pretended some inheritances against the Lords of Chauvergnon his Vncles. Charles of Bourgonne had giuen sentence in fauour of his aduersaries, and (as he sayd) to his great preiudice, so as hee had twise left his seruice. Now the question is to winne him againe.

The conquest of Bourgonne

The King promisseth to inuest him in all those places which hee pretends to be long vnto him, by the succession of his grand-father, and to giue him good preferments in France. So he makes him in shew the head of that armie which the Lord of Craon commanded, being Lieutenant generall for the King in Bourgogne, whom the King trusted more then the Prince, being rashe and light in the change of parties. Craon hauing commandement to enter into Bourgogne, hee sends the Prince of Orange before, to practise the Towne of Dijon. Hee wrought so politickly, that Dijon and many other places, both of the Duchie, and Countie, did willingly submit themselves to the French command. Auxonne and some other places of strength continued still vnder the obedience of Marie of Bourgonne.

The reuolt of the Prince of Orange.

Craon, seeing himselfe in possession of all these places, desired rather to hold them vnder the Kings authoritie, then to deliuer them to the Prince of Orange, notwithstanding the Kings promise and instance: who desired to gratifie this Prince, and yet would not discontent Craon, who commanded the forces. The Prince hauing to doe with a man that would yeeld nothing without good consideration, and seeing himselfe frustrate of his pretensions, he ioynes with Chastelauguion his brother: and Claude of Vaudry, a braue Gentleman, raiseth some troupes, with the which he draweth from the King, the most part of the aboue-named places, with as great facilitie, as if hee had conquered them for him, and then followes the Infantes partie, whose age and weaknesse, required a great support by some worthy alliance.

There was some speech of Charles the Daulphin, but he was yet but nine yeares old. The Duke of Cleues laboured for his eldest sonne: the Emperour for his sonne Maximilian, King of the Romains. Mary desired much the alliance of France, but the King had done

A done her a great disgrace, deliuering her letters to the Gantois, the which shee had secretly written: which caused the death of those two good men, and the banishment of her most affectionate seruants. Moreouer her Estate required a man to gouerne it. She would willingly haue married with the Earle of Angoulesme, if the King had beene so pleased.

The humours of the heire of Cleues pleased her not, nor such as were about her. The Emperour kept as a pawne, a diamond with a letter which the Infanta had written vnto him, by her fathers commande; whereby she promisseth to accomplish the marriage, in forme, according to her fathers pleasure. He sends it to the Duchesse, to auerre her hand and promise, demanding if she would persist therein. She doth auouch the contents, and agrees to make it good. So Maximilian comes to Gand, and there the marriage was consummated. A marriage, which should proue a firebrand, to kindle (by their descendants, both within this Realme, and in manie other Estates) the Combustious tumults, and furies which haue followed: the which happilie had beene auoided by a french alliance. But God had other wayes decreed.

This marriage was consummated during the Orangeois reuolt in Bourgogne, the which continued somewhat long, by the support the Germanes gaue him in fauour of Sigismond of Austria vncle to Maximilian, who (hauing his territories adioyning, and especially the Countie of Ferrete, the which he had retyred by the Suisses meanes) would gladly haue gotten somewhat of his neighbours. But the indiscretion of Sigismond, and the want of money to pay the Bourguignons, were a meanes that the King did more easily preuent the Prince of Orange his practises, who nowe called himselfe Lieutenant to the sayd Germanes. They supplied him with some troupes, with the which he recovered almost all the Countie, contynuing his course, vntill that Craon came to beseege him in Gy, a small Towne of the sayd County.

Marriage of Maximilian and Mary.

Chastelauguion seeing his Brother coop'd vp, and the place readieto yeeld to Craons discretion, posts thether with all the forces he can: and comes to charge Craons armie in front, whilest that the beseege should set vpon him behind. So charged both before and behinde, he found the match hard: yet by the defeat of Djouene or fiftene hundred men, for the most part enemies, and the taking of Chastelauguion, he wonne the victorie. Craon leads his army after this victory before Dole, the chiefe Towne of the County: but for that he did presse it but slackly, and neglected his enemy, whose forces he knewe to be but small, he had ill successe. For in a fierce fallie they slewe many of his men, and carried away a great part of his artilerie. This affront brought him in disgrace with the King, who fearing a more dangerous checke, hearing likewise complaints from all parts, of his great exactions and money vniustlie taken, puts him from the gouernment of Bourgonne, preferring in his place Charles of Amboise, Lord of Chaumont, a valiant, wise and vigilant Captaine. Loue preuayles more then force. He perswades the King to pacifie the Suisses and other Germanes, who followed the Prince of Orange, in fauour of the house of Austria: and to make the way more easie for the King, he him selfe doth practise the Commanders.

The Prince of Orange deterred.

Craon beaten before Dole.

He is in disgrace with the King.

Then began the Suisses first league with the King; the which he effected, by meanes of twentie thousand franks he gaue yearly among the Cantons, and the like summe to be distributed among some Captaines which he employed. And to please them, he made himselfe a bourgeois amongst them, and obtayned the title of the first allied to their Commonweale. A title which the Duke of Sauoie pretended to be due vnto him aboue all others. They likewise for their parts, promised to furnish six thousand men to serue the King continually, for foure Germane Florins and a halfe a moneth, a number which continued alwayes vnto the death of Lewis. The Suisses came vnder the Kings pay, and so the Bourguignons party much weakened, who asserbled the Nobility of the Country together, vnder the Prince of Orange, and defeated the companies of Salezard and Coninghen neere vnto Grey. But Amboise (being fortified

A league with the Suisses.

1478. with men and artillerie,) takes Verdun, Montfaucon, Semur in Lauxois, Chastillon vpon A Seine, Bar vpon Seine, Beaulne, and Rocheport neere vnto Dole, belonging vnto Vanduz. Thus hauing freed all the approches to Dole, he Campes before it, batters it, makes a breach, giues an assault, and takes it. Some troupes of the Townes last subdued thrust themselves into it, either to warrant it from spoile, or to haue a better share, but there enters such a multitude of franke archers, as it was impossible to saue it from sack and fire. Yet the King repaired the ruines about the walles, building a great part of the wall towards the riuer of Doux, with a great trenche, whereby a great part of the said riuer did runne forth, inuironing of that part of the wall: but this is nothing, in regarde of the fortifications which haue beene since built, whereby it exceeds most of the Cities of Christendome, beeing excellent at this day, in Senate, Vniuersitie B and armes.

Dole, with many other Townes, taken by Amboise.

Auxonne deserued a long and sharpe siege: but the wisdom of Amboise prevailed so well after the siege of Dole, that (giuing the chiefe offices of the Towne, to such as demanded them) it was yielded within fure or fixe dayes, and likewise the Castles of Tou, S. Agnes vpon Salins, Champagnole, Arguel, and some others, built vpon rockes. Bezançon, an Imperiall Towne, yielded to the King (by his Lieutenant General) the like duties as they were accustomed to doo the Earle of Bourgogne. Thus Bourgogne being conquered, remained some time in the Kings quiet possession. A young horse hath need of a gentle hand, to make him taste the Bit with delight. But Verdun and Beaulne, not able to endure the command of the French, began first to kick, yet by the Governours discretion, they were speedily subdued, and recouered from Simon of Quinsey, who led a troupe of fixe hundred men of foote and horse, Germanins and others, tumultuouſlie assembled in Ferrette, and thereabouts, to put into the abouenamed places. Verdun was taken by assault, and subiect to the accustomed insolencies in the like prizes. Beaulne yielded by composition, in the beginning of Iuly, with liues and goods saued, and for a fine they payed fortie thousand Crownes. These sodaine exploits did so terrifie the other Townes, as all kept themselves within their due obedience.

But how doth Edward King of England looke vpon this Theater, where our men play the pettie Kings? And how doth he suffer the King without any opposition, to enlarge his estate by the taking of Arras, Boulougne, Hedin, and so many other Townes, and to be lodged in many dayes before S. Omer? In truth our Lewis had a quick conceit, and very watchfull. He knew well that the English in generall, were wonderfully inclined to warre against this realme, as well vnder colour of their ancient pretensions, as for the hope of gaine, inticed by many high deeds of armes, wherein they haue often had the aduantage: and of that long possession, both in Normandie and Guienne, where they had commanded three hundred and fiftie yeares, vntill that Charles the 7. disposſessed them. That this baite might well perswade them to crosse his desseignes. These two mighty Princes neighbours, cannot see (without ieaousie) the one to growe great by new conquests, and the other to be at quiet. He therefore entertaines Edward with hundrie Ambassages, presents, and goodly speeches: causeth the pension of fiftie thousand Crownes, to be duly payed at London, and some sixteen thousand distributed among such as were in credit about him: so as the profit they drew from the iudicious bountie of Lewis, tyed their tongues, and blinded their eyes. Money was muck to him in regard of a man of seruice, and he was pleased to vaunt, that the great Chamberlaine (whereof there is but one in England) the Chancellor, Admirall, Maister of the horse, and other great Officers of England, were his Pensioners. So he gaue vnto Howard foure and twenty thousand Crownes in money and plate, besides his pension, in lesse then two yeares: and to Hastings great Chamberlaine, a thousand markes of siluer in plate at onetime, as appeares by their quittances, in the chamber of accountes at Paris.

Lewis had great need to vse this policie and bountie, for this yong Princeesse did infinitely presse Edward, who for her cause did often send to the King to demand a peace, or

The politike liberallitie of Lewis.

A or at the least a truce; and in the Court of England, there wanted not some to incense Edward, that seeing the terme was expired, by the which Lewis should send for the Infants of England, (whom they called Madame the Dauphine) hee would deceiue him. Yet no respect, neither priuate nor publick, could moue Edward: he was pursie, loosing his delight, vnable to suffer paine, glorious of nine famous victories, and fraught with home-bred enemies: and about all, the loue of fiftie thousand Crownes (so well paid in his Tower of London) kept him at home. Moreouer the Ambassadors that came from him, returned laden with rich presents, and alwayes with irrefolute answers, to winne time; promising speedily to resolute the points of their demands, to their maisters satisfactions.

The disposition of Edward King of England.

B But let vs obserue another ingeniuos policie: Lewis neuer sent one Ambassador twise vnto Edward, to the end that if the former had happily treated of any thing that tooke not effect, the latter knew not what to answer, and so ignorance serued him for an excuse, with delay of time. Moreouer, he instructed his Ambassadors so well, as the assurance of the marriage they gaue to the King and Queene of England (the accomplishment whereof they both greatly desired) made them take hope for payment. Yet the King had neuer any such meaning: there was too great an inequality of age: and thus getting a moneth or two by mutuall Ambassages, he kept his enemy from doing him any harme, who (without the baite of this marriage) would neuer haue suffred the house of Bourgogne to be so oppressed. An other reason dissuaded Edward from embracing of Maries quarrell. She had refused to marry with the Lord Rivers, brother to the Queene of England. The which match was not equall, hee being but a poore Baron, and she the greatest heire of her time.

Lewis feeds Edward with dilatorie hopes.

The reason why Edward neglects Marie of Bourgogne.

And the better to keepe Edward quiet, the King intited him to ioyne with him, and consented that he should haue for his part the Prouinces of Flanders and Brabant: offering him to conquer for him, at his owne charge, foure of the greatest Townes in Brabant, to entertaine him ten thousand English men for foure moneths, and to furnish him with Artillerie and carriages, so as Edward would come in person, and seize vpon Flanders, whilest that hee employed his forces else-where. But Edward found that Flanders and Brabant were hard to conquer, and painfull to keepe: and also the English, by reason of the commoditie of their trafficke, had no will to this warre. Yet (said hee) since it pleaseth you to make mee partaker of your victories, giue mee of those places you haue conquered in Picardie, Boulougne, and some others: then will I declare my selfe for you, and assist you with men at your charge. A wise and discreet demand: but those places were no lesse conuenient for Lewis, who was loth to beat the bush, for another to get the birds.

It appeares, that Edward did wonderfully affect the alliance of France, and feared to lose the King any occasion to infringe it; so (as some say) hee cauted his brother the Duke of Clarence to be put in prison, vpon colour that hee would passe the seas, to succour the Dowager of Bourgogne: for the which crime, he was condemned to haue his head cut off, and his body to be quartered, a punishment inflicted vpon traitors in England. But at the entreaty of their mother, Edward did moderate this sentence, and gaue him the choise of what death he would, wherevpon he was drowned in a Pipe of Malmesey. But this Duke was sonne in lawe to the Earle of Warwicke, whome Edward had slaine in battaile, as wee haue sayde. and it seemes the greatest crime they could obiekt against him, was the priuate hatred which vsurpers commonly beare, to those whome they doubt might but crosse their tyrannicall usurpations.

Looke the Chronicles of England.

And as wee haue recreated our selues beyond the Seas, let vs now passe the Alpes, and see what is done there, suffering our warriours to enioy a truce vntill the next year. There were at that time two mighty families at Florence, the one of Medicis, the other of Pacis. These were supported by Pope Sixtus the fourth, and by Ferrinand King of Naples, to ouerthrowe the absolute gouernement of the Cities: they attempt to murder Laurence de Medicis, and all his followers, and gaue

Troubles at Florence.

1478. for watch-word to the murtherers, when as the Priest celebrating the high Masse, A should say, Sanctus, in the Church of S. Rasperce, where they should assist at a certaine day, Laurence escaped, but being maymed of many of his members, he saued himselfe in the vestry. Julian his brother was slaine and some of their followers. Then runne they to the Pallace, to murther all those which had the gouernement of the City: but being mounted, they see that some of their men had abandoned them, so as they were not about foure or fise, and which was worse, the gates were shut vpon them. The Senators (seeing these rascalls thus handled) put their heads out at the windowes, they see this tumult, and heare James Pais and others crying Liberta, Liberta, and Popolo, popolo, (words to moue the people, and to make them follow their faction) but they moued not: so as Pais and his companions fled from the place, and those that were entred were presently hanged at the barres of the Pallace windowes. Francis Saluati Archbishop of Pisa, hauing said masse with a cuirasse on his backe, was taken and hanged in the same habit. The Gouernours seeing the whole Towne to stand firme for them and the Medicis, they send presently to all the passages, to apprehend all such as should be found flying. James and Francis Pais were presently taken, with an other Captaine of the Popes troupes vnder the Earle Ieronimo, and hanged instantly, with other great personages to the number of fourteene: some groomes and other base people, were knockt downe in the streets. Nicholas Cardinall of S. George, nephew to the Earle was a long time prisoner.

The mutinie appeared and the murtherers hanged.

The Pope and the king of Naples send their forces against Florence.

Lewis begins to decline.

The battell of Guynegyste.

The King aduertised of this hurliburly, sends the Lord of Argenton, both to take (in C his Maiesties name) the homage which Bonne Duchesse of Milan, ought for the duchie of Genes, in the behalfe of the yong Duke John Galeas her sonne, and to receiue the men at armes, which they had granted in fauour of the Medicis.

The Pope aduertised of the execution done at Florence, doth excommunicate the citizens, and with the same breath commands his armie to march, & to ioine with that of Naples, being great and faire. It was commanded (for the Pope) by the Duke Urban, Robert d'Armini, Constantin of Pesaro and many others: and for Ferdinando, by his two sonnes the one Duke of Calabria, the other Don Frederike. They take many places about Florence, and almost ruine the whole state. There were few Commanders, of small experience, and weake forces. The Kings assistance did somewhat comfort them, being after much war, absolued and reconciled to the church, as also to reniue the Pope. Lewis had called a councell of the French Church at Orleans, for the restoring of the pragmatik Sanction in France, and to abolish the custome to carry money to Rome for the obtayning of Bulls: yet the assembly brake off without any conclusion, & was referred to Lions the next yeare, but without effect. Thus passe the affaires of this world, but many doe oppresse at the length. Our Lewis hath in a manner out-liued al his greatest enemies, and now he begins to decline. Troubles, care & waywardnesse, call him mildly to his graue: the vigor of his spirits faile him, & hereafter wee shall see a strange alteration in his humors. The truce ended: and seeing we must returne to warre, let vs begin it by some notable stratageme. The Archduke Maximilian hath now the Flemings hearts at his deuotion. To imploy the, he camps before Therouenne, with about twenty thousand Flemings, some Germane troupes, and three hundred English, ledde by Thomas Abergieyn an English Captaine. The Lord of Cordes Lieutenant generall for the King in Picardy, assembles what troupes he can, out of the neighbour garrisons, eight thousand franke archers, eleuen hundred men at armes, and makes haste to relieue it.

Maximilian vnderstanding of their approach raiseth the siege, marcheth towards the, & affronts them at Guynegyste. Des Cordes was the stronger in horse, but the weaker in foote. The forwards ioine without any stay, the Archdukes (being ledde by Rauesslein) doth not maintaine the fight, but is soone broken and chased euen vnto Aire by Cordes & Tora. The foote stand firme, supported by the Archduke himselfe, the Lord of Rhomont, the Earle of Nassau, & two hundred Gentlemen, all on foote: the franke Archers of the French, supposing that these footemen would flie with the foreward, fall vpon the baggage. The Duke doth charge them, forcing them to leaue their booty and fall to

A to armes. The slaughter was great, but most of the enemies. Eleuen thousand Bourguignons were slaine, sayeth the History, and nine hundred prisoners, amongst the which was a Germane Earle, and the King of Polands sonne: of the French there died fine thousand: and the small number of the Kings army, made the enemy continue master of the field, who gathering together the remainders of his troupes, tooke the Castell of Malauoy by assault, where Captaine Remonet (notwithstanding the faith which was giuen him when he yeelded) was hanged.

For satisfaction hereof, fiftie of the about named prisoners, were hanged by ten in a place, ten whereas Remonet was executed; ten before Douay; ten before Saint Omer, ten before Arras: and ten before Lille. Des Cordes did runne rashly to this battaile and without the Kings commandement: who was somewhat amazed with the first newes, thinking they had concealed the truth, & that it was quite lost for him. If it be so (saith he) farewell all my latter conquests: he was not accustomed to loose, but alwayes verie happie, being loath to hazard much in fight. But if any Captaine had meanes to sell him a good place, he was a liberall purchaser at what price soeuer: but the seller must afterwards take heede to his gossip Triflam the Hermit.

This blast made Lewis resolute to treat a peace with Maximilian; so as it might bee profitable vnto him; and that he might thereby curbe the Arche-duke, and by the helpe of his owne subiects, so as afterwards he should haue no meanes to annoy him. For this effect the King seekes to the Gantois, that by their mediation, a marriage might be made betwixt Charles the Daulphin, and the Daughter of the sayd Arche-duke, vpon condition to leaue him the Counties of Bourgogne, Auxerre, Mafcon, and Charalois, and to quit him Arthois, reseruing Arras in the estate hee had settled it, the City commanding the Towne, the which hereafter should be held of the crowne by the Bishop. As for the Duchie of Bourgogne, the Earldome of Boulougne, the Townes lying vpon Somme, and other places in Picardie there was no mention. The Gantois, (and by their soliciting, those of Bruges with some other chiefe Townes of Flanders and Brabant, who desired rather to suppress, then to fortifie their newe Lord,) gaue eare to this transaction, all intreating Maximilian and his wife all they could, being loath to submit themselves to his commande: first for that he was a stranger: secondly for that they knew more iudicious Princes, but not any more couetous then his father, whose son was seasoned with the same base couetousnesse, which carries with it great contempt. Notwithstanding this treating ended with a truce, attending the conclusion of a generall peace. In the meane time, our Lewis applies himselfe to order his realme, to reforme Iustice, and the Court of Parliament (especially for the tediousnes of suits) one of the principall points for the which he hated it) but without any diminution of the number of his officers nor of their authority. Moreouer he desired to bring into al the Cities of his obedience one custome, one waight, & one measure, to suppress those horrebleeches the practicioners, & the Marchants fraude. He had wonderfully oppressed his people yea wittingly: and neyther admonitions nor supplications could procure any releefe: the motion must come from himselfe, he is now whole addicted there vnto, but sometimes a burning feuer tending to furie, sometimes a cold palsey sometimes the trouble of the Emoroids, sometimes his speech fayling, sometimes some other fits or distemperature of minde, diuerts him from this good humor. To reach vs, neuer to defer that vntill to morrow, which we may presently performe: for we ought to feare, that God wil not giue vs the wil, & meanes to do wel when we haue once neglected it. All these ordinary infirmities made him siward and vnpleasing to his household seruants, causing him to take their seruices well ment in euill part. And being one day at Torgues neere vnto Chinon, about dinnertime, troubled with his ordinary fits, as he would haue draw ne towards the windowes, they hindred him: vpon his first recovery, he chased away all those that had by force stayed his approach to the windowes: neyther would he euer after admit the to his presence, holding themselves happy to enioy their offices. His iudgement being troubled, it made him thinke, that this maner of proceeding did derogate fi o his authority, which he sought to maintaine aboue al things: neither would Vpon his amendement after any infirmity, he would still knowe what expeditions and dispatches they had made. He tooke the letters, and made shewe to reade them, although he had no knowledg, or very little. Yet must they please him in all things, being dangerous to offend him. This first sate continued about fiftene dayes, at the ende whereof he recovered both speech and iudgement. He sent the Cardinall of Balue at liberty, (a prisoner since the year. 1468.) at the request and pursuite of Cardinall Saint Pierre de Vincula, Legat in France, being sent to mediate a peace betwixt Lewis and Maximilian, and to solicit them to free the Christians oppressed vnder the Turkes persecutions, whom the King furnished with hope and good words.

But being come to Peronne, and having giuen Maximilian and the Flemings intelligence of his arrival, they would not admit him, & so his voiage proued fruitlesse. Neither admissions nor requests could euer moue the King to deliuer Balue: and now a sennel drawes him to it, seeking an absolution for that he had deteyned him so long in prison. And as he feales his strength and senses to decay, so iellousie and distrust (very incident vnto him) increased daylie: and apprehending death, he feares least his orme subiects should hasten it by some new practises. In this perturbation, he remembers that Iohn Duke of Bourbon had followed the Duke of Gienne in the warre of the common weale: and that he might ioyne with the Duke of Brittain, to raise vpon new troubles and to shorten his dayes.

He appoints certaine Commissioners ill affected to the house of Bourbon, who not able directly to touch the Dukes person, they sumō his Chancellor: his Atturney generall, the Captaine of his gards, and other principall Officers, to appeere in person before the Court of Parliament at Paris. Being examined and heard, and finding nothing wherewith to charge them, they were freed: and death did soone after free the layd Duke from feare he had conceyued of the Kings hatred.

He had imitated the Duke of Bourgongnes armie, and by the aduice of des Corais his Lieutenant general in Picardie, newly imposed fiftene hundred thousand francs, for the maintenance of ten thousand foote: whereof the six thousand Suisses before mentioned were a part: two thousand five hundred pionsers, and fiftene hundred men at armes of his ordinarie, to fight on foote when as neede should require, causing a great number of carts to be made to inclose them in, and tents to campe in, and therefore he called them soldiers of the campe. And for that they complained that the Franke archers did greatly oppress the poore people he did cassier all their companye. When this newe campe was readie, he went to see it ranged in battaile in a valley neere to Pont de Larche in Normandie, vnder the command of his layd Lieutenant general, causing them to lie in campe a whole moneth together, to the ende he might see what quantity of victuals were necessary for them: and then he returned into Touraine. Being at Tours, beheld a relap, which hee feared greatly. He looth his speech, they hold him for dead, he remains two houres couched on a pallet in agony. Being somewhat recovered, seeking to diuert his disease and to reuine his spirits by the change of aire, he went to Argenton, and then returned to Tours, but still languishing of his disease foretelling his approaching death. Then he vndertooke the journey of Saint Chauld, which many gentlemen had vowed being present at his fall. Vpon his returne, newes come of the death of Muris of Bourgongne, who going a hunting mounted vpon a stirring hobbe, was cast, and after died of a cotidian, having had by Maximilian, Philip Arche Duke, Margaret afterwards Queene of France, and Francis that died young. A vertuous Prince, liberall, respected and beloued of all her subiects.

The death of Lewis of Bourgongne.

Fleeing vnto
King Lewis.

This death was wonderfull pleasing vnto our Lewis, in the midst of his afflictions, for who not dreaming that he had one foote in the graue, thinks now to do his busines the better: for (sayd he) the Emperour is miserable, and of small credit in Germanie: Maximilian young and of small experience, and ill beloued of his subiects: and moreover

A The pupilles are in the Gantois keeping, a people inclined to mutiny against the house of Bourgongne. Yet he repined much at the secret intelligences the Duke of Brittain had with the Engls: and now a new subiect thrusts him on to this enterprife, the which doubtlesse he had vndergone, if his health would haue suffered him. Francis Duke of Brittanie, vnderstanding that they made excellent armes at Milan, sent to buye a great number, and to the end they should not be discovered by the noyse, and breed a new suspicion in the King, (if he heard thereof) he caused them to be trusted vp in packages of flike with cotton. These armes passing vpon moyles through Anaergne, Doyac Gouernor of the Country had some intelligence, and aduertiseh the King thereof, who declares them forfeited to the benefit of Doyac.

The Duke of Brittain

ied.

B This buying of armes, made Lewis to gape, more then euer, after Brittain: but he desired the execution, to practise the Gouernors of Gand by the Lord of Cordes, and treats the marriage of the Daulphin his son, with Marguerit the daughter of Maximilian and Marielare deceased. The late surprise of Aire by de Cordes, amazed the Flemings and Walons, & made the willing to reeke an agreement with the King. To this end, Maximilian & they together send a great Ambassage to Arras, managed for the Arche-duke, by the Lords of Bergues and Lannoye, with some Secretaries: and for the Comonalties by the Abbots of S. Britin and Saint Peter of Gand. The King appoints his Lieutenant general in Picardie to heare the, with la Truquerie, lately created first President of the Parliament of Paris, and other graue personages. A peace is concluded by meanes of Cordes and marriage, in fauor whereof, they giue (as a portion to the layd Marguerit) the Counties of Arthois & Bourgongne, the Lands and Seigneuries of Maisnois, Auxerrois, Charolais, Salins, Bar, Sens and Noyon, to enioye them for euer. And in case that young Edward Duke of Flanders should die, Marguerite should succeed him in all the Lordships that belonged to her deceased mother, the souerainty of Flanders remayning to the King. By meanes hereof, the Artsins (that had bene confined), returned to Arras, and the City recovered her ancient name.

A peace be-

This Marguerite was conducted into France by the Lady of Ruassein, the bastard daughter of Philip Duke of Bourgongne, and received by the Duke & Duchesse of Bourbon, who led her to Amboise, the place of the Daulphins abode, where the marriage was solemnly celebrated. Edward King of England was wonderfully inced at this marriage, seeing him selfe deprived of his position: and fearing least this disgrace should breed him great contempt, yea a rebellio of his subiects, seeing the effects of that which he would not beleue. Moreover he did finde, the King had newly planted strong detestances betwixt them two, and his conquests did stretch very neere vnto him. He conceived to great a griefe vpon all these considerations, as soone after he died, partly for sorrow, and partly of an Apoplexie. Soone after the death of Edward, Lewis received letters from the Duke of Gloucester, who (by the murder of his two Nephewes Thomas of Edward his brother) had vntured the Crowne of England, and was called Richard. This Richard sought the Kings friendship, but Lewis abhorring to barbarously, would not vouchsafe to answer his letters, nor to heare his message.

At the same time, William of Marche, brother to him whom they commonly called the Boare of Ardenne, (to install his sonne in the Bishoprike of Lege, leaves a great number of foote and horse, and beseegeth Lewis brother to the Duke of Bourbon, being Bishop there. The Bishop craues succors from the Arche-duke of Austria and the Prince of Orange his brother in lawe, who not able to come in time, and west by some secret partisans of la Marche, he goes forth in armes to fight with his enemy, & was slaine: whereby la Marche entred into Lege, but soone after he was surprised by the Lord of Montigni, aided with some troupes from the Arche-duke, & sodenly beheaded.

Our

1483. Our Lewis is now well satisfied touching the affaires of Flanders: there remained no-
 The last of this life. thing but a reuenge of Brittaine. But oh how doth suspicion, feare, distrust, and finally death, breake off his great desseins? He is now at Plessis neere Tours: priuate, solitary, and shewing himselfe to few. He feares a decay of his estate, and yet is become vnable to gouerne a great Estate. The opening of a doore feares him: his owne shadow amazeth him, death terrifies him, but (the worst is) his conscience troubles him. Hee puts his most trustie seruants from him, hee doubts his neere kinnesmen, hee abhors them, hee suspects them, & suspects al the world. Those whom he doubts most, hee distrusts, with a couple of his gard to guide them, pensiuely, sad, dreaming, froward, peevish, and cholerick: euery thing displeaseth him, all is vnreasonable, all offends him, he knowes not what is fittest for him, either life or death, and yet would he liue & strange. He knows that he hath many enemies, and hath offended many: that the greatest of the Princes loue him not; that the meaner sort murmured, and that the people hated him: for he hath ouercharged them, yea more then any of his Predecessors; and hath not meane to ease them; and although he hath a will, yet it is now too late.

His disposition in his declining age.

Conscience mille te res.

Oh what a greuous testimonie, is the conscience of our misdeeds: fewe enter at Plessis, but his household seruants, and the Archers of his gard, whereof there are foue hundred daily in gard at the gate. No Noblemen lodgeth there, none come there but his sonne in law Peter, (afterwards Duke of Bourbon), (by the death of John his brother) and few of his followers: and yet he thinks still, that some one enters in to offer violence to his person: or that by loue or force they will pull his scepter from him. He causeth his sonne to bee straitly garded, and will not suffer many to see him, least hee should be made the head of a faction. His daughter hath no access to him. His son in law no credit. His sonne in Law returns from the Daulphins marriage. Lewis with a deuise, makes the Captaine of his gard to search such as are entred with the Duke to see if they were not secretly armed. He commands him to hold the Counsell, then he dissolues it: for in his absence they would make Monopoles. Who did euer see a mind more distract? more vnquiet? and fuller of cares? Hee distrusts his sonne, his daughter, his sonne in law, and generally all those that may commaund.

The Castle gate is safely garded, but they may leape ouer the walls: they must bee planted with gaddes of iron, with many points, and so thicke as no man might passe them: and moreover the ditch at Plessis, compassed in with great barres, with care engins of fire in at the corners: Canoniers, and fortie cross-bow-men were appointed to stand, teene a day and night sentinell in the ditch, with commission to shooe at any one that should approach in the night, vntill the opening of the gate in the morning. Doubtlesse, the iustice of God would that those cages of iron, and those of wood covered with plates of iron both within and without, those shakles, bolts, manacles, cheines, tyed to a great bowle, waighie beyond humane force: where hee had often times imprisoned many, (yea and of honour,) for very fitioulous causes, should now be so many tortures to his conscience, at the last point of his death: and as he had given them eight foote in bredth, and it may be so much in height, to stretch out themselves: so hee now retires himselfe into a little corner of the Castle, and like another Terillus, they were fatal to their first deuise: the Bishop of Verdun remained some teene yeares shut vp in the first that was made.

To conclude, no dispatch came to Court, during this lamentable estate. The King had but one or two about him, men of no credit, who knew well, that after his death, the best that could chance vnto them, was to be shamefully chased away. But a great confusion attends them shortly. These men made no report vnto him of anything that happened, but onely that which concerned the Estate and the realme, labouring to maintaine loue with all men.

Strange distempers.

As for his person, euery day a new grome of his chamber, euery day new seruants. Yet knowes hee not whome to trust. One onely amongst the rest gets some credit, but forced. It is his Phisition, James Cottier a Bourguignon: he giues him 10000. crownes monthly, and what offices, or what lands he will demand, be it from himselfe, or his friends.

friends: and for a nephew of his the Bishopricke of Amiens, and (as a man would say) 1483. his Crowne and his scepter, so as he will prolong his life. An odious, impudent, and audacious Phisition: who to continue his credit, sayed vnto the King. I know well that one of these mornings, you will send me away with the rest, but (swearing a great oath, you shall not lue eight dayes after. A strange hurt-breaking, to be braued by a rascally booke-astomany great Princes did yeeld him voluntary obedience. But oh vanitie, to thinke that the deuice of man can adde one minute to mans life. Lewis had neede to haue been put in mind of this Oracle: I haue said, you are Gods, and all the children of the Lord: but you shall dislike men: and you that are the principall shall fall like other men.

Lewis braued by his Phisition.

At that time liued Francis borne at Paulin in Calabria, a deuout Hermit, without learning, but of an austere life, and holy reputation, founder of the Suirs Monines. The King sent for him by a Steward of his house, in the company of the Prince of Valentim, sonne to the King of Naples: at the first sight hee kneeles vnto him, and desires him to prolong his dayes. In truth, we haue often zeale, but not according to knowledge. But, Put no confidence in the chiefe of the people, nor in any of the somes of man, who haue no power to deliuer thee. O how happie is he, whome the mightie God of Israhel, and whose trust is in the *Eterna*l. In the meane time, Lewis declines, and death follows him at the heeles: yet will hee not haue men to thinke so, and on its no intention to diuert this opinion, both within and without the realme. Within, he attires himselfe richly, contrary to his custome, and shewes him selfe, but onely in his Court, and gallerie: he makes seuerall lawes, to be feared: sends away officers, dischargeth men at armes, cuts off pensions, and takes some quite away. To conclude, hee passeth his time, to make and marre men. Without the realme, he payes that due in England which he owes, & in all other places, where he will haue them thinke that he is found and alive: he sends men vnder colour to buy something: Into Spaine, Naples, and Germanie, some horses, in Sicile, some good mules, but especially of some good officer of the Countie, and payed double for them. In Brittaine, gray-hounds, and spaniels. In the kingdome of Valence, little water-dogges. In Denmarke and Sueden, haukes. In Burbye, little Lions, of the bignes of foxes. To conclude, the more he feared the decay of his dignitie toward his latter end, the more he sought to be feared, and takes away all occasions to thinke that his end approached. Feeling his end drawe neere, hee sent for the Daulphin his sonne, whome he had not seene in many yeares, causing him to be noursished apart, least the colour of his presence should haue bred some faction, as there had rashly risen in his yong age against Charles the 7. his father. And experience hauing taught him, how dangerous a sodaine alteration was: he commaunded him expressly not to displace any Officer, and especially to maintaine Oliuer le Dain in the offices and goods hee had gotten in his seruice, as hauing assisted him well in his sicknesses. But as this man was haughty & too highly exalted, so must he and some others of like sort be shortly suppressed, and John Doyac, gouernour of Auvergne, from whome he had receiued good and notable seruices, to call maister Guyot Pot, and the Lord of Bouchage to Counsell, to follow Philippe of Cordes for armes: Not to beleue his mother, especially in the gouernment of his State. Who (as a Sauoisien) hee had found by experience, to fauour the Bourguignons, and generally to confirme all those in their dignities, whome he had aduanced. And to ease the people, whome hee had oppressed by the necessitie of the warres. Few dayes after the King had spoken to the Daulphin his sonne, his ordinarie infirmities takes him, & suddenly lost his speech, with a great debility of his forces. Hauing recovered (judging himselfe but a dead man) he sent the Duke of Bourbon to the king his son (so the he called him) giuing him the charge & gouernment of his said son. Then he sent the Chancellor with the seale, & part of the archers of his gard, & Captaines: al his hounds, hauks, & other things, & all such as came to see him, he sent them to Amboise. Yet was he not so wel resolved for his death, but he had some hope to escape, namely by the means of his Hermit, & a multitude of relicks which were brought from Rheims, from Paris, & from Rome, the holy oyle, the rodd of Moses & Aaron, the holy Crosse (were it true or false) & such like, vntill the diuines had

A hard sentence to a man that had so often commanded, that euen in the last pangs they should not pronounce that cruell word of death, the which he feared beyond the condition of man; and preuented by all the remedies that might be inuented. Yet behold he disposeth himselfe; I haue (said he) hope that God will helpe me: but withall hee addes: yet happily I am not so fuke as you suppose. Norwithstanding, he felt the helpe of heauen: for his speech was restored, his vnderstanding good, his memory perfect, whereby he pronounced many prayers, adding therevnto, by his last Will & Testament: That de Cordes should giue ouer the enterprife they had concluded vpon Calais: that they should suffer the Duke of Brittany to liue in peace, without feare of suspect, and likewise all the neighbors of the realme: that vnder the shadow of a peace of fife or sixe yeares, the people might breathe, and the King his sonne grow in age. Finally, on Saterday the 30. of August, he yeelds vp his soule quietly to God, hauing liued 61. yeares, and reigned three and twenty: he made chioise for his buriall at our Lady of Clery, the place of his deuotion.

A cunning Prince, wise, painfull, reuengefull, vigilant, industrious, of a great memorie, neuer hazarding that, which by policie, dissembling, money, or any other industrie he might obtaine: vnquiet in his raigne, vnquiet in his life, and vnquiet in his death, not able to resolute but in extremities. Deuout, but inclining to superstition. A great oppressor of the people, but to giue to the Churches, to forraigne pensioners, and to purchase them deere, whom hee had fitte for his purpose: as wee may easily perceiue by the discourse of his life. He was continent beyond the ordinary of great and generous Princes: and in truth greatly to be commended, in that he had so vermouthlie contained himselfe within the bounds of his professed vowe, and neuer to haue knowne other women then his owne wife. And if the 61. yeare, (the which hee alwayes apprehended as the fatall periode of his life, for that none of his predecessors, since Hugh Capet, had passed that terme) had not ended his life, hee had reformed the State, ordred iustice, and releued the people. Happy in his death, hauing changed a continuall toile, into an eternall rest: happy in that rest (which wee hope for in heauen): To haue left a Successor quiet of himselfe, young, but of great hope, and chiefly, for that he had scene the Church, during his raigne, freed from that long and inueterate three and twentie yeares Schisme, which had so long turmoiled it. Thus are we come to the end of this raigne: but before we proceed, we must succinctly view the Estate of the Church and Empire vnder his raigne, seeing the course of our historie hath drawne vs on thereto without interruption.

Wee haue scene, that by the renunciation of Felix the 5. Nicholas the fift of that name, remained in quiet possession of the Pontificall See. The most memorable acts of his Papacie, were the great Iubile, which he did celebrate in the yeare 1450. where there was so great a concurse of people, that about two hundred were smothered, going and coming out of the Churches, besides an infinite number of people that perished in the riuer of Tyber; through the fall of the bridge of Saint Angelo. This Pope loued learning, he gaue great pensions to learned men, sent them into diuerse places, to seeke out bookes which lay hidden in darkenesse, by the negligence of the ancient, or perished by the violence of the barbarous, filling his Librarie at Rome: he caused many Greeke Authors to be translated into Latin. He repaired many Churches and other buildings ruined at Rome, enriching them with vessels of golde and siluer, and crosses enriched with precious stones. Finally (griued for the taking of Constantinople from the Christians) he dyed of thought, of a Feuer and the Gout, (or as some will say, of poison) the 25. of March 1455.

Calixtus the 3. of that name, a Spaniard, of the age of 85. yeares, before called Alphonfus Borgias, Bishop of Valence, and Cardinall of the foure Crownes, succeeded by the consent of the whole Colledge: commended, for that in the first frutes of his Popedom, he had (according to a vowe he had made,) proclaimed a warre against Mahomet. And to induce the Princes, hee sent some notable Preachers in those dayes, 1483. A dayes, John Capistran, and Robert de la Lize, friars, to exhort Christians to relieue their bretheren, detayned vnder the Turkes tyrannie, and by ringing of the bell at noone day, to inuite them to pray for those that fought for this quarrell: yet blamed for that, vnder colour of his Indulgences and pardons, which were sold for fife ducats a peece, hee had gathered together, and left to his successor, a hundred and fiteene thousand ducats.

He died in Iuly, 1458. Pius. the 2. called Aeneas Silvius, a Siennois, a poore boy, hauing attained to much knowledge; by his laborious studie, obteyned the dignitie of Pope. He had bene the Popes Secretarie, at the Councell of Basil, and by writing had impugned the authoritie of Eugenius the Scismatick: and soone after was crowned Pope. Hee latest, by the Emperour Frederic the 3. and honoured by him with many Ambassages to diuerse Princes. Nicholas the 5. made him Bishop of Triest, and after of Sienna: and Calixtus, Cardinal. But vppon his entrie to the Popedom, he sought to suppress two bookes, which he had published for the approbation of the Councell of Basil, and afterward laboured very ambitiously to enlarge the Romaine sea: for the encrease and preferment whereof, the historie saith, he neither feared Kings, nor Princes, people, nor Tyrants. A great enemy to King Lewis the 11. whilst that he would not yeeld to the abolition of that Pragmaticke Sanction: who to crosse him in that yeere 64. did forbid to carrie any money to Rome; or to bring any bulls from thence, renewing the same Edicts in the yeare 1478. But in the end he was so flattered by this Aeneas, & by his successor Sixtus the 4. as he renounced all the rights of the Pragmaticke Sanction. He had likewise proclaymed a voyage into Turkie, by a Counsell assembled at Mantua. But the Ambassadors of King Lewis and of René Duke of Anjou (hauing laid open the rights which the house of Anjou had to the Realme of Naples, and the wrong was done him, vsurping it to the behoofe of Alphonso the bastard of Ferdinand, whom this Pope had by his absolute authoritie put in possession of the Realme) he grew so bitter against the French, for Ferdinand, as the sayd Ambassadors would not promise any thing in their masters name, for this warre: so as the assembly was dissolved, the eighth moneth, without any good to Christendome. An ambitious man, austere to Princes, a great persecuter of the enemies of the Clergie, curteous and officious to his friends, busie for the enriching of the Church, a great builder. And finally, as hee was readie to depart from Ancona, to march in person against the Turke, who was then entred Italie, a Cotidian ague seized on him, whereof hee dyed in the yeare 1464. Of him we reade thus much: as Platina and Sabellius doe report. Priests are forbidden to marrye for a great reason, but yet there is a greater for the which they should bee suffered. and moreover Paraduventure, it should not be the worse, if many Priests were married, for many being Priests and married, should bee saved, the which in their barren Calibats are damned. Hee likewise would haue abolished some Nunneries of Saint Brigit and Saint Clare, & caused the Nunnes to come forth, to the end (saith Calixtus secundus) that vnder the habit of religion they should not hide their adulteries.

Paul the second, borne at Venice, before named Peter Barbo, Cardinal of Saint Mare, succeeded. His first calling was marchandise, but seeing an vnckle of his chosen Pope, he applied himselfe somewhat to learning, and was first created Arch-deacon of Boullen, then Bishop of Cerua, after Cardinall, and finally Pope. A man of a good personage, but arrogant & proud; so as Platina obserues, that he first spake these wordes: That the Pope carries within the circuite of his bosome all diuine and humane laws. Exceeding all his Predecessors in attyre: but about all in his mitre, the which hee enriched with pearle and stones of an inestimable price, shewing himselfe proudly vpon solemne dayes; thus sumptuously attyred, followed by his Cardinalls with scarlet barres, (the which hee did forbid all others to weare, vpon greuous minishments) and mounted vppon mules with footclothes of the same colour: grosse and dull witted, louing neither learning, nor learned men: so as he declared them Hereticks that either in sport or earnest did pronounce this word Academy or Vniuersity. Couetous, dissolute, voluptuous, turbulent, giuen to cōuiring & the whole time of his raigne he troubled

The pride and pompe of Paulus the 2.

The Popes disposition,

1483. Italie, with combustions and homebred warres. Finally they report little good of him, but that he had bene pitifull to the poore and needy, to haue preferred Rome from famine, and reformed many Monasteries, reducing them to a better discipline. They say, that hauing one day read certaine poesies, made against him and his daughter, he began to grieve, and to blame the rigour of the law made by his predecessors, who did forbid Priests to marrie: so as seeing himselfe a scome to the people, hee resolved to giue Priests liberty to marry: but an Apoplexie tooke him suddenly out of this world, the 25. of Iuly 1471. leauing a rich treasure. In trueth, They gather goods (saith the Oracle) and know not who shall enioy them. Some impute this sodaine death to the Author of the Magicke arte, the which he practised.

Sixtus the 4. borne at Sauonne, and named Francis of Ruere, Generall of the Grey Friars, and Cardinall of Sixte, Legat of Auignon, was installed by the election of the Colledge, in the Pontificall chaire. Liberall and charitable to his owne, beyond the bounds of true zeale: for in their fauour he gaue Indulgences and pardons prodigally, and granted many other things against all right and reason: so saith the Historie. Amongst the rest, he aduanced Peter of Ruere to a Cardinallship: a monstrous man in his expences, who in two moneths deuoured in vanities, dissoluition and loosenesse, aboue two hundred thousand Crownes, besides the debts wherewith he charged his heires. He repaired many decayed Churches and Monasteries, built new, and gaue them great renewes. He restored the Abreuiataires, (which was a Colledge of learned men, and studious in diuine and humane lawes, Poets, Orators, Historiens, &c.) first instituted by Pius the 2. then abolished by Paul the 2. his succesor. Then did he institute anew the Bullistes, people fitter to get money, then for any other thing, and nine Notaries of the Apostolick treasure, appointing them certaine reuenues: which offices were sold in the beginning for five hundred crownes, and since for two or three thousand crownes: so well could they sell their marchandise. Sixtus made many vniuersal warres, against Ferdinand King of Naples, for that against the Popes liking, he had succoured his sonne in law Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrare, besieged by the Venetians. Against the Venetians whom he did excommunicate. Against the Florentins, excommunicated likewise with an interdiction of fire and water. But by the intercession & threats of the King, & the succours the Venetians gaue to the Florentins against the Pope (who had incensed Ferdinand King of Sicile, Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, and Frederick Duke of Pybin, Captaine generall for the Church) to make warre against them hee abolished them. Then being sick of a Feuer, hauing newes that a peace was made betwixt the Venetians and other Potentates of Italy, hee dyed suddenly. There flourished vnder him Iohn of Mont le Roy, a great Mathematician, Ralph Agri-cola, Pomponius Latius, Ambrose Calepin, learned men in humanitie. Let it suffice, to haue noted such Popes as haue reigned vnder our Lewis, and now let vs see that which concernes the Empire.

The estate of the Empire.

That great Iohn Huniades, a firme and sound rampier for the Christians against the Turkes, had left two sonnes, Ladislaus & Matthias. They had for an hereditarie enemy Vlricke Earle of Cilie, neere kinsman and a favorite to Ladislaus King of Hongarie and Bohemia, sonne to Albert of Austria, borne after his fathers death. Ladislaus the eldest, complaining one day to Vlricke, of the slanders wherewith he wrongfully charged him to King Ladislaus, they passed from words to blowes, so as he flue Vlricke: for the which the King of Hongarie caused him to bee publickly beheaded, and lead Matthias the younger prisoner to Prague in Bohemia, to put him to death, farre from the view of the Nobility of Hongarie, to whom the memory of Huniades was wonderfull deere and precious. But as Ladislaus prepared for his marriage at Prague, to be sonne in law to Charles the 7. beheld a blacke and deadly poison suddenly choakes vp the key which that new alliance had conceined. After whose death there did arise great quarrels for the succession. Some Noblemen of Hungarie, wished the Emperour Frederick the third for their King: the greatest part preferred Matthias, both for that he was of the nation, as for the happy memory of his father Iohn.

The

A The election being made, Matthias is set at libertie by George Boiebrac, the new King of Bohemia: hee demands the Crowne. Frederick armes himselfe with a constitution, which he had received from Elizabeth mother to Ladislaus deceased, when he sent him her sonne to bring vp. Vpon refusal they go to armes: but the Germane Princes pacified this quarrell, concluding, That Matthias should pay for his Crowne vnto the Emperour, foure score thousand crownes.

Warre for the Crowne of Hungary.

In the meane time there springs vp new seeds of warre in Germanie. Pius the 2. making the Emperour and his deuotion to the Romaine sea, his support, puts Ditericke Isebourg from the Arch-bishopricke of Mayence, establishing Adolph of Nassau in his place. Isebourg opposed himselfe vigorously against the Popes exactions, who spoiled (as he said) the Prouinces, vnder a pretext of warre against the Turke: and moreover, he would not tie himselfe by othe vnto the Pope, who would likewise binde the future Ecclesiasticall Electors, not to assemble the Electors of the Empire, for the election of any new Emperour, or for any other cause concerning the Empire, before they were duly informed, to the end his pleasure might bee preferred before all others. An audacious and vniuersall demand. Frederick the victorious Conte Palatin of Hauten administrator of the Electorship for his Nephew Philip, the sonne of Lewis his brother, being a pupill, stood firmly for Isebourg. Lewis Duke of Bauiere, surnamed the rich, ioynes with Frederick. The Emperour hated them both, and desired much to crosse them (although in his heart he had reason to fauour that party, for the which they fought): but hee feared the valour of Fredericke, and the wealth of Lewis. The Pope vergeth him to stirre vp some great Princes of Germanie, to oppose against the Protectors of Isebourg, rather then against Isebourg himselfe. Adolph of Nassau, was assisted by Albert Marquis of Brandebourg, Lewis of Bauiere, surnamed the black, Charles Marquis of Bade, and his brother, Iohn Bishop of Mets, with Vlricke Earle of Wintemberg: all which enuied the prosperitie of Frederick, and yet feared to trie his valour. Frederick was the weaker in men, but right hath a strong partie. They neglecting their enemies small forces, charge him disorderly: he resists them valiantly, beats them, defeats them, and puts them to flight, takes the Marquis of Bade, the Bishop of Mets, and the Earle of Wintemberg prisoners, the first of Iuly 1461. and to let them vnderstand that they had erred in the discipline of warre, spoiling the corne, & burning the Mills, he caused them to sup the first night of their imprisonment without bread.

Warres in Germany.

The end of this warre was the beginning of an other, more fatall for the Emperour. The Pope deposed George Boiebrac from the crowne of Bohemia, as fauouring the doctrine of Hus, and appoint Matthias, surnamed Corwinus: but the Emperour would not graunt it, depending of the Empire. Matthias was much moued, and the more, when as after the death of George, the Lords of Bohemia, and the Emperour likewise, leasing him, made choise of Ladislaus the sonne of Casimir, King of Polland, and of Elizabeth, daughter to Albert of Austria. In this warre, the imperiall Maiestie was not onely shaken, but through Fredericks misfortune almost ruined, and he in a maner expelled out of Austria, & it reduced vnder the power of a strange Lord, mighty and warlike: When as beheld Albert Duke of Saxony, sonne to Frederick, 2. Elector of Saxony, father to the Duke George and Henry, Grand-father to Maurice and Augustus Electors, leues a goodly armie at his own charge, assailes Matthias, & so weakens him in many battels, as he abandons the greatest part of Austria, & forceth him in the end to accept a peace with such conditions as Albert would impose. During these parties in the West, God raised vp some meanes, to crosse the Turkes exploits, if the diuisions of Christian Princes, for the most part procured by the Popes, whilst they fed themselves, had not conuerted their owne forces against themselves. Three yeares after this princell wound which the christian church receiued by the losse of Constantinople, Matthias the 2. besieged Belgrade, but to his confusion. A handfull of men, lead by that brave Huniades, in two dayes together giue him two bloody battailes, wins them, kills also it fortie thousand of his men, spoiles his campe, takes his Artillerie, & with some difficulty he saued his person, being wounded in the left pappe, and carried out of the fight as dead.

A great defeat of Turke.

Mahumed

1483. Mahomet seeing by this disgrace, that the land did not fauor him; he meanes to tie an other ayre: hee rigges a great fleet of gallies, to seize vpon the Islands of the Archipelagus. But he had purchased a mighty enemy, Vssumcassan of the race of Asimberia Turke, Lord of Cappadocia, Armenia, & some other Countries adioyning, who had lately slaine Molisonbre, or (as some write) Demir of Persia, and by that victorie inuaded the Realme.

The Turkes

third battayle.

Vssumcassan hauing disapointed the desseins of Mahomet, grewe so proud, that to make the victory the more famous, he drewe rich presents out of the treasures of Persia, and sent them vnto Mahomet, requesting him not to attempt any thing against Trebisonde, nor Cappadocia (a conquerors request imports an imperious commande) countries which belonged vnto him by reason of the dowry of his wife, the daughter of David Comnene. Mahomet not able to digest that a meaner then himselfe should preferre him a lawe, employes all his wit to obfure the glorie of this newe King. Hee therefore sends a part of his fleet into Asia, directly to Pontus and Sinope, towards Trebisonde. And he himselfe with an incredible speed crosseth Asia, and camps neere to Vssumcassan. Three battailes are fought: Vssumcassan wins the first against Amurath Bascha, a Greeke by nation, neere to the riuer of Euphrates, which Bascha was slaine; and the second against Mahomet, where he was in person. These two battailes did wonderfully weaken the Turkes forces. In the third, the Persians amazed with the vnaccustomed noyse of the Turkish shot, vnable to endure the terrour of the harguebush, Vssumcassan and his men oppressed with this newe army, lost the honour of the two first dayes, and Remald the sonne of Vssumcassan was slaine with a shot.

Mahomet pursues his good fortune, beseegeth and takes Sinope the capitale Citie of the Prouince; and afterwards all Paphlagonia: then he camps before Trebisonde, batters it by sea and land, and in the end takes it; spoiles the treasors of King David Comnene: sends him prisoner with his two sonnes, and his Cousin Iohn le Beau, to Constantinople, to senie for a shewe, the day of his triumphe, carling them afterwards to be barbarously slaine, rooting out the race of Comnenes. In the same voiage he tooke Cilicia from Piramet Carsman, and being returned to Constantinople, hee conquered with his armie by Sea, the Islands of Lemnos and Lesbos: he vnpeopled Mitilene, and transported the Inhabitants of the Ile into an other country.

With his forces at land hee assayed Dracula Prince of Valachia: who with such small forces of foote and horse, as the shortnesse of time would suffer him to leue, did so surprise and shut vp Mahomet, as both he and his army were in a manner ruined: when as beheld Mahomet Bascha, Lieutenant Generall in the Turkes army, with a braue & hardie resolution opened the passage by force: but with great losse of his forces, the which (fortified with newe troupes,) hee sends into high Misus and Selawonia: chased Stephen King of Bosnie, out of Laiue the chiefe Citie: dispossessed him of his Realme, and in the end slewe him: about the yeare. 1463. A while after Matthias King of Hongarie recovered the sayd Citie and Realme, ouerthrew a great armie of Turkes spoiling the country of Sirme, tooke many places in Croatia and Dalmatia: and in the end expelled Mahomet, being come to beseege Laiue: spoiled his campe, and was master of all his baggage. Scanderbeg, (expelled his country,) was retired into Italy, where shewing that the diuision of Christian Princes was the meanes to confirme the Turkes estate, and that it was impossible to make him giue ouer this audacious and insatiable desire: beeing at Lisse vpon the riuer of Drille, hee was surprised with a feuer, whereof hee died, being threescore and three yeares old, in the yeare. 1467.

Scanderbeg

His vermes.

A Prince exceeding all men in valour, of an wonderfull courage: so as euen with vehemency his lippes did bleed, at the beginning of euery charge. Hee neuer retired battaile, neuer turned his backe: neuer was hurt but once, lightly in the foote with an arrowe: he neuer led about six thousand horse and three thousand foote, and had slaine with his owne hand about two thousand barbarians, striking with such force, as he cut many in two peeces.

Mahomet

Mahumed being freed by the death of Scanderbeg, vndertooke three warres at one instant: Misithes of the race of the Paleologues, had commission to go to Rhodes: Acomath Bascha into Italy, to conquer it, with Rome, and the Empire of the West: and Mahumed himselfe goes into Asia. Misithes being often beaten, was forced to returne with the remainders of his armie, languishing and in pittifull estate. Acomath lands in Calabria, takes Otranto, and so amazeth all Italy, as the Pope (neglecting all in regard of the safetie of his person) resolues to leaue Rome. Mahumed going into Asia, died of the Collick, neere vnto Nicomedia, in the yeare 1471. A happy death for the Christians: for Otranto besieged by the Italians, aided by Matthias, was yeilded by composition, with their liues and goods saued, without attending fine and twenty thousand Turkes, which Acomath pursuing his victorie, brought to their succours. Thus Italy was deliuered from imminent danger, and the Pope assured: we will now leaue the raigne of Batazet, second successor to Mahumed, to continue our worke in the West.

CHARLES the eight, the 56. King of France.

His raigne will not hold vs long, but after the Duke of Orleans league, the motiue of five yeares warre in Brittanie ended, by the Kings marriage with Anne the eldest daughter to Francis Duke of Brittanie, we shall be transported beyond the Alpes, to take the possession, which René King of Sicile, and Charles Earle of Maine his brother, had by their testaments left to Lewis the xi. to the rights they pretended to the realme of Naples: vpon the way wee shall see him entertained by Lewis Sforce, in the Towne of Ast; then hauing received the Forts of Florence, with the Citie of Pisa,

A briefe rehearsall of Charles his raigne.

1483. from Peter de Medicis, he enters Rome, notwithstanding the gainsaying of Pope Alexander: & having vsed therein the rights of a conquerour, he treats an accord with the said Pope: receiues from him the title of Emperour of Constantinople, with the institution of the realme of Naples: and consequently causeth himselfe to bee crowned King of Sicile. And to augment his honour, hee makes his passage, maugre the forces of all the Princes and Potentates of Italie, at Fournoue: and laden with glorie and spoiles, retournes triumphantly to seeke some rest in France, after his wearie toyles. But alas, when as in the greene and vigorous season of his life, he shall meditate of a second voyage for the recouerie of his realme of Naples, (as easily lost as wonne,) and when as the Easterne partes liued in hope to haue the Christian church restored by him, oppressed now vnder the Turkish Traine. Death vniust and vnseasonable, according to man, shal with himselfe cut off all his goodly desseins, the which he had laid in the beginning of his flourishing youth, to carry him to the fruition of a better rest. The iudicious reader may iudge, if we haue reaped more honour & profit in the getting, then shame & hurt in the losse of so many Estates lying farre from vs. Charles came to the Crowne at the age of 13. yeares, delicate, weake, sickly in his youth, mild, gracious, deuout: but wilful in his humors. Lewis had bred him vp at Ambaise, attended on by few seruants, not visited by any, without any instruction, but bare reading, not willing to helpe nature by art. Yet the weaknes thereof hath often times more need of a prop to support it, & a spur to pricke it forward, then of a bitt to restraine it. Did he feare that learning should impair his health, or corrupt the good seeds which nature hap planted in his mind. He was content, that according to his fathers humour, his sonne should learne this only sentēce in Latin. He that cannot dissemble, cannot rule. But he did him wrong: for he was inclined to the reading of French books: & he came no sooner to the crowne, but they found in him a desire of knowledge, which made him to haue a taste in the Latin tongue. But as the aptest of his age was slippt away without profit, so did hee salute the Muses but a farre off: weake of bodie, but of a good wit, capable of counsell, & susceptible of the helpes requisite for the gouernment of a firme & solide State. His minority was the cause of a quarrell, betwixt the Duke of Orleans (a young Prince and neere to the Crowne, and the Earle of Beauieu, for the Regencie: which caused his Coronation to be differred vntill the next yeere: after the which an assembly of States should determine of the administration of the King & Realme. The Princes of the bloud attending this sollemnitie, hauing bin so often wronged by Oliuer le Daim, Daniel his seruant, & Doyac, who had wholly gouerned the deceased King, did without the Kings priuite (whose young yeares withheld him from gouernment) informed of their insolencies, proud carriage, vniust murders, thefts, extortions, & other crimes, which they had committed vnder the authoritie of Lewis the x. and by a decree of the Court, make Daniel forsake both bodie and goods, and his master like wife some few dayes after. Doyac whipped at the corner of euery street, lost one of his eares vpon the pillerie, at the Halles of Paris, then hauing his tongue peared with a whor iron, he was conuicted to Mont Ferrant in Auuergne, where he was borne: there they cut off his other eare, & whipt him likewise. Moreouer, the excessive rewards which Lewis had giuen to some persons, were reuoked, and they constrained to make restitution. To teach meane men, raised by the bountie of Kings, that man is mortall, but the memorie of indignitie is immortal with great men.

At the same time the Duke of Brittaine was wholly possessed by Peter Landay his Treasurer, (of whom we haue formerly spoken,) by whose flanders and suggestions he had suffered his Chancellor Chauuin, to die miserably in prison, of hungar, and cold: being a very honest and a reuerend man. Landays was the sonne of a poore Taylor in the suburbs of Rachapt, at Vitry in Brittaine, as it appeareth in his proces, quicke witted, and busie headed. His first accessse vnto the Duke was in the qualitie of a Taylor, and after hee vsed him to carrie his loue letters, the said Duke being of a very amorous disposition. In the end he makes him master of his wardroppe, and finally his Treasurer generall; then hee begun to manage the Treasor, Iustice and affaires of State at his pleasure to many, and preferre Officers by his letters without the Dukes appointment,

A pointment, to place or displace whome he pleased: proud, treacherous, reuengefull, implacable to such as had offended him. Presumptuous, declaring such Noblemen of Brittaine, as could no longer endure his arrogancie, guiltie of high Treason, for that they had attempted against his personne, forfeites their goods, banisheth their persons, and arming his maister to their destruction, the which they could not auoyd, but by a generall pardon and remission.

In the end their patience is moued. John of Chalon Prince of Orange, sonne to one of the Dukes sisters, and John of Rieux Marshall of Brittaine, the principal of his Court, hauing layed a plot, with the other Barons of the Country, at all aduentures to seize vpon Landays: they enter the Castell of Nantes, being secretly armed, seeke for Landays, and finde him not, being gone to Pabottiere, a house of his vpon Loire, neere vnto Nantes. The Duke is amazed at this insolent proceeding, and beleuees it is some practice against his person: One of his seruants goes vp to the batlements towards the Towne, and cries out aloud: That they seeke to force the Duke. The archers of his guard storme: the Officers and gentlemen of his house flie thether, the people troupe together. They plant such Cannons, as they finde in the Towne against the Castell, ready to batter downe the gate. The vndertakers (who had not foreseene so dangerous a consequence) shewe forth the Duke vpon the batlements, and cause him to speake. He assures them, that they haue not attempted any thing against his person: and to satisfie the multitude, Philip of Montauban enters by agreement, hee aduiseeth these Noblemen to absent themselves for a time, in the meane time the people would be pacified, and the Dukes wrath appeased. Landays on the other side hauing escaped a troupe that was sent to surpris him in his house, saues himselfe through the ditches of his garden, alone, and on foote: and so in the night recouers the Castell of Poënné, and giues the Duke notice of his aduenture. The Duke sends a Conuoie for him, and is more ruled by him then before. So Landays assembles all the Officers and men of Counsell in Brittaine. hee sends to the Vniuersities of Italy, layes open the violence done to the Duke in his owne house, by his vassalles and subiects, and demands what punishment this offence deserues. The Assemblée answers, as Landays desired: That they found them guilty of high treason, yea in the highest degree, and therefore deserued death and losse of goods. A decree followes, with condemnation of death, houses beaten downe, woods cut vp at the wast, with all the rigours which men condemned for such a crime might deserue. They flie into France, & offer their seruice to the countesse of Beauieu, the kings sister, cōplaining of the insolencies of Landays, without making further mention of their quarrel with the Duke. Landays discouers their retreat, he vnderstands of the discord betwixt Lewis Duke of Orleans, & the said Ladie, & causeth his master, by letters written to Lewis to accuse the disobedience & treachery of his nobility, who acknowledging Anne for Regent of the Realme, depriued him of the honor & right that was due to him rather then to a woman, as the first Prince of the bloud: he exhorts him not to relinquish his iustitle, & promisseth to assist him with his best meanes. The Duke of Orleans had against his minde (as we haue heard) married Ioane the yongest daughter of Lewis x. deformed and vnfit for conception: and followed the onely aduice of the Earle of Dunois, sonne to John bastard of Orleans, a man of great foresight, aduised, & a good and a valiant captain. This Earle did presently forecast, that (by the meanes of Landais, who did so secretly inuite Duke Lewis) forsaking Ioane, he might marrie with Anne the eldest daughter of Francis Duke of Brittain. This hope drew him soone to Nantes, where hauing heard the cōplaints of the French, and contented the with words and promises, without any meaning to accomplishe the, moued rather with desire to gouerne the state, he retournes into France, to assist at the Kings coronation at Rheims, whereof the day appointed. There were present at the Kings coronation, the Dukes of Orleans, Alençon, Bourbon, & Lorraine, the Earles of Beauieu, Angoulême, Vendôme, la Roche sur Yon, Montpermier, Lorgueuille, Foix, Dunois, and those that were fled out of Brittain, the Prince of Orange, John Lord of Rieux, & Ancenis, the Earle of Aumale Ponceet de la Riviere, who was created Mayre of Bourdeaux the lord of Vrfe, (who was created master of the horse) & others of their troupe, al which brought him with pompe to make his entry into Paris, 1484. and to prepare for a generall Parliament to bee held at Tours, with more free access then had beene vsuall, yet not so effectuell as was expected: euery one seeking rather to mainteine his priuate authoritie, then to procure the peoples ease. The Pragmatick Sanction was restored, to vse it as they had accustomed. The Constables sword was giuen to the Duke of Bourbon, the gouernment of the Kings person to his sister, a cunning woman, and somewhat of her fathers humour: but the name of Regent was forbidden to them all, to preuent ialousies. There was a Councell erected of twelve, by whom matters should be dispatched in the Kings name: of the which Lewis Duke of Orleans should be president.

The Countesse of Brabant the Kings sister hath the gouernment of his person. Lewis put from the Regencie.

Lewis discontented with this deuice, seeks to hold his ranke, hee pretends that being the chief Prince of the blood, the Regencie belonged vnto him, assists at the Councell in Parliament, and in the assemblies in Towne, and notwithstanding the last will of King Lewis, and the decree of the Estates, yet will hee by force haue the name and effect of Regent. But our Kings (who may not to preiudice the elder, or for want of issue, their neereft kinsman, being a male and legitimate,) dispose of their Crowne: haue they not then power to comit the gard of their children, being yet pupils, & the Regencie of the Realme to whome they please? Morcouer was it reasonable that hee which was not yett five and twentie yeeres old, who liued vnder his mothers wing, who by right had yet need of a gouernor, should bee declared capable for the gouernment of this Realme? So, want of yeeres depriued his grandfather of the same dignitie, during the phrenesie of Charles the 6. This discontent is nourished by a newe accident: Lewis playing one day at Tennis, where the Ladies were present, there fell a blow in controuersie, the which Anne iudged for the aduersie part. Lewis otherwise mooued, casts out some word, importing a lye. Anne discontented herewith, causeth it to be decreed in Court, that the Duke should bee committed prisoner: hee is aduerted thereof by John Louen (or Louuaine) a gentleman of his house, and so retires to the Duke of Alençon. The Duke of Lorraine was come to demand the Duchie of Barre, (the which Lewis the eleuenth had possessed,) and the Earldome of Prouence, which hee pretended to be his, as sonne to the daughter of René King of Sicilie, Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence, and by consequence, the neereft kinsman to Charles Duke of Anjou, (who by transaction and testament had made Lewis the eleuenth D his here) who was but nephew to René, and sonne to Charles of Anjou, Earle of Amaine his brother. Barre was restored, and the Lorraine had a hundred men at armes entertained, with thirtie fixe thousand franks for foure yeeres, during the which they should looke into the title of the said Earldome. During this terme, some well acquainted with the Estate of Prouence, produce certaine testaments of Charles the first of that name, brother to Saint Lewis, and Earle of Prouence by his wife, and of other Kings of Sicilie, which had beene of the house of France, by the which, the house of Lorraine was not onely excluded from the succession of Prouence (not lyable to the daughter, while there remained a sonne of the race) but that also the Realme of State, and all other Seigneuries possessed by the house of Anjou, belonged to the King. That King René hauing regard to the said testaments, had at his death preferred his neyphew Charles, before the said Duke of Lorraine, sonne to his daughter.

The Duke of Orleans greued to bee thus excluded from his pretensions, and that Anne alone gouerned the King her Brother: he practiseth the Dukes of Boulon, Alençon, and Brittaine, (the cheefe support and refuge of the discontented French) the Earle of Angoulême, John Count of Narbonne, Francis Earle of Longueuil, and many others. Alain Lord of Albret, hoping, by the meanes of Lewis, whome he found to haue great credit with the Duke of Brittaine to marie with Anne, the eldest daughter of the said Duke (hauing not duly examined the heart of Lewis) enters easily into this faction. Thus all things threaten a horrible and pernicious war, but more in show then effect. Lewis with his allies assembles some troupes, and thinking to put them into Orleans: the Inhabitants giue him to vnderstand by the Lord of Joyeuse, deputed there on his behalfe, that hee might wel enter with his household, but not with his four-

A foolish warre.

Anno. Regencie was then his retiring place.

Anne & the twelve Counsellors, cause him to be besieged by Francis Earle of Vendôme, Lewis his brother, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, René Duke of Lorraine (whom the sayd Lacie had wholly wooen vnto her, knowing him to be resolute, vehement, & of fashion) and Peter of Rohan, Lord of Gié, Marshall of France. In the end this waire was pacified by this agreement: That the Duke of Orleans should come to Court, and inioy the place that belonged vnto him: but Francis Earle of Dunois, the Dukes right hand) a busie bodie & the first author of the trouble, should retire himselfe into the Countie of Ast, belonging to the said Duke, or to what other place he pleased without the realme. Must Lewis then bring his confederats in disgrace with the king, & now abandon them? Behold the Duke of Bourbon & the Earle of Angoulême leading, 300. Lances, 8. thousand foot, and about eightene hundred gentlemen of Anuergne, Bourbonnois, Forest, Beauuetois and Angoulême, & Alain: 8, or 9. thousand fighting men. If Lewis had attended them in some place of strength, how dangerously had he shaken the new Estate of Charles, not well settled during his minoritie? But hee had too good a mind to reare out his owne bowels, in their persons, whom the law in time should submit vnto him, and dismember the Crowne, which he should weare in his turne. Anne, to disperse this storme, causeth the Earle of Beauuetois her husband, to incounter their troupes, & force the Duke of Orleans to march in person, against those that came to his seruice. They were all Frenchmen: & as they were lightly armed, so were they as lightly disarmed: the Marshall of Gié, and the Chamberlane of Grauille, shall easily reconcile them.

Alain being stopt in his passage of Garonne, at S. Basille, by the Earles of Vendôme, & Roche-sur-Yon, was admitted to the same accord, vpon charge to furnish the King a hundred men at armes for his seruice: the which he deliuered vnder the command of S. Cyr, and Forcés. They are all dispersed: the King at Amboise, Lewis at Orleans, Alain, in Bazadais, and all the rest to their houses: the Vicont of Foix, and Peter his brother being Cardinal, at Nantes, vnder colour to visit their sister, wife to the Duke of Brittaine. They find their brother in law much incensed against his Nobilitie, & they resolute to defend themselves. But as both armies were ready to ioyne, an accord is made by some mediators: That considering the Dukes age & weaknes of iudgement, the State should be gouerned by the aduice of his neereft kinsmen, and friends. Landais is reiected, and it comes he drawes letters patentes in the Dukes name, & declares al those of the Dukes army, that had entered into capitulation with the enimies troupes, guilty of high treason, forfeiting all their goods as traitors: he carries this patent to the Chancellor Francis Chrestien, to be sealed, & brings a comandement from the Duke to that effect: the which the Chancellor refused to do. Behold Landais hath purchased two enemies for one, & both haue sworne his ruine, but they must countenance it with iustice. They depute the Lord of Pont Chasteau to summon the Chancellor to do iustice vpon Landais, to appoint Iudges for his triall, and to force him to appeare. They make informations against him, wherevnto they decree to apprehend him. It is bruted throughout the towne, that Landais by sentence should be committed prisoner. The people runne by heaps, they fill the Castle yard, & will not depart vntill Landais bee deliuered. He takes himselfe in the Dukes châber. The Nobilitie doth force the Châcellor to repaire to the Castle and to demand this man. The Duke being constrained, deliuers him, but vpon condition that he should not be vsed contrary to Iustice, & commands vpon paine of death, that he suffers no outrage be done vnto him, vnder colour of Iustice.

The Nobilitie being aduertised of his taking, posts to Nantes, and offer themselves vnto the Duke, like humble subiects, suing for his fauour. Landais proceesse being made with that of John of Vitry, one of his seruants, by certaine Commissioners, they were hanged. This done, the people were pacified, and the Nobilitie, by the intercession of the Earle of Comminges, returned into fauour, & obteyned letters of pardon. Then returns the Earle of Dunois to his Towne of Parthenay in Poitou, but without the Kings permission. The King, (that is to say, the twelve vnder his authoritie) suspect his returne, and (fearing least the Duke of Orleans had sent for him, or that he

Hee sends backe the messenger A with promise to followe, & vpon a second charge by the Marshall of Gie, doubting the humour of the Countesse of Beauieu, and moreover mad at his ill vantage, keeping in as it were confined within Orleans, without libertie to go forth in safety; he parts from Orleans, vnder colour to go a hauking; he takes the way to Fontenay, and from thence to Nantes, whether the Earle of Dunois went to meete him. This departure was presently knowne, and Parthenay was suddenly besieged, taken and razed, with many other places in Guienne, belonged to the Earle of Cominges, and others that were in Brittain. These men slept not. A league is presently made vnder the Dukes of Brittain and Orleans, whereinto there enters the Prince of Orange, Francis of Laul Ladie of Dinan and Chastebriant, John Lord of Rieux & Earle of Aumale Marshall of Brittain, the Earles B of Angoulême and of Dunois. The Duke of Lorraine who findes no great satisfaction of promises, is easily drawn into it. Maximilian King of the Romains giues his consent, Charles opposeth Lewis of Bourbon, Earle of Roche-sur-Ton, great grand father to the Duke Montpensier that nowe liueth, and makes him his Lieutenant general in this war: with Lewis of Bourbon the yongest brother of the Earle of Vendôme, he giues them for assistant, maister Lewis of Tremouille Viconte of Thouars, who had married Gabrielle of Bourbon, sister to the sayd Conte Lewis.

Francis Duke of Brittain had no great reason to be a Sanctuary for these mutines, & by receiving them to drawe all the forces of France vpon his decayed age, attending nothing but his graue. But supposing to protect himselfe from the Kings surpries, C he must ruine his Country, his Nobility, and his subiects. But then fallies out another accident. The Lords lately reconciled grewe in ialousie, that the French were come to reuenge the wrong done vnto their Duke: or else with their ruine and the Dukes to make their peace in France. They desired to send them home for two respects; the one to content the King and his Sister, the other, for that they should not growe in any such credit with the Duke, as in the end he might employ them against themselves, wishing in a manner for Landais, to oppose him against them. Moreover they feared James Guibé, a Captaine of the Dukes men at armes, and in good credit, Nephew to Landais and his seruant, least hee should seeke some reuenge for his Vncles death. If it should be so, how could they subsist? The King discouers this secret D ialousie, and findes a good expedient, to thrust the men on to their owne mutuall ruine. To this end he sends Andrew of Espinay Cardinall of Bordeaux, and the Lord of Fouchage, with instructions to Rieux Marshall of Brittain, and comission to offer them men and meanes to expell the French out of Brittain.

The best aduised discouer the Kings intent, that accepting of this offer, they make the way open for the King to enter into Brittain. But in the end they agree: That hee should not send into Brittain for this succour, aboue foure hundred lances, and foure thousand foote, and that at the Barons request. That the King should pretend nothing to the Duke, whilst the Duke liued. That he should not besiege nor take any towne, Castell, or fort within the Country: and that his soldiers should take nothing without paying. That when as the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Dunois and others should retire out of Brittain, the King should be bound to withdrawe his forces. And for the Brittons: That the Noblemen of Brittain should arme with him, and accompanie his armie to expell the French. The confirmation of these Articles is seconded with foure hundred lances, and six or six thousand men led by the Lord of Saint Andé, who enters Brittain on the one side: the Earle of Roche-sur-Ton on another, and the Vicant of Tours on the third. All the Country is suddenly filled with Frenchmen at armes, and the Orleanois are amazed, being vnfurnished both of force and counsell to resist.

The Earle of Dunois being of more iudgement then the rest, considers, that the company of a hundred lances belonging to Alain of Albret, was a part of those foure hundred commanded by Saint Andé: that it was conuenient to winne him, and with this dessein to put him in hope of the marriage of Anne of Brittain. An inuentio according the necessity of the time, but this was not the Earles intent, who labored to winne

A woman her for the Duke of Orleans; neyther the Prince of Orange, who vnder hope: 1487. of this alliance, had drawne the Arche-Duke Maximilian into this league, whereby he should enter into Bourgonie, with a mighty army led by the Duke of Lorraine, whilst that he himselfe should annoy the King in Flanders and Picardie. But great shewes and stratagems. He was so poore and needy, as the King might easily disappoint all his practices and stratagems. Nowe are we deeply ingaged in warre. The Duke of Brittain accompanied with Lewis of Orleans, the Earles of Dunois and Cominges, the Lords of Montmery, Joyeuse, du Lis, Saint George, Dampierre and Beauuau tooke a viewe of his army at Malestroit, consisting of six hundred lances and sixteene thousand foote, great and bad, ill armed and ill trained: whilst the French and Brittons being ioyned together, take Redon, & to terrifie Rennes they spoile the Country euen vnto Maye, besiege Pleimell, batter it, and in three dayes take it, spoile and ransom it. The Dukes armie marched, to succor this Towne, when as Maurice of Mené being great of body and courage, sayd. (Whether go we my friends? Our Duke is onely governed by the French, by whose perswasions we march against the French, who at their first encounter will betray him to their nation, whereof I am well aduertised. Were we not better to remaine in our castles with our wiues and children, then to be thus led by the humours of others?) A speech of great consequence. He was of the best allied in Brittain, issued out of the house of Guerlesquin, and had well serued Lewis the xi. as gouernor of Guise and Captaine of a hundred men at armes in the warres against the Flemings: a man of valour and counsell, and well aduanced by the sayd King, hauing the profits of La Ferté-Bernard, dequismortes, Beuuyage and Gorlanniere: but very in constant in his changing of parties. At this speech they all scatter: so as of sixteene thousand, scarce the fourth part keepe the field: the Duke amazed here with, leaues Malestroit, and recouers Vennes: but he was pursued so speedelie, as he looeth his baggage, being fauored in his retreat by the Prince of Orange, who had posted from Nantes to his succor, very happily: for otherwise hee had bene besieged and taken. Vennes being beleagard, yeelds for feare. The Duke at his departure had left two thousand, eight hundred horse in it, vnder the command of Coetquen Lord Stuard of Brittain, & of Amaulry of Moussay; & for Captaine of the Towne James le Moine: who vnable to maintaine the sege, retired in haste. D Coetquen went to Dinan, where he commanded; la Moussaye with his horse to Nantes, where the Duke was, and the Kings army did bend that wayes. Adrian de l'Hospital a Captaine of men at armes, meetes him vpon the way, defeated him, killeth a great number of his troupe, and takes many prisoners: some six hundred recouer Nantes. This was about Wintontide. The Duke thus pressed, being weake in his person, & weake in his subiects: being diuided, weake in friends, weake in those who had ingaged him in this warre for their quarrell, sends the Earle of Dunois and Oliuer of Coetman (who soone after fell to the French and was made gouernor of Auxerre) to craue succors fro Henry King of England. But to increase his misery, Henry was not yet in quiet possession of his Reaine, crossed by some remainders of Richards party, the which he must suppress. E The King resolved to besiege the Duke in Nantes, he comes in person to Antenis, thether sometime associat Brittons, repenting their indiscretion, for that they had taken Townes, & spoiled the Country, contrary to their promise; and their owne Lands sufficed the like ext: emities. Thus Nantes was besieged the 19. of Iune, well battred, well assailed, & as well defended. The deputies of England were foure times shipped to cross the seas, & foure times put back, by tempest of wether. In stead of English, they brought fiftie thousand Brittons of the commons, greened to see their Duke besieged. The Kings army, eyther holding themselves vnable to fight with them, or neglecting them as fruitlesse forces, or doing it of purpose, the sooner to furnish the Towne, gaue them free passage, and holding it likewise impossible to force a Towne well furnished with Commanders, men and victuals, they raised the sege the 6. of August, to go without losse of men to Dol: the which was taken and spoiled without resistance, the Brittons and other soldiers were put to ransom. F During the sege of Nantes, Peter of Rohan Earle of Quintin, of the French faction, surprised Moussaye defeated.

Nantes besieged.

1487. surpris'd Montcontour, & summoned Guingamp, a passage for succors that came to the Duke from the Bishopricks of Treguer, Leon and Cornouaille. John of Coetmen Lord of Chasteaugui, Capitaine of the Towne, was at Nantes. He flies thither, and turneth the place with men sufficient to defend it, and having intelligence that Plusquache with about fiftie Gentlemen, Bretons of the Kings armie, spoyling the countie and drawing the Nobility to their partie, dined in the Abbie of Begar, having called together the neighbour parishes, and assembled some troupes, he charged them, overthrew them, and led them all prisoners to Guingamp: where the Judges of Goello and Quincamp, by the Dukes expresse commandement, began to informe against them, and had finished their processe, if some friends and kinsmen had not found meanes of delay, vntill the Dukes death ended that proceeding.

This prise gaue courage to the Captaines of Dinan. They assemble about five thousand men, and beseege Montcontour. But the Vicount of Rohan, and the Earle of Quintin, offering to succour it, and moreouer the siege of Nantes requiring force and expedition, they retire to Rennes, to ioyne with the other forces, consisting of fix or seauen thousand men. At the same instant Yvon of Rorcs, Lord of Bois de la Roche, & Peter Long Lord of Karuegues (inticed with the great welch which the Earle of Quintin had lett in his Castell,) assemble some soldiers with many peasants, and beseege Quintin: they take it, and against the composition sworne, spoile the Towne and Castell, and (in hatred of the Earle, who followed the King) burnt it to ashes. The Earle by meanes of his subiects recovered it soone after: and Coutequet capitaine thereof before, expelled them againe, and spoyled the Towne.

But to what end serued this cruell stratagem, seeing that Rorcs had a house in the country, and the Earle good meanes to be reuenged: as he was a yeare after, by the taking of Rorcs himselfe, and the spoile and burning of his house? The Phrigians grow wife too late; sayeth the Prouerbe. The Nobility of Brittain finding their error, by drawing their Kings forces into the country, to their owne ruine, they send to the Duke, protesting to be no way associat with the King, but to defend themselves against the French that were neere his person, who they doubted had bene drawne in to preiudice them: they offer to serue him hereafter, and against all men, so as he will pardon them. The Duke receiues them, and graunts letters of abolition, deliuey and restitution of all their goods and dignities, as before the warres namely to the Vicount of Rohan, to the Lords of Anagour and Rieux, (lately put from the Office of Lieutenant generall and Marshall of Brittaine) as well for themselves as their assistants. Rieux enjoyed it, but the rest persisted in the Kings seruice. In the meane time the Kings armie prepares to go into Basse Brittain, and to beseege Guingamp: but the Marshall of Rieux changing his partie, makes them to change their proiect.

Rieux was at Ancenis, wonderfully perplexed to see the French entred the Countie, by a breach which the Nobility of Brittain had voluntarie made them, deuising some meanes to repaire these confusions, drawne therevnto by his reception into grace. The Earle of Cominges going Ambassador to the King, passed by Ancenis, and confirmed Rieux in this good resolution, perswading him to go vnto the Duke, with assurance that he should be gratiofully receiued. Rieux thinking to strike two strokes with one stone, sends Francis du Bois to the King, who at that time was at Font de Larche: giuing him intelligence that the Duke of Orleans, the Prince of Orange and others retired into Brittain, were willing to leaue the Country, so as they might rest safely in their houses, without touch for that was passed. Which being concluded, he beseeched his Maiesty to retire his men at armes, according to the treaty he had signed with his owne hand.

Anne hearing this proposition. My friend (sayed she vnto the gentleman) say vnto my Cousin the Marshall of Rieux, your master, that the King hath no compassion: and seeing he is entred so farre, he will make it good. The Earle had no better satisfaction. An answer discouering the Kings intentio: which was to incorporate this Dutchie to the Crowne: the which caused the Marshall to yeeld to his Prince without dissembling.

He

A He drawes some souldiers from Nantes, in October, and deliueris his Towne of Ancenis into their hands, swearing they should keepe it for the Duke. In the end, Francis of Laval, Baron of Chasteaubriant, sonne in law vnto Rieux, suffers him to enter the Castell, holding him to be the Kings seruant. Being the stronger, & ledging his troupe within the Towne, hee commands, (seeing that the King had broken the contract) all those that would not sweare fidelitie and seruice to the Duke, to retire the next day with bag and baggage. Could he be ill receiued of his maister, carrying with him the deliuey of two so good places? The Prince of Orange hauing ioynd with some Germaine succours, sent by Maximilian; and lead by Balarwin, bastard of Foucamp, and some three thousand men of the countie of Cornouaille, Leon, Treguer, & Goello, resolved to besiege Quintin, where the Brittons (ioynd with the French that were commanded by the Baron of Pont-Chateau) did wonderfully annoy Guingamp: who being in a towne vnfit for warre, left the place, and gaue the Prince meanes to campe before la Chaize, a Castell belonging to the Vicount of Rohan. But weakened by the losse of many of his men, part of them going daily to the French, & part disbanding by reason of the winter; he retired his armie to Montcontour, resolute to take a view, & to punish such as were departed without licence. Yet notwithstanding all his care, and the Dukes seuer command to the gentle men, to returne to the Campe within two dayes, vpon paine of the losse of their goods and honors, and to others of corporall punishment, those few forces which remained, vanished soderly.

C Thus the Duke wauers, betwixt hope and feare, fortified on the one side, but weakened on the other, seeing his estate incline to ruine. He had two pillars, which in his conceit might raise him, or at the least support him; Anne and Isabell. The Prince of Orange, wooed Anne for Maximilian: Rieux, the Lady of Laval, and the greatest part of the Nobilitie, for Alain of Albret. The first promised greater conditions, yet the King had incombred him much in Flanders, supporting the Gantois against him, so as he could not succour his pretended father in law, neither with his person, nor his subiects; having small credit amongst them, and lesse money: for that they would not assist him to preiudice the King. Alain (whom others call Aman) had some forces in hand; and fed with this plausible hope, he brought about a thousand men out of Castile, & three thousand Gascons. The Duke would willingly haue made two sonnes in law of one daughter: & vrgent necessity forced him, (like vnto Charles of Bourgonne) to promise her to many, whom he could giue but to one. euen as Erisichton satisfied his gluttonie and continuall hungar, wherunto Ceres had condemned him (hauing cut downe her groue) by the many sales of his daughter Mnestra. In th'end Anne is promised to Maximilian, who should come to marry in Brittain, & withall he should bring great troups of men to succour the Duke against the oppression of the French. But hee abuseth no lesse then he is abused. Herevpon Alain comes with his Castilians and Gascons. At his first arriual he went to salute the Duke at Nantes, and then his Mistresse, this king to haue the greatest interest in her loue. But oftentimes two braue Grey-hounds courting a Hare, a third crosseeth them, and carries away the game, as we shall see. The Marshall of Rieux being arriued, gaue his consent in fauour of Alain, at the Countesse of *Laval*s request, sister in law to the said Alain. It was no time now to leaue this Marshall newly reconciled idle. The Duke giues him the charge of his armie, with commission to take Vannes, where Gilbert of Grassai, & Philip of Moulin, (of whom we shall make mention in the battaile of Tournouë) commanded. He marcheth thither, batters Vannes by composition, the third of March. Then Sir & Forjus (who led the hundred men at armes of Alains company) declared themselves Brittons by their Capitaines commandement, building foolishly vpon this marriage: yet some of the company retired to the King. The Kings armie wintered, but Lewis or Bouillon aduerted the taking of Vannes by Rieux, requires him by the surpris of Ancenis and Chasteaubriant, places razed neere the riuer, to make the siege of Fougères more easie, on the one side, being a frontier towne, and of good defence: and on the other side, that of S. Alank Cormier. The Brittons army had bin eightene moneths in field without rest, 1488. to make head against the French, but now they must shew what courage is in them. A The Duke of Orleans, Alain of Albret, the Earle of Dunois, the Marshall of Rieux, the Lord Scales an Englishman, (commanding some 300. men of his nation, sent by Henry King of England, by the means of the Lord Maupertuis) the Seignior of Leon, eldest sonne to the Vicount of Rohan; the Seigniors of Chasteaubriant, Crenetes, Pont l'Abbé, Plessis, Paliczon, Montigni, Baliues, Montuel, and other Captaines of bands, go forth of Nantes, with an intent to raise the siege. Their armie was 400. Lances, & 8000. foote, (besides 300. English, and 800. Germanes, sent by Maximilian) with good store of Artillerie, for this great rable armed, and tumultuously assembled by the Earle of Dunois, had bin in a manner all sent back, as an vnprofitable burthen vpon the earth.

Ccc to

But the matter is of importance, the French are not so easily forced to rise, and if an B occasion of battaile be offered, shall they accept it? The Marshall of Rieux (best experienced in matters of warre) with some others, are not of that opinion: for to what end (say they) should we hazard the estate and country, vpon an euent which may be avoided. If we loose the day, by what means shall we releue our selues? The Souldiers that shall remaine after the ouerthrow, wil want courage, and change their minds: the people would be amazed, the Townes stand in suspence, the conquerour would become maister of the Country, and take all Townes hee should attempt without resistance. It were best to temporise, & to incampe at Rennes, being well furnished with victuals, and things necessary: and in the meane time, to keepe the enemy occupied, forcing him to lie in field, tying him with their horsemen, & cutting off his forrage: or C elie to lodge the army in the frontier townes, to shut vp the victuals, & attend the winter: which being come, the enemy shall haue no means to lodge abroad, but must of force dislodge: & in the meane time, we shall see what profit will grow by the leagues of the Kings of England & Castile: of the Archduke, & the Duke of Lorraine; all which giue the Duke great hope, to countermine the Kings practises in Brittanie. The rest (rashly thrust on, partly by a yong and boiling humor, partly with desire to maketiall of their forces) make answer. That the souldiers are wearied with this long bearing of armes without effect: that hauing now an oportunitie to do well, they obserue a great joy in their resolutions: the which it was more fit to nouish then to quench: that their forces were altogether, and asked nothing but imploiment: & that delay would make D them leaue their Ensignes by little & little. In the meane time, Fougeres was at the last galpe: a towne of importance, and one of the keyes of the countrie, that to leaue it in this extremity, were to shew a manifest proofe of cowardise to all the rest. To conclude, they say in a manner, that to temporise, were to play the cowards.

Division in the French armie.

The first opinion was most probable, but the vehemencie of the Earle of Dunois, and the heat of yonger heads carried it. All march, but see the pittifull first fruits of their first lodging at Andouille, a village vpon the way to Rennes, from S. Albin, a contention falls betwixt the Duke of Orleans, & the Lord of Albert, a man of great reuenues, father to John the last of that name, K. of Nauarre: but his mistresse did not affect him, a good schooller in dissembling, to vse the power of Albert, for the benefit of the Duke her E father. The Duke of Orleans did flie a higher pitch, and by the mediation of the Earle of Dunois, was very farre in fauour with Anne of Brittanie: Alain discouers some good shewes of Anne, to the Duke of Orleans: wherevpon they grow to bitter words, as the next day they are ready to fight. But the enemy being at hand, was it now time to contend? to the prejudice of a whole armie. But now the foresight of the Marshall of Brittanie, doth pacifie all vpon this diuision: they receiue two seuerall aduertisements. S. Albin of Cormier was battered by the French with 3. batteries, and yeelded by composition, with their liues & goods saued: a small towne, but furnished with a very good Castle, but at that time vnfurnished of men, victuals & munition: & Fougeres yeelded vpon the like accord. S. Albin was commanded by William of Rosnewinen, an ancient F Captaine, who had had a command of men at armes vnder Charles the 7. and Lewis the 11. but in the warres betwixt Charles the 8. and the Duke of Brittanie, he returned to serue his naturall Prince. The Brittons armie marcheth to recouer this place: & the French to preferue their conquests, when as behold there riseth a mutiny among the

A the Brittaines. It is secretly murmured, that the French Commanders their associates, 1488. had intelligence with the heads of the French armie, the which suggestion did euen then hazard all: and if the Brittons had beene farther off, without feare of charge, they had easily disbanded. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange aduertised of this conceit, had great paine to worke any other impression. What do they? to giue an assurance of the contrarie, they leaue their horses, and sweare all to fight on foote with the Brittons and Germanes. A more bold then wise resolution, but necessitie did force them, to appease this mutinie which tended to sedition.

They order their troupes to fight. The Auant-gard to the Marshall of Rieux: the B Battaille to the Lord of Albret, with some horse to couer his flanks. The reereward to Chasteaubriant, and on either side, their carriages of artillerie and baggage to couer some of their foote, being fauoured on their flanke with a small groue betwixt Saint Albin, and the village of Oranges. And to make the small numbers of strangers seeme great, they attire twelue hundred, (some say, seuteene hundred) Brittons, with cat-tails bearing a red crosse, the English liuerie. Lewis of Tremouille in the absence of Lewis of Bourbon his brother in law, commaunded the Kings armie. Hee giues the C forward to Adrian del Hospital, an old French Captaine, and famous in this warre: he takes the battaile to himselfe, and giues the reereward to the Marshall of Baudricourt, pressed by a more sodaine charge then he expected. Gabriel of Montfauçois with tenne or twelue horsemen, sent out to obserue the Brittons countenance, makes report of C their good order.

The two armies approach, the artillerie thunders, and kils many men of either side: askirmishe continues about two howres, which giues the French leysure to order their battaile. The two forewards ioyne, the Brittons endure the shooke so courageously, as the French yeeld to the resolute valour of the Marshall of Rieux, who goes to charge the battaile: at the first they kill Claude of Montfort, a braue Captaine, sent by the King of England to succour the Duke, and the Lord Scales, a valliant Knight, with some others of the foremost ranke. Blaise a Germane Captaine, to couer himselfe from the French artillerie, changeth his quarter, marching backe-wise with his barrailon, like vnto a Croissant: but he is sodenly charged in flanke by fower hundred French horse, broken, D and many of them slaine. At the same instant, two hundred horse charge those which had the baggage in charge, and force them to retire. The Brittons horse that flanked the armie, growes amazed, and leaues the foote naked. They charge them, and force them all giue way, and all flie, some here, some there, the Brittons horse into the wood, and likewise their foote. The Duke of Orleans, and Earle of Dunois fighting unhappely on foote, doe what possibly may be expected, from such gallant Princes, but the Duke flying among the Germanes was taken in the wood: the other seeing this generall ouerthrowe, toare of his blacke crosse, the liuerie of Brittanie, and hid himselfe among the dead bodies: an Archer (that had beene of his company) knew him, and both of them were led prisoners to Saint Albin, whence the Duke of Orleans E was soone after carried to the great Tower of Bourges. The Marshall of Brittanie, and the Lord of Albret saued themselves in Dinan by the swiftnesse of their horses: All the countesseit English with red crosses were slaine without remission.

The Lord of Leon (sonne to the Vicont of Rohan) Pont l'Abbé, the Lord Scales, (an Englishman issued from that braue Talbot), Montfort (kinsman to the Prince of Orange), with six thousand souldiars of their armie were slaine. Mosen Cralla (an English fauouring of the Iewe) Lord Steward to Ferdinand King of Castill, and chiefe of the Spanish troupes, was taken prisoner. Of the French, James Galeot, a Napoli taine, a valliant and renowned Captaine: and others to the number of a thousand or twelue hundred men, but few of any marke. This was on monday, the 28. of July. I A day of great import for the State, the which did wonderfully shake the Dukes affaires, being troubled in mind, and his subiects tured with toyle and terror, whereof they follow practises of places, yeelding vp of Townes, and finally, euery one frames himselfe to follow the Conquerors fortune: a day eternising the happy memorie of that Noble 1488. noble Knight, Lewis of Tremouille, great great grandfather to Claude Lord of Tremouille, now living, Duke of Thouars, Prince of Talmund, Earle of Guines, &c. and of the noble Princessse, Charlotte Katherine of Tremouille, Princessse of Condé, Countesse of Taillebourg, Baronesse of Suile, Craon, Boufmiere, S. Hermine, la Chaise, in the Vicountie, &c. mother to the most high and mighty Prince Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Condé, first Prince of the blood, and first peere of France, &c. hauing at the age of 25. or 26. yeares, by his incomparable valour and vertue, wonne the honor of so memorable a victory. The next day, the Lord of Tremouille turnes towards Renues, summons the Towne, and (to terrifie the inhabitants) he lodgeth his armie in the Villages of Agenné, Chasteaugiron, Veru, S. Supplie, and others thereabout. The Heralds returne an answer; That the King had no right to the Towne, and that he wrongfully made warre in Brittanie; That notwithstanding his forces and happy successe, God the gardian of their right, might well doo vnto him, as he had in former times to King Iohn before Poitiers, and to Philip of Valois at Creey. That if Tremouille come, he shall find twentie thousand men to resist him.

Dinan yeelds. So the armie leauing Renues, marcheth to Dinan, vnder the command of the Vicount of Rohan Amaury of Mousay, gouernour of the Towne, compounds at the first summons, to deliuer it into the Kings hands, vpon the accustomed conditions in like cases: to commit the gard thereof to whom he pleased, and the inhabitants to sweare vnto the King: which done, the French armie should retire. On the other side, Guy the 15. of that name, Earle of Laval, causeth some French troupes to enter by night into his Castle of Stré, and so they became maisters of the Towne. and by the same meanes he drew his brother Francis Lord of Chasteaubriant, and Montplaisant to the Kings party. The Baron of Pont-Chasteau, brother to the Vicount of Rohan, followed the example of Francis of Auanguor, the Dukes base sonne, who had already deliuered the Towne & Castle of Cliffon into the Kings hands; and the greatest part of the Nobility followed the same course. Hereafter we shall see a ciuill warre, rather then a forreine. And for the last worthy exploit of this army, Tremouille besiegeth S. Malo, both Towne & Castle, one of the strongest places in Brittany, beautified with a goodly hauen. It was able to hold out against the forces of a mighty army, as well for the feat thereof, as for the fortification: but they easily enter into composition. The Kings affaires aduanced thus, as the Dukes declined: his Maiesty being at Angers, hee propounds in counsell whether he should proceed to an absolute conquest of the duchie, seize vpon the dukes person, and his daughters, giue them some pension, and marry them at his pleasure. He wanted no fire-brands in Court, to kindle these combustions, disperfed throughout all Brittanie. My Liege (say they) if you once get the father and his daughters into your hands, you shall easily obtaine the whole country, without striking stroke, & reduce the nobility at your discretion. Guy of Rochefort Chancellor of France, a iust man, and of a good conscience, shewes: That the Duke of Orleans retreat into Brittanie, had bin the chiefe motive to draw downe the Kings forces. That his Maiesty hauing now the said Duke in his power, the cause ceassing, the effect should cease. That the Duke Cliffon yeelds. was somewhat to be excused, if by the bond of alliance & affinitie, he had bin intangled in the disgraces of these noble men, fled vnder the shadow of his wing. Moreover, the King had no iust cause, to pursue his owne vassall with such violence, to ruine his estate, to inuade a pupils patrimony, & to spoile her of her grand-fathers inheritance. If the King were not satisfied, to haue the chiefe motives of these confusions in his power: he armed himselfe with a transport made to K. Lewis, by the Lord of Bouffie and Nicole of Brittanie his wife: that he must then examine the titles, and appoint men to looke into the rights of the one & the other: if the Kings pretensions were iust, it was in him to put them in execution: if not, the people would exclaime against this violence, and God the protector of the oppressed, would soone or late, raise vp some to reuenge it: for the peoples voyce, is the voyce of God, who cries to Princes; Doe right to the needy and Orphelins: do iustice to the afflicted and poore.

The Kings proposition in Council. The Chancel- lord diuulges him from the inuasion of Brittanie. The Duke of Orleans retreat into Brittanie, had bin the chiefe motive to draw downe the Kings forces. That his Maiesty hauing now the said Duke in his power, the cause ceassing, the effect should cease. That the Duke was somewhat to be excused, if by the bond of alliance & affinitie, he had bin intangled in the disgraces of these noble men, fled vnder the shadow of his wing. Moreover, the King had no iust cause, to pursue his owne vassall with such violence, to ruine his estate, to inuade a pupils patrimony, & to spoile her of her grand-fathers inheritance. If the King were not satisfied, to haue the chiefe motives of these confusions in his power: he armed himselfe with a transport made to K. Lewis, by the Lord of Bouffie and Nicole of Brittanie his wife: that he must then examine the titles, and appoint men to looke into the rights of the one & the other: if the Kings pretensions were iust, it was in him to put them in execution: if not, the people would exclaime against this violence, and God the protector of the oppressed, would soone or late, raise vp some to reuenge it: for the peoples voyce, is the voyce of God, who cries to Princes; Doe right to the needy and Orphelins: do iustice to the afflicted and poore.

This aduice made the Lords of the Counsell pause a while, and many in the end conclude: That it was more conuenient to agree vpon Iudges, to decide this contenti-trouerie judicially. Doubtlesse God holds the heartes of men in suspence, and makes them yeeld to what he pleaseth: But our Countesse of Beaumen was not well pleased with this resolution, hoping to haue the Earldome of Nantes for her share. They let the Duke vnderstand, what the Counsell had decreed. The crosses, distemperatures, age, and weakenes of iudgement, hindred the apprehension of his affaires. Yet will he deale surely. He chargeth the Earles of Dunois and Cominges, with offers and submissions to the King. The King refers them to Verger, to confide: thereof a house belonging to the Marshall of Gyé. Behold there growes great pretensions. The King pretends the proprietie of Brittanie, by reason of the grant made by Bouffie. The Vicount of Rohan did not renounce his interest. Hee descended of Marie of Brittanie, sister to Marguerite the Dukes first wife, the onely heire of Francis the first, and Marie preceeded the Duke that then was, in degree of blood. But the pittie was, she was a woman.

As for the pretended rights and grants of Bouffie, they answered: That the matter had beene fully decided by the treatie made at the Abbie of Victorie, and many others: To the Vicount of Rohan. That it was ended by the contract of marriage, testaments, and ordinances of Dukes their Predecessors, and decrees of Parliaments. But the King hauing two strings to his bow, like a Conquerour, grew wilfull, and his sister Beaumen more then he. If one sayled, the other was readie bent. Charles demands the wardship of the Dukes daughters. It was of purpose, that obtaining this wardship, he might marrie Anne at his pleasure, being twelue yeares old, and his Sister leueh. This might not be: the Nobilitie would neuer haue endured it. Moreover, Charles discouers, that forraigne Princes repined thereat, and were readie to imbrace this quarrell. They must therefore agree vpon Iudges, and a certaine place. Yet leauing nothing of this conquests of Brittanie, and being seized of some Townes won by their swords, let the Iudges determine what they will, we will doe what we please. In the end they draw articles. The King accepts them, & sends them to the Duke at Coyron vpon Loire, wher the Duke remained. He signes the, some willingly, the rest by force: reioying this happines in the end of his daies, to haue changed this wretched war into a publike rest.

So, a peace is concluded, and sworne on either part, the twentieth one of August. The King promiseth to call home all his men at armes, and the Duke to dismishe all strangers: he promiseth to giue the King for hostages, the Lord of Montplaisant, Raimond, and the sonne of the Lord Steward of Brittanie: and within a certaine time, to assemble the Estates of the Countrey, and to make them confirme this treatie. But Francis the second of that name, Duke of Brittanie, oppressed with greefe, melancholie, and age, and fore bruised with a fall: fallies sicke and dies the ninth of September, leauing the Marshall of Rieux gardien of his daughters, the Earle of Cominges for an assistant, and Francis of Laval, Ladie of Chasteaubriant, for gouernesse.

Presently after the Dukes decease, the King sends Ambassadors to Anne the new Duchesse, who giues her to vnderstand, that the Kings intention was to main- taine the treatie made betwixt his Maiestie, and the Duke deceased: but to make it more firme, it was expedient for her to yeeld in three points to the King. The first: That seeing they were allyed vnto the King, reason would, that hee should haue the gard, or wardshippe, and during their minoritie, the disposing of their landes, and Suzerainies. The second: That Commissioners appointed should decide their contentie, touching the principalitie of Brittanie, by the first day of Ianuarie next ensuing: and in the meane time, neither the one, nor the other, should carie the name nor the authoritie of a Duchesse, nor receaue the oath of fealitie. The third: That all strangers should void the Countrey, as was conteyned in their covenant. Anne makes answer: that shee desires to satisfie the treatie betwixt the King and her deceased Father, without any other conditions: And for confirmation of her words, shee calls a Parliament the 29. of December following, as the Duke was bound, to haue them ratifie the conuentions of peace. In the meane time there were robberies, taking of ransoms, massacres, thefts, desolation of the Countrey,

The Vicount of Rohan labored to winne the Townes by sweet wordes, and amiable letters, hee shewes vnto them the miseries of this warre, far from any end, by the de- cease of their Duke: that at his request, the King had retyred his armie, attending, if the Nobilitie and commons, would put themselves into the hands of the said Rohan, vnder whose commaund his Maiestie ment they should remaine, other wise he was ready to reduce the obstinate to reason by force. Rennes, Guingamp and others: (to whom he had particularly writtē) answered. That neither they nor the rest, can or ought acknow- ledge any other commander then the Duchesse: to whom during her fathers life, and since his decesse they were bound by oath. Moreouer they were aduertised that the King was resoluēd to entertaine a peace with their Princesse, in the same manner as had bin accorded. They beseech him to rest satisfied with this answer, vntill they be infor- med of the Duchesse intention, of the Counsels, and the Marshall of Rieux: and in the meane time, to haue the good of the Country, and the peace in recomendation. This answer puts the Vicount into chol- ler, and the Earle of Quintin his brother thrusts him on, being desirous to be reuenged for the often taking, and spoiling of his Towne. Hee goes to field with his troupe, and neere vnto Pontrieu hee encounters some men gather- red together, with an intent to go to succour the Duchesse: hee dorth charge them, de- feats them, and kills a part of them, being abandoned by some gentlemen that condu- cted them: then he takes & sackes Pontrieu and Chasteaulin vpon Tricuf, and so makes his way to Guincamp. He summons Chero & Gouicquet Captaines, to yeeld the Towne. C They answer, that they will not obey him, so long as there shall be a Duke or Duchesse in Brittanie. Vpon this refusall, he sends a Captain called S. Pierre, Seneschal of Tholose & la Forest to belegar it: who being repulsed out of the suburbs of Treguer, takes them of Montbareil and Pontauquen, spoile and burne them, and Rohan being aduerted, hee takes the suburbs of S. Croix. then he lodgeth in Montbareil, from whence he discou- reth the whole Towne so plainly, as hee might shoote point blanke into the market place: he burnes a part of the suburbs, & lodgeth his artillerie; he plants another bat- terie in the Taubins garden, to batter the curtain of the wall betwixt the ports of Renes, and Fontanie, and hee makes a breach, but not sufficient, yet hee giues an assault, and is repulsed. The next day he changeth his batterie, and plants it at the vpper end of the D friers garden: hee plays a whole day, beats downe a part of the wall, betwixt the Ports of Montbareil and Treguer: he offers a second assault, but it was as valiantly defended, as allailed. Gouicquet thrust into the thigh with a pike, is carried out of the fight. The night brings counsell, & those which had withstood 2. assaults, will be vnable for the 3. being now weakned of one of their chiefe supports, who was made vnable to serue, by rea- son of his hurt: morning being come, a truce is graunted, to take aduice of their Du- chesses. Rohan presseth it, & the Captaines seeing their men decayed in number as well by the taking of the suburbs, as at the two assaults, cōpound for ten thousand Crownes to the Generall to retire his armie, and to receiue them into his protection, promising E to furnish victuals and munition for the siege of Concq, the which he had charge from the King to besiege, and for want of present money, by reason of the losses sustained by the warre, to giue hostages. But this parle was friuolous. During which time Captaine Boissel declares himselfe for the French, seizeth of the gate of the Tower Quentic, and brings in the Earle of Quintin, (who gaped onely for reuenge of this place) hee takes and spoiles the Towne, and ransomes the inhabitants, and amongst them Captaine Chero: Gouicquet saues himselfe at la Roche de Rien. This chanced the 23. of Ianuarie, after fīue dayes siege. Concq yeelds vpon the approach: and Brest followed, a most strong place, and the key of all the Countie.

Thus Ploermel, Chasteaubriant, Malestroit, Vitré, Fougeres, S. Malo, Dinan, S. Aubin, Guingamp, Concq, Brest, and other places, are in the Kings power. The Nobilitie dis- possessed for the most part of their best places, shroud themselves vnder the conque- rors: there is small hope of succours. The English are diuided amongst themselves.

A the King of the Romains hath worke at home, and those small succours that come from both, preuaile nothing: there is no money in the Treasury, the Souldiers are not paid, the Crowne is worth eight Frankes: Anne is forced to sell of her reuenues for the maintenance of her house: and to aggrauate theise mischieties, her counsell is greatly diuided about her maiage. The Marshall of Rieux, and the Lady of Lauah, hold for Alan of Albret: but she will none of him. She protests, that what soeuer she had done in her fathers life, was in respect of him, being loth to disobey him, or to cause his grieles; and causeth the said protestation to be signified vnto him. The Chancellor & the Earle of Cominges, support her against the Marshall: he flies to armes, and besie- geth the Chancellor at Guerrende, (being seized of Annes person, to keepe her from B falling into his hands, who would marry her against her will, where he pleased,) but he could not enter. All these confusions made an easie way to the King, for the exe- cution of his enterprises.

Being thus oppressed, she sends to her allies, the Kings of England, Castile and Ro- manes: the English succours her (and in a manner beyond her expectation) with an army of nine or ten thousand men, vnder the command of Chene Master of the horse, accompanied with the Comptroller, and Ambassador of England: not for any ha- tred he bare vnto the King, but for feare of too mighty a neighbour, if hee vnted this goodly Prouince to the Crowne. The Marshall of Rieux, (hauing an other meaning apart, seeking to tye the English commanders vnto him, and to draw them to his fac- C tion, sends the master of the horse of Brittanie, and the Lord of Kaëron, to Penmarch, to receiue this Ambassador, and to offer him a conuoy to go to the Duchesse, (who to haue this armie neere vnto her person, makes it to land at Croisie, a port neere vnto Guerrende.) And to haue the people at his deuotion, Rieux giues out, that the Earles of Dunnis and Cominges, the Chancellor and others, had laied a plot to deliuer the Duchesse to the King of France. Anne fortified with this new supply, goes to field, desirous her selfe (being a Virgin) to attend the Marshall of Rieux, if he presented him- selfe: and being preuented of her entry into Nantes, by the Marshall, shee retires to Rennes, to giue order for the recovery of Guingamp. For this effect, she assembles some troupes, being assured that the French garrison could not be sodenly releued, the D Kings armie being imploied farre off in the conquest of the Townes of base Brittaine. These troupes were seized of Pontrieu: and to stop the courses of Guingamp, had sent some Gentlemen, with a number of the common people. Those of Guingamp, incu- ter them, charge them, ouerthrow them, & kill many of the chiefe gentlemen of note, William of Rostrenen, Lord of Breledi, Yvon of Ploesqueler, Seigneur of Kaërgabin, Yvon of Lesuerault, Kaërloët, Pontglou, Kaerneckyon, Potloy, Pregent the eldest sonneto the Lord of Lanchriou, and an infinite number of the commons. They presently take Pontrieu, sack it, and burne it. This was the 7. of Aprill.

The next day, Gouicquet aduertised that about 1500. men of the English armie, ap- E peared at the Isle of Brehat, he went vnto them, and so wrought with the commanders, as they landed at Pontrieu. The French, hauing notice hereof, being about 1500. horse, being loth to ingage their honours in a place not to be held, without succours, and ill furnished with victuals and munition, they set fire of many places of the towne, carry away what they can, exact 12. thousand crownes of the inhabitants, and retire them- selves, leading eight hostages, for the security of fifty thousand Frankes, granted by the inhabitants to the Vicount of Rohan. This English armie was presently followed by another of Spaniards, commanded by Don Diego Peres of Sarmiento Earle of Salmas, con- sisting of 2000. men at armes, and a great number of foote. Now Anne is strong, for- tified with two new armies, and the king feares, that in steed of inuading another mans country, he shall be forced to defend his owne. To preuent all danger, he fortifies his F frontiers, & sends Francis of Luxembourg Vicount of Martignes, & Charles of Marigni, to Henry the 7. K. of England, to draw him from the alliance of Brittany, considering his bound vnto the King, by whose meanes he was installed in the royall throne: but they were fruitlesse admonitions. The King calls for his Nobilitie, and all his companies of

In the meane time he puts two thousand foure hundred foote into Chastillon, and Prouence: John of Bellay, with his company of fortie Lances into Brest. Into Coneq Claude of Montauson and Bongars Capitaine of foote, with artillery, victuals and munition: and foure thousand French and Suisses were distributed into Dinan, Fougères, Saint Malo, and Vitré. But this was not sufficient to assure these places: a man of seruice doth oftentimes import more, then the whole bodie of a Towne. He therefore practiseth with John of Quellenec, Vicont of Fou, Admirall of Brittaine, by the meanes of the Vicont of Rohan. This Admirall armes some shippes, to keepe the Brittons from besieging of Brest by sea, and Maurice de Mené (of whome we haue made some mention) with the Lord of Chastel (newly reduced to the Kings seruice, by the Lord of Kaerisac) tooke the gard of the sea coast, to hinder the enemies landing. In the meane time the Brittons lodge their strangers at Lamballe, and assemble all into one bodie. The Marshall of Rieux, impatient to haue bene left Tutor vnto Anne by testament, and not to haue her in his possession: being too weak to take her by force in regard of Alain, hee seeks to the English, and sends Sourdeac to Henry, to let him vnderstand that Albret might assist him much in the recouery of Guienne. That it were good to binde him vnto him by the marriage of Anne of Brittaine, and to sequester those from her that were opposite. If he please, hee hath the meanes to drawe her into his Capitaines power, vnder colour to perswade her to visit these great and goodly succours, that were come to serue her.

The Admirall of Brittaine for the King.

The Marshall of Rieux seeks to win the English.

Yet could he not preuaile, in this point. She had already conceived some jealousy of the English, for her Treasorer (carrying them six thousand Crownes, which they had required, attending their pay,) had discovered, that they treated with the Kings men, & that they were now in speech of a truce. Being moued here with, she doth aduertise Henry, & beseecheth him to giue order, beleeuing that this dealing was not with his consent. She complains moreover, that the Marshall of Rieux detayned Nantes, from her kept her reuenues; placed, and displaced her officers. Beseeching the King, to command the Lieutenants of his army, to giue no support nor fauour vnto Rieux against her: but to pursue him as a rebell, and disobedient to his Princess, attempting against her and her authority. Henry wonne by the Marshall, assures the Duchesse of the continuance of his great loue, and that hee will answer at large to that which her Ambassadors had propounded, by some that hee would send vnto her. In the meane time, he desires his army should go to Rennes, or that she might go to them: to the ende she might visibly see, if those forces were sufficient to succour her. And he giues her to vnderstand by Yusbourche Secretary of state, that he had sent his army to succour her against all men: and especially against Rieux: so as the army with the commanders may come to her to Rennes, or that she may go to the army, as she shall thinke best. A grosse policie, easily discovered at the first sight, that this was but a practise to put her and the chiefe of her Counsell into strangers hands, to rule her at their pleasure. Anne findes this condition of hard digestion. And Henry fearing, least this distrust should make her to sue for an accord with the King; aduerteth, that the surest meanes to fortifie the Duchesse partie against the French, was the Marshalls reconciliation with her: and wrought therein so politicly, that by mediation of John of Coëtman and other Noblemen of Brittaine, an accord was made betwixt the Duchesse, the Earle of Comingen, and others of that party: with the Lords of Albret and Rieux, & the Lady of Lanville. So as in the beginning of January all quarrells were pacified, and all were vnitd in the common seruice of their Country.

The Marshall reconciled to the Duchesse.

England in posture.

During this treaty of re-union, the Marshall well informed that Brest and Coneq wanted both munition & victuals, went to beseege the fortresse of Brest by land, with his troups, & by sea with three score Britton shippes. & the English went to Coneq. The King knowing how much these places did import, sends S. Pierre and Chazeron with five thousand foote, to ioyne with the forces of Rohan, Saint André, the Seneschals of Loz and Caracassonne: and to draw forth part of the garrisons of Vitré, Fougères and

A and Dinan; and five and twenty shippes by sea, which put all the galleys of Brittaine to flight; and after their example, the army at land retires so hastily, as they leaue part of their Cannon wherewith the Towne was furnished, victualed, and releued with fresh men: and Coneq likewise was freed from the seige of the English. Winter approached, and the cold & raynie wether forced both armies to leaue the field. And therefore a newe truce was concluded, during the which, Iudges should be appointed to examine the interest of all parties: who for that effect should be sent to Avignon, a newe Towne, and they should name a newe Prince (who according to the report of the Iudges) should decide the controuersie. Maximilian was chosen. Doubtlesse it was a folly to dispend much in spies, and want good intelligence. The King being vpon the point to consummate his marriage with the Arch-dukes daughter, relied on him. But in whose fauour should he giue sentence, being in no good tearmes with the King: and hoping on the other side to ioyne vnto his ordinarie titles, the quality of Duke of Brittaine: Charles and Anne send their deputies vnto him, who are referred to Francford. The Iudges come, and pronounce a sentence, but not definitiue: That the King should deliuer all such places as he held, vnto the Duchesse, except S. Aubin, Cormier, Dinan, Fougères, and Saint Malo, which should be sequestred into the hands of Maximilian, and the Duke of Bourbon: to yeeld them vnto him to whome the Duchie should be adiudged: and all Frenchmen that bare armes, should leaue the Country, and the Duchesse likewise should dismis the English and other strangers. Taking a newe assignation at Tournay, to iudge continually of the cause, but all this was but to winne time, Maximilian makes his peace with the King, for his owne regard, whereby many places he held in Flanders were deliuered: and during these treaties, Isabell the sister of Anne of Brittaine dies at Rennes, the x. of June.

Truce accorded.

Maximilian made Arbitrator betwixt King Charles and Anne of Brittaine.

Isabell sister to Anne of Brittaine dies.

Anne married to Maximilian.

Newe cause of warre.

Anne remayning sole heire, the King of Romains loue increased, and the Duchesse desire to bee supported against the King made her willingly to yeeld. And for that Maximilian could not go in person, he deposes the Earle of Nassau, Wolfgang Baron of Pohem in Austria, James Condebaux his Secretary, and Lopian Stuard of his house, with authority, to treat, and conclude the marriage and to wed the sayd Duchesse. Notwithstanding the truce, no man will leaue his hold, neyther will the King giue ouer the places hee holds, nor the Duchesse dismis her strangers: but some part of them, and puts the rest into garrisons. She sends not to Avignon, fearing perhaps the surprize of her writings. The garrison of Nantes runnes ouer Poitou, Anjou, and other Countie. The Kings troups commit the like acts of hostility. Some Germanes enter into Brittaine. The Chancellor of Montauban goes to sollicite in England. Charles will haue Anne first to discharge her English and Castilians. Anne replies, that in like sort he ought by the treaty of Francford, to yeeld her her places, & to leaue the other foure as before mentioned, as newters. She imputes the spoiles of Nantes, to the former diuisions betwixt her and the Marshall of Rieux: and promieth that hereafter the like insolencies shall not be committed. That the Germanes comming was onely to force some of her subiects to obedience. That the Chancellors going to the King of England, was to agree vpon the charges due for the succors he had sent. That in truth, seeing the King to make newe preparations to the prejudice of their treaty, shee had giuen the Chancellor commission to treat for some succors of men. The King is discontented herewith, so as Gueméné and Coëquen her Ambassadors retorne with no other answer but a newe assignation at Tournay. In the meane time the King armes, and makes great preparations at Pont-See. Anne serues him with the same fauce. Shee solicits the Kings of England and Castille, and her newe spouse, to ioyne their forces, and to inuade France with a mighty army. Hee that cannot circumuent his enemy with the Lions skime, must vse the Foxes. Charles is aduertised of his newe alliance of Austria and Brittaine. The neighbourhood is dangerous, being thus fortified. He must auoide this, and by some meanes get that for himselfe, which an ill neighbour pretends. Hee therefore sends to treat with the Duchesse, but she cannot affect him, that had she wedd himselfe to violent an enemy. Yet he finds an other expedient.

Alain

King Charles seeks to haue Anne to wife.

1490.

Alain of Albret was frustrated of his hopes, and this deniall had mightily discontented him: he was therefore easily drawne away. The Duke of Bourbon gouernes him so absolutely for a time, that vpon certain promises and other preferments, he winnes him for the King, who promiseth to deliuer him the Towne of Nantes: wherein hee might doe much, being armed with the Marshall of Rieux fauour. The effects follow: Alaine surpriseth the Castell of Nantes, and in hatred of Annes disdaine, he spoiles the Treasurie of the Dukes of Brittaine, in the which were all their pretious stones, and the Duchesses Jewels, and deliuers both Towne and Castell into the Kings hands, yielding him the right hee pretended to the Duchie, by reason of his wife Francis of Brittaine, daughter to William Vicont of Limoges, a younger brother of the house of Ponthieure, for a pension of six hundred pounds a yeare, issuing out of the lands of B. Gaure, neere Theloufe, wherunto the Chamber of Accoumpts at Paris, with the Kings Proctor generall, and the inhabitants of Gaure opposed, maintaining, that there was no recompence due to the Lord of Albret for that interest, seeing he had none.

Nantes taken for the French

The King (who was in Sentinell) marcheth thether in person with his armie, the 4. of April, hoping now to finish this warre, and to send home the English. He marcheth, with an intent to besiege Anne in Rennes, whether this new terror had drawne her. But they had so sodenly pestred all the approches with numbers of trees cut out off the neerest Forrest, as they were forced to giue ouer that enterprife, to vndertake the siege of Guingamp, being the key of base Brittaine. The inhabitants were reduced to extreame pouertie, hauing lodged the English armie almost a yeare, who for want of payment, had spoiled them of all their goods, and left it ill garded with men for defence. Tremonille Lieutenant for the King, had this charge, who sent Adrian l'Hospital before, with part of the armie, to beleagar the place. At his approche the inhabitants demanded a composition: the Lieutenant receiues them, with assurance of life and goods. But in his absence, he cannot saue the towne from spoile.

Guingamp
taken.

Then fell out the appointment for Tournai: Anne sends sixteene Deputies, who findes the gates shut against them, and no lodging but in the Suburbes: the King disdaineth this treaty, hauing intelligence of the marriage of Maximilian with Anne: foreseeing, that from this stock might spring a plant, which hereafter might crosse his estate. Maximilian was now much moued for the taking of Nantes: the Emperour Frederick: his father held a Diet at Noremberg, to prouide some meanes to recouer this losse, and to encounter the French forces. The Princes of Germanie promise him twelue thousand Lausquenets, which the Colonell George of Terreplaine should bring to him by August following. The King of England should augment this armie with a leuie of six thousand English. But the discord that fell out betwixt these two Princes, and the tediousnesse of the Germanes, who are wonderfull heauie, gaue the King meanes to effect his desire, and to supplant Maximilian.

The Duke of Orleans freed from prison.

Anne much discontented with King
Charles.

At that time the King freed the Duke of Orleans from prison, and by the same meanes the Prince of Orange and the Earle of Dunois were reconciled vnto him. These men were great meanes to put the King in Maximilians place, being onely married by a Deputie. The Countsell found no better expedient, to quench all these quarrells and troubles. But the Duchesse was strange: what meanes is there (saith she) to loue a Prince, who these three yeares hath made such cruell warres against mee? being a pupill and vnder age? Who detaynes my Townes vniustly? Who spoiles my subiects? Doth outrage and kill my Officers, vpon refusall to pay him my rents and reuenues? Who (notwithstanding former transactions passed betwixt vs) spoiles my Country, makes desolate my Townes: and hath sought tyrannically to seize vpon my person.

It was needfull to imploy many great personages to pacifie this discontented minde. The King sends the Duke of Orleans to that ende, who cunningly doth practise the Marshall of Rieux, the Chancellor of Montauban; and others of the Countsell; with the Ladie of Laval (gouernesse to the Duchesse,) and other Ladies her familiars, who both publickly and priuately lay before her her forepassed dangers, the miseries in the

A which her subiects had bene plunged through warre: the neighbourhood of so mightie a King, who would continually oppress her; and the farre distance of Maximilian, a poore Prince, full of affaires, and of small credit, who hath no meanes to raise her, neither could he erer succor her with about two thousand men. That she had no better meanes to purchase rest to her selfe and peace to her subiects, then by imbracing the alliance of King Charles, whereby she should not onely recouer her places, but of a Duchesse of Brittaine, should become a peaceable Queene, and well beloued of the whole Realme. If they were both married, it was but by Attorneyes, finally, in such accidents, the Church doth willingly dispence with such couenants not personally performed, to preuent the miseries that growe by warre.

1491.
Her Countsell
perswade her to imbrace
the alliance of France.

Maximilian was farre off, vnacquainted with these practises, no man sought to preuent it: and these perswasions did ring dayly in the eares of Anne, so as in the ende shee yeelds to follow the resolution of her states. They were wonderfully toyled and wearied with the warre, the people turmoyled, the Nobility impouerished, the Clergy oppressed, some Townes taken, and some waiering; and moreover they did see a great Prince demand their allyance with force, and the chiefe Noblemen inclyned to the French faction. These reasons made it seeme more conuenient, and to be preferred before the slowe succors of Maximilian.

This was Anne Duchesse of Brittain perswaded, and a peace concluded and ratified by a happy and agreeable treaty of marriage, by the which (to maintayne the subiects of the Country in peace that were armed for eyther side) it was sayd. That all exploits and offences committed and done vpon assurance, or otherwise, during the warres on eyther side should be forgotten, and remayne without reproch to any, as remitted, abolished, and recompensed: every man should returne to his home, and all soldiars depart the Countrey. A wise aduice to mainetaine these two Countries in loue and concord. The Cittie of Rennes yeelds at this happie composition, where the King entred in November; vpon the assurance and conduct of the Duke of Orleans, with his simple traine, and without any men at armes, (for so it was agreed) to see the Duchesse and to raise the treaty, making the Prince of Orange (for that he had bene a chiefe instrument in this busines) his Lieutenant generall in Brittaine: then he tooke the way to Langais in Touraine, whether Anne was conducted by the Chancellor Montauban, Coetquen Lord Steward, and by the Lord of Chasteaubriant, and the marriage was consummated the 16. day of December.

A small peace
in Brittain
by a treaty of marriage.

The articles of the contract are to be seene in the Originalls. If this marriage were pleasing to God or not, let vs leaue it to the iudicious reader: so it is, that of three ionnes they could not bring vp one. Soone after Francis of Orleans Earle of Dunois died, the chiefe fierbrand of this warre, and likewise the principall motiue of this peace. From him are issued the Dukes of Longueville; and a little before John the second Duke of Bourbon was deceased, without Children, to whome succeeded Peter Earle of Beauieu, who hereafter shall be Duke of Bourbon, the eleuenth of that name.

The marriage
to Charles with Anne.

This yeare was borne Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, sonne to John of Foix, Vicont of Narbone, and of Mary of Orleans; one of the greatest Capitaines of his age, who shall giue ample testimonie of himselfe in the warres of Italie, which now we approach. There died also at Rome, Peter of Foix, Cardinall, brother to the sayd John, and Vicie to Queene Katherine of Nauarre. Henry of England, wonderfully incensed at this marriage, sought by all secret practises to surprize some of the chiefe places of the Province: and at the first retreat of his army out of Brittaine, hee caused it to make an offer at Port-blans, and some other ports, but they were still repulsed by the faithfull care of the Noblemen of the Country: namely by the Chancellor of Montauban, of Bertrand d'Acigné, and other sea Capitaines. Thus the Englishmen seeing their attempts like to take none effect, bent their course to go towards Calais, in the company of their King: who was making warre in the Countie of Gumes, whilst that Maximilian should enter the Realme, with forces on the other side: then 1492. then they besieged Boullen by sea, being kept from landing by the Lord of Cordes, A and the bastard of Cardonne, Captaine of Arras, with such small forces as they could suddenly oppose.

But oh Bastard, whilest thou repellst this common enemy, how prejudiciall shall they absence be from Arras? Four young gallants (saith the history) make false keyes to the gates, and give Maximilian intelligence, bringing him by night into the Towne, unknowne to Carqueleant, Lieutenant to Cardonne. Some write that one of those, in whom he trusted for the opening of the gates, made this Stratagem. But (howsoever) he was taken in his bed sleeping at his ease; and for a second token of base cowardise, he yeelded up the Castle, without attending the succors that came unto him. The Towne was spoiled, without sparing of the Churches, or the traitors houses. A worthy reward of their treachery. Thus can we preferre our Conquests.

A while after they attempted Amiens. A shame to soldiers; that a woman should heare the first report, & that by her advertisement to the watch, in ringing the great bell of Bessroy, should put the Towne in armes. And as the first aduice came from a woman, so are they honorable qualified in the history. To haue borne weapons and armes with their husbands, who by the care and command of Rubempré and of Anthoine Clabault, Maire of the Towne, did their duties so well (euery one repaying to the quarter, which had bene formerly assigned him) as the enemy returned amazed. A duty which made them as famous; as their descendants infamous, by the notable treachery they committed in our dayes. Henry loued peace, and was imbarke more at the instance of his subiects (least they should thinke him more gracious to the French then the ancient quarrells of both nations required) then for any desire he had, to haue the King his enemy, to whom he had a great and strict bond, as we haue heard. The chiefe cause of his grudge was a great sum of money, which he sayd he had lent to the deceased Duke of Brittaine. The King hauing discovered it, commands the Lord of Cordes to treat with him, and payes him the money: and so sends him home satisfied into England.

Peace with Henry.

And with Maximilian.

This peace made Maximilian willing to bee reconciled. Moreouer the Princes of Germanie laboured in this pacification, and the affaires of the Empire, in the which his father had associated him, since the yeare 1486. began to call him. The Swisses D laboured it, and the people, especially those of the Lowe Countrye (as well through the French warres, as by their owne private diuisions) were so toiled, as they detested the warres. In the end, a peace was concluded for foure yeares onely, by the meanes of the Duke of Bourbon, the Prince of Orange, and the Lord of Cordes. So he receiued his daughter Marguerit againe, with the Counties of Artois and Bourgogne, receiuing the reuenues and homages, and the King keeping the Castles, to place garrisons in them, vntill the end of foure yeares. Behold this estate doth now enioy a happy rest, by the vnion of this goodly and great Duchie, to the Crowne of France, and by a peace confirmed with Henry and Maximilian. But as Charles had enlarged his Diadem, with this new acquisition, so the vrgent importunitie of his Scholemaster, Lewis of Ambosie, E Bishop of Albi, and of Doctor Maillard, made him to restore the Counties of Roussillon, and Perpignan, too religiously vnto Ferdinand King of Arragon, the which Lewis the x. his Father had gotten, hoping by this meanes to tie the Spaniard to a perpetuall peace. What should Charles do then with his Nobility and his youth, he being young, vigorous and of no idle complexion? Now a great desire makes him to cast his eyes beyond the Alpes, and thrusts him to the conquest of goodly and rich Estates. But let vs examine the causes and proceedings farther off.

The first motive of the voiage of Italy.

We haue sayd before, that René Duke of Lorraine was in Court, and demanded restitution of the Duchie of Bar, and the County of Prouence. During his abode, the Realme of Naples being reuoluted, the Nobility and the three estates of the Realme, F put themselves vnder the Protection of the Church; as holding of it in fee. The Pope sends for René, to inuict him in the Realme, vpon some right which he pretended. The Gallies of Gennes attended him: the Cardinall of Saint Pierre was there to conduct him,

A him, and men from all the Noble men of the Country prest him therunto where they expected him so long, as the Pope was forced to make an agreement with Ferdinand, being assisted by the Florentines. Vpon assurance of this accord, which the Pope, the Venitians, the King of Spaine, and the Florentines had sworne, and were bound to see obserued, the Barons of the Realme returne home to their houses, and were all taken prisoners. The Prince of Salerne cheefe of the house of Saint Seuerin escapes, and three of his Nephewes with him, sonnes to the Prince of Basignan, who retire them selues to Venice, and demands of the Seigneurie what refuge they would wish them to choofe, to the Duke of Lorraine, or to the Kings of France or of Spaine. The Venitians answer. That the Duke of Lorraine was a dead man, vnable to support so heauie a burthen. B That the King of Spaine was already strong at sea, and the realmes of Naples and Sicilie would make him too mighty, that they had liued in good correspondency with the Kings of France, who in former times had possessed the said realmes. The delays of the Lorraine, being but poore, made the thus to qualifie him long for he wanted neither courage nor valour. They were ialous of the Neighbourhood of a mightie Prince, and did not consider that to call in a King of France to these Estates, was the meanes to ruine them. So they passe into France, where the affaires of Brittaine held them about two yeares in their pursute. One called Stephen de Vers, a man of base sort, who had serued the King well in his infancie, as a grome of his chamber, and now made Seneschall of Beaucaire and President of the Accountsof Paris, with the Generall Brissonnet, afterwards Cardinall, ruled their master.

The Neapolitains gouerne them, and they imbarke him in this voiage, who of himselfe was flexible. The wisest dissuade him, as a dangerous enterprife for the French, and alwayes farall: He wanted all necessarie things. The King was yong, and weake of complexion, he hath few good Commanders, and fewer wise men: no money, and himselfe wilfull, the best was he had a gallant Nobilitie and yong, but ill commanded, nothing obedient, and too wilfull, like to their head, the which notwithstanding purchased to the King an immortall glorie. The leading and returne of this army doubtlesse was the worke of heauen. Before his departure, Charles requires ayde and Counsell of the Venitians. Aide we cannot giue you (saie they) for feare of the Turke, yet were D they in peace with him, and the Turke then reigning, was of small reputation. As for counsell, it were presumption for vs to counsell so wise a King, assisted with so good counsel notwithstanding we wil helpe you rather then hurt you, and you shalbe very welcome.

The motives of the voiage of Naples.

Wants for this voiage.

In truth GOD will haue vs confesse, that neither the wit nor pollicy of man can disappoint that which his eternall prouidence had decreed. This succeeded otherwise then that common weale expected, first they conceiued not, that the King would undertake this voiage in person. Moreouer they hoped to be reuenged of this house of Arragon, whome they hated exceedingly, imputing it to Ferdinand, as the means to drawe downe Mahomet Othoman, who conquered Constantinople, and had done many outrages to the Venitians: and Alphonse sonne to the said Ferdinand had stirred up the Duke of Ferrare, to make that chargeable warre against them, the which had almost ruined them: to haue sent a man to Venice to poison their celskernes, with many other complaints which they framed against this house. But the chiefe motive was for that by their meanes they could not extend their dominions, as wel in Italy as in Greece. Thus they thought to vse the King as a scourge to whip their enemy, but not to ruine him, and by their shipwracke to haue meanes to seaze vpon some Townes in Apulia lying vpon the gulfes: as it happened.

This was one motive to transport the French forces beyond the Alpes. An other was, that Bonne a daughter of Sauoie & widow to Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, a woman both without honor and iudgement, was chiefly gouerned by a Secretarie of hers named Chico bred vp in that house, and by her Caruer, Antonie Tassinio. Chico to assure the estate of the yong Duke Iohn Galeas, sonne to the said Iohn, had expelled all his fathers brethren, vncles to the Sonne: and among the rest Lodowike Sforce; and Robert of Saint Seuerin, sonne of a bastard Daughter of the house of Saint Seuerin: Tassinio D d d. (who

1493. (who had a great interest in his Ladies bed and fauour) calles them home with her consent. Being returned they take Chico, and against their promise to offer him any violence, they put him in a pipe, and dragging him through the City of Milan, send him prisoner to Paule, where he died, & they modestly dismissed Tasino Lodowicke and Robert, freed from these two obstacles, fortifie them selues neere the Duchesse, and euen then did Lodowicke practise to vsurpe the Duchie of Milan. For the first fruits of this proiect they sequester the two sonnes of Bonne and lodge them in the Castell, and seize vpon the Treasor (which was then held to be the greatest in Christendome). They make three keys, whereof thee kept one, but they had the gard of all. They force her to renounce the wardship, and Lodowicke was created Tutor. This was not all, the Castell was carefully kept, and the Captaine went not without the turnepikes. Lodowicke and Robert were not admitted, but with one or two followers. But two great Princes cannot raigne long together in one State without ieaousie. Lodowicke supplants Robert, & puts him from all gouernment. Thus Lodowicke commands Milan absolutely, and Robert serues the Venetians: yet Galeas and the Earle of Caiazza, children to Robert, shall returne and doe Lodowicke good seruice in the State of Milan. Then began Lodowicke to increase in authority, grauing the Dukes picture on the one side of their coyne, and his owne on the other, not without the muttering of many, namely of Isabell the wife of Alphonso Duke of Calabria, sonne to Ferdinand King of Arragon, as proud and haughtie a woman, as her husband was weake of iudgement and without courage. This repyning made Lodowicke hasten his resolution. And thus he proceeded: when the Duke went forth of the Castell, his brother remained within, and Lodowicke conducting him home, the captaine did vsually come forth vpon the bridge to receiue him. One day among the rest Lodowicke staies him purposely a little without the bridge, to drawe forth the Captaine, whome Galeas and the Earle Caiazza seize vpon, and on such as followed him. They within drawe the bridge, Lodowicke lights a candle, & swears to cut off their heads that were in his power, if they yeeld not the place before the light be burnt: The which they do. He enters, and placeth men at his pleasure: he putts the Captaine in prison: arraignes him, vpon colour that he meant to deliuer vp the Castell to the Emperour. He staies some Germaines, and makes them beleue, that they treated in fauour of the house of Austria, which of old time pretended some right to the Duchie: yet afterwards both he & they were set at liberty. Lodowicke is now master of the fort. He must seeke means to maintaine this vsurpation: yet least he should growe too odious, he makes all dispatches in that name of John Galeas Duke of Milan his Nephew, a Duke in name only, but he in effect. In the meane time Isabell sollicit her father and Grandfather, to reuenge the iniustice and tyrannie of Lodowicke. Lodowicke vnderstood well, that this acte would offend many Princes: that his intolent and not accustomed exaction of money made his name odious to all the people of the Duchy: and that Ferdinand King of Arragon with his sonne Alphonso would not faile to embrace the quarrell and right of John Galeas and of their Isabell. To crosse them, he cunningly (to the prejudice of the ancient confederacie of the Estats of Italy,) makes a league betwixt the Pope, the Venetians, and John Galeas Duke of Milan his Nephew (arming himselfe alwaies with that name) for their common defence, and namely of Lodowikes gouernment, vpon condition, that the Venetians and the said Duke should either of them send presently two hundred men at armes to Rome, and greater forces (if need were) for the recouery of such places as were detained from the Church by Virgilius Trifinus, in fauour of Peter of Medicis his kinsman, associat with Ferdinand, & Alphonso. And more to crosse their estates, Lodowicke (who could not subsist in the midst of their vinted forces) sends an honorable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Caiazza was the chiefe, assisted by Charles of Balbiano Earle of Belzoiso, & Galeo of S. Seuerin, who had married a bastard of Lodowicks: who greatly vrge the title he had to this goodly and pleasant countrie of Naples. They safely drew the king to taste a vaine glorie of Italy, perswading him by great offers of seruice, succors of men, money, and munition. But before we passe the Alpes, let vs examine the estate of Italy, & the right which our Charles pretended. Since the declining of the Romaine Empire, Italy neuer enjoyed

A enjoyed a more happy prosperity, then about the yeare 1490. A long peace had made the most barren places fruitfull, it abounded in people, riches, great men of state, and good wits, in learning, industrie and military fame, such as that age could produce, beautified with the state of many Princes, not subiect to any other command but of themselves. Laurence of Medicis a Citizen of Florence, was a great meane to hold things in this prosperous estate, a man of a quiet spirit, experienced in affaires, iudicious of great authority aboue all his fellow Citizens, & for that he gouerned Pope Innocent the 8. his kinsman absolutely renowned throughout all Italy. He knew that the greatnesse of other Potentates, would mightly shake the Common weale of Florence, and therefore he fought by all meanes to hold them equall, by a generall obseruation of peace. Ferdinand of Arragon, King of Naples, a wise Prince, and of great reputation, did much affect this publike quiet, but he had worke at home: Alphonso Duke of Calabria his eldest son, being much discontented, seeing that John Galeas Sforce, Duke of Milan his sonne in Lawe, should carry but the naked and simple title of Duke, vnder the oppression of Lodowicke his Vncle. But Ferdinand hauing yet a fresh impression of the late reuolt of his subiects of Naples, not ignorant that at the first motion they would open their armes to the house of France, considering the affection which most of his subiects bare vnto it of old: he feared least the diuisions in Italy should drawe the French to invade the Realme of Naples: preferring a present benefit before the indignation of his sonne, desiring rather to vnite himselfe with the other Estats, especially that of Milan and Florence, to countermine the Venetians greatnesse, being then fearefull to all Italy, putt vp with the late ouerthrowe of the Duke of Ferrara, father in law to Lodowicke, after a long and dangerous hazard of their estate. Lodowicke was in the same predicament with the rest: and moreover peace was farre more necessarie then warre, for the preseruatiou of an authority lately vsurped. Herevnto that commendable inclynation to peace which he found in Laurence of Medicis, did moue him. And considering, that in regard of the inueterate hatred betwixt the house of Arragon and the Venetians, they should hardly make any firme League betwixt them: he therefore concluded, that Ferdinand and his sonne should not bee at neede assisted by any other, to crosse him in his desseins: and hauing them alone opposite, he should easily withstand them.

So Ferdinand, Lodowicke and Laurence continued the alliance cherefully which they had renewed in the yeare 1480. for 25. yeares: all the meaner Potentats in a manner leaning vnto them: to whom the Venetians greatnesse was wonderfully suspected, managing their affaires apart, not imparting their counsells to the body of the comon league, watching onely opportunity to growe great by the publike discords. Being all thus vnited, they were too strong for the Venetians: yet were they full of enuie and mutuall ieaousie, one prying still into an others estate, and continually crauing desicines, so as they could not long liue in true and faithfull friendship.

Troubles by
the death of Laurence of Medicis.

The death of Laurence of Medicis was a great cause of the breach of this generall peace. An vnseasonable death for him, hauing not yet liued 44. yeares compier: for his Country, the which (by his wisdom and iudgement) flourished most happily in all the benefites which a long peace doth vsually bring forth: and for Italy, as well by reason of the affaires which he did wisely manage, to the generall good of the whole Country, as also for that he was a notable instrument to temper the diuers humors and ieaousies which sprang vp daily betwixt Ferdinand and Lodowicke, and to quench the flames which might easily cause a generall disorder.

This peace beeing well shaken by his death, was presently quite broken, not so much by the death of Innocent, who by his sloth was growne vnprofitable as for himselfe, his friends and the publike, after hee had retyred his armes, the which hee had displayed at the instance of the Barons of Naples: as by the succession of Roderike Borgia, who was then called Alexander the sixth, a Spaniard, chosen vnder the factious discords of Afcianus Sforce brother vnto Lodowicke, & Julian of S. Pierre, buying the suffrages of many other Cardinalls, partly with ready money, suon 1493. and partly by promises of Offices and benefices. He was subtil and quicke witted, excellent in counsell, vehement to perswade, and a great man of state. But (sayd the Originall) his vertues were surpassed by his vices, dishonest in manners, no sincerity, no shame, no truth, no faith, no religion in him: but an insatiable covetousnes, an immoderate ambition, a cruelty more then barbarous, and a violent desire to advance by what meanes he could his children, which were many in number. Peter the eldest sonne of Laurence of Medicis, was successor to his goodly honors, but not to his fathers good humors. Peter differed as much from Laurence, as that Hector drawne dead at a chariots taile, from Hector returning victorious, honored with the spoiles of Achilles.

The peace of Italy turned by Peter of Medicis.

At his entrance to the government, following an aduice directly contrary to his father, without any other counsell then of Virgilius Vrsinus, of whose humour Peter depended (both their Mothers being of the family of Vrsins) he made so strict a League with Ferdinand and Alphonso, as Lodowike (a vigilant and subtil man) conceived presently that the Florentin forces might easily bee drawne to prejudice him, in fauour of the Arragonois. This ieaousie was layed open by this accident. The confederates according to their custome, must send to congratulate and acknowledge the newe Pope. Lodowike had wisely aduised, that all the Ambassadors should enter Rome together in company, and likewise into the consistory before the Pope, and that one should speake for them all. for (sayd he) by this manner of proceeding we shall make knowne to Italy, that there is not onely a singular loue and League betwixt vs, but also so firme a coniunction, as we shall seeme to be but one body and one Principality. Ferdinand approved this aduice. Peter did not publicly gainsay it, but in priuate hee could not digest it, being one of the Ambassadors chosen for the common weale of Florence, hauing resolved to beautifie his ambassage, with a proud and stately traine. He considered, that entering into Rome, and presenting himselfe to the Pope in troupe, his traine would appeere far lesse than in so great a company. And therefore he caused the King of Naples to frustrate his dessein, as not to be done without confusion. But Ferdinand loath to displease one to please another, doth aduertise Lodowike, that he did not recall his first consent, but at the instant request of Peter of Medicis.

There was yet another reason, which made Lodowike to suspect some secret intelligence betwixt Peter and the Arragonois. Francisquino Cibo bastard sonne to Innocent, D after his fathers death had retired himselfe to Florence, to Peter of Medicis, brother to Magdalene his wife. Being planted there, Virgilius Vrsinus bought of him, by Peters meanes, Languillare, Cerverre, and some other places neere to Rome, for fortie thousand ducats. The money was in a manner all lent him by Ferdinand, of purpose, to the ende that Virgilius being his kinsman and entertayned soldiary, growing great about Rome, he might reape the more profit. Ferdinand found no better foundation for his safety, then to tye all or the greatest part of the Noblemen, within the territories, to suppress the that Indies head, if it should rise too high. This he labored more carefully, doubting that Lodowikes authority would proue great hereafter with the Pope, by the meanes of Cardinall Ascanius his Brother.

The vanity of mans conceites must needs discover the weakenesse of his iudgement. Of two mischiefs Ferdinand did choose the greatest, & grounding vpon a light profit, he did not foresee, that he layed the way open to his owne ruine. For the more discovering the Arragonois intentio, & pretending that by the alienation of these final places lying in his Iurisdiction, done without his privity, they were by right forsaide to the Apostolike see. He exclaimes and complains against Ferdinand, Peter, & Virgilius, protesting to omit no meanes that may serue for the defence of his dignity, and the rights of the Romaine see.

Lodowike embraceth this occasion, and seeing the Pope to study of some great reuenge against Ferdinand, he feeds his passions, by the loane offorty thousand ducats & three hundred men at armes, leuied vpon the common treasure. Yet apprehending new troubles, he aduiseeth Ferdinand, to perswade Virgilius, to content the Pope by some honest composition, to preuent the inconueniences & scandales this diuorce might breed, and 1493. A and counsellor Peter to follow the domestical example of his father, and to be a mediator, as he had bene, betwixt Ferdinand and him, rather then a fire brand to kindle diuision: but he talked to a deaff man. Ferdinand promisseth to do it: but he ruined with one hand, what hee raised with the other. he secretly sollicitis Virgilius to take possession of those Townes and not to yeeld the Pope any thing, but some certaine summe of money, by meanes whereof he should remaine peaceable Lord of the layd places, promising to warrant him from all troubles.

Lodowike findes hereby, that it behoues him to fortifie himselfe with newe supports and newe alliances. He hath a good opportunity: the disdain of Alexander against the King of Naples, and the affection the Senat of Venice seemed to haue to the Disunion of this League, whereby their proiects had so long bene made frustrate. But the Pope loued his children deere: and contrary (to the custome of others, who called them Nephewes, as a more modest name) he impudently called them Sonnes. He hoped to obtaine one of the bastard Daughters of Alphonso, for one of his bastards sonnes (Grafte crabbe vpon crabbe, and you shall neuer reape good fruit) and whilst this vaine hope possessed him, he opened his eares rather then his heart to Lodowikes motion. Ferdinand gaue his consent, but Alphonso hated the ambition & pride of Alexander. The Pope being thus frustrate, turnes all his thoughts to Lodowike, moued partly with disdain, and partly with feare, seeing Vrsin, by the exceeding great fauours which he receiued from Ferdinand and the Florentins, to bee growne mighty in all the territories of the Church.

A league betwixt the Pope, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan.

The Venetians had yet fresh in memorie, the Leagues made against them in the war of Ferrara, in the which Sixtus had intangled them: and yet to withdrawe them, hee employed both his spirituall and temporall power. They had no more confidence in Alexander. Yet the policy of Lodowike did in the ende worke this League, betwixt the Pope, the Senate of Venice and the Duke of Milan, in the moneth of Aprill. 1493. Thus Lodowike is fortified on the one side: but he had an other meaning then the Pope or Senat of Venice: and foreseeing that he could not long build vpon the foundation of this newe alliance, he resolues to assure himselfe by forraigne forces, seeing that both his owne, and his friends in Italie were doubtfull vnto him. He therefore conuerts his thoughts on this side the Alpes, seeking to drawe the King to seize vpon the ancient inheritance of the house of Anion. But let vs see by what right? Urban the 4. gaue the Realmes of Naples & Sicile (vniustly detayned by Manfroy bastard sonne to Frederic the 2. to Charles Earle of Provence, & of Anion, to hold in fee, being brother to Saint Lewis, who obtayned this title that was giuen him by armes. Charles the 2. succeeded his father, who left it to Robert his son, and this man died without heires. Ioane daughter to Charles Duke of Calabria (deceased before his father,) enjoyed the succession. Being distayned not so much for her sexe, as for the lewdnesse of her life: she adopts Lewis Duke of Anion brother to King Charles the wife for her sonne, and then died of a violent death. Lewis passing thither with an armie, died of an ague in Apulia, seeing himselfe almost in possession of the kingdome: so as the house of Anion reaped no profit by this adoption, but onely of the Earldome of Provence, which was continually possessed by the successors of Charles the 1. Notwithstanding Lewis of Anion son to the first Lewis, and after the grandchild of the same name, thrust on by the Pope, as often as they had any quarrell with the Kings of Naples) haue often (but unfortunately) binuaded this Realme. By the death of Ioane the Realme was transported to Charles of Durazzo issued likewise from Charles the 1. to whom Ladislaus his sonne succeeded: who dying without issue left his sister Ioane the 2. for his heire: an vnfürfortunate name in that place, whose indiscretion and impudency of life made them purchase the name of folles. Lewis the 3. making warre with the helpe of Martin the 5. against Ioane, fearing the government of the Realme, to those to whom she had abandoned her body, she adopted for her sonne and sole refuge, Alphonso King of Arragon and of Sicile. Afterwards hauing reuoked her adoption, vpon colour of ingratitude she adopted the same Lewis: who employing his forces for her against Alphonso expelled him from the Realme.

The right of France to Naples and Sicile.

1493. realme: but he died the same year, leaving Joane in quiet possession the remainder of her life. Then dying without children she instituted René Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence for heire, being brother to the said Lewis her adoptive sonne. This institution displeasing some Barons, who said that the will was forged by them of Naples, they called backe, Alphonso. Hence sprang the warres and factions betwixt the Aragons, and the Aragons, nourished so long, by the couetousnes of Popes, who according to the oportunitie of times, haue oftentimes granted their inuicestures diuersly. Alphonso carrying it by force, and dying without lawfull heires, left Ferdinand his bastard to succeede, as a purchased good, not belonging to the Crowne of Arragon. John sonne to René assisted by the chiefe Barons of the Countie, came to assault him: but the hapines and valour of Ferdinand giues him the repulse. René furnishing his sonne John, and dying without an heire male, names Charles his brothers sonne for heire, who dying without children, resigned all his inheritance to Lewis the xi. Father to Charles the eight.

Charles was but two and twentie yeares old, little experienced in affaires, conetous of glorie, and thrust on with a valiant desire: he often neglected the wholesome counsell of the wisest, namely of Lames of Grunille, Admirall of France, preferring the advice of some or base qualitie that possessed him, corrupted by the Neapolitanes that were retired for reliefe, & by the Ambassadors of Lodowick. The Nobilitie of France, commended the wisdom of Lewis the xi. who refused to accept of the Genewis whē they offered themselves, being alwaies loath to attempt any thing vpon Italie, being both painfull, and fatall to the Realme. They knew Ferdinand to be a wise Prince, rich in money, and of great fame: and his sonne Alphonso to be valiant and well scene in the art of warre. (but these were but shewes, and all their reputation turned into a ridiculous sioake.) That for the gouernment of warre, and state, the Kings counsell was but weake, and their experience small that had most credit with him. Hee must haue a huge masse of money, and there was none in his Treasorie. Moreouer they objected the craft, and policie of the Italians: that Lodowick himselfe for a light profit would breake his faith. That hee would be loath to see the Kingdome of Naples, in the King of France his power: finally to make any conquest beyond the Alpes, were to vnfurnish the Realme both of men and money.

All this was but to cast oyle into fire already kindled. Charles reiects all advice of peace, and without the priuie of any but de Vers and Prisonnet, hee agrees secretly with Lodowicks Ambassadors: That an armie passing into Italie for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Milan should giue him passage through his Countie. hee should accompanie him with five hundred men at armes maintrayned: he should suffer him to arme what fitting hee would at Genes: and before hee should march, hee should lend the King two hundred thousand Ducats. On the other part. The King should defend the Duchie of Milan against all men, and should especially maintaine Lodowicks authoritie: and during the warre, he should maintaine two hundred Lances in Ast, a Cittie belonging to the Duke of Orleans, to supply all necessaries in the Duchie. This he signed with his owne hand, and promised moreouer vnto Lodowick, That going to the Conquest of Naples, he should giue him the principallitie of Tarentum.

But did not Lodowick feare the power of so great a king, lately fortified with three goodly Provinces of Bourgonie, Picardie, and Brittaine, the which his father Francis Sforze would haue doubted, if a poore Earle of Prouence, had conquered the realme of Naples? and did he not apprehend him who had publicly protested, That he would neuer suffer the oppression of his cousin: for Charles and John Galeas were sisters children? Doubtlesse now the time was come, when as that should bee verified which Laurence of Medicis spake a little before his death, vnderstanding of the vision of Brittaine to the Crowne. That if the King of France knew his owne forces, Italie could suffer much. and the publike predictions of Enri Ierosme Sauonarola, whereof we will speake hereafter.

The King now takes his way to Lions, to assemble his forces, and diuides them into two two armies at land, and at sea. In that at land were about sixteene hundred men at armes, two archers to a Lance, sixe thousand Archers on foote, six thousand crossbowmen, sixe thousand pikes, eight thousand hargrebufiers carrying two hundred swords, twelue hundred pieces of artillerie, of iron and brasie, sixe thousand two hundred pioneers, two hundred expert Canoniers, six hundred maister Carpenters, three hundred matons, eleuen hundred men to cast bullets, to make coale, cordes & cables, four thousand carters, and eight thousand horse of the artillerie. The armie at sea consisted of eighteene gallies, six galeons, and nine great shippes. The chiefe commanders that did accompany the King, were, Lewis Duke of Orleans Lieutenant general for his Maestie by sea, the Earle of Angouleme, the Earle of Montpensier, the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Nemours, John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, the Earles of Neuers, Ligni, Boulougne, Bresse, the Lord of Albret, Lewis of Tremouille, Vicount of Tonnars, the Marshalls of Gié, Rieux, and Baudricourt: the Lords of Crusol, Tournon, Piains, Silli, Guise, Chandenier, Mauleon, Prie, Montafon, d'Alegre, Bonneuil, Genouillac, Franczles, Chaumont, Chastillon, Palice, Fergi, d'Hospital, Beaumont, Myolans, Mattheu bastard of Bourbon, the bastard of Bourgonne, with a great number of Noblemen, & voluntarie gentlemen. The Lord of Cordes, (so famous in our historie, for his singular valour, wisdom, and loyalty) died at Bresse, three leagues from Lions. The Lord of Prise, master of the Kings horse, prepared all things necessaie for the fleet at Genes.

Some infection transported the King from Lions to Vienne, from whence the Duke of Orleans parted for Genes, and there the voyage was fully concluded: for vntill that time the dissuasion of the best aduiled, and the defect of the cheefe sinewes of warre, had held them in suspence: for that a hundred thousand Frankes, borrowed vpon great interest, in the banke of Soly at Genes, could not long maintaine the ordinary charge of his house. Yet fifty thousand Ducats lent him by Lodowick Sforze, and the lively impression of the Cardinall S. Pierre, the fatall instrument of the miseries of Italie, did somewhat reuiue the fainting courage of Charles. What shame (saith he) what infamie, to giue ouer so honorable a resolution? an enterprise published throughout all the world? the Popes amazement? the terror of Peter of Medicis? the ruine of the Aragons? who can stay the violent descent of this armie? euen vnto the marches of Naples? Doth he doubt the want of money? At the fearefull thunder of his artillerie, yea at the lesse brunt of his armes, the Italians will bring vnto him: and the rebels spoiles shall feed his armie: what shadow then? what dreame? what vaine feare doth cause this inconstant change? where is that magnanimitie? where is that courage, which did but euen now brag to ouercome all the forces of Italy united together? In the end, the King marcheth the 23. of August, leaving Peter Duke of Bourbon, his brother in law, for Regent, who conducted the Queen from Grenoble into France.

Doubtlesse, we must obserue a singular and fauourable prouidence of God, in the end of this voyage, vnder taken vpon borrowed money: but where God workes, all things are eie. For a third parte of his need: being at Turin, the King borrowed the Jewels of the Duchesse of Sauoy, daughter to William Marquisse of Montferrat, & widow to Charles Duke of Sauoy, & pawned them for 1200. Ducats: & for a fourth, being at Casal, he pawned the Jewels of the Marquisse, widow to the Marquis of Montferrat, for the like summe: women worthy doubtlesse of our historie, hauing loued our France with a singular affection. At Ast the King was toucht with the small poeks, & a feuer, which did hazard his life, but within fixe or seven dayes hee was recovered. Thither came Lodowick Sforze, and Beatrice his wife, daughter to the Duke of Ferrare, to salute him, and withall came very fauourable newes.

Ferdinand was lately deceased. Alphonso his Sonne had two Armies in field: one in toingny, towards Ferrare, the which Ferdinand his Sonne Duke of Calabria, commanded, accompanied by Vingil Vrsin, the Earle of Petilliano, and John Laques of Tunale, who afterwards serued the King. This Armie had to encounter them the Earle of Catanzo, and the Lord of Aubigni a Scottishman, who stopp their passage. The other at Sea, led by Don Frederick brother to Alphonso, accompanied by 1494. Obietto of Fiesque a Genevois, and others, by meanes whereof they were in hope to drawe the city of Genes into their faction. But the Bayliffe of Dijon entring with two thousand Swisses, assured it for the King. Obietto with three thousand men had taken Rapale twenty miles from Genes. The two S. Severins brethren, and John Adorne brother to Augustin Gouvernor of Genes ioyned with the Duke of Orleans, and a thousand Swisses charged them, ouerthrew them, and slue a hundred or six score: (It was much in that age, for then their warres were not bloody) tooke some prisoners, and all that escaped were stript by the Duke of Milans people: so as Fredericke could neuer gather them againe together. A disgrace which did much distast the Florentines, being alwaies more inclined to the house of France, then to that of Arragon, & encouraged the king to proceed, inimated therunto, by the perswasions of Lodowick. My Lord, saith he, doubt not of this enterprise: there are three great parties in Italy: you hold the one, that is Milan: the other stirr not, these be the Venetians: you have no business but at Naples, hauing conquered that realme, if you wil giue me credit, I will assist you to become greater then euer was Charlemagne, and we will expell the Turke out of Constantinople. Lodowick perswasions to Charles.

Finally, Charles makes his entry into Paui, in quality of a king, vnder a Canopy, the fleets hanged, & the People crying, God saue the King. Then grew there some ieaousie, they wold haue the King rest satisfied with the towne for his lodging: but in the end, the castle was opened vnto him, where he did visit John Galeas his cousin, being sicke, & at the point of death: not without great compassion of such as thought the course of his life would be soone cut off, by the notable treachery of his vnle.

The death of John Galeas.

Plaisance receiued him as willingly as Paui, and thither newes was brought of the death of the Duke of Milan, leauing a sonne and a daughter. Lodowick posting thither, with promise to returne, vsurped the Duchie absolutely with the title. Thus all Lombardy marched at the bruite of this French army, some for loue, and some for feare. They held our men to be religious, loyall and full of bountie: but couetousnesse, robberies and other insolencies of souldiers, made them soone to alter their conceits, & the horror of the artillery (whose thunder was yet strange vnto them) amazed them. The Florentine, a cunning dissembler, had sent twise vnto the King, before he parted from France, at the first came the Bishop of Rhegin, and Peter Soderini: of whom they onely demanded passage, and a hundred men at armes maintained: at the second time, Peter Caponi, and others, who made answer, that by the commandement of King Lewis the xi. they had renounced the alliance of John of Aniou, (if he were associate with Charles of France in the warre of the common weale) to enter into league with Ferdinando of Arragon, and therefore they could not rashly leaue it. But in either of these troupes, there was full some enmy to Peter of Medicis, who gaue the King intelligence of the peoples desire, lifting vp their hands for the recovery of their liberty oppressed by Peters gouernement, entred euen by his nearest kinsmen, and the best families, as the Carpenters, Soderini, Nerli and others.

Great practices against Peter of Medicis.

And for a second baite, Laurence and John de Medicis, cousins to Peter, came secretly to the King at his departure from Plaisance, vowing great loue in generall to the house of France, and much hatred to their kinsman, against whom Charles was greatly incensed, for the excuse he made to his Ambassador, which was sent from Asi: That the chiefe Cittizens were in their houses in the country, and could not so speedily returne him an answer, but they should shortly let him vnderstand their resolution, by speciall Ambassadors. In the meane time they arme ioynly with the Pope. The King must not leaue Tuscan and the Estate of the Church behinde him as his enemies. The army passeth the Appennin at Pontremv upon Magre, the which diuides Liguria (which is the Country of Genes) from Tuscan, and is vpon the marches of the Florentines country, of purpose to force them to plant the Standard of France vpon their walles, or else to take the weakest places to winter in.

The second exploit of the Kings armie, was at Fiuzane, a towne taken by force, sackt, and all mercenary souldiers, with many inhabitants slaine. A hard stratagem, for men

A man, who (as we haue said) made warre rather in pompe and bravery then with bloudes.

Serezane was sufficient to withstand, yea to ruine a great power: Serezane was more strong a fort built vpon the hill about the towne: but the Florentines diuisions had hindered all necessary prouision, but men. And indeed they were loath to make warre against the house of France, of whom they had of old time depended: & the rather for that they were forbidden to trafficke; & their men banished out of all France, by the especiall aduise of Caponi. The armie could not continue there, the countrie is straight and barren, compassed in by the sea and mountaines, no victuall but what was brought from Parie, and great store of snow. But the way must be laide open to Pisa, and if they had neglected the first place that resisted, what village but would haue held out? Paul vsurped some horse, with three hundred foote (meaning to put them into Serezane) who are incountred, beat, & in a maner all slaine or take prisoners, by some troupes of the foreward going to forrage beyond Magre. This terror made the Florentines to protest publicly, That they would no longer incurre the Kings displeasure, nor the Duke of Milans. Whereupon they send fiftene or sixteene Cittizens; and offer the King free entrie into their City, whose onely desire was to expell Peter of Medicis.

The Florentines offer the King free entrie into their City.

Peter practised for his part (by the meanes of Laurence Spinoli his factor in the barke at Lion, the Earle of Bresse, & Myolans the Kings Chamberlaine, Gouvernor of Daulphinie). They procure him a safe conduct, and at the first treaty he graunts the King all his demands: That the forts of Serezane, Serenazelle and Pietresaint (the Keyes of the Florentine dominion of that side) those of Pisa, and the port of Liorno should be put into the Kings hand, who should be bound to redeliuer them after the conquest of Naples. That the King should receiue the Florentines into his alliance and protection, vpon the loane of two hundred thousand ducats, and the assurance of these promises should be concluded in Florence. A facility which discouered a wonderfull feare and trouble of minde: for the King wold haue bene well satisfied with more easie conditions.

Peter de Medicis graunts the King his demands.

Lodowick was present at this Capitulation, who to reape some benefit of Charles his conquests, obtaines from his maiesty for thirty thousand ducats, a transport for him and his heires, of the possession of Genes: (which the King some yeares before had granted to John Galeas Duke of Milan) yet discontented that Charles would not giue him Pietresaint and Serezane in gard (which places he demanded (as forcibly taken away by the Florentines from the Genevois, and had serued him as a meanes to lay hold of Pisa) he returned to Milan, and did neuer after see the King, leauing notwithstanding Galeas of S. Severin, and the Earle of Belfoiozo nere his maiestie.

Lodowick Sforce discontented with the King.

Thus by the confiscation of these strong places, the ports of Romagna are opened vnto the King, he enters Luques being very honourable receiued by the Cittizens, crying God saue the King of France Augustus. From Luques he goes to Pisa, Galeas of S. Severin, following the instructions giuen him by Lodowick Sforce (who did not foresee that the like accident would be the cause of his ruine) called the chiefe Cittizens, and aduised them, that rebelling against the Florentines, they should craue liberty from the King: hoping by this meanes that he should one day draw Pisa vnder the Duke of Milans command. To who they were subiect, before the Florentines held it; this was in the same yeare the Venetians conquered Padoua. Through this aduice the people troupe together, men, women, and children: they flocke the next day about the King going to masse, crying with open throat, Liberté, Liberté, beleeching him with hands lift vp, and teares in their eyes, to free them from the Florentines oppression, by who (say they) they were most tyrannously intreated. Raboa Councillor of the Parliament of Daulphinie, and Maister of requests, said vnto the King, that their demand was iust, & that it was a pitifull thing to see the hard subiects that did oppress the. The king (who did not consider the importance of this action) breaking the treaty of Serezane, & that he could not giue liberty to a towne that was not his, into the which hee was receiued onely by curtesie, rashly lets slip these words: I am content.

Pisa revolts against the Florentines.

Fauoured indirectly by the King.

Pricks

1494. Prick forward a strong headed horse, and he will runne at randon. This multitude doth presently change their crye of liberty, into cryes of ioy: and running to the bridge vpon the riuer of Arne, they beat downe the Mazorce, (this was a great Lion, planted vpon an high pillar of Marble, with the armes of Florence) and cast it into the riuer, and in the same place they set vp a King of France, holding a sword in his hand, and treading this Mazorce vnder their feet. But oh the lightnesse of Italians: fewe yeares after, at the entry of the King of the Romans, they shall deale with the King as with this Lion.

This ignominious and rashe wound, giuen to the estate of Florence, by Peter of Medicis, contrary to the example of his predeceffors, without the aduise of the Citizens, and without any decree of the Magistrates, had wonderfully incensed his fellow Citizens. Being returned to Florence, to prepare his lodging for the King, going the 9. of Nouember, to enter the Palace of the Seignurie, to treat of the Kings arrivall, behold James Nerli, a yong man, Noble and rich, with other Magistrates, being armed, offer him the entrie alone, but denyeth it to all his followers. Hee retires home to his house, and resolues to get that by force, which hee could not willingly obtaine. Hee armes, and caueth Paul Vrsin to approach with his troupe, the which was in the Florentinus pay. The State proclaimes him a rebel: the people flie to armes, and cryes Libertie. Peter recouers the gates, and with him were the Cardinall Iohn, and Iulian his bretheren: they flie to Bologne, and from thence to Venice. Peter had no cloake, but one of his groomes: being hated of his fellow Citizens, disdained of his domestick servants, his house spoiled, with losse of aboute a hundred thousand Ducats in mouables: and to increase his misery, a factor of his at Venice, refused him for the value of a hundred Ducats in cloath. A notable example, of the inconstancie of worldly affaires. Thus by the rashnesse of one yong man, lately equall in a manner to great Princes, the house of Medicis fell for that time, which vnder colour of ciuill administration, had gouerned the common-weale of Florence three score yeares peaceably, and with a respected authority.

Charles entred the next day triumphantly into Florence, himselfe & his horse armed, and his Lance vpon his thigh. The Florentines were not ignorant of his discontent, for that they fought to crosse him in his enterprise, and that many of his followers, thrust on by couetousnesse, gaped after nothing more, then the sack of so rich a City, having first of all resisted the power of France: and that others also did sollicite the restitution of Peter of Medicis, especially Philip Earle of Bresse. And although the City might worthily iustifie that violence, whereof Peter and his complices were the onely motives: yet did they wisely foresee, that the King would not let slip this opportunitie, to become their Lord. But being vnable to stop this violent streame by any force, they had secretly filled their cheefe houses with resolute men, receiued their entertained Captaines into the city, and did giue order, that euery man, both within and without neere the City, should arme at the sound of the Pallace great bel. Thus fortified with men, they stand still vpon the termes of composition. Oft times we loose the eie by ouer-gipping. The fauour they did see some beare vnto Peter: the insupportable tummes of money that were exacted, the absolute Seignurie of Florence which the King demanded, as hauing conquered it by the law of armes, considering in what manner he entred, made them refuse the rigor of demands, with a firme resolution to mainteine their publike liberty with the perill of their liues. Thus they grew angry on eyther side, and for a conclusion of the last conference, the Kings Secretary reading the articles which his Maiesty would resolutely haue concluded: behold Peter Caponi, one of the 4. deputies for the City, (a violent man, and one of the mightiest families in the State) puls the articles from the Secretary, and teares them. Seeing you demand

A bold asse. of us (saith he) so outrageous conditions, you shall sound your Trumpets, and we our bells.

This audacious brauery did moderate the excesse of their demands; for how lamentable had it bene, to haue fallen to any tragicall decision of their controuersie. The King calls him back, and containing himselfe within the bounds of reason, passeth this

Peter de Medicis and his bretheren expelled Florence.

Miserable estate at Venice.

The Kings entry into Florence.

The Florentines fortifie themselves in their houses for feare of the King.

Who makes unreasonable demands.

A capitulation. That the Cittie of Florence, should be a friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France. That at the end of the enterprise of Naples, the King should yield up without any charge to the Florentines) Pisa, Livorne, Pietresancte, Serezane, Serezanelle, and all other places taken or renolted: and in case of deniall they might recover them by force, that they should giue the King fiftie thousand Ducats in fiftene daies, forty thousand in March, and thirty thousand in Iune following. They should pardon the Pisans their rebellion, and other crimes. They should free Peter of Medicis from banishment and confiscation; vpon condition that he should not approach within a hundred and fiftie miles of their confines: nor his bretheren neerer then a hundred miles. This accord was done vpon the great altar, in the Church of S. Iohn at Florence. But matters succeeded otherwise, as we shall see: so the Florentines changed their red Lillie into a white.

Two daies after, the King parted towards Siemie, a City well peopled, seated in a fertile country, in ancient time rich, mighty, and the second City in Toscane, which needed in many factions to the stronger party, so as they enioyed more the name then the effects of liberty. They tooke off their gates for the Kings entry: notwithstanding the City being suspected of him, (for that it had bene alwayes at the deuotion of the Empire) he left a garrison, and tooke his way to Rome. Aigue-pendente and Montefalcone, (places belonging to the Pope,) receiued him with royall pompe, and laid the way open to Viterbe. The Florentine fortes which the King held, and the garrison left in Siemie, made the Venetians and Milanois to feare, that hee would hardly end his conquests with Naples. To prevent this common danger, they treat of a new confederacie, and had concluded it, if Rome had made that resistance to the King which many expected. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, the Popes forces, Virgile Vrsin, and the remainders of the Arragonois armie, had resolved to campe at Viterbe, and there to make head against the King; but the roades which the Colonois made (who had taken Ofina from the Pope, and hindred the passage of victuals to Rome by Sea) hauing put all the country about Rome in alarme, being iealous of the Popes integrity, who began to hearken to the French demands, made him to retire, leaving the way open for the King to enter into Viterbe, by the fauour of the Cardinall of S. Pierre, and the Colonois, and so into the territories of the Vrsins.

D The Pope is now wonderfully perplexed: he knowes himselfe to haue bene one of the cheefe motives of Charles his voyage: and since, without any offence, he hath opposed his authority, his counsell, and his armes. Hee imagines, that the assurance hee shall draw from the King, shall be no firmer then his to the King. He sees the Cardinals Ascanius, S. Pierre, and other his enemies in credit about the King. Hee feares that this prediction of Sauonarola should now take effect. That the Church should be reformed by the sword. He remembers with what infamie he came to the Pope: come: his government and his life controules him. The Cardinals Ascanius, Saint Pierre, Colonne, Sauelle, and aboute fiftene others, vrge the King to suppress a Pope so full of vices, and abhominable to all the world, and to proceed to a new election. Hee hath no sufficient forces to withstand the stranger. Alphonso droopes; Ferdinand is weak. Fergilus Vrsinus Generall of the Arragon armie, Constable of the realme of Naples, allyed to Alphonso, (Iohn Tourdain, sonne to the said Vrsin, hauing married a bastard daughter of Ferdinand the father of Alphonso) bound to the house of Arragon by so many respects, had of late consented, that his sonnes should giue the King passage, lodging and victuals within the territories of the Church: and leaues him Campagna, and other places, for his assurance, vntill the armie were past the territories of Rome. The Earle of Petillano, and all the rest of the family of Vrsins, followed the same accord. And now Ciuita-uechia, Cornette, and in a manner all about Rome is in the power of the French. All the Court, all the people, are troubled, they demand an aid. Being thus troubled in minde, he sends the Bishops of Concord & Terne, to the King: but hee seeks to compound both for himselfe & Alphonso. The King had not aduanced his armes euen to the gates of Rome to that intent. He sends the Cardinals Ascanius and Colonne, Lewis of Tremouille, and the President of Gannai, to the Pope, who in an humor

The Pope hath many enemies.

He sends to the King.

1494 humor brings Ferdinando with his armie into Rome, & suffers the to fortifie the weakest places. But the meanes to defend it? Ostia cuts off their victualls. The Cardinals arrived (an act worthy of Alexander) they are presently taken prisoners, to make the deliuer vp Ostia, & in the same tumult, the French Ambassadors are stayed by the Arragonois: yet the Pope caused them to be presently deliuered, & the Cardinall soone after. He sends the Cardinal of S. Seuerin to the King, being at Nepi, & treats no more but of his owne affaires. And that which vrgeth him most, the King is come to Bracciane, the chiefe towne of the Vrsins: the Colonnais haue many of the Gibelin faction within Rome: the Earle of Ligny (cousin germaine to the King by his mother) and the Lord of Alegre were ioyned vnto them, with fife hundred lances, and two thousand Swisses, to spoile the country beyond Tiber, & to keepe Ferdinando within Rome. But he was more amazed when as about twenty fadomes of the wall fell downe of it selfe, the which inuities the King, and forceth the Pope. But he feares the Cardinals hatred, and the ruine of his estate.

The walles of Rome fall alone at the Kings entry.

The King frees him of this doubt, and doth assure him, by the Marshall of Gie, the President of Gannai, and the Seneſhall of Beausaire. That hauing meanes to make his passage by force, he is notwithstanding moued with the same reuerence that his predecessors haue alwayes borne to the Romaine sea, that entring peaceably into Rome, all their controuersies should be conuerted into amity and friendship. He yeelds, and first he obtains a safe conduct for Ferdinando, to passe safely through the dominions of the Church. Thus the King entred Rome with all his armie, by the port of S. Mary de Popolo, in like manner as he had done into Florence: euen as Ferdinando Duke of Calabria passed out at S. Sebastians gate, the last day of this yeare. The Pope fraught with feare and distresse, shuts himselfe vp into the Castle S. Ange, whilst hee should treat with the King. And for that he refused to deliuer the castle vnto the King, the artillery was twice drawn out of the Castle of S. Marke, where the King was lodged: yet the presents and promises of Alexander preuailed much with some of the priuie Counsell, & the King of his owne disposition, was not inclined to offend the Pope. But what needes there any Cannon to batter a place, which opens of it selfe, fiftene fadom of the castle wall, (saies the original) fell at the Kings arriuall. In the end the Pope giues the King the forts of Ciuitauecchia, Terracine, & Spolet, yet this was not deliuered) To hold the Conquest of Naples, and grants impunity to the Cardinals, and Barons that had followed the King. Emin Ottoman brother to Baiazet, the 2. who since the death of Mahomet their father (being pursued by the said Baiazet) had saued himselfe at Rhodes, & from thence being led into France, had bene put into Pope Innocents power: for whose gard Baiazet paid yearly forrie thousand ducats to the Pope, that by the greedinesse of this summe, they should be the lesse willing to yeeld to any Prince, that might make vse of him against him. The King desired to haue him, to make him an instrument of the warre, which he resolved against the Turke, after that of Naples. But Alexanders holynesse, aduised the Turke to stand vpon his gard, and to prouide that this yong King preuaile not in his enterprise: for a recompence hereof, Baiazet (although he detested the Popes impiety) sent him two hundred thousand crownes, by George of Antie, the messenger of this aduice, intreating the Pope, to free him of this feare. It was generally beleueed, that he was poysoned, and died within few dayes after that Alexander had deliuered him. Moreouer it was said: That Cesar, Cardinal of Valence the Popes sonne, should follow the King three monethes, as the Popes Legat, but rather to be a pawne of his fathers promises.

By meanes of this accord, the Pope returns to the Vatican, the Pontifical Pallace, where the King made his fittall submissio, obtaines 2. Cardinals hats: the one for the Bishop of Mans, being of the house of Luxembourg the other for Brissonnet Bishop of S. Malo, and for himselfe the title of Emperour of Constantinople: and a promise to inuest him in the realme of Naples, without any preiudice to an others right, and then he cured many of the Kings euill. And to shewe, that as eldest sonne in the Church, hee had as great iurisdiction, as the Pope with in Rome: Hee caused three seats for Iudice and execution to be done of some that were guilty of a sedition made in 1495.

Alphonso there.

Ferdinand was no sooner parted out off Rome, but the hatred which the people bare to the house of Arragon, shewed it selfe. The tyrannous oppressions of Ferdinand and his Alphonso were yet freshe. The Ile of Isle flowed yet with the blood of foure and twenty Princes, and Barons that had returned vpon his word, who being imprysoned after the reuolt of Arrago, Alphonso (to make his coming to the crowne famous) caused barbarously to be flaine, amongst others, the Duke of Sesser & his owne Vncle the Prince of Rosane, who had married the sister of Ferdinand his father. Ferdinand had a man without faith, a dissembler, cruel, violent, a great exactor, infamous, a ransacker of women, & irreligious, (witness the Bishopricke of Tarentum, the which he sold to a French thirteenth thousand ducats, for his sonne, who he had sayd was a Christian) Alphonso had the same qualities: and moreouer he was d. solute, impious, and wicked. The crueltie of Ferdinand and Alphonso.
The Naples had added the old reliques of the Angelin faction, which might helpe much to preceede an alteration. Thus the people of Naples rise, Aguila and Abruzzo aduance their enignes: Fabritio Colonnais, keepe al in awe about Albia & Taillecuisse & al the rest of the Realme was ready to rebell. But that which most imports, the furies of his owne conference torment him.

He thinks that the ghosts of these murdered Noblemen appeere vnto him, that the trees and stones found into his eares the names of France. He sees his subjects ready to reuenge the blood shed against his fayth. Thus, vnable to withstand both a foraine and a homebred enemy, he causeth his sonne Ferdinand to be crowned, whose yong yeares had yet giuen no cause of scandall; and with foure light Gallies, laden with all kindes of wine, (wherevnto hee was much giuen) seeds to garden withall, some few eales, & a little money, he fled to Marare in Sicily, where he sodely changed his horrible excesse into a Monkish life, assisting the religious at al houres of seruice, both day and night, liuing in abstinence, almes and prayers: but oppressed with the hemoroids and grauell, he died, being ready to shut himselfe vp in a monastery at Valencia the great.

This flight made the Kings way more easie, and verified the saying of Pope Alexander. That the French were come with wooden spurs, & chake in their harbingers hands, to make out their lodging without any difficulty. Alluding it to the prickles of wood which pages and lackeys put in the heeles of their masters shoes, when they ride vpon their moyles. And in truth, our Frenchmens backes were not much inflamed with their armes, in this expedition: nor any one place staying the King about a day, but the Castles of Naples. The King going from Rome comes to Vellure, from whence the Cardinal of Valencia (his fathers right sonne) stole from his maiesty. From Vellure he comes to Montfortin, a Towne belonging to the Church, strong of situation, yet was shattered & taken in fewe houres. All that were found in armes, were flaine, except James Comte a Romain gentleman, Lord of the Towne; who preuailing the hatred hee bare the Colonnais, before his honour, had left the Kings pay to the house Alphonso.

There with some others heeing retyred into the Castell, yeelded then silues prysoners vpon viewe of the Cannon. Mont-Saint-Ian, a Towne belonging to the Marquis of Pesare, seated in the same plaine, vpon the confines of the kingdom of Naples, strong both by arte and nature, fortified with three hundred strangers, and five hundred inhabitants, which were resolute to defend their state, yet was it in one day beleagged, battered, assailed and taken in the Kings presence. Seau hundred and thre were slayne in the fury of the fight, and but thirty French: and to terrifie the rest, was burnt.

They are now ready to enter. The Arragonois must shew his courage. Ferdinand the King assembles all the forces he can, hauing fiftie coners of horſe, & six thousand foot, vnder the most expert Captaines of Italy: and camps at Saint Germaine. The place is of easie defence, on the one side an high and inaccessiblle

But this army was daunted, without courage, and without force: the name of the French had amazed them: and the capitaines, partly desirous of innoation, partly greedy of better intertaynement, wauered in their faith and courage. The Marshall of Gié approcheth with three hundred Launces, and 2000 foote, but terror goes before him. In this amazement both Cancellio and Saint Germaine are shamefully abandoned, and eight peeces of great artillerie are taken to thunder hereafter in fauour of the French.

Capua yeelded. Capua was sufficient to receiue the army, which marched after the Forward, rather like traueilers then men of war, without order, without commandement, & without obedience, the soldiers gaping after nothing but spoile. The situation is very strong, hauing Vulturno before it (a riuer very deepe in that place:) but their resolution was like to that of Saint Germaine: and to increase it, as Ferdinand made account to defend it: and by that meanes to hold Naples and Caiette. The Queene his Grandmother sends him word, that since the losse of Saint Germaine, there was so great a tumult at Naples, as all would be in an vnprore if he came not speedily. He goes, and promisseth to returne the next day. But John Iaques of Triuulce towhome he had giuen the Towne in gard, comes with some gentlemen of Capua to the King being at Calui: he presents him the Towne & his seruice, and makes an offer to bring Ferdinand. The King accepts the Capuans offer, and the coming of Ferdinand, vpon condition that he retain no portion within the realme, but should content himselfe with such meanes as he should giue him in France. In the meane time the soldiars lacke Ferdinands lodging and his stable: the men at armes disperse themselves, there some here some. Virgilius & the Earle of Petellano craue a safe-conduit from the King, and retire with their companies to Nole. Ferdinand thinking by this iourney to haue assured the Neapolitaines, returns at the time perfixt, when as the Capuans aduise him not to set forward, seeing they were other wise resolu'd. Auerse (a Towne betwixt Capua and Naples) sends their keyes to the King, and the Neapolitaines determined to followe them. Ferdinand retyred into the Castell, knowing that five hundred Lansquents ment to take him prisoner: he giues the mouables of the said Castell, and as they were busie to diuide it, he slips from them, sets the yong Prince of Rosane at liberty (whome by loue or force he carried with him) and the Earle of Popoli: he causeth the ships that remained in the port, to be burnt and sunke, and saues himselfe with the Queene, Don Frederic his vnckle, his daughter Ioane, and some few seruants, in the Ile of Ischia: and whilst he was within sight of Naples, he often repeated this goodly Oracle, If the Lord keepe not the Citty, the watchmen watch but in vaine.

Thus all wauer at the Conquerors fame, and with such cowardise, as two hundred horse under the command of the Earle of Ligny going to Nole, tooke both Nole, Virgilius, and the Earle of Pettilano, without resistance, being retired thither with foure hundred men at armes, attending the safeconduit they had obteyned from the King, being amazed like to the rest of their army, and from thence they were led captiues to the fort of Montdragon, and all their men stript. In the meane time the Neapolitans Ambassadors come with their keyes, desiring a confirmation of their ancient exemptions and priuileges. The King enters the 21. of February, and is receiued with such exceeding ioy, both of great and small, of all ages, all sexes and all qualities, as euery one runs as to their dearest redeemer, from a hatefull & insupportable tiranie. Thus Charles (without planting of tent or breaking of lance) in foure moneths, and a halfe, with an admirable happines, came, sawe & ouercame. They saie commonly: that the poyson lies in the taile, and that the hardest part to slea of an ele, is the taile. The perfection of the victorie consisted in the taking of the Castles of Naples.

The Tower of Saint Vincent, built for the defence of the port, was easily taken. The new Castell, the lodging of their Kings, seated vpon the sea, strong by nature & by art, plentifully plentifully furnished with victuals and munition, and manned with five hundred Lansquents, but abandoned by the Marquis of Pescara, to whome Ferdinand had left it in gard, who seeing the garrison bent to yeeld the place, had followed Ferdinand, & was after some small defence yeelded, vpon condition to depart in safetie, & to carry what they could away. And see heere the first and greatest error which the King committed in this exploit, himselfe wanting experience, but his minions and fauorites no counsell. Hee gaue all these victuals and other moueables, to the first that begged them: who furnished themselves with the munition, whereon the preservation of the Towne and place depended. The Castle of l'Oeuf, built vpon a rocke, hanging ouer the sea, being battered with the Canon (the which might onely indamage the wall, but not the rock it selfe) compounded, if they were not releued within a certaine time, and after foure and twenty dayes siege, it was deliuered into the Kings hands.

The King made his entrie into Naples the 12. of May, in an Imperiall habit: and was receiued as King of France, and of both Sicilies (whereof the realme of Naples makes a part): & Emperour of Constantinople. But herein he made no iust account with him selfe, & takes away Kingdomes. The Barons and commonalties sent away their Capitaines and troupes disperied into diuers parts of the realme. Those which depended most of the house of Arragon, do first turne taile. The Caraffes, who enjoyed forty thousand Ducats of inheritance. The Dukes of Melfe, Grauinna, and Sora. The Earles of Montorio, Fundi, Tripalda, Celano, Monteleone, Merillano, and Popoli, come to doetheir homage, and generally all the Noblemen of the Realme, except Alphonso Auolo, Marquis of Pescara, the Earle of Acre, and the Marquis of Squillazzo, whose linings the King gaue away. An other rigour which shall be a great cause of the following reuolts.

Calabria yeelds willingly to the Lord of Aubigny, sent thither with a small troupe, except the Castell of Rhegium: but they wanted meanes to force it, the Towne held for the King. Abruzzo yeelds of it selfe. Apulia erects the Standard of France, except Turpia and Manitta: who notwithstanding had planted the Flower-de-Liz, yet refusing any other command, then of the King himselfe: who had giuen them to the Lord Penja d'Alegre, and they returne to their first maister. The Castles of Brandisium and Gallipoli, were neglected with too great confidence: but they shal serue shortly as a lenaine to stirre vp a masse of rebellion. The rocke of Caiette, well furnished with all things necessary, yeeldes at discretion, after some light assaults. Tarentum, Otrante, Monopoli, Trani, Manfredonne, Barle, and in a manner all other strong places yeeld at the first brute. But some holding themselves wronged, for that they had in a manner disdayned to heare their deputies: others for that they had sent no man to receive them, will soone returne to their first demand.

The Ile of Ischia, remained yet, and Ferdinand vpon the first intelligence of the yeelding of the Castles of Naples, had abandoned it to Iunick d'Auolo, brother to the Marquis of Pescara, both most faithfull to their Prince, and was retyred into Sicile. The King sends thither his armie at sea, the which was cast by a tempest vpon the Ile of Corse: yet in the ende they anchored vpon the realme, but after the last acte of this expedition. This armie holding it selfe too weake to force the foote of Ischia, would not assault it, and therefore the King resolu'd, to send into Prouente and Genes foure more shippes, and to assure the Sea. the which Ferdinand scowred with foure-teeene galleys ill armed. But prosperitie doth oft times make vs become insolent, and without considering the consequence, wee easily let matters passe at aduenture. Our French are now well lodged, they dreame of nothing but feasting, dancing, and Turneyes: and the greatest about the King haue no other care, but to make the victorie profitable to themselves: without any regarde, neither of the dignitie, nor of the good of their Prince, who not satisfied with the conquest of these goodly and rich citizes, determines to aduance his victorious forces. Let vs leaue them gladd with ease, pleasure, and good cheere, and let vs make an escape into the East, to see how he had sped there, if the Pope had as well vnitied the Potentates

French.

1459. of Italie, to ioyne their common forces with our Charles, as he now sturres them vp to a crosse his new conquests.

Mahumet the 2. left two sonnes, Baiazet the 2. of that name, & Zemin, (they name him diuersly, Zemin, Zizim, Gemin, & Geme.) both resident in their gouernments when the father died. Baiazet in Capadocia, Zemin in Licaonia. Their absence sets the Bajachas and Captaines of the Ianifaries at discord, about the succession, so as they fell from words to armes. Hereupon the Ianifaries proclaime Baiazet Emperour being absent: Isaac and Mesühes, chiefe Captaines of the Turkish armie, being then at Constantinople, set Corchut the sonne of Baiazet in the throne of his ancestors: they deliuer him the fortes and treasure, that vnder colour of his nonage they might manage the affaires of the Empire at their pleasure. Baiazet posts thither, and by great bribes doth pacifie and winne the hearts of the Ianifaries, and of their Captaines, incensed against him through the malice of some Noblemen. So Corchut being yet very yong, yeelded him the Crowne willingly.

Zemin on the other side, was called by his friends and partisans, holding him to be a man of greater courage, and more execution then his brother, being more fit for his booke, wherevnto he was more addicted, then vnto armes. Pyramet Caraman King of Cilicia, and Caithbey Sultan of Egypt, incite him to warre against his brother. But he was vanquished in three battailes, by Achamot Bascha, and despairing, fled to the great Maister of Rhodes, leauing his mother and two twins, a sonne and a daughter in Caras, whom Baiazet caused to be murdered. Many Princes of Europe demanded Zemin, as Lewis the eleuenth, King of France, and Matthias King of Hongarie, hoping by his meanes to ruine Baiazet: but this was a good pigeon in the Popes Doue-house. Innocent the eyght would haue him, hoping that Baiazet his brother would giue some notable summe of money, to redeeme him, or else to keepe him from any other, that might vse him as an instrument to crosse his new Empire. Alexander, successor vnto Innocent, (a monstrous man in life, monstrous in his election, and monstrous in his death, (I haue horror to reade, and more to report, what writers doe testifie, intrating the curious reader, to see them rather in the Originall themselves) being forced to deliuer him to Charles the eyght, and so disapointed of his yearely pension of forty thousand Ducats, which he receiued for the gard of him: corrupted by the money of Baiazet, he caused him to bee poisoned: eyther greued for the losse of his pension, or enuying the glory of Charles: or else fearing, least if things should succeed happily for him against the Infidels, hee should turne his thoughts and forces, to reforme the abuses and corruptions which had long before crept into the Church.

A while after the flight of Zemin, Baiazet caused Acomath to be strangled, for that (growne proud and fierce, by reason of his wealth) hee practised to ruine Baiazet, and to transport the Empire to Zemin. A happy death for the Christians, of whom Acomath was an vniust and cruell oppressor. Baiazet freed by the death of these two men, hee turned his forces against the Christians, and subdued Valachia. Then hee vanquished Caraman, reducing his Principality into the forme of a Prouince. After that hee marched with his army into Asia against the Sultan Caithbey: who had succoured his Brother Zemin with Counsell, men, vittuals and money. The Sultan defeated the Turke in two great battailes, the one was giuen neere to Adene in Cilicia: the other neere to Tarsis: in the which he tooke both the Commanders of the Turkish army prisoners. Mesühes Paleologue and Achomar Cherseogle, sonne in law to Baiazet, and slew about threescore and tenthousand Turkes.

This check made Baiazet to change his clymate and leauing Asia, to passe into Europe, where his aduersaries were not so strong. He tooke Durazzo, neere to Falonne, and wonne a great battaile vnder the command of Cadi-Bascha, against the Sclauonians, Hongarians and Croatians, who were ouerthown in the large plaines of Croatia, neere to Saua, about the yeare 1493. But John Castriot, sonne to that

John Scanderbeg, recovered that which Baiazet had vsurped: forcing him to accept of such conditions as he propounded. Moreouer Cerf-Vichin defeated him in battaile in Croatia, and expelled him the Country.

Then all those nations which lie betwixt Falonne and Constantinople (being from the one to the other about eightene dayes iourney) languished vnder the burthen of the Turke armie, Albanois, Sclauonians, & Grees, hoping for their deliuey, by the meanes of our Charles. But what could he do, seeing those that should second the resolution of the young Prince, were the first to ouerthrowe his desseins by their secret practise: Charles notwithstanding the death of Zemin, sent the Archbisshop of Durazzo into Greece, an Albanois by birth, hauing an enterprise vpon Scutari, with Constantin a Greeke, afterwards gouernor of Montferrat, who had intelligence within the Towne: the Venetians haue no sooner knowledge of the death of Zemin, but to gratifie Baiazet, they will haue the honor to giue him the first aduice: for the effecting whereof they command, that no ship should passe by night betwixt the two Castells, which are at the enuy of the gulf of Venise. This was the same night, when as the Archebisshop should depart with many swords, bucklers and iauelins, to arme those with whome hee had intelligence. But he is taken, & shut vp in one of those Castells: his instructions are viewed wherby the Venetians informed of the fact, send to aduertise the Turkes in the places adioyning. In truth our French had not yet learned to know him, who guides our hands to fight, & our singars to the battaile. Attending a strange & sodaine Catastrophe, they must quit the bounds of their victory in the Realme of Naples. Let vs now see the issue of this iourney. We haue left King Charles at Naples, seeking his delights, and his people hunting after profit, neglecting to expell the Arragonois out of those fewe places which held yet for them. In the meane time the peoples loue and fauour, who loue not the strangers, but in their neede, decreased.

The King had in his bounty freed the Realme of about two hundred thousand Ducats by yeare: yet matters were not managed with that order and iudgement that was requisite: he heard not the petitions and complaints of suters, but left the charge thereof to such as ruled him: who's incapacity and couetousnesse confounded all. The Nobility were not regarded, their seruices were not recompenced; they had no access to the King: no distinction of persons; no gratuity but by chance: mens courages that were estranged from the house of Arragon, were not confirmed: no restitution of goods and offices to the Angeuins, and other Barons, which had beene banished by old Ferdinand: preferments were giuen to such as purchased them with money, and other extraordinary meanes: to many they were giuen without reason, and taken from others without any cause: the Townes which were not wont to obey any immediately but the King, were giuen for the most part to Frenchmen. Things most insupportable to subjects, who had beene accustomed to the wise and well ordered gouernment of Kings of the house of Arragon, and had hoped for better in the change of this royaltie. These things did wonderfully blemish the reputation of the French. On the other side, there was no care to keepe the faith ingaged, for the restitution of the Townes and fortresses, to the Florentines and the Church. A pretext which serued a principall ground for the following League.

In the meane time, Alphonso and Ferdinand lately Kings of Naples, lay before the Venetians, the dangers they incurred by this newe purchase to the Crowne of France. The King of Castile is in doubt of his Ilands of Sicile and Sardinia. The Emperour threatens, and they giue him falsely to vnderstand, that the King desired his Imperiall Crowne. The Duke of Milan could neuer beleue, the King should finde so great facility in this expedition, or proceed so farre with his forces. He was vnable to defend his estate newly vsurped. But an other feare possesseth him: the feruitude that hangs on his head, and all Italy. The Pope opposeth, & the Turke at the Popes instance, threaten the Venetians, if they declare not themselves against the King. The Venetians, hauing seen the violent course of this happy successe, that the King, like lightning, had runne through all Italy: that he had seized vpon Pisa, & other forts of the Florentines: that he

Causes of discontent in the Realme of Naples.

1495 had left a garrison in Sienna, and done the like in the territories of the Church. They imagined, that his conceits had a further reach then the realme of Naples, and hold an others danger to be their owne. To preuent it, they conclude a League, (for three intents, sayd they, to the Lord of Argenton, the Kings Ambassador at Venice): To defend Christendome against the Turke: For the common defence of Italie: And for the preferuation of euery ones priuate estate. They conclude by secret articles, to aid Ferdinand of Arragon, for the recouerie of the realme of Naples, who with great hope of the peoples loue, was ready to enter Calabria. That at the same instant the Venitians should attempt some sea Townes of the said realme. The Duke of Milan (to cut off all succours that might come from France) should seeke to surprise Ast, where the Duke of Orleans remained with small forces. And the confederates should giue the Emperour & the King of Spainne a certaine summe of money, to inuade France with a mightie armie.

A League concluded against the French.

The Florentines had iust cause to forsake the King. He had not settled them in the possession of their places. He preferred the Counsell of such as supported the Pisians before the Florentines, or his faith, perswading him that if these were restored they would vnite themselves to the other Potentates: Yet would they not enter into this League, desiring rather to recouer their places from his hand that did inioy them. The Duke of Ferrara dissembling, would not signe it, yet was he content that his sonne should accept the pay of an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and the title of Lieutenant generall for the Duke of Milan. This League concluded, made the courtiers desirous to retorne into France, thrust forward rather by an inconstant lightnes, then any wise consideration, or loue to the Kings honour, and good: Leaving many important affaires vndecided, and the realme not wholly conquered: some chiefe forts eyther not taken or not furnished, gaue an entrie to the Arragonois. We doe oftentimes commende an enemye ouer whom we haue an aduantage. So the Castles of Caiete, Rhegium, Brundisium, Gallipoli, Mantia, Turpia, Otrante, and other Townes neglected, made the way to a generall reuolt. Now the confederates march to field, to ioyne their forces, meaning eyther to beseege Charles within Naples, or to fight with him in his returne. They must therefore resolue either to defend the realme, or to leaue a good gard, and to depart before this great storme fell vpon them. The Spanish fleet landing at Regium, had furnished it, and assured it for the Arragonois. Mantia, Turpia, and Otrante, seeing the League, and that they had not regarded them, plant the Arragon ensignes, and receiue the garrisons which Don Frederike had sent them. The Venetian fleet, commanded by Anthony Grimaldi, appeared vpon the coast of Apulia. In the end all the realme begins to make open demonstration of a new will. But see, he that was euen now the peoples terror, the Iudge of an others life and estate, the hope of the East, stands in feare to be controlled. A scourge to abate the presumption which his victorie had bred. The King leaues Gilbert of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier, for his Viceroy, a hardie and valiant Prince, but faith the Historie, Not wise: hee did not rise before noone. And for the defence of the Realme, two thousand five hundred Suisses, a part of his French footemen, eight hundred French Lances, five hundred men at armes Italians in his pay, some commanded by the gouernour of Rome, some by Prosper and Fabrizio Colonna, and by Anthony Sauelli, Captaines well preferred in the distribution of places and offices within the Realme, especially the Colannes. Prosper had in the Duchie of Tricette, the Cittie of Fundi, Montfortin, and about thirtie other places. Fabrizio had the countries of Albi and Taillecouste, which Virgile Vrsin did formerly enioy. The Lord of Aubigni, a braue and wise Knight, was made Gouernour of Calabria, & had the Earldome of Aeri, & the Marquisate of Squillazzo giuen him. The Prince of Salerno was restored to the office of Admiral, & he of Bisignan well aduanced. Steuen de Pers, sometimes groom of the Kings Chamber, & after Senshal of Beaucaire, obtained the Duchie of Nole, the Captainship of Caiete, & other commands, with the office of great Chamberlaine, & Controuller of the treasor within the realme, well affected to the gard thereof, but too weake of iudgement to beare the burthen and care of so great

The order the King left in Naples.

Affaires. Don Iulian of Lorraine (greatly commended for his gouernment) was made Duke of S. Angelo. Gratian des Guerres, a valiant Captaine of reputation, had the gouernment of Abruzzo: Gabriel of Montfaucon (of whom the King made great account,) had Manfredonia, but hauing receyued it well furnished with victuals, and in a Country abounding with corne, he so deuoured his prouision, that after foure daies secege, he was forced to yeeld vp the place for want of victuals. The King left George of Swillat Tarentum, who carried himself there with much honor. He died there of the plague, and the Towne held for the King, vntill that famine forced them to change their party. In Aquila, the Baylife of Vitry was commended to haue well discharged his duty. Such was the order the King left in the Realme of Naples, wherof followed a horrible disorder: for the greatest part of other Captaines, appointed in diuers places, applied to their owne priuate profit, such commodities as they found within their places, for the defence whereof the King had greatly weakened his forces. So returning but with nine hundred men at armes, two thousand five hundred Suisses, seauen thousand men in pay, and fiteene hundred men of defence, chosen out of his trayne following the Court, he parted the 20. day of May, taking his way to Rome, and his armie arised to Liorno. The Pope made some shew to reconcile himselfe with the King, & the King labored to diuide him from the league. In the end a bad conscience made him go to Oruete with his colledge of Cardinalls, a thousand light horse, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, leauing a sufficient garrison in the Castell of S. Angelo, and the Cardinall of Anastase for Legat in Rome, to receiue the King, who refusing Vaticane, lodged in the suburbs. And the Pope vnderstanding, that he approached to Viterbe, (although he had giuen some hope of an enterviewe betwixt Viterbe and Oruete), yet he went from Oruete to Perause, with an intent, if the King tooke that course, to recouer Ancona, and so retyre himselfe by sea into some place of safety. Yet notwithstanding the Kings iust cause of discontent, he redeliuered him Ciuitasuechia and Terracine, reseruing Osie, the which he left in the hands of the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, Bishop of that place. The territories of the Church were not spoiled by his army: onely Toscanelle, which refusing to lodge his foreward, was taken by force and fact. But we must leaue records of our indiscretion in all places. His enemies troupe together & during a fruitlesse stay of fix or seauen dayes at Sienna, we giue them leifure to ioyne their forces. Moreouer the Florentins summon the King of his faith & promises, and to drawe him therevnto the more willingly, (besides the thirty thousand ducats which they were ready to pay, as remayning of their guilt) they offered to lend him three score & x. thousand ducats more: and to assist him in his passage with three hundred men at armes, vnder the command of Francesco Secco, a braue Captaine, and faithfull to the King, & with two thousand foote. Three reasons should moue the Counsell to accept hereof. The want of money, the increase of their army, and that which did most import, the discharge of the Kings faith and royall oath: yet a firebrand must begin to smooke, and in the end fire all Italie.

The Pope flies.

Notable errors of King Charles.

The Earle of Ligni, yong and vncperienced, (yet fauoured of the King his cousin) laboured for the Seigneuries of Pisa and Linorne, and the Siensis required him for their Lord, promising him an appointment of twenty thousand Ducats by the yeare, vpon condition he should entertaine three hundred foote for the defence of the place, taking away the ordinary gard, which the order of Monte Nuovo (in whose power the gouernment of the Cittie was wont to be) held in the Palace. The King (being yong) preferred the counsell of yong men, before the Marshall of Gié, the President of Genoa, and others well aduised: and agrees, that he should take the Cittie of Sienna into his protection, binding himselfe to defend all that depended thereon, except Montpulciano, wherewith he would not deale, neither for the Florentins nor the Siensis. But what were the fruites of this conclusion? but the shamefull expulsion of this garrison, & of the Lord of Lisle, whom the King had left there for Ambassador, by those of the foresaid order, who soone after recouered their ancient authority by force.

King Charles refuseth the Florentins offer.

Then liued at Florence, Friar Icrofme Sauonarola, of the order of Saint Dominicke, 1495. in great reputation of a holy life, and a graue preacher, who by his sermons had A greatly confirmed the Florentines affection to the King: hee had long time sermo-nized and preached the Kings coming into Italie, saying: That he was sent of God to punish the Tyrants of Italie: that nothing could resist him, that he should enter Pisa, and such a day the Estate of Florence should die. And in truth Peter of Medicis was banished that day, and many other things fell out as he had foretold, (amongst others the death of Laurence de Medicis) and he sayd he knew them by reuelation: That the Church should be reformed by the sword. He likewise affirmed: That notwithstanding the great forces of the Venetians, the King should returne without any danger to his person: that he should bee in-countred upon the way, but the honour should be his, had he but a hundred men in his com-panie. That God which had conducted him in his going, would guard him in his returne but B for that he had not discharged himselfe in the reformation of the Church, as he ought, and had wincked at the thefts & insolencies of his troupes, That God had pronounced a sentence against him, and he should haue his chastisement. The which hee himselfe did signifie vnto the King in plaine tearmes: adding, That if he would take pittie of the people and restraite men from doing ill, and punish the offenders, as his dutie required, God would revoke, or mitigate his sentence. To conclude, that he should not thinke to be excused for saying: I do no euill. A lesson for Kings. That the faults they suffer in their subjects, are so many burthens layed vpon their owne backs, to pleade one day against them, before his Maiestie, to whom they, like to all other men, are accountable. And moreover: That the peoples voice, is the voice of God.

In the meane time, the Venetians and Lodowike Sforca make great preparations to stoppe the Kings passage, or at the least, to keepe him from attempting against the Mi- lanois. And for the better effecting of their desaigne, they entertaine John Fiesque, at their common charge, who ioyned the Citie of Bologna to their League. Lodowike armed tenne galleys at Genes, vpon his owne charge, and foure great shippes, at the common charge, of the Pope, the Venetians and of himselfe. And to surpriseth the Towne of Ast, as he was bound by the Capitulation, he leuied two thousand foote in Germa- nie, (having lately drawn Galeas of Saint Severin into this action) with seven hundred men at armes, and three thousand toote. By meanes of these forces he promised D to himselfe an assured conquest of the Citie of Ast. Hee sends the Duke of Orleans three insolent conditions: That here, fier hee should no more usurpe the title of the Duke of Milan, the which his father Charles had taken after the death of Philippe Maria Viscont.
That he should not suffer any new forces to come from France into Italie. That he should send those into France, that were in Ast. And for the assurance of these things he should deliuer the said Towne into the hands of Galeas S. Severin, who should keepe it faithfully for the King.
A wretched man, who by a proud ostentation, thinks to amaze a noble courage, and cannot instantly hide the basenes of his owne. But by the aduice of the Lord of Argenson, Ambassador for the King at Venice, the Duke of Orleans had from the beginning furnished the place with foure hundred men at armes, five thousand foote, E thousand Swisses, and five hundred men which Lodowike Marquis of Saluces had sent.
The Duke of Bouillon had leuied this armie to ioyne with the King vpon the Helpe & to helpe his passage: But the Duke of Orleans imployed it in the Marquisate of Saluces, to take Gaspieres, the which Antonie Maria, of S. Severin held. And although he had expresse commaundement from the King, to lay aside all enterprises, and go to meet with him, yet did hee accept the offer made him by two Opizins, gentlemen of Nouarre, who hated Lodowike Sforca.

Hee passeth the Pau by night, at the bridge of Sture, accompanied by the Mar- quis of Saluces, and was let into Nouarre by the conspiratours, without any resistance. In this place the Duke of Milan tooke his greatest delight, being most plea- F sant of all others for hauking, and hunting. This stratagem had beene dangerous in an other of meaner qualitie, seeing the question was to succour the Kings person, whom the French esteemed no lesse then a Kingdome. But seeing the Duke of Orleans had thus begun, why did he not proceed? Milan opened her armes: Pauia offered it selfe, and

A to that end sent twise vnto him. Lodowike (as delect in aduersitie, as proud in his profperitie,) shewed the basenes of his courage. The Nobilitie & people desired nothing more then the ruine of this house of Sforca. 1495.

The Venetians had let the King vnderstand, that if he made warre against the Duke of Milan, they would succor him with all their meanes. Thus Charles foreseeing, that by the taking of Nouarre, hee should soone haue the enimies vpon him, and that the Duke of Orleans should need succours: he goeth on from Sienna to Pisa. Then Sauona- rola comes to him to Poggibonfe, and the next day to Castel Florentine, and vsing (as hee was wont) the name and authoritie of God, he declared vnto him: That if hee yeelded not to the Florentines the places, whereunto hee was bound by oth, he should bee rigorously punished. The King excusing himselfe vpon that which hee had promised to the Pr- inces, to maintaine them in libertie, before hee had taken any oth in Florence, gaue both the Monke and the Florentine Ambassadors hope of restitution, after his coming to Pisa.

At Pisa, the Cittizens teares, both of men and women, (beseeching them that lodged in their houses, to intreat the King, not to suffer them to fall againe into the Florentines tyrannie) made Charles to forget the promises and oth hee had taken vpon the altar of Saint Iohn at Florence: but most of all, the importunate sute of the Earle of Ligni, that the King would leaue him Pisa and Lisborne at his deuotion. Those which had impugned this resolution in Sienna, did likewise contradict it in Pisa: for (said they)
C if by the opposition of enimies, any disorder should chance, or any difficultie to passe through Lombardie, we should haue a sure and fit retreat at Pisa: whereas, if we restore them to the Florentines, when as they haue recovered all their places, we shall finde them as inconstant as the other Italians. Moreover they gaue the King to vnderstand, that for the safetie of the realme of Naples, it were expedient to hold the port of Li- sborne, for if the estate of Genes should change for the Kings good, hee should be in a manner Lord of all the sea, from the port of Marselles vnto that of Naples.

Finally, the King changed the Captaine of the Cittadell, and left one called En- traques, a man (saith the Originall) ill conditioned, seruant to the Duke of Orleans, (whom the Earle of Ligni had recommended) with some footmen of Berri. Entragues
D wrought so, as he had Pictresancte, Moriron, and Libraicta, neere vnto Luques. Sere- sane was giuen (by meanes of the said Earle) to a bastard of Rouffy his seruant, and Serezanille to an other that was at his disposing.

Thus the King did willingly weaken his forces the which he must distribute into these places, to make his fauorits great. And as hee suffered himselfe to be too easily carried away by the rash counsell of those hee fauored, behold vpon a hope giuen him by the Cardinals of Rouere & Fregose, Obietto of Fiesque, and other banished men, on a todaine alteration at Genes, he sends with them (against the aduice of his Counsell, who did not approoue the weakening of his armie, for if hee should win the battelle, Genes would yeeld of it selfe, but if he lost it, he had then no need thereof) Phi- E lippe Earle of Bresse, afterwards Duke of Sauoie, the Lordes of Beaumont, Polignae, and Ambeion of the house of Amboise, with fixe score men at armes, & five hundred cross-bowmen, newly come out of France, sending after them the company of men at armes of Vitelli, & those men which the Duke of Sauoie had sent, fortified by the army at sea, reduced to seuen galleys, two galeons, and two barks, commanded by Mio- lans gouernour of Daulphiné, to countenance that at land. But how easily doth man deceiue himselfe in his owne conceits? All these that went to take, are taken, even at the same place where we haue seene our men defeat King Alphonsoes troupes, and by the same men that they had beaten. John Lewis of Fiesque, and John Adorne, were led Captiues vnto Genes, where they lost the fruit and honour of a famous battelle, in the which they might haue done good seruice.

But who will not thinke the predictions of Sauonarola to bee very true. That God would guide the King by the hand into safetie: taking away his enemies iudge-ment, not to molest him in the most painful straights of his voyage? Our French are now 1495. betwixt Luques and Pietresainte, inuironed on the one side by high mountaines, and A on the other, by deepe marishes and boggs. They must passe a caufie, which a cartier crosse, with two peeces of cannon might easily gard. Pontreme, lying at the entry of the mountaines, was held for Lodowik by three hundred foot. The Marshall of Gie arriving with the foreward, they presently open the gates in fauour of Triuulce, vpon promise to saue their liues and goods. But alas the Suiffes had not yet forgotten, that when as the armie passed to Naples, some forty of their companions were slaine there in a tumult. For this cause, they fall furiously vpon them, kill all the men, sacke the towne, and burne it, and all that was within it: the Marshall not being able to preuent this disorder.

A foole re-uerence by the Suiffes.

The blood being inflamed, it transports vs beyond the bonds of reason: but as it B growes cold, it returns to his right place. These Suiffes doubted some punishment: or at the least, that the King should growe in dislike of them for this outrage, committed both against the lawes of armes, and nations. But what? an vbridled desire of revenge: a military fury hath transported them: they are ready, though not to make satisfaction, yet to repaire it, by some notable seruice. And see, an opportunity is offered. The army staide on this side the vallie of Pontreme, in extreame want of victuals: and the artillerie could not passe these troublesome straights, without great toyle, and losse of time. And this gaue the enemy leasure to make one vnited body of all his forces. The Suiffes come and doe voluntarily offer to passe it by force, so as the King will pardon them. The which he doth. Leauing the vally, they must mount vp a very steepe C hill, where the moyles did creepe vp with great difficulty. These men performe the worke of horses of burthen: they couple themselves by two and two, and so vnder- take the worke, a hundred or two hundred at once, as the burthen required, and one being weary, in other supplie his place.

Repaid by a notable peace
offerance.

The foreward was lodged at Fornoue (a small, but a good village, seated at the foote of the mountaines, entering into Lombardy) where he had the enemy in front: without doubt they were in great danger, if they had then charged them. But their desire to allow vp this armie in the midst of the plaine: giuing the King meanes (who laye fiftene French leagues off) to ioine his troupes, layed the way open to shame and confusion, imagining, that to charge our French on this side the mountaines, were to D cut off all retreat of Pisa & other places of the Florentines. And on the other side, to fight without at ending their men, were to doe them wrong, seeing that their foote were not excellent. If they miscarried, they should purchase reproach with the Seignour of Vence. Some light skirmishes made the Marshall retire into the higher part of the mountaine.

The armie of the league.

Hereupon the King ioynes with his foreward, on Sunday the 15. of July: and all the E enemies forces armed, being five and thirty thousand men in paie, two thousand six hundred men at armes barded, making foure men of combat to euery lance: five thousand light horse, amongst the which, were two thousand Albanois, and of the neighbour provinces of Greece, who retaining the name of the country, are commonly called Stradiots: as who would say, men of the campe; good souldiers, and well practised in armes. The rest were foote, well appoynted with artillerie. Over the Venetian troupes, Francis Gonzaga, Marques of Mantoua commaunded as Generall, a young man, but of great courage and desirous of glory, and with him Luke Pisan, and Methuor Truifan, were commissaries of the armie, being of the chiefe Senators of Vence. For Lodowik's force (who opposed some part of his forces against the Duke of Orleans: being nine hundred men at armes, twelue hundred light horse, and five thousand foote) The Earle of Caizzo, a more politike then hardy Captaine, commaunded, and Francis Bernardin, Viferat, chiefe of the Gibelin faction at Milan was Commissary: & by F consequence, enemy to Triuulce.

Their army camped at the Abbay Guaruole, about a league from Fornoue, vpon a little hill on the right hand of the Kings army. The King had no other forces, but what he brought from Naples, whereof we haue made mention at his departure. He must

A must passe neere the enemy (being but halfe a League off, and a litle shallow brooke 1495. called Taro, betwixt both.) There was no likelihood, that this great multitude should part without the hazard of a battaile. To trie their resolutions, the King (who desired only to passe quietly into France) causeth the Lord of Argenton, lately Ambassador at Vence, to write vnto the aboue named Commissaries, that he desired to confer with them. They promise to meet the next day in a conuenient place betwixt both armies. The night was terrible in raine, lightning, and thunder, a fearefull prediction of the day following.

Monday morning, the King armes himselfe complete, and mounted vpon his Sauoy (a horse which Charles Duke of Sauoy had giuen him) faire and good, manna- B ging with all agilitie, blacke of colour, and answerable in proportion to him that was mounted thereon: he shewes himselfe to his troupes, with a cheerefull countenance, well coloured, and a speech contrarie to his custome, strong, resolute, and wise, an assured preface of the honour hee should winne that day. Putting his armie into battaile, hee placed in the foreward 350. French Launces, and John Laques of Triuulce with his company of a hundred Launces, and three thousand Suiffes, the chief C hope of the armie, commanded by Engilbert brother to the Duke of Cleues (who did fight on foote, with the Bailife of Dijon, that had leuiued them) and to second them, three hundred Archers, some crossbowmen on horse-backe of his gards, whom he commaunded to leaue their horses, & the most part of his foote, conceiuing that the foreward should be charged with the chiefe of his enemies forces. His Maicellie was in the Bat- D taile, hauing about him feuen or eight yong Noblemen armed like him selfe, (for the confederates had sent to discouer him by a Herald, vnder colour of some demands,) and for counsell he had the Lord of Trimouille. The Earle of Voix commaunded the reereward: the baggage, by the counsell of Triuulce, was left without gard, exposed to pillage, to keepe the enemy occupied with that bait. Thus the armie E marched, when as Luke and Melchior the Venetian Commissaries were readie to parle. But the troupes were now in alarum, the Captaines encouraged their men to fight. The names of both armies calls them from words to blowes, they beginne by skir- mishes, the Canon thunders, but with more noise then effect. The Marquis of Man- D tione, his vnckle Ralph of Gonzague, the Earle of Bernardin of Montone, with a squad- ron of six hundred choise men at armes, a great troupe of Stradiots, and other light horse, with five thousand foote, passe the Taro vpon the back of the French reereward, to charge them behind. leauing on the other banke, Anthony of Monfetre a bastard of the Duke of Vrbis, with a great squadron, to passe at the first call: ordaining moreover, that at the first shooke, a part of the light horse should charge in flanke, and the rest of the Stradiots should follow, to set vpon the baggage. The Earle of Caizzo, with foure hundred men at armes, and a great number of foote, passeth likewise to charge the F Foreward, leauing in like sort on the other banke, Amball Bentiuole, with two hun- dred men at armes, to supplie when he should be sent for. And for the gard of their E lodging, two great companies of men at armes, with a thousand foote, the Venetian Commissaries reseruing a supply for all euents. Thus the French armie is enuironed on all sides, so as being broken, no man might hope for safetie: & the King, who to streng- then the foreward, had weakened the other two partes, was forced to leaue the Knight he ment to make, to some better leasure, and to turne his backe to the Foreward, & his face to the enemy, approaching neere the Reereward. The Stradiots fall vpon the bag- gage, they wound, kill & spoile, & the Marquis is at blowes with the reereward, who at the first charge breake their Lances, & then valiantly they ioine pel-mel, with their bar- the axes, swords, and other short weapons, the Marquis performing the part of a most D valiant and vigilant Captaine, & his troupe of most resolute men at armes. The King F was brought rashly into danger, his followers being disperfed here and there in the Confiest, assisted with fewe about him, but Mathew bastard of Bourbon, and Phi- lippe of Moulina gentleman of Solange (noted for that they had bin scene very neere vnto the King in this conflict. The King in great danger

1495. he made him keeper of the great teale, gaue him a company of men at armes, the gouernment of Langres, and a great summe of money, according to the time, to keepe him to build Moulin, (a Castle neere to Romorantin in Sologne.) Robinet of Frainceilles (who led about fourscore lances of the Dukes of Orleans), Lewis of Tremouille (with about forty lances) three hundred Scottishme archers of his gard, & the Gentlemen of his household, did fight more courageously then their forces could permit, not without great danger to his person, being much esteemed by the Marquis, hoping to haue the like aduenture ouer him, as he had vpon the said bastard, beeing wounded, and taken prisoner, neere vnto the King. But the apparent danger of his maiestie, had so inflamed those that were neere vnto him, as falling by heapes vpon the Italians, they couer their maisters person with their owne: and so this sodaine fury was stayed, by the charge of a squadron comming at neede from the battaile broken by the death of Ralph of Gonzagua. A death vnworthy of him, for he loued the French, & if he might haue bin credited, the King should not haue opened his passage by force, & quite overthrowe all by the couetousnes of the Freebooters: for these men (seeing their companions enriched with the spoyle of the baggage, and to carry away ouer the riuers, some moyle with their burthens, and some horse or armor) they leaue their men at armes, and run to the spoile. The other horsemen were moued presently with the like desire of gaine, and the foote stole out off the battaile, to follow the like example.

On the other side, Anthony of Montfreltre appointed by Ralph to succede when hee should be called, keeping his stand (for that by reason of Ralph's death no man called him) the French took their field at large, and doubting their courage, they doubled their blowes, so as by the death of some, and the wounding and flight of others, the Marquis his troupe oppressed with the rough charge of our men at armes, in the ende turned their backs, and were chased and beaten euen to the riuers side, without taking of any prisoner, or care of booty, our French being loathed of this filthy gaine, by that common voyce flying amongst them: Companions remember Guinegasse, where the greedinesse of spoyle had taken from them the better part of a notable victory.

At the same instant the Earle of Caiazzo led his troupes against the forehead: but this was but a countenance: for euen as they couched their lances, seeing some of his troupe vnhorled, John Piccinin, Galeas of Correge and others fainted, and breaking of themselves, they had meanes to recouer their battaile. For the Marquis of Gié, seeing on the other side of the riuier an other regiment of men at armes, prepared for the battaile, he keepe backe his men, the which was held of some to be a act of cowardise, then of discretion: but by such as preferre reason before danger, wise and iudicious. The Swisses tooke about twenty of these runnawaies, and slue them.

This Marquis of Montona gathered together the remainders of this overthrow, and the Earle of Petillano being prisoner vpon his word, since the taking of Capoua, flying in this tumult to the Italians campe, kept them from a more shamefull rout. For the whole Campe talked of a retreat: and the high way from Plaisance to Parma was couered with men, horses and carts that retyred. Then the King going to his forwardes, (which had kept their stand) propounded vnto his Captains, whether he should charge the enemy in his lodging: Triuulce and Vitel'i counselled him therevnto, and Francis Séc (whom the Florentines had sent to conduct the King vnto Ast) thrust him forward. But the passage of Taro being vneasie, (by reason of the raine fallen the night before, and the day of the battaile the companies being weary, the night approaching, & the king content to haue had the aduantage in so doubtfull a fight, did moderate the heat of the pursue, causing them to lodge at Medesane, a village halfe a league from the place where the battaile was fought. So this battaile ended: a memorable day, being the first of a long time, that had bene obstinately fought in Italy with bloud-shed, & slaughter, (for in former times the Italian combates, were rather pleasant shewes then battailes, famous also for the great numbers of commanders that were slaine. The small number of conquerors, in regard of the huge multitude of the vanquished.

The

A There were numberd some five and thirty or forty French horsemen slaine, and some fourscore groomes of the baggage. The Stradiots carried away of all their booty but five and forty of the best horse, which were the Kings and his Chamberlaine's: of Italians three hundred and fiftie men at armes, amongst the which, there were seauen or eight of the house of Gonzague, Rainunce, Farnese, Bernardin of Montone, about fixe score Gentlemen of the Marquis his company, and so great a number of others, as they were esteemed to be three thousand five hundred, and not one prisoner. Let vs remember, That the eternall God scatters the counsels of nations, and brings to nought the practices of men. And in another place: That the King is not saued by a great armie, neither doth a mighty man escape by his great force.

B The King stayed the next day at the same lodging, and departed on wednesday the eight of the moneth, without any sound of Trompet, busying the enemy vnder colour of a parle, fearing them that feared him. But if he could haue made profit of his victory, and turned head against them, who were yet amazed, as their own commanders did confesse, all had sought for their safety by flight. And if he had displayed his colours in fauour of little Francis, sonne to John Galeas Duke of Milan, the name of the usurper was so odious to all the Duchy, and the name of their lawfull Lord so pleasing, as the people had easily confined Lodowike into the Castle of Milan, and consequently the Venetians had lost most of the places they possessed in Italy: so ready is that nation to follow the victors happines. This was the counsell of Triuulce: but the King would not attempt any thing vpon the right which the Duke of Orleans pretended to the Duchie, being now in possession of Nouarre. Moreouer, God which had giuen him the honour of a victory, would take from him all cause of presumption, depriving him of the principall fruites that depended thereon.

This so happy a victory, opened a passage for the King, yet was he to encounter a world of difficulties: steepe and craggy mountaines, rough vallies, dangerous forests, riuers hard to passe, want of victualls, and behinde him the Earle of Caiazzo had passed the riuier of Taro with two hundred Lances, to cut off them that lingered behind. The riuier of Treby, gaue the first obstacle, with some terrour, for about ten of the clocke at night, the riuier swelled so high, as it was impossible to passe it before five or the clocke in the morning, the souldiers wading about the stomacke. The King did wisely to dislodge without bruite, being (besides the enemies army) so neere to Lodowike's strong garrisons, hauing a great number of horse, and twelue hundred Lanquenets, lodged in Tortone and Alexandria, and five hundred others; with the foresaid Earle, who were entred into Plaisance, fearing some alteration.

Truely Charles did dayly feeble the trueth of Sauonroles predictions: That he should endure much, but the honour should be his. The riuier of Scrinia was kept by Gaspar of S. Severin, surnamed the Fracasse, brother to the Earle of Caiazzo, and Captaine of Tortone, but aduertised that the Kings meaning was only to passe, he retired to his charge, furnished the army with victualls, came vnto the King, and excused himselfe, for that he could not lodge him within the Towne: the which he kept for Lodowike. After a shower comes a sun-shine (saith the Prouerbe.) The King is now in a friends country, at Nice belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat, and from Nice to Ast. Then the great army of the league, which had followed him into the country of Tortone, hauing no more meanes to annoy him, went to ioyne with Lodowike's troupes before Nouarre, the which was in great want, for the Duke of Orleans had gouerned the victualls hee found therein very ill, and had neglected to furnish it as hee might haue done, considering the fertility of the country. He had of late retained the supply of seuen thousand five hundred good fighting men, sent to the King by the Duke of Bourbon: and contrary to his maiesties Commandement, he hath taken places from Lodowike: and nowe in need of succoring, he demands succours, for want whereof he shalbe forced to yeeld what he hath gotten.

But Charles had other worke. Naples is in danger: Ferdinand sought all meanes to recover it: and hauing presented himselfe with Gonsalue Fernand of the house of

Fff

Aghillar,

1495. Aghilar, of the territorie of Cordoue, with six thousand men neere vnto Seminare, after the taking of Rhegium, he had sought to draw the whole realme into rebellion, if the Lord of Aubigni, gouernour of Calabria, had not by his vigilancie and valour slacke the heare of the peoples rage. And the quarrell had bene ended by the death or imprisonment of Ferdinand himselfe, if Iohn of Capoua, brother to the Duke of Terrmini, whom Ferdinand had brought vp a page, had not performed the part of a most faithfull and loyall seruant, who leauing his horie, lost his life to saue his maister Ferdinand, hauing his horie flaine vnder him. Consulue fled through the mountaines to Rhegiu: Ferdinand to Palma, lying vpon the sea neere to Seminare, & frō thence to Misina. Ferdinand grieved with this disgrace, wil once againe trie the hazard of armes. He is well informed, that all the city of Naples desires him greatly: many of the chiefe, both of the Nobility and people, call him secretly. And therefore before the brue of this ouerthrow in Calabria should alter this good humour, hee parts from Misina with three score vessels with top-masts, and twenty lesse, furnished more for shew and brauery, then for any good seruice, hauing no forces proportionable to so high an enterprise. The peoples fauour and desire supplied his want of men. The Townes of Salerno, Melfe, and La Cauce, display their Ensignes, & he houers about Naples, attending some mutinie in the Cittie. But all was in vaine: the Vice-roy had in time manned the approaches, and suppressed the rebellion which began to breed. But according to the aduice of some, hee should haue armed such ships as were in the harbour, with souldiers and men of execution, and haue charged the enemy, who being strong in C snipping, and weake in men, was rettyred to Ischia.

The conspirators faint not, but seeing their practise discovered, make a venture of necessitie. They call back Ferdinand, and intrate him to land, to giue both force and courage to those that would rise in his fauour. He approacheth, and lands at Magdeleine, a mile from Naples. Here the Vice-roy shewed no lesse courage, when he should feare, then he had shewed himselfe fearefull, when as resolution was most necessary. He leades in a manner all the garrison out of the City, to disturbe his landing. The Neapolitans embracing this occasion, flie to armes, troupe together at the sound of the bell, seize vpon the gates, and proclaim Ferdinands name in all places. Our French are now in danger on all sides: shall they attend the forreine enemy, or shall they go to encounter them within the Cittie? They haue no meanes to enter by the same way they came forth: all are armed, all is barred vp. There is no other access but by the port ioyning vnto the new Castle: but the way is long and hilly, and they must go about a good part of the Towne walles. But during this march, Ferdinand enters, and riding through the City, the people receiue him with great cries of joy: the French hauing recovered the Castle, seeke to winne the heart of the City; but being repulsed with Crosse-bowes and small Artillery, and finding the entrie of euery streete well manned, the night likewise approaching, abandoning almost two thousand horse, good and bad vpon the place, hauing no meanes to keepe them within the fort, vnfurnished of prouisions, all put themselves into the Castell, despairing euermore of E themselves to recouer the Towne.

Presently Capoua, Auaise, Nole, the Castle of Montdragon, and many other places follow this example, and the greatest part of the realme turnes to Ferdinand. Some one must needs pay for all. Caiete hauing taken armes for Ferdinand, the French garrison enters the Towne with furie, makes a horrible slaughter of the rebels, and sacks it. The Venetian army at sea, besiegeth Monopoli, a City of Apulia, both by sea and land, giues a hote assault, they take it by force, and the Castle by composition, and afterwards the Towne of Pulignan. Charles aduertised of these reuoltes, being parted from Ast towards Turin, he sends away Peron of Basche his Steward, to hasten away an army at Sea, from Villefranche neere vnto Nice, the which carried two thousand fighting men, with store of victuals, vnder the command of the Lord of Arban, a valiant Captaine, and well experienced at sea, yet very vnfortunate in this expedition. For hauing discovered Ferdinands fleet about the Isle of Porene, consisting of thirtie

In the meane time, the Arragonois employes all his forces against the new Castle, the Castle of Ouse, & other forts held by the French. And to make the way the more easie, he fortifies the Hippodrome, mans the Mont S. Herme, and Puissancon, and assailes the Monasterie of the Crosse. B it being at the first greatly annoyed by the Artillerie, he conuerts his force into pollicie, which proues vnfortunate for the Author. There was in it a Moore, sometimes seruant to the Marquis of Fescara. The Marquis B sounds him, and hee promisseth to giue entrance. For this effect, he mounts in the night by a Ladder set to the Abby wall, to conclude of the conditions, the manner, and the time, but he discovered not an other Paris, who lying behind the battlements of the wall, cut the throat of his Achilles with a Crossebow. The Marquises death was repaired by the reuolt of Prosper & Fabrizio Colannes. who notwithstanding the great aduancements they had from the King, (carried away with a light beleefe, spread abroad by certaine lying letters of Lodowicke Sforce, that the King was dead at Fornovo, and seeing moreover that the French affaires declined) they returne to Ferdinands pay. The Castles thus beleaguered, the sea shut vp by Ferdinands fleet, famine encreasing daily, and all hope of forraine succours cut off by the voluntary route of Arbans C nauie, made the Viceroy to yeeld vp the new castle to Ferdinand, after three moneths siege, with promise to go into Provence, if hee were not releued within thirty dayes, departing with bag & baggage: and for assurance of this capitulation, he gaue for hostages, Iues of Alegre, la Marche of Ardenne, la Chapelle of Aniou, Roquebertin Catelan & Ienis: this was the 6. of October. If any releefe came vnto them, it must be of those forces that were dispersed within the realme. So the Lord of Persi d'Alegre, brought the Saisses, with many of the companies of men at armes, accompanied by the Prince of Bisignan, and diuers other Barons persisting yet in their fidelitie. Ferdinand aduertised hereof, opposeth the Earle of Monteleone. They incounter at the Lake of Pizzale neere to Eboli, where our French had a reuenge of that braue flight of their armie at sea. For D the Earles forces exceeding Persi in number, flie at the first approach, without any fight, leauing Penantio sonne to Iules of Varane Lord of Camerin prisoner, but being not pursued, for that our men came to an other end, they retire without any great losse to Nole, and after to Naples. This victory thrusts forward our men to the execution of their designe. Ferdinand (to hinder their approach) casts vp a trench from Mont S. Herme, to Castle of Ouse, and plants artillerie vpon the hills adioyning, the which doth greatly indamage the French, and takes away all meanes to enter the Castle. This side wanting fresh water, made them retire in disorder, leauing behind them some peeces of Artillerie, and part of the victuals they had brought for the releefe of the Castles, being discontented with the small endeavour the besieged had vsed to receiue them.

E He that giues ouer, looseth the game. The Viceroy frustrate (by this dislodging) of all hope of succours, leauing three hundred men in the Castle Neuf, (a number proportionable to the victuals that remained) & a conuenient garrison in that of de l'Ouse, he imbarques by night with the rest of his souldiers, being 2500, and takes his way to Salerno. Ferdinand complains that the accord is broken: That it was not lawfull for the Earle of Montpensier to depart sodenly, without taking leaue, and with such a company, before he had consigned him the Castles, threatening to be reuenged of the hostages for this iniury & deceit, the which were yeilded a moneth after the prefixed time, when as the garrisons compounded for their departure, being vnable to endure the famine any longer: Those of Castle Neuf, vpon condition the hostages should be deliuered: Those of de l'Ouse, if they were not succoured by the first day of Lent ensuing. But let vs leaue Ferdinand consumed in his throne, and returne to Nouarre.

Nouarre was at the last cast, they had no more Corne, no more horses, but for few dayes. some died of hunger, some languished of sicknesse. Mugnes, Briote, Camarian, Nouarre.

Siege of Nouarre.

1495. Bolgue, and other neere places, (with the towers built by the French,) were taken by a force, and the enemy lodged in the Suburbs, were so many Block-houses, neither was there any means to succour them without a battaile. But how? The King took his pleasure at Turin, and at Quiers, he had no will to hazard another battaile for one Towne onely, which the Duke of Orleans would keepe, and no man would fight but in the Kings presence. The Prince of Orange (who in matters of warre had great credit with the King) and all the other commanders, desired rather to end the siege by some friendly agreement, then by the hazard of a battaile. Winter approached: every one sees his store spent: many are sick, some retire without leave, others obtaine it. The enemy giues care to a peace. His armie was newly increased by a thousand Reissers, led by Frederick Capelare, of the Countie of Ferrete, and by eleuen thousand Lansquenets, commanded by George of Aberfing, borne in Austria. The leuie which the Bayliffe of Dijon went to make in Suisse, was not yet ready. Why then (considering the content of both parties) are not these great numbers dismissed friendly without force? Some few fought contention: they had the Kings eares open, and their words were Oracles, as Briffonnet Cardinall of S. Malo, and the Archbishop of Rome: yet would they not leave their robes to put on armes, but keepe themselves safe from blowes. The King (say they) must not begin, let his enemy speake first, he is here in person: The Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan are by their Deputies. But whilst they stand vpon this point of honor, their teeth grow and their stomachs shrink at Nouarre. And thus the matter was handled, referring the honour of both parties. About that time the Marquise of Montferrat dyed, daughter to the King of Servia in Greece, leaving two sonnes, whereof the eldest was but 9. yeares old. The Marquis of Saluce, & Constantin Uncle to the said Marquis, one of the ancient Noblemen of Macedonie, (the which Mahumet Ottoman had many yeares before invaded) contended for the gouernment of the two pupils. To accord this controuersie, for the safety of the children, and the content of the Countie, the King had sent the Lord of Argenton to Casal Cerna, and the Marquis of Mantoua, a Steward of his, to condole this death. These two fall into discourse, to pacifie both armies without blowes: so as by the Stewards perswasion, Argenton writes to the Venetian commissaries, vnder colour to continue the parley they had vpon Taro. Giuing eare thereto, they impart it to the Duke of Milans Captaines. In the end, by common consent, they meet betwixt Bolgue and Camarian. There were for the King, the Cardinall of S. Malo, the Prince of Orange, the Marshall of Gié, and the Lords of Piennes and Argenton. For the confederates, the Marquis of Mantoua, Bernard Contarin the Commissarie of the Venetians Stradiots, and Francisque Bernardin Visconte.

Their chiefe controuersie was vpon the deliury of Nouarre. Milan holds in fee of the Empire, & therefore the King did vrge, that Nouarre, as a member of the said Duchie, should be deliuered to Maximilian, by the hands of the Germaine Capraines, that were in the Italians Campe. and the confederats would haue him leaue it absolutely. In the meane time, the famine growes so great, as it kills about 2000. of the Duke of Orleans men: and their great necessity required nothing but expedition. But more difficulties growing then could sodenly be decided, they conclude a truce for eight dayes, with permission for the Duke of Orleans to come forth with a small traine. For the suretie whereof, the Marquis of Mantoua did willingly offer himselfe, as an hostage to the Earle of Foix, after an oth taken, that they should proceed sincerely in the treaty of peace, & that it was not onely to free the Duke of Orleans. The Duke being come to the King to Vercell, for the prolongation of the truce, vntill a conclusion of peace: all the men of war came forth, and were conducted into a place of safety, by the Marquis of Mantoua, and Galeas of S. Senerin. So the Towne remained in the Inhabitants keeping, with anoth, not to deliuer it to any, but with the consent of both parties. And thirtie men were left in the Castle, vnder the Duke of Orleans authoritie, to whom they should dayly send victuals out of the Italians Campe for their money.

A colour of ten thousand which he thought to bring, the number was doubled, running at the name of the Kings pursle. So great a number of men of one nation, was suspicious. The one moitie ioyned with the Kings armie neere to Vercell, the other camped apart, fise leagues off. This new supply, reuiued the courage of the Duke of Orleans, and of those whose fingers itched. But to what end were a Battaille, seeing that Nouarre had not moued the King, but onely to free the Duke, and his seruants that were now deliuered from captiuitie? And what means were there to fight with two thousand eight hundred men at armes barded, fise thousand light horse, eleuen thousand Germanes, and an infinit number of other foote, in a Campe intrenched with palissadoes, and deepe ditches full of water? a counsell fit for scarlet robes, thrust on rather by their owne couetousnesse, then with any respect of the Kings honour or the Dukes. This Cardinall of S. Malo, did more affect his Maiesties seruice, or the priuate advancement of his house, seeing that his vnmeasurable greedinesse extorted this confession from his owne mouth: That the Duke of Orleans had promised him ten thousand Ducats of rent for his sonne, if he had this Duchie of Milan. Doubtlesse great Princes vse good and bad instruments to satisfie their desires, but in the end they abhorre the vnlawfull practises of their workemen.

On the other side, his great number of men, newly arriued, who desired nothing but employment, made the Italians mindes more inclinable to peace. So the Marshall of Gié, the President of Gannai, the Vidame of Chartres, Argenton, Piennes and Morulliers, hauing conferred againe with the confederates, where the Duke of Milan, did assit in person: they concluded an accord, more through the necessitie of the season, and want of money, desirous to returne home with the shew of an honourable peace, then with any confidence it would continue. It was agreed; That the King should be serued by the Duke of Milan for Genes, as of his vassal, against all the world, and in so doing, the Duke should furnish at his owne charge, two Ships to succour the Castle of Naples (the which held yet) and the yeare following, should serue the King with three, and go with him in person to the enterprize of Naples, if by chance he returned, and should suffer the Kings men to passe. If the Venetians did not accept of the peace within two moneths, but would maintaine the house of Arragon, hee should ayde the King against them: and the King should giue him all that should be taken from them. That of sixe score and foure thousand Ducats lent to the King in that voyage, hee should forgie fourescore thousand. And for the expenses made at Nouarre, he should pay the Duke of Orleans fiftie thousand Ducats, by the moneth of March following. That for the suretie of Genes, the Duke should giue two hostages, and deliuer the Chastelet into the Duke of Ferrares keeping, as a Nether, for two whole yeares, the gard thereof to bee paide at their common charge: and in case the Duke of Milan should forfait Genes to the King, the Duke of Ferrare should then deliuer the Chastelet to the King, and the Duke of Milan should giue two other hostages of Milan. That the Duke should not empeach the Florentins, to recouer what belonged vnto them. That Triuulce should be restored to his lands and goods. And that the prisoners, the confederates had taken, should be deliuered.

This peace was sworne on eyther side: the Venetians craue respite for two moneths, to accept or not, and the King transported with a great desire to see his France, resolved to part the next day. But aduertised that the Swisses practised eyther to assure themselves of his person, or to seize vpon the cheefe in Court, for three moneths pay, which they sayde was due vnto them, by an accorde made with Lewis the eleuenth, That so often as they should go forth with their Ensignes displayed, they should receiue that payment: hee parted from Vercell, (into the which many Swisses were gotten) and went towards Trine, a Towne belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat. This humour possessed them by the instigation of those to whom this peace was not pleasing.

From Trine, the King sent the sayd Marshall of Gié, the President of Gannai, and Argenton, to Lodowicke Sforce, to moue him to an enterview. But hee grounded his excuse vpon some speeches which the Earle of Ligni, and the Cardinall of Saint Malo had 1496. had vsed. That they should take him when he came, to the King to Paucier: who would A he willingly parle with the King, hauing a barre and riuer betwixt them. He had heard talke of the parle betwixt Edward & the Costable of S. Paul, with Lewis the eleuenth, Charles taking this distrust in ill part, receiued his hostages of Milan: and impatient to attend the Geneuois, aduancing to Quiers, he sent Peron de Basche to Genes, to receiue the two carrakes promised by the treaty, and to arme foure others, where- in hee made accompt to shippe three thousand Suisses, to releue the Castells of Naples, knowing that the armie of Nice had beene altogether vnprofitable. But it was sufficient for the Milanois to promise: hee knewe well that hungar would force the wolfe out of the woode, that is to say, that want of victualls would shortly expell the garrisons out of those Castells. Moreouer being perswaded, the King would B hardly repasse the Alpes, he seekes the friendship of Ferdinand, arming two ships for his seruice.

Charles did then send the Lord of Argenton to Venice, to knowe if they would accept of the peace, and to passe three articles: To re-deliver Monopoli, which they had taken from him: To draw back the Marquis of Mantoue, their Lieutenant generall, & all others they had in the Realme of Naples, for Ferdinands seruice: and to declare King Ferdinand to be none of the league lately made, in the which there was onely named the Pope, the King of the Romains, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Milan. For answer, they flatly refuse all the Kings demands, as hauing no warre with him: and that their meaning was onely to succour the Duke of Milan as their Allie, whome the King C fought to ruine.

And for the making of an agreement, they offer to be a meanes: That Ferdinand should do homage to the King, for the Realme of Naples, with the Popes consent: and should pay a hundred and fiftie thousand ducats yearely, and a present summe of money, the which they would lend: for the loane whereof they should haue Bruduse, Otrante, Trani and some other places in Apulia, in pawne: That Ferdinand should giue the King some places for safety, to make warre against the Turke, according to the hope wherewith Charles had fed all Christendome. The which, if he would vndertake, all Italie should contribute therevnto. That the King and they should dispose of all Italie without contradiction: and for their part, they would ferue the King with a hundred gallies at their owne charge, and with fiftie thousand horse by land. But this Turkish warre was but a glorious cloake for euery priuate mans couetousnes. And who can wonder if God did sodenly frustrate our desseignes, hauing an other ground then we made shewe of? Who will not iudge, but this offer had beene as honorable for France, as the generall losse of the sayd Realme was dishonorable? Charles would willingly haue vndertaken it, and the greatest part of his Counsell did allowe it. But Tacitus obserues of Vitellius, That his iudgement was such, as hee found all harsh that was profitable, and tooke nothing in good part but what was pleasing, and that proved hurtfull. A lesion for Princes, not to trust so confidently to some particular persons, for the government of their affaires, as not to impart it sometimes to others: E neyther to aduance any one so high, as all the rest should bee his inferiours, for making himselfe to be feared and respected aboue all (as the Cardinall Briçonnet, his Brethren and kinsfolke did) he commonly makes his house great at his maisters cost. But it was the humor of this young King, fearing (sayeth the history) to displease them to whome hee gaue credit, and especially such as gouerned his treasure: as the aboue named.

Our Conquerors are now arrived at Lion, in the moneth of October, not greatly carefull of those they had left at Naples, without any intelligence or letters from the King, but onely counterfeite: and nothing but promises for assignations of pay, where- of followed the generall losse of the Realme: who for a signe of their conquest, left F them nothing but the possession of a stinking and contagious disease, which afterwards spread ouer all France: the which (beeing till then vnknowne in our parts, and the Physicians not acquainted with the cure thereof) lodged manie in the graue.

tious to the King.

The beginning of the pocks.

A graue, leauing many deformed and lame of their limmes, and subiect to continuall 1495 torments.

Charles hauing continued two moneths at Lion, hee receiued two very trouble- some and vnpleasant aduertisements: One was Domestically, the death of his sonne the Daulphin, deceased at three yeares of age: A goodly child (saith the Originall) and bold in speech, who feared not those things which other children are accustomed to feare. The other was forreine, the yeelding of the Castels at Naples. The King passed ouer his mourning lightly: for being little, both of bodie and vnderstanding, he began to feare, least the Daulphin growing in these generous dispositions, which they noted in his infancie, should soone blemish the fathers power and authoritie. A lamenta- B ble thing, that so great a Monark should feare his owne child lying in a cradle. But that was certaine, that Charles the seuenth his grandfather had beene iealous of Lewis the eleuenth his sonne. Lewis had terrified his father, and was in feare of his sonne Charles the eight: and now Charles apprehends some decay in his estate by his son. Jealousie is a disease which doth commonly infect Princes houses. The other accident was of greater consequence, and toucht him more neerely. But were not these cross- es sufficient to afflict him, but he must receiue a publike shame by meanes of a pri- uate mans couetousnesse?

The Florentines prest the performance of their treatie, sworne at Florence, con- firmed at Asi, and afterwards at Turin. Charles writes to this effect to Entragues Cap- taine of the Citadell at Pisa, and to the bastard of S. Paul, to restore those places to the Florentines which they commaunded. But these gentlemen are good marchants, they sell that which they are commanded to giue. Entragues interprets the Kings letters parents according to his owne couetousnesse, and excuseth himselfe with a secret charge he sayd he had receiued, not to deliuer it without the Earle of Lignies hand writ- ting, in whose name hee commanded Pisa. But this was the cheife cause, hee must haue money. Florence did not offer any, Pisa must pay it, or else fall into their hands whom they hated to the death. To draw them vnto it, he hath an other wicked pra- ctice. He lends to the Florentine Commissaries, to bring their armie to the port of the suburbs of S. Mare, that if the Pisans would not receiue them friendly, hee would D force them to abandon the sayd gate, being so commanded by the Citadell, as it could not resist without the Capitaines sufferance.

Hee did not beleue the Florentines should so easily haue taken the bulwarke of the said suburbs. But when as he sees the assailants enter pel-mel, kill some, and take others prisoners, he turnes his Artillerie vpon the Florentines, kills and hurts them, and forceth the Florentines to abandon the place. In the end, prest by the Kings commanding letters, both to the Earle of Lignies, to him, and to all the garrisons, to leaue the said places, hee deliuers them for twentie thousand Ducats, and after sels Pietre- santa to the Luquois, and Libresacta to the Venetians. And the aboue named bastard, as good a marchant as the other, sels Serezane and Serezanelle to the Geneuois. And al E to the Kings dishonour, his subjects shame, and the absolute losse of Naples, Saillant who was commaunded in the port of Liuorne, is commanded to haue yeelded the place, to the Florentines at the first summons, and Entragues banished the Realme of France, by a decree of the priuie counsell. Yet the Duke of Orleans (his maisters credit) caused this sentence to be repealed. The Pisans being masters of their Citadell, razed it to the ground. And rather then they will submit their neckes to the Florentines yoake, they implore ayd from the Pope, Emperour, Venetians, Geneuois, Siennois and Luqua- ti. But whilst that Lodowike consults whether hee should receiue them into his protection, the Venetians preuent him. So many dogges fighting for one bone, pull one another by the throat, whilst the most politicke carries it away.

F The Viceoy in the meane time gathers together the remnant of his shipwracke. And as the reuolt of the Colonnors had greatly weakened the Kings partie, so hee hoped to repaire it by the meanes of Virgilius Vrsinus, who seeing the Colonnors his enemies newly aduanced to great authoritie with Ferdinand, hee accepted 1496, of the Kings entertainment, being agreed that he with the rest of the house of Visin, A should make a leavy of six hundred men at armes, and with the Vitelli cross Ferdinand's attempts, who by diuers euent laboured vehemently to recouer that which the King held yet. And let vs now see the successe of their affaires. The successe of armes is variable, but God holds them in ballance, and giues the aduantage to whome hee pleaseth. Our men had sometimes the better, and sometimes the worse. But this but a languishing fit. Our French being incamped at Nocere, had by an intelligence giuen, taken and slaine seuen hundred Arragonis, going to surprise Gisone, neere to S. Severin: but seeing Ferdinand fortified with the Popes troupes, they leaue Nocere, to take S. Seuerin, and Gosence which was lately rebelled against them.

Abruzzo continued firme through the valour of Gratian de Guerres, against the attempts of the Earle of Popoli: and the comming of the Visins and the Vitelli, did greatly molest the lands of Montecassin, and the neighbour cuntry of Labour. Calabria (although the long sicknes of the Lord of Aubigni, had stayed the course of his prosperity) remained yet at the Kings deuotiō. The Viceroy had mounted & armed such as came with him from Naples. All these considerations gaue courage to our men, and made the way to a battaile, which the Viceroy and Visins greatly pressed. But the want and necessity of money to pay their strangers, doth cast an aple of discord in the army: eight hundred Lansquenets, for want of pay, go to the Arragonis, who fortifying the enimie, makes our French so much the weaker. Behold a rough shaking for a house that threatned ruine. And now comes the blowe, which in few monethes shall strike C vs dead.

At the first, the Venetians would not receiue Ferdinand into the league of the Potentates of Italy, to the end that vrgent necessity might force him to yeeld the something, watching so long for an opportunity, as in the end they finde it. Ferdinand had a great action in hand: he must hazard all, to become (as they say) a rich Marchant, or a poore pedler. He accords with the Venetians, and in regard of a succour of seuen hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and three thousand foote, led by the Marquis of Mantoue, and their nauie intertained, which lay then vpon that coast, with a loan of fifteene thousand ducats, he deliuered vnto them, Otrante, Brudusum, and Thrane, and consents they should retaine Monopoli, and Pulignane, which they then D held, vpon condition to deliuer them, vpon payment of such money as should be employed in the gard thereof, so as it amounted not aboue two hundred thousand ducates. Moreouer the Pope, they, and the Milanois, sent other companies of men at armes leauied in common. And Lodowike, who would not directly breake the treaty of Verezill, agreed secretly to pay ten thousand ducats monethly towards the warres of Naples.

If the Earle of Montpenefer were in want, Ferdinand was as needy, and the Venetian succours could not be so soone ready. So the weakenesse of both parties, being sicke of one disease, kept them from attempting much, yet idlenesse makes the souldiers slothfull. To keepe them in exercise, the Viceroy practiseth an intelligence vpon Beneuent: E but he was preuented by Ferdinand, who had notice thereof: he leaues it to take Fenestane, Apice, and many other neighbour townes: wanting victuals, and the season approaching to collect one of the most important reuenues of the realme, which was the custome for cattle in Apulia, he marcheth to frustrate the enimie: it mounted yearly to fourescore thousand ducates. Ferdinand and followes, to stay the Viceroy's course, attending his succours.

At that time there arriues a French nauy at Caiette, of fifteene great ships, and seuen A new French fleet in the kingdome of Naples. less, wherein they had shipped eight hundred Lansquenets at Sauone, and the troupes appointed for the great ships that should haue bene armed at Genes. This armie takes Istri at their landing, with other neighbour places. Don Baptiste Caracciol had promised to giue him entrance into Seffe, but Dom Frederick, Ferdinand's vncke, preuented him, committing the bishop and others guilty of this practise to prison. The fury of the warre was in Apulia, and the successe was variable, for both parties lodged in diuers

A diuers Townes, who rather by their ordinary roads, then by any valour, made warre 1496. against the poore cattell. Virgilius Visinus and Marian Sauelli had gathered together an infinite number of cattell, the custome betwixt S. Seuer & Porcine: and Ferdinand with six hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and fifteene hundred foote, comes by night to driue them away: who by the breake of day beeing planted before Saint Seuer with his men at armes, to make head against Virgilius, if hee issued forth, he caused his light horse to driue away about threescore thousand head of cattell. Sauelli issueth forth of Porcine, to the rescue, but being too weake, he was forced to retyre with the losse of thirtie men at armes.

This check drew the Viceroy against Ferdinand being at Fogge, to recouer both the honour and the pray that was lost. Vpon the way hee encounters eight hundred Lansquenets, betwixt Nocere and Troye, which went to ioyne with Ferdinand: hee chargeth them, and beeing obstinate in fight, defeats them, and killes them all, with some losse of his men: and so presents himselfe in battaile beefore Fogge, but none issuing forth saue the light horse, hee laye in ambush in the wood of the Incoronate or not crowned, and recouered the greatest part of the cattell. Then presenting himselfe before Fogge, hee retyres to Saint Seuer: when as the light horse falling vpon those that did driue away the bootie, deprived eyther party of the greatest profit, for the cattell being dispersed here and there, were abandoned to the first that could take them. Herevpon the army at sea ioynes with the Viceroy, and the Marquis C of Mantoue with the Arragonis. So the chiefe forces of both armies approach. The French were stronger in foote, and the Italians in horse: which held the estate of affaires in suspence.

The King began now againe to affect the affaires of Italy, and hauing made a progresse to Tours and Paris, to performe (sayeth the history) some vowes which he had made at Fourmoue, he returnes to Lion. His owne inclynation drew him naturally to this war: glorious, for that he was the first of the Kings of France, after many ages, that had renewed the French armies in Italie. Moreouer, the Florentins, the Cardinal of Saint Pierre, John Iaques Triuulce, the Visins, the Earle of Montmore, (sent to that end by the Barons of the Realme of Naples, who yet did carry the flower de Lice, but with more D importance then all the rest,) the Cardinal of Saint Male, and that Mignon the Seneschall of Beaucuire, gaue him a certaine hope of victory, by meanes of a great and speedie succour: and contrarywise of an apparent losse, if matters were more neglected. Euen those which before had dissuaded this enterpryse of Italie, greued nowe exceedingly to see their conquest so cowardly lost, and the French Nobility to perish: who vnfurnished of aide) were ready to suffer shipwracke. The Admirall of Grauille alone could not fauour this warre.

These resolutions were somewhat hindred by the warre which the King supported in the County of Roussillon, from whence the Spaniards made ordinary roades and robberies in Languedok. Charles of Albon, grandfather to the deceased Marshall of S. E Andrew, defended the frontier, as Lieutenant to the Duke of Bourbon, gouernor of that Province the which was greatly indamaged by the garrison of Saulses, a little Towne in the sayd County, strong of men and situation, and defended by some gentlemen of the King of Castills house, who were seconded by an army in field, bigger then the French. Albon vnder takes to beleage Saulses, batters it, makes a breach, and giues an assault, and within ten houres carries it by force, where he slew some forty Spanish gentlemen of marke, and about foure hundred men of defence. A worthy reward for the wrong which the Castillian had done to Charles, who had so willingly restored him the possession of this Country, hoping to binde him by this good turne, nor to crosse him in his desseins, vpon the Realme of Naples, as by the contract of reddition he had promised. This exploit kept the Snailles within their shelles, who vnder pretense F and colour to continue their Conquests vpon the Moors, whom they lately overcame and chased out of Granado, in the ende they motioned a truce, the which (beeing concluded from March to October, for themselves, and such of their faction as would A truce betwixt the Kings of France and Castile.

1496. would accept of it) diuided the Castilian from the other confederats, attending that a mutuall assemblie at Montpellier, should end all their controuersies by a firme and durable peace.

Charles greatly affects the merpride of Italy.

The Cardinal of Saint Malo hinders the Kings voyage.

Thus Charles freed from this incombance, retournes more vehemently to his first desseins, and to draw his counsell therevnto, hee sayed, that hee felt a diuine inspiration in his soule, which called him into Italie. It was according to the predictions of Sanamarala. In the ende it was concluded, That Triuulce should retorne to Ast, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant, with eight hundred Lances and foure thousand French and Suisses: That the Duke of Orleans should soone followe, and then the King. That thirty shippes should passe the straights into the ports of Provence, and should be armed for the passage of Naples, with men, victuals money, and all other munition. A braue desseine and a goodly order, if it had taken effect. But it is a great error in Kings, to giue the chiefe places of authority, rather to Church-men, then to their Princes, or to Noblemen of merit: seeing that these men haue but one oath, which is to their King, and the other hauing two, they commonly preferre that which they owe vnto the Pope. The Cardinal of Saint Malo, gouerning the Treasor, and in a manner the whole State, did not directly contradiet the Kings will, (hauing so greatly affected the first voyage) but so slackt the expeditions, delaying the necessary payments, that no prouision was effected. And who would not beleue, but the Pope giuing to this man a Cardinals hat, would likewise drawe him to his faction.

But lets heare another disturbance, when as euery man supposed that the King would speedily passe the mountaines, he makes a poasting voyage to Paris and to Tours, for three reasons. The first, vnder colour of deuotion: to take leaue (sayd he) of Saint Denis and Saint Martin, according to the ancient ceremonies of the Kings of France. The second, to bid the Queene farewell, who was resident at Tours: The third, to draw all the Cities of the Realme to ayde him with money, after the example of Paris, to auoide the necessities of the yeare before. But he did not see downe the fourth: and it may be more vrgent: the loue of one of the Queenes maids: an importune passion, which doth so restrain all the spirits of man, as he neglects all other cares. Charles departs, and retournes not in foure monethes: he sends Triuulce to Ast, with a small D troupe, more to confirme the friendship of Philip, the new Duke of Sauoie, by the death of the little Duke his Nephew, then for any preparation of warre: and for the prouision of Naples, six shippes were provided laden with victuals, and laden with hope to be soone followed by a great army, and to receiue forty thousand ducats due at Florence. This was physicke after death: for if they had arriued in time, they had preferred, or at the least stayed for a season the losse of the Realme. If Brissonnet were so dull in these Commissions in the Kings presence, Iudge if he made any halt in his Maiesties absence.

Yet the body of the Neapolitane state was so shaken, as for want of speedy remedy it was ready to fall. The two armies approch, both so tired, as the warre must sodenly end by the ruine of the one. The French were camped before Cirelle, ten myles from Renecunt: and Ferdinand, to diuert this seege, was before Frangette of Montfort. For the succoring whereof, our men leaue Cirelle: but the Lansquenets apprehending a second assault, left the place at randon. This was a losse, which did greatly import our men.

They had meanes in shewe to defeate this army, so busie at the sacke of Frangette, as the Capitaines aduertised, that there was but a valley betwixt the French and their lodging, they could not in time call backe the soldiars from the spoile to armes. The Earle of Montpensier would haue embraced this occasion. Virgilium Vrsinum did vrge it, Persid Alegre, by an enuious, or malicious shew of hazard, which they should incur in passing the valley at the mercy of the enemy, loathing the Suisses & Lansquenets, which he commanded, discontented moreouer with the small entertainment they had made him whē he preferred himself to succor the castells of Naples, hindred the execution and

A and besides, vnder colour of pay, (as they say) he caused the strangers to mutine. Thus the French forced to found the retreat, went to followe the seege of Cirelle, where Camillo Vitelli, performing the office of an excellent Capitaine and souldier, during the assault, was wounded in the head with a stone, whereof he died. An accident which caused the French to abandon both the assault & the seege, to retire towards Arriane, and to seeke some meanes to draw the Arragonois to battaile. But they had to deale with cunning temporisers, who knowing our men to be pressed with the want of meat and money, and foreseeing that the slacknes of their succors would breed greater commodities and defasters, they suffered them to keepe the field, and lodged in their forts, where their commodities could not be cut off.

B Not onely the armie, but also the other parts of the realme were greatly distressed. Annibal the bastard sonne of the Lord of Camerin, had of late defeated the Marquis of Bitonte of the French faction, in Abruzzo: for a reuenge, Gratian de Guerres, being in field, ouerthrew the Earles of Selane and Popoli, leading three hundred horie and three thousand foote for Ferdinand. Norwithstanding the losse of an occasion of a victorie at Frangette, the extreame necessitie of all things, the discord of the Captains, and continuall contradiction of Persi, refusing to obey the Earle of Montpensier, for that (saith he) he had against reason abandoned the Castles of Naples, the disobedience of the souldiars, the discontent of the Neapolitane troupes following the King, not payed, & iniuriously intreated in the diuisions of b vnties or victuals, the departure C of many from the Campe, the mutinies of the Suisses and Lansquenets, who cryed out tumultuoutly for their pay, the neighbourhood of many Townes, supported by the enemies armie, and many defasters concurring, daunted the courage of our soldiars, ingendred a contempt and hatred in the people, & forced our men to flie from place, to place, without any hope of meanes to fight with the enemy, who to spare the blood of his people would not hazard any thing.

All these difficulties carried our French into Apulia, and as they were busied in the taking and sacke of Atelle, and then to possesse Venouse, a strong Towne, and abounding with victuals, Ferdinand takes Gesualde in one day (the which in former time had endured a seege of foureteene monethes) and taking from them all hope of Venouse, D he forceth them to retire to Atelle, and presently campt before it, desirous to win a victorie without peril and losse of men, and cutting off all the passages, hee takes from them all meanes of vittaile: But this accident made his desseignes more easie. The remainder of the Lansquenets, who since their departure from their houses, had receiued but two monethes pay, seeing the time of their entertainment past, they went to the Arragon partie. And that which hastened the totall ruine of our men, was the event in Calabria. By reason of the Lord of Antignies sicknes, many of his company were goneto the Viceroyes armie. The Earle of Melete, and Albert of S. Seuerin, with many other Barons of the Countrey (seruants to the Kings) lodged at Laine vpon the river of Sipri, couered with the Castle on the other side of the river, against any one E that should assaile them vpon the high way, and from some other places belonging to the Place of Bisignan. It is very dangerous to be too confident, especially in matters of warre. These Noblemen assembled all the forces they could, to charge Gonsalue, who made warre in that Prouince, and after the taking of some places was camped before Castrouillare. Gonsalue prevents them, and conning neere the river, he causeth his foote to march towards the bridge, which lyeth betwixt the Castle of Laine and the village. Which bridge was negligently garded, relying vpon the aboue named places, whilst that he passeth with his horse at a foard two miles aboue, and both should charge our men at one instant. The effect succeeded: he arriues before day, finds them without sentinell, & without gard, chargeth, and breakes them instantly, takes eleven F Barons prisoners, and almost all the souldiars, who flying towards the Castle, sell among the foote, who had already seized vpon the bridge.

This victorie layed the way open for Gonsalue to ioyne with Ferdinand with 6. thousand men: & this relief was the ruine of our troupes, pressed with 3. armies, the Arragonois.

The French defeated.

1495 gonis, Venetian and Spanish. So as being no more able to be releued with victuals, A nor go to forrage, neyther to haue any passage to the riuer, to water their horses, being themselves in great extremity for water; being vanquished with so many difficulties and abandoned of all hope, after two and thirty dayes seege, they obtained of Ferdinand a truce for thirty dayes, and necessary victuals for that time: during the which, none of the beseged should go forth: License for the Duke Montpensier to signifie this accord unto the King: the soldiers, their liues and goods saved, with the which they might retire into France by land or sea: and the Vrsins with other Italian soldiers, whither they would, out of the Realme: Impunity to the Barrons and al others that had followed the French faction, and restitution of their goods and offices, so as within fifteene dayes they returned to Ferdinand. All this is good, but there followes a very dishonorable promise: That if the Earle of Montpensier bee not releued within thirtie dayes, he shall deliver Acelle and all that he holds within the Realme of Naples into Ferdinands hands, with all the artillery. Thus reason yeelds, where force commands.

A dishonorable composition made by the French.

The Earle of Montpensier dies with most of his troups.

The time expired, all were conducted to the Castell of Stabbie vpon the sea, and the Viceroy was summoned to yeeld vp all the other places, which the King possessed. But, pretending that his authority did not extend to the Capitaines which commanded in Calabria, Abruzzo, Caiete and other places, which the King himselfe (and not he) had giuen them in garde: the Arragonois making shew to dismisle them, caused them to be conducted (but more properly confined them) vpon this controuersie to Blate, and Puzzol, where (vnder colour that shipping was not yet readie,) part of them by the wants they had endured, and part by the indisposition of the aire, being hot and vnholosome, and part feeding intemperately vpon Grapes and other fruit halfe ripe: but with more likehood, hauing (as some write) seasoned their meates, & mixt their wines with drugs insupportable for the stomake, the Earle of Montpensier died, and of five thousand men, scarce fifteene hundred returned safe to their Country. There is but one hazard to loose all. A battaile although very disperate, had bene far more honorable and lesse fatall. But let vs rather note the examples and errors of other, then reprove them.

Virgilius and Paul Vrsin, by the Popes commandement (who had sworne the rume of that house) were thit vp in the Castell del Ocus: their men (led by John Jordan the son of Vrsin, and Bartholmewe of Aluiane) were stript in Abruzzo by the Duke of Vrbino, and these two commanders called by Ferdinand to Naples, were likewise imprisoned. Aluiane escaped soone after, the rest died in prison. Now all things smile vpon the conquerour, but hee pursues the victory otherwise then wee can doo: and in the eagles-boiles, euery one flies to the stronger, and makes his peace as he may. Ferdinand sends Don Frederic his Vnkle and Prosper Colonne before Caiete, and Fabricio Colonne into Abruzzo, where they yeelded Aquille for the Arragonois, tooke the rocke of Saint Seuerin by force, and caused the Capitaine and his sonne to be beheaded, to terrifie the rest: then he went and incamped before Salerno, where the Prince of Bisignan made his peace for himselfe, for the Prince of Salerno, for the Earle of Cappacie, and some other Barons. Grattian des Guerres (forced to giue way to this violent streame,) leaues Abruzzo, and retires himselfe with eight hundred horse into Caiete, where don Frederic doth presently inuest him. Gonsalue returned into Calabria, where the Lord of Aubigni (after such resistance as his forces could make), being gotten into Groppoli, in the end promisseth to leaue all the Prouince, hauing liberty to returne into France by land. The other Capitaines (eether for that they had filled their bagges with the provisions of their places, or had by disorder consumed that in few dayes, which in time of necessity might haue serued long: or through feare, or impatience of the discomforts which followe a seege) were forced to yeeld them at the first summon.

But shall Ferdinand long enioy the happy successe of his armes? Behold, hauing not yet tasted the sweetnes of his Conquests, reinyning nothing for the recovery of the Realme but Tarentum, Caiete, and fewe other places, held by Charles of Sanguin, & Mont Saint Angelo, where Don Iulian of Lorraine commanded, who caused the next

but

A bour Countries to feele both the greatnes of his courage, and the weight of his arme, 1497. death comes and cuts off both the course of his victories, & the threed of his life: and transports his Crowne to Don Frederike his vnkle. Thus the state of Naples felt the diuers humors of five Kings in three yeares. Ferdinand, Alphonso, or King Charles the eight: Ferdinand the incestuous, hauing married his Aunt, sister to Alphonso, his father, and Frederike.

King Ferdinand dies.

Frederike leauing the seige of Caiete, comes to enioy his Nephes succession, and those which had before followed the French partie, as the Princes of Salerno and Bisignan, the Earle of Cappacie and others, were the first to proclaime his name in Naples, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of the warre against our men. Tarentum (being seized by the Venetians) was forced to yeeld through famine, who hauing held it some dayes (not without suspect that they would appropriate it to themselves) in the end they conigned it vnto Frederike, at the Popes intercate, and the King of Spaines. Caiete might haue held out some monethes, but iudging the King would haue as little care to recover them, as many other places negligent lie lost to the preiudice, both of a great number of the Nobilitie, and also of the Crowne, they compounded with Frederike by the meanes of the Lord of Aubigni, giuing them leaue to returne by sea into France, with bagge and baggage. And consequently, all other places did quite reiect the French command in the state of Naples. And Frederike (hauing obtayned the investiture of the Realme, from the Pope) was solemnly crowned.

C Thus King Charles was freed from the care hee had for the recouerie thereof, but the losse and infamie thrusts him on to reuenge vpon the next neighbour. Many Potentates of Italie perswade him thereunto: the Duke of Ferrara knew well that the Venetians (hauing taken Polesan from him,) sought his ruine, and amidst these diuisions he was like vnto a sheepe betwixt two wolues, that is to say, the Venetians and Duke of Milan his foame in law, who (preferring his safetie and his childrens, before the loue of the Duke of Milan), offered the King five hundred men at armes, and two thousand foote. The Marquis of Mantoua (being discontented with the Venetians) sel from them with 300. men at armes. John Bentiuole offered a hundred and fiftie men at armes, & the companies which his two foames led, with a good number of foote. The Florentines (not to loose Pisa and other places, and to warrant themselves from the wrongs, which the Venetians praetised against them) promised eght hundred men at armes, and five thousand foote at their owne charge. The Vrsins and the Gouernour of Rome, a thousand men at armes. Moreover there was in Asi eight hundred men at armes, and fixe thousand foote. If all these forces with the French, had ioyntly charged the Duke of Milan, either his estate had bene in danger, or hee must haue followed the Kings partie, the which obtained, the kingdome of Naples had bene easily recovered. The Duke of Orleans was appointed to this effect, for the King would not directly breake the treatie of Verceil, desiring the Duke should make this warre in his owne proper name. The Duke refuseth to march with other E tithen the Kings Lieutenant, either iudging his provisions not well grounded, or seeing the King ill disposed of his person, whose next heire he was, if hee miscaried. Thus both the enterprise, and the intelligences which Triuulce had against the Milanois were made frustrate.

The Princes of Italie incense the king against the Venetians and Duke of Milan.

The Duke of Orleans refused to make warre against the Duke of Milan in his owne name.

There are other actions which succeed as vnappely. The Fregoses being expelled Genes, by the faction of the Adornes, could not returne without some notable support, who coming to the gates, they hoped with great facilitie to raise their party, to chase away their aduersaries, and to reduce the Towne to the Kings obedience. The King vpon this hope, commands Triuulce to assist Baptista Fregose with those forces which he had in Asi, and the Florentines with Octauin Fregose to assaile Lungiane at the same time, and the East coast, whilest that Baptista should molest the West. This enterprise did much trouble the Duke of Milan: and if it had bene continued, it had produced greater effects in the estate of Milan then at Genes. For Lewis of Fiesque and the Adornes had brought many men into Genes, and armed a fleet

1497. to see, at the common charges of the Venetians, of Lodowike, and of Frederike king A of Naples. And Lodowike had not yet receiued his Venetians. But in stead of Genes, they went to take Nous, a towne able to cōtaine many men, and the Fregoses held the castle, fit to make warre in the countrie, and to stoppe the passage from Milan to Genes. The taking of Nous made the neighbour places yeeld to Baptista, and at the same instant, the Cardinall of S. Pierre, with two hundred Launces, and three thousand foote of Triuulles troupes seised on Vintemille, and presented himselfe before Sauonne, hoping that in disdaine of the Geneuois, (whose yoahe they bare,) hee should find both the Citizens harts, and the Cittie gates open. But no signe, no shew of any alteration. John Adorne followed the Cardinall, and forced him to retire into Albare, a place belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat. Triuulles had an other descing: and although B he had an expresse commandement from the King, to surcease from making warre against the Duke of Milan, and to second Baptista and the Cardinall, yet did he seeke by all meanes to kindle troubles in the said Duchie: and if he had beene suffered to proceed, without doubt there had followed some notable effect, vnder colour, to assure the companies that were passed into the riuer vpon the East: that he thought it necessary to shut vp the passage betwixt Alexandria and Genes, whereas Lodowike assembled his forces, by the taking of Bourg and other places of importance in the Countrie. But to obey the Kings will, he lost a goodly oportunitie, to doe great seruice vnto the Crowne. for now the whole Countrie stood at gaze, some for feare, others being desirous of inuouation: and Lodowike (as much perplexed in this aduersitie, as in all other) C fled to the Duke of Ferrara his Father in law, to mediate an accord betwixt the King and him. But the fruitlesse staie of Triuulles betwixt Bosco and Nous, gaue the Venetians meanes, to send many men at armes, and light horsmen to Alexandria, and fiftene hundred foote to Genes: and finally, to send the Earle of Petilliane to succour the estate of Milan. Thus the Fregose practises came to nothing, the which they imputed to the Florentines, who would not assaile the riuer of the East, being loath to enter into a war vntill they might see the French affaires more successfull. And Triuulles leauing garrisons in Nous, and Bosco, takes his waie to Asl. It may bee the dismembriug of these companies into peeces, did hinder their enterprise: and it may be, if all together had gone directly to Genes, the successe had beene more profitablie for, besides the diuerse D humors of factions, most of the Reistres, & Emisquens, which Lodowike had sent thither, were after some small stay, returned vn-awares into Germanie.

Milan.

About the end of this year, the Kings of France, and Spaine, began their assemblee, promised at the last truce, the which they had transported from Montpellier to Narbonne, and afterwards broken off by the Castillians excessive demaunds. There they found the same difficulties: The King would referue to himselfe full power to continue his enterprise in Italie, refusing to yeeld to any agreement, wherein it should be comprised. The King of Spaine desired to haue no warre with him beyond the mountaines, which might draw after it many inconueniences, and yeeld him small profit: finally they continued their truce, not cōprehending any of the Potentates of Italie. The Spaniards see- E ing the king to meditate of a second voiage beyond the mountaines, hoped to perswade him to the conquest of Naples with their common forces, and to take from the Venetians many ports, and other places which they possessed, the vsurpation whereof was very suspitious vnto him. But neither of them had made his account with him, who doth prolong and shorten the dayes of man at his pleasure, and who doth found the secret thoughts of men. But not able to obtaine this condition of Charles, with all his policie, he procured it of his successor, to the great preiudice of his Crowne.

Then expired the two yeares, during the which, the castle of Genes had bin left in gard with the Duke of Ferrara. The King (pretending the forfeiture and disobedience of the Duke of Milan) demands the possession thereof, offering to lay downe in a third mans F hand halfe the charge spent for the gard of the places, according to the treaty of Verceil, and in the meane time, the law should determine, to which of them it should be restored. But the great pursuit of Lodowike, and the imminent danger hee feared, made him to yeeld it vp vnto Lodowike, vpon restitution made of all his charges for

A for the gard thereof. And the Venetians, to shewe that they held themselves more bound, for that he had deliuered it to Lodowike rather then to our Charles, they entertained Ferdinand the Duke of Ferrares sonne, paying him for a company of a hundred men at armes. The Kings desire to returne into Italy increased still, and it seemed hee had greater occasions then euer. Experience had made him wise. He remembered the errors he had committed in his first iourney, and obserued the well, hoping (if he might recover his losses) to prouide better for the gard of the Realme. His intelligences from all parts called him. He had a truce with the Castillian. He had a new league with the Suffes. Reasons to draw the King into Italy.

The Emperour was discontented with the Venetians, and sought his friendship, being desirous to ioine with him, to seise vpon the states of Italie with their common force and expenses, imitating the Castillian. Pope Alexander labored to reconcile himselfe. The Venetians deuised how to estrange themselves from Lodowike. The Florentines had resolved to free themselves as soone as Charles should begin the warre. And to this end they demanded the Lord of Aubigni for their generall, with a hundred and fiftie Lances whereof they should pay a third part. The Marquis of Mantona, was discharged from the Venetians pay, and should bring to the King, with the Vrsins, the Vitellii, and the Captaine of Rome brother to the Cardinall of S. Pierre, fiftene hundred men at armes Italians. He had the friendship of the Duke of Sauoye, and the Marquises of Saluces and Montferrat. John Bentiuole promised to ioine with his troupes as soone as he should passe the mountaines. But he is diuerted by diuers meanes. Some of his fauours thrust him forward to this enterprise, but with so huge a preparation both by sea & land, and so great prouision of money, as it required a long time. Others entertained him in his delights, and loathed him with all difficulties: and the Cardinall of S. Malo (according to his vsuall manner) lackt the prouisions of money. Thus the time was lost, & matters made fruitlesse, which were almost brought to their perfection. There were no dispatches for the Lord of Aubigni, no money for the Vrsins, Vitellies, Fregoses: no man passeth into Italy. So as all mens miudes growing cold, the Fregoses make their peace with the Duke of Milan. The Vitelli had passed to the Venetians pay, if the Florentines had not enterpayned them for a year. The Florentines themselves (counsellled by D Lodowike & force, in the beginning of the year 1498) sent an Ambassage to Rome, signifying (although in doubtfull termes) that if Pisa might be yeelded vnto them, they would ioine themselves with the rest, for the defence of Italy against the French. A Florentine policy, but made frustrate by a Venetian shift.

The Venetians, being labored to yeeld to the restitution of Pisa, seeing there was no other meanes to separate the Florentines from the French, they couer their countenances with many colours: they complaine that this counsell proceeds not of any care they haue to the cōmon good, but from the bad affection which some one carries to their enemies. For say they, by their Ambassador at Rome the Florentines hoping to enjoy the greatest part of Italcany by the returne of the French into Italie, the yeelding of Pisa were not able to E diuert them from their naturall inclination to the house of France: but contrariwise, the more mightie they are, the more meanes they shall haue to disturbe the quiet of Italy. Why thinke the Confederats by a common consent promised the Pisians to defend their libertie, and now to violate both their honour and faith? Is this the reward for the exceeding charge we haue so willingly maintayned, when as all the other confederats were so unwilling to disparting for the common good? By what meanes was Italy preserved? With what forces did they fight at Taro? With what armes haue they recovered the Realme of Naples? When with haue they forced Nouarre to acknowledge her first Lord? Can any one denie, but these actions did proceed from a sincere affection to the good estate of Italy? seeing wee were not the nearer vnto dangers, neyther are the disorders growne by vs, whereof wee suffer the F paine.

Whilest these things were treated of at Rome, among the Confederats, not without apparent signes of future diuision: a new humor carries away our Charles to his Castle, which he caused to be built at Amboise: a building of admirable worke & charge, Charles.

1498. hauing (to that end) brought the most rarest workemen that could be found, from Italy, and all other parts: and for the beautifying thereof, he had gathered together the goodliest plots that could bee found in France, Italy, Flanders, and else where: notable to foresee, that in steed of a proud and stately Palace, he should end his life in a baie and filthie gallerie.

Broken off by his death. Hauing his minde inclined (besides his building) not onely to a second voyage beyond the Alpes, but to reforme his life, honouring the Queene his wiues bed with a chaste respect, whereas many loose allurements had transported his youth: To restrain the pompe and ambition of the Clergie: To order Iustice, giuing audience twice in the weeke to all complaints, and free access to any that would desire iustice.

Note O yee Princes.

Doublelesse, The King sitting in his throne of Iustice (saith the Wiseman) disperseth all ill with his looke: To reforme his house: to dispose of his treasure: to ease his subiects, restraining all taxes (which had bene made vpon his subiects, to twelue hundred thousand Frankes, besides his reuenues): a summe which his estates had graunted at his comming to the Crowne, for the defence of the realme. It chanced the 7. of Aprill, going after dinner with the Queene into the Castle ditches, he strooke his forehead against the doore of a gallerie, whereas he meant to see a set at Tennis: this blowe being a certaine aduertisement, to driue him to the premeditation of his approaching end: the last pangs of death moued him presently, with a godly and holy resolution, (but wisely conditioned, according to mans weaknesse) the which he testified by these words, talking with Iohn of Beauuais Bishop of Angers, his Confessor, touching the faults he had committed in his younger age. I hope (saith he) neuer to commit mortall nor veniall sinne, if I can auoide it. Presently vpon this protestation, he fell backward, falling into an Apoplexie, wherewith he had bene a little before troubled, which closed his eyes with the sleepe of death, about eleuen of the clock at night.

A notable example, wherein wee read the pittifull estate of Princes, when as death knocketh with an euen hand, both at Kings Palaces, and at poore mens cottages, giuing them an end like to all other men: and the inconstant loue of Courtiers. Behold a King, who commanded ouer so many Prouinces: whom so many great Cities obeyed: who had such numbers of sumptuous Castles at his pleasure, and now building a house of a royall attempt, giuing vp the ghost, in a chamber neere to a gallerie stinking with the Urine which euery one made, as he passed through it, laid vpon a poore matresse, such as they could finde out by chance. And before his eyes were shut vp with this last sleepe, euery one forgets the course which this declining sunne had runne, to follow the hope of the Easterne starre, which came to lighten this realme.

King Charles dyed.

His disposition.

Thus Charles the eight liued, and thus he dyed: an humble Prince, liberall, religious, courteous, familiar, and of easie access: of a good and tractable disposition, small of stature, but of an invincible courage, louing Iustice and his people, capable of counsell, commended for his great attempts: hauing in his youth purchased so much glory, and giuen so great hope, both within and without Christendome, that if God had granted him a longer life, without doubt he had equalled the fame of the most excellent and rarest Princes. In him failed the direct line of the Kings of France, descended from Philip of Valois, and the crowne fell to the collateral line, of the which the neereft and most capable of the succession, was Lewis Duke of Orleans and Valois.

LEWIS

LEWIS the twelfth, the 57. King of France.

WE behold our France, (hauing, vnder Charles the eight happily breathed after the troubles and confusions which had so long afflicted the state, during the raignes of his Predecessors,) takes her rest vnder the protection of a Prince, excellent, in bounty of nature, in sweetnesse of manners, in temperance and moderation of minde and affection: finally, in the happines and felicity of his raigne. Who haue extended his Empire beyond the lymits of Gaulle, subdued vnder his obedience two of the noblest and mightiest Cities of the world, Milan with Lombardie, and Genes with her two riuers, East and West, together with the Ilands of Corseque & Cipre: reconquered and diuided the Realme of Naples with the Castilian: but in the end, lost it by his treachery and disloyalty: vanquished the Venetians in that memorabile battaile, the 15. of May 1509. suppressed the Popes insolency: defeated the Venetians. Against before Bresse: made a peace with the Spaniard and Venetian, & consequently allied himselfe with the King of England. He shall haue this honor and content, to see his subiects in so great prosperity, that by the conference of things passed before his time, their realme was neuer so mighty in armes and men: neuer so plentifull in all kinds of commodities, neuer so fortified with such strong places: and which imports more, neuer so blessed in concord, neuer so void of diuisions, neuer so able to endure a great charge, and to produce noble attempts.

The happines of his raigne.

A Godly King, chaste, vpright, courteous, good to his seruants, gratiois to his enemies, mercifull to all men, a friend to Iustice and sincerity, an enemy to flattery, libellous, but without oppression of any, loyall, respected in all parts of the world: who in regard of learning, shall open a way which his thrice worthy successor should bring to a most happy perfection. But to crowne him with titles of honour, hee was called 1498.

The father of his people. A King commanding a nation most willing to obey. A people multiplying by millions, in Nobilitie, Marchants, tradesmen, and the common sort. A people replenishing the Townes before halfe desert. To conclude, a people testifying the excellencie and greatnesse of their Soueraigne. For the greatnesse of a King sayeth Salomon; is in the multitude of people, but when his subiects decrease, it is the fall of his Soueraigntie. But let vs see, by the relation of the Historie, the course of this admirable prosperitie, and first of all his rights of Succession, as well to this Crowne, and that of Naples, being King of France, as also to the estate of Milan, by reason of Valentine his grand mother.

The genealogie of Lewis the 12.

King Charles the 5. had two sonnes. The eldest Charles the 6. his successor, who was father to Charles the 7. of whom was borne Lewis the 11. father to Charles the 8. who B dyed without children. The yongest, Lewis Duke of Orleans, who married Valentine daughter to John Galeas Earle of Verus, & first Duke of Milan, by whom he had three sonnes, Charles his successor Duke of Orleans, John Earle of Angoulesme, Philip Earle of Verus. The said Charles freed from his long imprisonment in England, had by Mary of Cleues his wife, our Lewis the 12. heire, (for want of heires male in the direct line) of this realme, and of the dependencies thereof, and so was annointed at Rheims, the 27. of May, 1493, assisted at this sollemnitie, by John Duke of Alanson, serving as a Peer in the place of the Duke of Fourgongne, Peter Duke of Bourbon, for the Duke of Normandie, Antoine Duke of Lorraine, for the Duke of Guienne, Philip Earle of Raoulain, in place of the Earle of Flanders, Gilbert of Cleues, for the Earle of Champagne, & Gaston C of Toix, for the Earle of Polouise; and for the Peeres of the Clergie, the Bishops that were then resident. Afterwards he receiued the royall Crowne, in the Abby of Saint Denis in France, the first of Iuly following, and the day following made his triumphant entrie into Paris.

We iudge of the inward beautie of a Pallace, by the entrie thereof. Who would not then, by these happy first suites of this raigne, conceiue a constant hope of a heauenly blessing? Lewis, after he had worthily performed the funeralls of his Predecessor, hee first purchased the loue of the Noblemen of his Court, maineining every man in his dignitie and state, and the Magistrates in their offices. He applied his minde, to order and to cut off the tediousnesse of suites: freed his subiects of the third part of the Subsidies which oppressed them: yea euen the rights which they are accustomed to pay to their new King, for the charges of his funerall that is deceased, and for his coronation: and for a second benefit to the countrie, he put the men at armes into their garrisons, reducing them to the ancient discipline of warre, which the disordered liberty of troubles past, had much corrupted.

This done, by the aiding of his best States men, he made many goodly lawes vpon the abusive charges in the pursute of Iustice: neither did he euer publish an Edict, before it was confirmed by the iudgement of Soueraigne courts. His decrees contained some limitation of the priuileges granted in old time to Vniuersities, the which they abused to the oppression of the people. The Vniuersitie of Paris opposeth against the publication thereof, and were ready to make a sedition, many publishing infamous libels, both against the King and against the Chancellor of Rocheport. The Schollers troope together, and resolute to abandon, both study and the exercise of learning, John Cane, being Rector, forbids the Regents to read any more, and the Preachers to preach, vntill the Vniuersitie had recovered her ancient priuileges. The King aduersed of these mutinies, drawes many men at armes into Paris: and sitting in Parliament, confirms the aboue named ordinances by an Edict. The Rector fearing a check, keeps all the Schoilars within their lodgings, and reuokes the commandement he had giuen. John Standon, a Doctor of Diuinitie, a Brabanson, and one of the chiefe authors of this counsell, was banished the realme. Thomas Varnet of Cambrsie, (who preaching, had barked out some thing against the kings authority) prevented this decree, and banished himself. Being thus content in minde, & quiet within his realme, his thoughts turned beyond the Alpes, and now he takes vpon him the title of Duke of Milan. He was 1498. Aided vpon the right of succession. Valentine besides her dower (which was the Country of Ast, with a great summe of money) had obtained this clause in her contract of marriage. That, for want of heires male of Galeas, Valentine should be to the Duchie, or (he being dead, her next descendants.

This mention was of no force, but the Imperiall seat was then vacant: and the Pope confirmed it. The Popes pretending, the Empire being without an Emperour, the administration belongs to them. And seeing, that by the death of Philip Maria, the masculine line of John Galeas failed, who then should succeed in this goodly estate, many contended for it, the Emperour Frederick maintained, that it should be vnto the Empire, considering the line specified in the Institution made to John Galeas, by Wenceslaus King of the Romains, was extinct. Alphonso King of Arragon & Naples, armed himselfe with the testament of Philip, by the which hee was made his heire. But in worldly affaires, the strongest most often carries it. Francis Sforce one of *Philip*s Captaines, sonne to Sforce Attendule, an Aduenturer, a braue and active spirit, had married Blanche, bastard daughter to the sayd Philip: and hauing no man at that instant that might resist his violence, hee did so cunningly winne all the greatest Cities of Milan, as by their support & suffrance hee soone seized on the state, the which he might easily effect, hauing all the forces at his command, & no competitor. For neither Lewis Duke of Orleans, nor his Children had any means to recouer this Duchie from Francis, by reason of the great warres which followed in France, by the death of the sayd Lewis, and of the Duke of Bourgongne slain likewise at Montereau, Lewis the 6. and 7. Charles sonne to the sayd Lewis (taken at the battails of Azincourt, languishing twentie five yeares a prisoner in England, and delivered by Philip Duke of Bourgonny,) could neuer obtaine any aide from Lewis the eleuenth, being troubled by homebred warres from the beginning of his raigne. Moreouer Lewis did alwaies make accompt to settle his authority, by the suppression of his neereest blood. And for this cause our Lewis, his sonne in lawe, sonne to the sayd Charles, had no whit the more credit with his father in lawe, for the recouery of his inheritance. And the sword which hee did vntheath against Charles the eight his brother in lawe, (of whome hee pretended the Regencie) and after in the warres of Brittaine, tooke from him all means to attempt this enterprife, vntill such time that (the King hauing left him in Ast, to crosse the attempts of Lodowike Sforce) he seized vpon Nouarre, but with a fruitlesse euent.

Nowe is he seated vpon the royall throne of his Ancestors, peaceable within himselfe and peaceable with his neighbors. Triuulce doth not cease to lay open vnto him hostility to expell Lodowike. To make the way easie, Pope Alexanders friendship, the Venetians, Florentins, and other Potentats of Italy was very requisite. Hee seeks by his Ambassadors, and findes that the death of Charles the eight, had bred an alteration in their dispositions. The Pope conceyuing, that the peace of Italy was the fruit of his priuate estate, did easily allowe of newe troubles. The Venetians (being troubled by the Kings deasse, from the feare they had of him, for the indignities hee had receyued,) did not beleue that a newe King would so vehemently imbrace the quarrell of his Predecessor: and foreseeing that also, that if Sforce were once quiet, he would oppose him selfe against them, for the affaires of Pisa, whereof hee did (but coldly) the restitution vnto the Florentins, by the Popes meanes. The Florentins had not yet so much estranged their affection from the French, but there was good means to recouer it.

Being thus affected, they all send their Ambassadors to the King. The Pope (who desired to nothing more then the temporall aduancement of Cesar Borgia his sonne, then Cardinall) did willingly imbrace this occasion, to plant him in the Kings good fauour, and by some especiall bond, to purchase his masters loue. He knew well that Lewis would willingly put away Ioane his wife, to marrie with Anne the widowe of Charles: and euen then hee resolu'd, to exchange spirituall graces for temporall commodities.

lates with the
king.

He then agrees with the King for thirty thousand Ducats, and drawes a promise from A him, to aide him presently after the conquest of Milan, to reduce to the obedience of the Apostolike sea, the Townes possessed by the Gouvernours of Romagna. And for his towne Casir, a company of a hundred Lances, twenty thousand Frankes pension, a wife in France to his liking, and Valentie in Daulphinie, with the title of a Duchie. Then he committed the matter of diuorce, to Ferdinand Bishop of Sept, his Nuncio in France, to Philip Cardinall of Luxembourg, and to Lewis Bishop of Albi, (some name George of Amboise, Arch-bishop of Rouan,) who vpon report of the protestation made by Lewis to a Notarie, the day of his marriage: That his meaning was not to contract any marriage, and that the solemnitie which he did celebrate, was onely to please the King: whom hee knew to be cruell against those, by whom he thought himselfe to bee wronged. And moreover: If by chance Lewis, either by the expresse commandement of his father in law, or after of his brother in law, did lye with his wife, hee did interpose secret witnesses, that should depose of his abstinence. And besides, the Physitians and Philosophers hauing iudged her incapable of issue, they declared the sayd marriage voyde, and gaue him liberty to marry with Anne: who marrying elsewhere, should haue diuided the Duchie of Brittanie from the Crowne of France. The Venetians sent to congratulate his coming to the Crowne, and by way of excuse, gaue him to vnderstand, that the contentions they had with King Charles, proceeded onely of distrust and ialousie, whereof he had giuen them cause, seeing, that not content with the realme of Naples, he had cast his desires vpon all Italie.

The Venetians.

The Florentines.

The Florentines did not forget their ancient customes in like cases to the Crowne of France: but especially, to put him in minde of their desertings to the deceased King, followed therevnto by Lodowick Sforce, to the end that when the two commonweales of Venice and Florence, should come to treat of the affaires of Pisa, the Venetians practises (whose greatnesse Lodowick did much feare in Italy) might bee crossed by the Florentines: & they purchasing fauour & credit with the King, he might employ them, to mediate some accord betwixt the King & him, the which he desired with all his heart. Lodowick did foresee the forme, and laboured to auoide it, but in vaine: for the time of his shipwrack was at hand. Then Cesar Borgia, the new Duke of Valentino, came vnto the King with the Bull of dispensation: where he was no sooner arrived, but as the sonne of his Father, he plaid the first act of a bloody Tragedie, vpon the alliance which the King did contract with the Pope his father, Cesar following the instructions of Alexander, dissembled the bringing of this Bull: iudging the Kings disposition to be like vnto those, who desire that most, which is refused, to make him the more pliable to his desires. But the Bishop of Sept hauing sent intelligence vnto his Maieshe of the truth: the King thinking it sufficient to haue the Bull dispatched, concluded the marriage with Anne, giuing for a portion to his wife diuorced, the Duchie of Berry. Cesar hauing discovered the author of this aduise, caused the Bishop to be soone after poisoned. The peace with other Princes, which might somewhat disturbe the proiects of Lewis, was no lesse expedient: he therefore concluded with Ferdinand King of Castile, E and thereby did associate him in the conquest of the realme of Naples: he confirmed that which his Predecessor had with the English, and renewed the alliance with the Suisses, granting them the pensions which Lewis and Charles were accustomed to giue.

He commits a treacherous murder.

Peace with the English.

Troubles in Burgoyne.

Maximilian alone, working vpon the old leuaine of his Ancestors, shewed some bitterness amidst these contents, casting the coales of diuision in Bourgoyne & Champagne, by the Lord of Vergi, Comtois, when as they least doubted it, seeing that Lewis being taken prisoner at the battaile of S. Aubin, and hauing, aboue all others, imploied Maximilian for an intercessor to Charles the 8. they thought that Maximilian should reioyce at this new surrection, more then any other Prince, and that the discontent he had against Charles (hauing forsaken his daughter, and married with Anne of Brittaine his Spouse) had beene mortified by the death of the said Prince. The Emperour was thrust on by the Duke of Milan, who being perswaded, that the King busied at home, should haue no leisure to attempt any thing in Italy, or any accord being made betwixt them, he

he should be comprehended therein. This war put the realme in alarme: but Lewis 1499. agreed to great a powers vnder the command of John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, his brother in law, as it was quenched as soone as kindled, by a truce of many moneths, without any mention of Lodowick Sforce. And to the end that Phillippe Arch-Duke of Burgundie, and Earle of Flanders, soune to Maximilian, might reape the fruites of their reconciliation, he did homage to the King, for the places hee held of the Crowne: and those of Artois were restored vnto him. In the meane time, they consulted at Venice, vpon the termes of confederation with the King. The chiefe difference was, the holding of Fists. The Venetians offering all other conditions, would not haue this string stretched the King being resolute to haue it, restored vnto him, in fauour of the Florentines. The King's allocation with the Venetians. refused to treat, vntil this article might be granted. But the Duke of Valentino, and other Agents for the Pope, the Cardinall of S. Pierre Triuulce, and all the Italians, (who for their owne private interest perswaded him to warre) hauing layed before him the losse he should receiue, by the want of the Venetians ayde, considering their power and meanes to annoy the Duke of Milan, hee yeelded without any more treache: That at the same time, as he should inuade the Duchie of Milan, they should doe the like vpon their frontiers. That hauing wonne the rest of the Duchie, Cremona and Guaradada, should be taken by their common forces, for the Venetians, except the breadth of fortie fadoms along the riuier of Adda. That after the conquest of Milan, the Venetians should be bound to defend that for a time, with a certaine number of horse, and foote. & the King should doe the like for Cremona, and other places which they possessed in Lumbardie, euen vnto themselves of Venice. This conuention tooke all hope from Lodowick, both of peace with the King, and reconciliation with the Venetians. Being thus left naked, hee resoluesto defend himselfe, and beginnes by the fortification of Anon, Nouarre, and Alexandria, Townes lying neere to the French, meaning to oppose against their violence, Galeas of S. Severin, with the greatest part part of his forces, and the rest against the Venetians, vnder the command of the Earle of Catazzo. He commands Galeas to passe the Pan, with fixteene hundred men at armes, fixteene hundred light horse, ten thousand Italian foote, and five hundred Lansquenets: but rather to defend his places, then to keepe the field, hoping that the prolonging of the warre would breed him some aduantage, for that he expected an issue of the accord, which he did mediate betwixt Maximilian, and the Suisses: the which effected, he had promise of notable aide. On the other side the King caused, Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Ligni, to march with Euerard Lord of Aubigni, & John Laques of Triuulce, leading 6. thousand horse, and twentie five thousand foot. The Castle of Arazze vpon Tanare, was the first object of their armies, a place kept by 500. foote, assailed the tenth of August, and taken within few dayes. Seuen hundred men being lodged in Anon, did likewise suffer to be lost in two dayes, and all those put to the sword, that were retired in armer into the Castle. Donat Raffagnin, a Milanois, Captaine of the Castle of Valence, well furnished with men, & artilerie, corrupted by the promises of Triuulce, gaue entrance to the French, the same day, as he had by the like treacherie twentie yeares before, delivered one of the gates of Tortone to Lodowick Sforce, to the preiudice of Bonne of Sauey, and of the little Duke John Galeas. All the souldiers were flaine or taken, amongst others, Otfauian brother to S. Severin, was prisoner.

The same deluge ouerflowed (euen vpon the very brute) Basgagne, Verguere, Chastellaneuf, and Port Corounee. Antonie Maria Palauoisin yeelded vp Tortone, not attending any assault. Alexandria makes head against the armie, and whilst they presse it, Lodowick shuts himselfe into Milan, and seeing his estate lost by peece meales, he flies to those remedies which are vsuall in greatest dispaire. He inroules all that could carrie armes, assembles the people, dischargeth them of a part of their ordinarie imposition: shewes them with most vehement wordes, That if happily hee had overcharged them, not any desire to gather treasure, nor his owne disposition, (being an enimie to oppression) but rather the time and the common dangers of Italie had prest him therunto: first to countercheck the Venetians greatnesse: then, to oppose against the landing of King Charles. That the fruits which they had reaped thereby, were peace and publike quiet, where in beautie, of buildings, inhabitants and acts, with mildnes and moderation of spirit, care all to administer good and breefe iustice to euery man indifferently. That the merits, and gra-tious government of his father layed before their eyes, how insupportable would the insolent and proud commaund of the French be vnto them. That abhorring the rough and vnciuill manners of strangers, they should resolute for the common defence of their liues and country.

 That the French are but a brute, which being withstood, it should then be easie to resist them.
 That the Emperour made hast to succour them in person. That Prosper Colonne marcht with the troups of Frederike King of Naples. That the Marquis of Mantoua, was already in the Countrie of Cremona, hauing pacified all controuersies. That to all these aydes if they did but ioyn their loyalties, and good will, he should find himselfe strong enough to encounter all the power of France united together. B

But these admonitions came too late: it was very apparent, that necessitie, and not any good meaning, had forced him to this humilitie, whereof hee had neuer giuen them any testimonie. Thus his ruine approached. The Venetians for their part made warre in Guiradadde, and had taken Caranage and other Townes vpon the ruer of Adde. The Earle of Caiazzo, discontented that his brother being yonger of yeares and of lesse experience, should be preferred before him in the commaund of the armie, had secretly passed his word to the King. In the meane time they thunder-against the walles of Alexandria, and Galeas of S. Seuerin hauing with him twelue hundred men at armes, twelue hundred light horse, and three thousand foote: not discouering his intent to any Captaine, but onely to Luke Maluazzo, he flies secretly out of the Towne in the night, after the third dayes seege, with a part of his light horse, flew-ing by the effect, that he had a brauer arme, and was more experienced in iusts, and tournies (in which exercises all other Italians gaue him place) then in the government of an armie. His flight daunted the courage of the beseege, and made the passage easie. The armie enters in at the breake of the day, spoiles the garrison, and sacks the Towne. The losse of Alexandria, and the following seege of Mortare, opened the gates of Pavia.

Milan miseth, the Citizens arme, and respect Lodowike so little, as they giue good testimonie of their affection, by the murder of Anthony of Landriano his Treasurer D generall, comming at noone day from the Castle. Lodowike foreseeing his owne by an others ruine: being well informed that his gouernment was exceeding hateful vnto the Milanais, and moreouer amazed at the report which Galeas made of the valour of the French men at armes, he sent away his children, accompanied with the Cardinals Afcarius his brother, and of S. Seuerin, with about two hundred thousand ducats which he had in treasure, (well shorned of a million and a halfe which he made there of few yeares before) he left the gard of the Castle to Bernardin of Corte borne at Pavia, whom he had bred vp young, and three thousand foote, furnished with victuals, munition, and money, for many monethes: he restored to the Borhomees, gentlemen of Milan, the landes he had taken from them. But was this any liberalitie, seeing he could not E keepe them? and the second day of September he departed for Germanie, followed by the Cardinal of Effe, and Galeas of S. Seuerin, with a good number of horse, and foote, vnder colour to hasten the imagined troups which Maximilian prepared for him. The Towne thus abandoned, being loath to be a pray vnto the enemy, who ap-proched towards the walls, prevented their coming, and willingly consented to bring them in, reseruing the capitulation to the Kings arriuall, from whome they hoped, (considering their voluntary submission) to receiue goodly exemptions, and great priuileges. All other places of the Duchie conformed themselves to the patterne of their cheife citie.

Cremona abhorring the Venetian yoke, stretched out, both armes and hart to the F French: but the King vnwilling to infringe the treatie made with the Senate, they were forced to yeeld to the yoke after some dayes seege. Genes follows this example. The Adornes (to whom Lodowike had giuen the gouernment) John Lewis of Fiesque and the people

A conle contend who shall haue most honor in yeelding it to the King, who giues them for gouernour, Philip Lord of Rauastin, and Baptiste Fregose for his Lieutenant. But force could not take the Castell, by the aduice of Triulzee, gold makes a breach. Bernardin without other approach, by the consent of the other Capitaines, namely of Philippin of Fregose, bred likewise and brought vp by Lodowike, sells it twelue dayes after Lodowikes departure, and receites for paiement a hundred thousand Crownes. Some report but ten thousand, (yet I should terme this sale the capitulation of a foole, considering the place which he commanded) halfe the mouables in the Castell, a company of a hundred Lances, an annuall pension, with many other graces and priuileges. But this infamous marchant, hatefull to all the world, fled from by query man as unworthy to be in any ranke amongst men of honor, cast off from all companies, with words full of reproch, confounded with shame, and tormented in his owne Conscience, accusing his villanie and base ingratitude, he died of griefe within fewe dayes after. Thus all things foretell the ruine of Lodowike; his owne indiscretion, the peoples hatred, the cowardlines of his Capitaines and soldiars, & the treachery of his house-hold seruants, so as in twenty dayes he is dispossessed of this noble & mighty estate which he had before won. The King receiuing intelligence at Lyons of a speedier victory then he expected, departs presently in post, and makes his entry into Milan, granting to the people exemptions of many customes, impunity to all such as had followed force, resi-tution to the gentlemen, who through the tirany of former times had lost their goods;
 if they were not extant, or not to discontent them that were in lawfull possession, hee gaue money to many to buy them againe, or others lands if any were to be solde. He repeated by Edict the Regents, and professors of learning, giuing to some lands, to others increase of their entertaynement, honored the gentlemen of the Country with his table, and their houses with his Presence. And to make this gouernment more popular, hee made John Inagues of Triulzee, a Milanais gouernour of Milan, giuing vnto him Viguerie and many other things, in regard of his merits and loyall seruice.

As the French forces prospered thus in the Duchie of Milan, and the Venetians bu-fled in the Countie of Cremona, the Florentins gaped after the restitution of Pisa: & to obtaine it, they giue vnto Paul Vitelli, their generall, an army of ten thousand foote with a great number of horse, with the which (hauing taken Cascine and other places that supported Pisa) he incamped before the Citie, the last day of Iuly. An enterprize of difficulty as well for the strength of the Towne, as for the valour and resolution of the Citizens, who willingly would haue suffered any misery, rather then to haue fallen vnder the Florentins command. Hee batters the fort of Stampace, and the wall of cyther side with 20. peeces of artillery. Vitelli giues an assault & forceth it, with so great a terror to the Pisans, as abandoning the rampars, euery man seekes to saue himselfe by flight. And if the generall had pursued it vigorously, that morning had crowned him with honor, whereas it proued the beginning of his downefall: for seeing his soldiars full of spoile run together by heapes, hee stayed their heat, causing the most of E his troups to retire, and gaue the beseege leysure, (seeing this first brunt past) to restore their courage, and returne to the gard of their rampars. So as whilst he labored to winne a victory, with the least preiudice to the army that might be: being lodged in a Country, full of pooles & marshes: which lie betwixt the sea and the Towne, and the season being subiect vnto pestilent windes, a generall contagion infects so many of his men in fewe dayes, as the healthy were not sufficient for a generall assault, so abated the seege against the Florentins will, who promised to renew his troups with fresh supplies. So as the bad opinion which the Florentin people had conceiued of him, increased nowe in such sort, that being called into Cascine, by the Commendaries of the army, vnder colour of lodging the Companies, they tooke him prisoner from thence he was led by the Magistrats commandement to Florence, & there publicly beheaded. An ordinary reward for generous minds, that subiect themselves to the seruice of a multitude.

The King receiuing them all graciously, compounded with them according to the qualities of their persons, & the benefit he might reape by thē. The Marquis of Matoua, and the Duke of Ferrare, came in person. The King gaue the Marquis a company of a hundred Lances, and the order of S. Michel, with an honourable pension. The Ferrarois (being in disgrace in Court, since the time that he deliuered the Castle of Genes vnto Lodowick) was glad to buy the Kings loue with ready money. Iohn Bentiuole sent his sonne Hanniball: the Florentins had some trouble to make their peace. They had offended all the Court, for that fearing to incense Lodowick Sforce, touching the affaires of Pisa, they had held themselves newters betwixt the King and Lodowick. Moreover, the death of Paul Vitelli (to whome the Crowne of France was beholding) made the King strange vnto them: and the credit of Triuulce did them harme: who aspiring to the Seignurie of Pisa, was as much desired of the Pisans, to warrant them from the Florentins oppressions: Finally the King had need of money, and the Florentins paying a fine as the rest did, were receiued into grace, vpon condition: To aide one another for their common defence, they of the Estates of Italie for the King, and the King for them, for the recouerie of Pisa, and some places held by the Siennois and Luquois: That being repossessed of Pisa, they should furnish the King with fife hundred men at armes, and fiftie thousand Ducats: paying also vnto the King six and thirtie thousand Ducats, which Sforce had lent them, abating that which they had disbursed for him.

The Pope also did not forget himselfe: but vrging the performance of the treatie made with the King, obtaines for the Duke of Valentinois (who hauing married the Daughter of the Lord of Albret, had repassed the Alpes with his Maiestie) three hundred Lances in the Kings pay: and foure thousand Swisses, to be paid by the Pope, to ayde him to make warre in Romagna. The King (hauing settled such order as he thought fit for his conquest: and prolonged the truce he had with the Emperour, vntill May following,) tooke the way to Lion, leading with him the grand child of Iohn Gales, whom the mother had vnadvisedly deliuered, him he made a Monke. Then hereceiued newes of a faire Daughter that was borne vnto him, the which shall hereafter be wife to Francis the first of that name, and Queene of France. An other accident, but fatal, made that season famous. exploits.

This yeare Italie, besides foraine and home-bred decisions, felt also the Turkes forces. Batizet Ottoman (being expressly drawne by the perswasions of Lodowick Sforce, hauing no other meanes to be reuenged of the Venetians), assailing with a mighty armie by Sea, such places as the Venetians held in Greece: he sent six thousand horses by land to spoile Friuli, who finding the Country without defence, expecting no such guests, did spoile, sack, and burne, all euen vnto Luence: they chained together an infinite number of prisoners, and being come to the riuer of Tagliamento, they refused such as they thought fit to carry with them, and murdered all the rest. In the meane time, the Duke of Valentinois (hauing ioyned the forces of the Church, with those troupes he receiued from the King,) tooke Imole with ease, in the end of the yeare. And in the beginning of the next, (famous for the celebration of the great Iubile at Rome) Furli. But as hee marched to other Townes, the course of his conquests is stayed by vnexpected accidents, bred by diuers motiues. The most part of the Lombards could not sit with the French humour, and all were discontented, for that they had not tasted this great bounty of the Kings, whereby they were promised a generall exemption of all imposts and tributes.

Moreover, the Gibelin faction (very mightie in Milan) was wonderfully grieved to see Triuulce (chiefe of the Guelfe) preferred to the government: and hee by nature factious, proud, and stinging, did much increase this bad disposition, fauouring them of his his partie beyond the bounds of reason. This did greatly estrange the peoples hearts from him. He slue with his owne hand some butchers, who according to their customaires, refused to pay the ordinarie customes, and withstood the receiuers with armes. Doubtlesse if such as haue the gard of a mightie estate newly conquered, dislike both Nobilitie and people, what may bee expected but a generall alteration? Adde thereunto the lightnesse of an inconstant multitude, alwayes desirous of innovations: Now they lament him whome before they hated. Lodowick aduertised of these broyles, strikes while the iron is hot, and without any longer feeding himselfe with the Emperours vaine and frustratorie hopes, hee makes a sodaine leuie of eight thousand Swisses, and fise hundred men at armes, Bourguignons, by the helpe (but not entertained) of the sayd Maximilian, and flies to Comie with all speede, the which being abandoned by the French garrison, finding the humor of the inhabitants inclined to change, gaue him an easie entrie.

Triuulce felt this storme coming, and to auoyd it, he demaunds speedie succors from the Venetians, according to the association which they had made with the King, and makes knowne to the Lord of Alegre (who commaunded the French troupes, and the Swisses in the Duke of Valentinois armie) the necessitie which calles him speedily to Milan. The Venetians send Nicholas Earle Petilliano, to ioine with Triuulce or Aubigni, and if he were debarred, to spoile the Milanois cuntry. The Earle not able to ioine with Aubigni, spoiles the COUNTRY, and then retournes towards the Townes vpon the riuer of Adda, to prevent any new alteration. Aubigni departs sodainly with the Swisses, and all the horse, obtaining free passage through the Countries of Parma, and Plaisance, vpon condition to abstaine from all acts of hostilitie. And coming neere to Tortone, at the perswasion of the Guelfs of that Towne, (who had bene expelled by the rest that were at Lodowicks deuotion) hee enters, and sacks the whole Towne, Guelfs and Gibelins, without any distinction: then hee went towards Alexandria, where as the Swisse for want of pay, went to Sforces armie.

Swisses reuolt.

The losse of Comie hauing stirred vp the people of Milan, and the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, Triuulce leaues within the Castle such forces as the present necessitie could furnish: hee fortified Nouarre with foure hundred Lances, and puts himselfe D with the rest into Mortare, thinking that Lodowick would force it before he passed, and in the meane time, giuing the King aduertisement of this sodaine alteration, hee should haue meanes to stay the enemies proceedings. But it chanced otherwise. Sforces armie neglecting both Mortare, and Nouarre, flies to the most important, and recouers Milanas easily as they had lost it. Pavia, and Parma presently set vp Sforces armes. Lode and Plaisance had done the like, if the Venetian troupes had not sodainly entred. Alexandria and other places neerer to Ast then to Milan, would not declare themselves, before they had seene the last act of this Tragedie. The Genoais refused to retourn vnder Lodowicks commaund: and the Florentines reiect his request, touching the restitution of money which hee had lent them, for the which, they had past their promise vnto E the King.

Sforce re-
couers Milan.

The Marquis of Mantoua sent him his brother, with somemen at armes. The Lords of Mirandole, Carpi, Correge, the Rosset, those of Verme and Bobie, with other such wethercocks, follow the wind that blowes: finally this new Conquerour findes more affection, and ioy at his retorne, then hee had least at his departure. Milan being recouered, Lodowick leaues the Cardinall Ascanius bis brother before the castle, and (reinforced with fiftene hundred men at armes, besides the Bourguignons, & great troupes of foote) he takes Vigevano by composition: and the Kings succors, not able to come in time, for the defence of Nouarre, they compound to yeeld the Towne, and to depart with all their baggage. But the Castle (which holds yet for vs) shall shortly F be the meanes of Lodowicks ruine. At Triuulces first summon, the King had dispatched the Earle of Ligni, with a good number of foote, and horse. But hee found the two commanders, Triuulce and Aubigni, so diuided, as if the King had not speedily and wisely prevented this pestilent contagion, it had doublese ended with a pittifull and bloudie 1500. die Catastrophe. Aubigni and Triunlee, held themselves equall in power, and vertue. The first would haue them presently to force Milan: the other would attend about Nouarre, the new armie which the King leuied in Suissierland. If Aubigni set at libertie any prisoners taken in the warre, Triunlee ransomed them. Finally, what the one built, the other pulled downe: and they tormented one another with continuall riots.

The King aduertised of this preiudiciall partiality, he sends vnto them, Lewis of Bourbon, yonger brother to Gilbert, late Viceroy of Naples, and John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne: but by reason of their young yeares, they were guided by Lewis of Tremouille, Lord of Thouars, being accompanied by the Lords of Grauille, Admirall of France, Lautree, and many others, followed with fiftene hundred Launces, ten thousand Suisses, sixe thousand French, and the Cardinal of Amboise, who was Lieutenant for his Maiestie, on that side of the Alpes. Triunlee being arrived, treating with these two Commanders, he easily drew them, (in regard of his Maiesties seruice,) to lay aside all rancor, and to become good friends, handling them so wisely, as there appeared no change in their gouernment: but in stead of two, they afterward seemed to bee three heads in one hood. Thus vnited, they resolute to send some companies of light horse, vpon the way to Milan, to cut off the passage to foure hundred horse, and a great number of foot that came from Milan: & to prevent Lodowike of all meanes to get vnto Atilan if he were prest: & then they turne the force of their army against Lodowike being at Nouarre. There were among the Suisses, that were entertained by Sforce, many captains which had serued in the voiage of Naples, & at Nouarre, who complained of their entertainment, not payed at the appointed time. Tremouille deales with the vnderhand, and vpon promise of a great summe of money, withdraws them from Lodowike.

The Suisses, by the perswasion of their Colonels, begin tumultuously to demand their pay. Lodowike giues them all his plate, and intreats them earnestly to attend the men and money that came from Milan. But fearing, least by the coming of these Milanois, they should be forced to winke at Lodowike, and to faile Tremouille, they caused the French armie to approach neere to Nouarre, to draw Lodowike to field, who was loath to ingage himselfe among men whome he sees ill affected to him. They are not deceiued in their hopes. He goes forth with his armie, and puts his light horse to beginne the charge. Tremouille makes it good, vntill the Admirall Grauille, and Edmond D of Prie arriving, the Italian troupes giue way, and are put to rout. The Suisses pressed to fight, answer. That they will not fight against their brethren, kinsmen, and others of their nation, without leaue from their superiors. And approaching neere their Countrymen, making as it were but one armie, they protest, that they meane to returne, and so obtaine free passage through the French armie. Lodowike compassed in in this nation, could neither by prayers, nor promises, diuert them from their disloyall intent: only he got a promise, To set him in a place of safetie. So they agreed, that disguised, & armed like a Suisse on foote, hee should march in their ranks. But going betwixt two great troupes of men at armes, this poore Suisse disguised, is discovered, in one of their Battailons, with Galeas of S. Seuerin, Fracasse, and Anthonye Marie his brethren, and E stayed: the Italians were stript, but the Lansquenets, and Fourguignans were sent away without touch, and Lodowike was led prisoner to Lions, where the King remained: and within two dayes after was sent to the great Tower at Loches, where he continued captiue, about twentie yeares, vntill his death. Behold the ambition and aspiring conceits of him, whome all Italy could not containe, now restrayned in a straight prison. And to auoid a greater corse, he increats Tremouille that he might not see Triunlee his enemy. Whoe being aduertised, and hasting thither, Sforce (sayd hee with a bragging speech) thou seest thou wrongs thou hast done me, are now repaid in the same measure. This happened the Thursday before Palme Sunday. Doubtles the circumstances of Lodowike Sforces miseries are remarkable: wherem we may learne, that the diuine Iustice F doth alwaies punish offenders, and takes from them at need, both iudgement, courage, wit, and all other faculties. Let vs obserue in this Tragedie, that Lodowike being fearful, promising, praying, fighting, flying, disguise, is mockt, taken, & finally, dies in a most pitifull estate. A Prince excellent in many perfectiōs of nature, industrious, eloquent

A of an high and buisie spirit, but infamous for the death of his nephew, couetous, 1500. vaine, ambitious, turbulent, proud, treacherous, impious, cruell, paying a Crowne for euery frenchmans head that his host should murder going to the Subile. So as it is not strange, if he hath felt the rigour of Gods iustice in his owne person. Lodowikes dispositions.

And to fill vp the measure of affliction in his familie, the Cardinall Ascanius, vpon the brute of this defeat, flying from Milan to recouer some place of safetie with many gentlemen of the Gibelin faction, (who hauing affected Lodowike, dispayred of pardon) refreshing themselves at Riuolte, in the territorie of Plaisance, Conrad of Lande, Lord of the same place, (his kinsman and ancient friend) sends presently for Charles ursin and Sonzin Benzon (Captaines vnder the Venerians pay,) and treacherously deliuer vnto them the said Cardinall, with Hermes Sforce, brother to the deceased Duke John Galeas, with most of the gentlemen in their company, who presently conueied them to Venice: but the Senate, at the Kings instant request (who considered how necessaric it was for the safetie of the State of Milan to haue these men in his power) deliuered both the Cardinall, Baptista Vicomt, and Hermes, with all other Milanois that were retyred for the same cause into the Townes of Guaradadde.

The Cardinall was sent to the great Tower at Bourges, vntill that hauing the whole Realme for his prison, hee obtained leaue, by the intercession of the Cardinall of Amboise, to goe to the election of a newe Pope, promising vpon his oath neuer to attempt any thing to preiudice the Crowne: and to bee a meanes to ad- C uance one of the French Cardinals to Saint Peters chaire. But oh the ingratitude and treachery of this Milanois: the Colledge of Cardinals inclining to chooſe the Cardinall of Amboise, hee alone by his faction, wrests the popedom from the French, to giue it vnto Iules the second a Geneuain, in the yeare. 1503. Milan, being restrayned from all meanes of religion, sues presently for pardon, the which they obtaine of the Cardinall or Amboise in the King's name, vpon condition to repaire their rebellion, by the payment of three hundred thousand ducats, whereof his Maiestie did afterwards remit the greatest part.

The rest of the rebelling Citties were euery one taxed, according to their abilities. Thus all the Duchie of Milan was quiet: the Suisses were dismissed, who returning to their houses, seize vpon Belinzane, lying in that mountaine, the which (not drawn out of their hands, as the King might haue done for a little money, shall hereafter giue the author of this error, being a most conuenient passage to stoppe the Suissers entrie into the Duchie of Milan) and shall giue occasion to liberall tongues, to scoffe both in publike and priuate, at the greedinesse of Lewis, whereof these braue Commaunders returning into France, had had more cause to complain, if the Queene had not supplied this defect with that bountie which the King did owe vnto their merits. Doubtlesse shee did bountifullly repaire those errors, which the King did oft commit in that respect. And the King restrayning his libertie, within the bonds of frugality, would not seeme bountifull with the oppression of his people.

E Now let vs see how the remainder of the yeare was employed. The exceeding prosperity of a Prince is suspected vnto other great personages, who feare some diminution in their estates. Maximilian considering how the alienation of so gooly a fee, was preiudiciall to the Empire, and the blame hee did incurre by suffering Lodowike to be thus spoyled, who had cast himselfe into his protection, hee dismissed the Ambassadors of France, and Venice, being readie to proclaime warres against them, as vsurping the lads of the Empire. With this dessein he acquaints the Princes Electors with the iniurie done to him, to them, and to all the Germanie nation, the apparent danger, least their too still patience should make the King of France seeke to ioine the Imperiall Crowne vnto his owne, like vnto some of his predecessors. That partly F through necessity, and partly through the ambitious desire which the Pope had to aduance his sonne Bois, Duke of Valentinois, he would willingly winke at these proceedings. This consideration made the King to put off the war of Naples vnto the next yeare. But as the forces of Germanie moue but heauily, so had hee leisure to assist the to discharge the oath made by his Predecessor, and his owne) with six hundred Lances maintained by his maiesty, and seauen thousand Suisses (but payed by their common-weale) and diuers companies of French, with artillery and munition necessary for the recouery of Pisa, Pietresante, Montpulcian, Matron and other places, vnder the command of the Lord of Beaumont, whom they demanded, but ill chosen for them. To auoide this storme, the Pisans, Geneuois, Siennois and Luquois, (cnuying the Floren-tins greatnesse, offered the King a hundred thousand Crownes in ready money, to the ende the Florentins should not benefit any thing by the recouery of those places so important for their states, promising to pay him fiftie thousand crownes yearly foreuer, vpon condition that the Pisans should recouer their liberty by his meanes, and the fortresses of Liuorne, with all the territory of Pisa.

Triuulce and Fiesque, pleaded for the Pisans, shewing howe expedient it was for the King to weaken the Florentins, and some other Potentats of Italy: but offering a great some of money to the King, they discovered their inward greedinesse, to make themselves Lords thereof. Finally the matter was concluded in fauor of the Florentins. And whilest this army remaynes in Lombardie expecting their pay, the King caueth the Lords of Mirandole, Carpi and Corregeto pay their fines, who for twenty thousand Ducats obtayned remission of their rash rebellion.

The Marquis of Mantowa, (to auoide the like censure,) humbly craued pardon.
John Bentiuole (hauing fauored Lodowike as the rest,) payed fortie thousand Ducats: C and the King by this meanes, tooke both him and the City of Bologne into his protection, whilest that the army (to loofe no time) tooke Mont chiaruolo in the territorie of Parma, belonging to the Torelli fauorers of Sforce: then returning backe, to passe
the Appenin, by the way of Pontreme, at Fregoses request they spoiled Aubri Malefine Lord of Massa, with small credit and other places, although he were in the Florentins protection. In the end the Cardinall of Amboise (performing his promises but badly with the Florentins) receyued (for a summe of money) the Luquois into the Kings protection, agreeing, that his maiesty should hold Pietresante in gard, vntill it were decided to whome it did appertayne.

The Pisans (being resolu'd to make a defensue warre) repaire their fortifications: D men women and Children worke with great earnestnes: and to coole the heate of the French comming to their seege, they made knowne the affection they bare to the Crown of France, by an antientike Instrument sent to the Lords of Beaumont and Rauastein Gouvernor for the King at Genes, who receyued them in the Kings name: and Beaumont summoning the Towne of Pisa, had for answer: That they desired nothing more then to liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty, and therefore they yeelded vnto the King, vpon promise not to deliuer them into the Florentins power. Doubtlesse he was ill practised in politick and military affaires, to seeke that by force which hee might haue without toyle or shame.

And was it not a hard thing, to ruine a people which made such shewe of tender loue and voluntary obedience to this Crowne. Beaumont camps before Pisa the 29. of Iune: batters it all night, and some part of the day following, beats downe about three score fadome of the wall: and mounts to the assaults both with foote and horse.
E
But hee discovered not a deepe and large trench, which the Pisans had made betwixt the wall and the rampar within, so as the breadth and depth amazing our men, they remayned vpon the breach, rather as spectators of the worke, then hauing any desire to enter.

Strangers speake truly, that wee are but a brunt, and that beeing withstood at the first, wee are easily broken. The quality of the rampiers, the obstinacie of the Cittizens, their ancient inclynation to the French, ingenders such a familiarity, betwixt the beseggers and beseege'd, as conferring familiarly together, going into the Towne of Pisa, and comming out safely as from a friend Towne: the soldiars nowe fall to accusing their Commander of rashnesse, and support the Pisans against

Against their Captaines, so as in stead of assaying them, they themselves encouraged them to defend, & suiers Tarlatin bore at Cestello, to enter the Towne with some old soldiers, to receive the command for matters of warre, as he did euer alter, with much honor. This sufferance both of horse and foote, breeds other disorders. They define to haue the seege raised, spoiled the vittles that came to the campe: and Beaumont (unable to stay this insolencie) the Coscons first leaue the armie, in tumultuous manner, and giue exanple to all the rest of the foote: The Suisses likewise found a retreat, & the horse returne into Lombardie: leauing the Florentins affaires in great confusion and disorder.

The Pisans embrace the oportunitie: and with one breath take Libresetta, freeing themselves towards Lucques. And the King complayning, that the Florentins had I preferred Beaumont before the Lord of Alegre, would haue sent backe his men at armes, to winter about Pisa, that roading vp and downe the Countrey, they should keepe it as it were blockt vp, giuing them hope, and promise of a new seege in the Spring. But the Florentins refusing this offer, despairing of any better succellie by the French forces, exposed themselves to the common iniuries of their ill willers, the Ge-neuois, Siennois, Luquois, and all others, who desired their ruine. On the other side, the King considering, that the Popes vnion with the Emperour would bee wonderfull preiudiciall vnto his deffense for the reuenge of the reuolt at Naples, although he had some reason of discontent against Alexander, who had nothing assisted him, during the warres of Atlan: yet his Maiestie shewed himselfe alwaies most tractable to C the second the Popes continuall deffines, in fauor of the Duke of Valentinois, sending vnto him, (vnder the comand of the Lord of Alegre) three hundred Launces, and two thousand foote, accompanied with threats, To be reuenged of those that should oppose themselves against the Popes deffins, as an iniurie done to his owne person. And the Pope likewise promised him, both his sonnes person, and his men, whensoever hee should recouer Naples. So Borgia (ioyning sixe hundred men at armes, and sixe thousand foote, to the French troups,) enters Romagna, takes Pesere, Rimini, Brisquella, and runs without any resistance throughout all the vallie, vntill that Faenze stayed, for a time, the violence of this streame. He camps before the Towne in Nouember, battles it, makes a reasonable breach: and the fift day of the seege, giues a fierce assault, D valiantly defended, as the death of Honore Sauelli, and a great number of his men, slaine at the first charge, forced him to found a retreat, and the snowe (falling with an exceeding cold) to raise the seege.

The former threats had terrified the Potentates of Italie: and the Kings request vnto them in priuate, made them abandon Romagna. The Venetians renounced the protection of Peter Astor, Lord of Faenze. John Bentiuole his vnkle contemned himselfe, fearing to incense the King, and the Popes forces: and the Duke of Valentinois, could not endure, that an vnwarlike people; (hauing no other head but a yong man, of eightene yeares of age) should obscure the fame of his first exploits: he returns in the beginning of the new yeare, laden with ladders, and seeks to surprize it: but in vaine. Pol-E lie not succeeding, he returns to force, and by the taking of Ruffy, and other places of the countrey, he makes the enterprize easie. A new breach is made, and new assaults giuen: the first without effect, the second gaue hope of victorie: but the violence of the Canon which battred in flanke, the incoutring of a deepe & large trench:
the death of Ferdinand Farnese, with many other men of worth: and the number of the wounded, makes them to leaue the assault.

But at length he carries it. The losse the Florentins had receiued in this assault, and the dispaire of succours, cooled this first heate, & feare making the apprehend hard conditions, if force reduced them into the victors power, they treated to yeeld, their I liues and goods saued, vpon condition that Astor their Lord, should with his libertie choofe what retreat he pleased, enioying the reuenuew of his patimonic. But poore some one (sayeth the Originall, naming no man, but noting the villain with his finger) hauing taken his pleasure of him, and glutted his lust, they caused him to be secretly murdered with his bastard brother: and the Pope with the approbation of the Colledge, giues to his sonne Borgia, the inuesting and title of Duke of Romagnia. This estate seemed to him imperfect, without the adiunction of the territory of Bologne. But the Kings expresse commandement, not to attempt any thing against the estate of Iohn Bentiuole (whome he had taken into his protection) caused the Valentinois to content him: for that time, with a transaction from Bentiuole, to haue passage and victuals through his country, a tribute of nine thousand ducats yeerely, a certaine number of horse and foote, and Castel-bologne, (a place vnder the iurisdiction of Bologne) and so he transported his forces into Tuscane.

Marke here a notable example of a childe to his father. One of the sonnes of the L.G. Montesper going to Pozzuolo, to visit the sepulcher of his father, suffered himselfe to be so much ouerruled with passion, that after he had washed all parts of the monument with his lamentable teares, he fainted, and fell downe dead vpon the Sepulcher of his father, who had as little sence of those his latest sorrowes, as he had feeling of so great a fault, to giue such libertie to the rage of nature.

The Florentines in great perplexity.

The Florentins are mightely perplexed, they had greatly moued the King by their bad order in the recovery of Pisa, as we haue heard before, but there springs vp newe motives of discontent: The exceeding charge they had beene at, and were still forced C to beare for the warres of Pisa, the ieaousie of the Popes forces, and of his Borgia, made them slacke in paying the King the money, which the Duke of Milan had lent them: and the debt which hee pretended to bee due vnto him by reason of the pay, made by his maiesty to the Suisses which he had sent against Pisa, whom hee had maintayned with his owne money: vpon refusall which the Florentins had made them, vnder colour that they would retire into their Country before their time perished: and the King (who sought to empty their cofers, to the end he might gouerne them more absolutely) demanded it very earnestly. Moreouer they grewe more weak by their owne ciuill discords, which troubled them in the popular gouernment, where in many of the Citizens being suspected, eyther as friends to the Medicis, or desiring D an other kind of gouernment, matters were managed with more confusion then counsell: and to increase their crosses, the King did presse them for the aides and summes of money promised for the voiage of Naples, pretending: That he had performed the conuentions they had made together, whereto they were bound: seeing that by their owne fault they had hindred the recovery: therefore hee was no more bound to protect them. And in truth Julian de Medicis, beseeching him in person, and at the Popes perswasion, to restore him and his bretheren into their estates, vpon promises of a great summe of money, hee most willingly opened both eare and heart to these offers.

The Florentines freed by a fayned transaction with Borgia.

All these considerations drew the Valentinois into Tuscane, with seauen hundred E men at armes, five thousand choise foote which Bentiuole gaue him, (the French companies lodging apart, to attend the Kings army which began to march): But he knew, that the king would not bee pleased with this entry in Hostile manner into the Florentins Country, and that otherwise his army was both weak of men and munition, to force any Towne.

The Florentins also knowing themselves naked, both of horse and foote, others then of the Country: oppressed with ieaousie, feare and diuisions, hee makes this accord with them: That there should bee a confederacie, betwixt the common-wealth of Florence, and the Duke of Valentinois, with a prohibition not to aide the rebelles on eyther side: and that the Florentins should entertayne him for three yeares at their charge, F with three hundred men at armes and six and thirty thousand ducats yeerely, which men at armes hee should send to them when soeuer they had neede, eyther for themselves, or any other, and should not oppose themselves against him, for the defence of the Lord of Plumbin

A Plumbin, who was in their protection.

But this composition was onely to disarme the Valentinois, and to send him packing. And hee well informed of the policie, staying in the same County, spoyled it in reuenge, both by fire, and sacke, most like to an open enemy, trying them with demandes, which partly they refused, partly deferred, hoping that the Kings authority should free them from these bonds, which necessity of the time and *Borgia*s force had extorted from them.

The King indeed held the rodde, but stayed his arme: he was pleased the Valentinois should terrifie them, but not tyrannise ouer them. For although hee would willingly haue seene some other forme of gouernment at Florence. yet an alteration then would B
 haue beene very preiudiciall vnto him: the King being loath to see the Valentinois aduanced to any other authoritie, or by any other forces then his Maiesties. So by the commaundement of Lewis, he leaues Florence, and enters the territorie of Plombin, taking Surgerette, Starline, and the Islands of Elbe and Pianosa, where leauing a sufficient garrison, as well to guard the places, as to molest them of Plombin, he continually returned towards Rome, to ioine with the armie, that was marching to the conquest of Naples.

The warres of Naples resumed.

Nothing crossed the course thereof, but the alarms which the Emperour had formerly caused. But when one treats with a Prince, that is flexible for money, the accord is soone made. The gold of France must now stay the iron of Germanie. Philippe the Arch-Duke might doe much: he was a Prince inclined to peace (and it may be, he died too soone for the good of France, leauing an heire, whose birth and all the courtes of his life, hath beene most fatal to the Crowne) and the traffick of his subjects made them loth to heare speake of warre with the French. But that which did most import, the King offered to giue Claude his onely daughter, in marriage to Charles, son to the said Arch-Duke: and for a dowrie, when they should be both of age, to confirmate the marriage (for neither the one, nor the other was yet three yeares old) to giue the Duchie of Milan. So by the meanes of Philippe, and for money, Lewis obtained a prolongation of the truce, in the which the King of Naples was not comprehended: who notwithstanding, by the meanes of fortie thousand ducats, and a bond D of fiftene thousand more monethly, purchased a promise from Maximilian: Not to make any accord, but to comprehend him in it, and to make waire in the Duchie of Milan, when as need should require, to diuert the Kings forces. There yet remained one scruple, Ferdinand King of Arragon, and of Castille by Isabell his wife, might stirre vp the Venetians, and happily the Pope, (both prompt inough to oppose ioyntly against the greatnesse of this Crowne:) Hee was concurrent with our Lewis, in the right of the succession of Naples: for although Alphonso King of Arragon had disposed thereof to Ferdinand his bastard, as his owne proper good, gotten without the rights of the Crowne of Arragon: Yet Iohn his brother (successor to the Realme of Arragon) and since Ferdinand sonne to Iohn, had alwaies protested of their lawfull pretensions to the estate of Naples, as a good, purchased by Alphonso, with the forces, and treasour of Arragon.

And this Ferdinand King of Arragon temporised like a Spaniard: watching his opportunitie, to attempt some great matter for his owne benefite: He did not onely make demonstration of all the duties of a good kinsman to Ferdinand King of Naples, and his other successors: but the better to lull him a sleepe, hee allied himselfe to the sayd Neapolitain, giuing him his sister Iane in marriage, and consenting that Iane her daughter should marrie with young Ferdinand.

This concurrence of two Kings in like desire, caused the one to free himselfe from lets, and crosses: and the other to get a part of that which hee could not compassie F wholly, and so then to share betwixt them, the conquests of the sayd Realme: vpon condition: That the King of France should haue the Cittie of Naples, with all belonging to the land of Labour, and the Province of Abrazzo: Ferdinand should for his part haue all the lands, and territories belonging to Apulia, and likewise to Calabria, agreeing

one another, but onely not to hurt one another, and that they should doe homage vnto the Pope, Lewis with the title, no more of King of Sicile, but King of Ieru-salem and Naples, imitating the example of Frederick the second, Emperour of Rome, and King of Naples, by his wife the daughter of Iohn, King of Ieru-salem (in name but without effect) and of Naples, and Ferdinand in qualitie of Duke of Apulia and Calabria.

The armie
going to Naples.

The capitulation was no sooner concluded, but the King prepared his armie vnder the command of Lewis of Armagnac Duke of Nemours, sonne to James beheaded at Paris, vnder Lewis the eleventh, and the Lord of Aubigni, an ancient, wise, and well experienced Capitaine. In the which were Francis of Bourbon, Earle of S. Paul, brother to Charles Earle of Vendosme, sonnes to Francis of Vendosme, who dyed at Verceil, Lewis of Bourbon, Prince of la Roche-sur-Yon, great grand-father to the Duke of Montpensier now liuing, Charles of Bourbon, afterwards Duke of Bourbon, and Constable of France, Lewis of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier, his brother, Gaston of Foix, Vicount of Narbonne, the Kings Nephew, sonne to Iohn Vicount of Narbonne, but by reason of their young yeares, obeying the aboue named commanders. The troups were a thousand Lances, foure men to a Lauce, sixe thousand French foote, foure thousand Suisses, and the Duke of Valentinois with his forces. The armie at sea, commanded by the Earle of Rauaslein, Gouverneur of Genes, consisted of three Caragues of Genoua, and sixe ships, with many other small vessels, laden with many foote men, so as they esteemed their footemen to be twentiethousand: who by the Popes fauour, and Borgias his sonnes, passed through all Italy without any resistance.

Frederick's simplicitie.

Frederick King of Naples, had not yet discovered the secret conuention of the two Kings, who proceeding plainly, did sollicit Gonsalue (who lay at Anchor in Sicile, vnder colour to succour him) to come to Caliste: and very simply put some places in Calabria into his hands, as he demanded: but this was but to make the conquest of Fedinands portion the more easie. So hoping (that Gonsalue having ioyned with his armie) he should haue sufficient forces to withstand the French, he went and camped at
S. Germaine, with seuen hundred men at armes, six hundred light horse, and six thousand foote, with the troups which the Colonois brought vnto him, hauing likewise sent his eldest sonne Ferdinand to Tarentum, to commit the Prince of Basignan, and the Earle of Melete to prison, accused to haue intelligence with the Earle of Caiazza, who was in the French armie: the which being come neere vnto Rome, the Ambassadors of France and Spain, giue notice vnto the Pope of this diuision made betwixt their maisters, with an intent afterwards (say they) to make warre against the enemies of Christian religio: and according to the tenour of this agreement, they demand a league, the which was presently granted. Doubtlesse the more wee seeke to shadow and colour an iniustice with goodly shewes, the greater it appeares.

Two Kings blamed for this diuision.

Behold the desseignes of two Kings, discovered and layde open to all the world, and both ioyntly blamed. Ours, for that he had rather drawe a corriuall into Italy, to whom his enemies and ill willers might sue, then to leaue the full possession vnto Frede-ricke, offering (as we haue sayd) to hold the realme of him, and to pay him a yearly tribute. The other, for that, desire to haue a part of the realme had made him to conspire against a King of his owne blood, whom (the more easie to ruine) hee had alwayes entertained with lying promises of succours, blemishing the glory of that noble title of Catholike King, which hee and his wife Isabell had lately obtained. This league amazed Fredericke, but more the generall mutinie, whereby Saint Germaine and the neighbour places had rebelled at the b.uite of the French forces, euen before that Aubigny parted from Rome: so as in steed of keeping the field, as hee had pretended, hee shuttes himselfe vp, meaning to defend his Townes. Capoue was the first place of defence that he made choise off, and did fortifie it with three hundred men at armes, some light horse, and three thousand foote, vnder the command of Fabricio Colonne and Rainunce of Martiane: and leauing Prosper Colonne for the garde of

Rebellion in the estate of Naples.

A of Naples, he lodged in Auerse. Fabricio had caused the messengers of some Neapoli-taine Barons of the French faction, to be murdered at Rome, being sent to treat with him touching an accord for their maisters: and see now, these murders are reuenged, if not vpon the person, at the least vpon the Authors goods. Aubigni in passing, burnes Marine, Cani, and certaine other places belonging to their houle: then drawing towards Montfortin, he findes that Iulius Colonne had shamefully abandoned it, leauing by the same meanes, all the other Townes about Capoue, euen vnto Vulturnus, to the victors discretion.

Frederick aduertised that Aubigni had passed Vulturno, leauing Auerse, he retired into Naples. Auerse, Nole, and others, yeelding vnto the French, prepared them the way to Capoue, the which enuironed on cyther side the riuer, and battered fiercely on all parts, endures a hotte assault, and repells them with great losse. The Canon shotte shakes the strongest walles, and the rough assaults amaze the most resolute, they renew the batterie, and all prepares to a second assault. The people mutined, the Captaines and souldiers fainted, and Fabricio Colonne parted from a Bastion with the Earle of Caiazza, when as our men greued with the first affront, force the breach, ouerthrow the defences, enters it, kill all they meet in the furie, ransome such as they finde after their furie past, and sack the Towne. A happy victory, if the horrible inso-lencie and licentiousnesse of the victors, had not defamed it. Many women, maidens and Nunnes, to auoide this first furie, were retired into a Tower. Borgia would see them, and chose out fortie of the fairest, the rest seiued as a pray for the souldiers lust, who after solde a part of them at Rome. Fabricio seeing the Towne taken, fled away speedily, but some galloping after, brought him back prisoner to the Campe. Don Hugues of Cardonne, and all the other Capitaines and men of qualitie, saued their liues by ransome. Rainuccio of Martiane being hurt at the assault, dyed in the Duke of Valentinois mens hands.

Capoue being lost, it made them loose all hope euer to defend any place: Caliste yeelde presently, Auerse opens her gates. Naples compounds soderly for three score thousand crownes, payable to the victors. And Fredericke being shut vp into Catle-Neufe, compounds with Aubigny: To deliuer into his hands within sixe dayes, all the townes and forts which were of the Kings portion, onely reseruing the Ile of Ilicie for sixe moneths, during the which, it should bee lawfull for him to go whether hee pleased, but not into the realme of Naples: To draw what hee would out of the Castles of Naples, except the artillerie of King Charles, which remained there: That all offences should bee pardoned which had bene committed since the first conquest of the Realme by Charles: and that the Cardinals Colonne, and of Arragon, should enioy the spirituall liuings they possessed within the realme.

tion of Frede-ricke, who of King of Naples made Duke of Anjou.

Thus Frederick detesting the treacherie of the Arragonois, and desiring rather to flie vnto the Kings protection, he came into France, to accept what his Maiestie should gise him, which was the Duchie of Anjou, with thirty thousand Crownes of yearly pension. An ill aduised resolution, for keeping himselfe in some place of safetie, hap-pely he might (during the partialities which shall soone growe betwixt Lewis and Fedinand) haue found meanes to recouer his realme: yet was hee happy in his misery, changing a Crowne of thornes, a State full of troubles, to a quiet life, and yet honorable: for euen after the French were expelled Naples, hee was still maintained and kept in the same honour, and in the same estate, by the Kings great loue and bounty.

Gonsalue at the same time conquered the portion for his Maister, and although all the Countie did more affect the French command, yet hauing no man to receiue them in his name, nor to defend them, all the Townes did willingly submit themselues vnto him, except Manfredonia and Tarentum, the which after some shew of resistance, did in the end vndergo the Castillian yoake. Ferdinand eldest sonne to Frederick, was at Tarentum, with secret commandement from his father, not to come into France, though he should be forced to strike saile.

But seeing that both were wholly despoiled of their estates, and that our Lewis did A nourish the father, the Castilian might well entertayne the sonne. Gonsalve lends him vnto him, against his sollemne oath taken, at the receyuing of the sacrament, To leaue him at his liberty: but some nation preferres the interest of state, before the feare of God and the respect of his owne reputation.

Plombin deliuored to the Duke of Va-
lentinus.

The Conquest of Naples, had made the Valentinois returne to his enterprize of Plom- bin, and James Appian Lord of the Towne (hauing manned it with a sufficient garrison, came vnto the King, who long before had taken him into his protection. But whilst he did sollicite in Court for the preservation of his estate, (though without any hope of fauour, by reason of the Kings promises made vnto the Pope, Not to hinder him in his desires) Pandolfo Petruccio deliuerd vp the Towne to the Valentinois, who by B the authority of the Apostolike see, and the support hee had from the King, made it well knowne in Italie, that his excessiue couetousnesse had no restraint nor bounds. In the meane time, the King treats a peace with the Emperour very effectually. Many reasons moued him therevnto: they desire to obtaine the possession of Milan: to of- fend the Venetians, to whome the prosperity of this Realme beeing very offensive, they did vnder-hand hinder the conclusion of this peace: and to recouer Cremona with Gua- da aduue, at the great instance of the Milanois. with Eresse, Bergamo, and Crème, the an- cient appertenances of the Duchie of Milan, and vsurped by the Venetians, in the time of Philipp Maria Visconte.

A treaty betwixt the Emperour &
King Lewis.

For this treaty the Cardinall of Amboise, Lieutenant generall for his maiesty at Mi- C lan, went to the Emperour to Trent, where first they treated of the marriage of Charles the eldest sonne to the Arch-duke, Philip with Claude the onely daughter of Lewis: the Emperour granting to cyther of them, the inuesting of Milan, but not to the Kings heires males, in case hee had any: To recouer whatsoeuer cyther of them pretended to haue beene vsurped by the Venetians: To call a generall counsell to reforme the Church, not onely (ay they) in the members, but euen in the head. Doubtlesse there is small assurance in the loue of Princes, who gape after nothing but their owne great- nesse. Moreouer did wee euer see any thing succeed well with them, who haue co- loured their passions with the name of the Church, and the reformation thereof. This is properly sayd, to take the name of God in vaine: And likewise all the malicious practi- D ses and schoole tricks of a Cardinall, (whose ambitious spirit gaped after the Pope- dome, what could they bring forth but smooke for France, and combustion for Italy?) Truly the reading of Histories doth teach vs, That the politike gouernment of preests, is vnfortunate and fatall.

prolonged.

This treaty, hauing onely in shewe made way for a peace, was ended with a prolon- gation of a truce, giuing hope that these things treated on, should soone take effect. And this opinion was confirmed by the comming of the Arche-duke Philip, with his wife (daughter to Ferdinand King of Arragon and Isabell Queene of Castile) who as ap- pointed to the succession, meaning to go and receiue the oath of fidelity of their sub- iects, they passed through Paris the 25. of Nouember, and from thence to Blois, where E the King and Queene remained: and there they concluded the marriage of their chil- dren: but man purposeth, and God disposeth.

Philip of An-
f. is pulled through France.

For with the newe yeare, the Emperour brought forth newe desseings, refusing flat- ly the inuesting of the Duchie of Milan to the King: and treating with the Potentats of Italy touching his passage to receyue the Imperiall Crowne, he found the Florentins tractable to the articles which he propounded, considering the hard condi- tions the King demanded, seeming to bee wholly estranged from them, saying that hee was acquit of the articles accorded at Milan, and they remayned still bound. Thus Hermes Sforce Ambassador for Maximilian at Florence, had obtayned a promise of the C. m. non-weale, to aide him in his voiage with a hundred men at armes, and thirty thousand Ducats, when as he should be entred into Italy. But the King fearing lest the Florentins despairing of his loue, should make some accord with Maximilian, in the ende he made an newe agreement with them, vpon milde conditions: That the King

A King (returning them againe into his protection) should defend them against all men, with his owne force and charge for three yeares following, during the which they should pay vnto his Maiestie forty thousand Ducats yearely: and it should be lawfull for the Florentins, to protect by force against the Pisans, or against any other that withheld their places. The Pi- sars are againe abandoned to the spoile, and the Florentines resolved to vanquish by a generall waste (the forerunner of famine) that place which they had in vaine tryed to subdue by the sword. This passed in Tuscane, when as no man perceiued what tol- lowed these garboiles.

The begining of diuision betwixt Lewis & Ferdinand.

But two nations of such contrary humors, could they liue so neere neighbours, but some seedes of dislike should bring forth fruites of diuision? There sodenly E growes great controuersies betwixt our French and the Castilians for their confines. And why do we not vse a graue deliberation in our contracts, to make them so strong as nothing may infringe them? Alphonso of Arragon King of Naples, the first of that name, had (to make the collection of his reuenues the more easie,) diuided the realme of Naples into six principall Prouinces, The Land of Labour, the Principallitie, Egadicte, Calabria, Apulia, and Abruzze, whereof Apulia was subdiuided into three parts: the land of Otrante, Bari, and the Capitanate ioyning to Abruzze, and se- parated from the rest of Apulia by the riuer of Lofante, (otherwise called Laufade.) Seeing then that in the diuision, Abruzze was fallen to the French, had they not reason to dispute the possession, the sayd Capitanate being rather a portion of Abruzze, then C of Apulia? and the matter of greatest importance was, that not inioying Capitanat, they lost the reuenew growing of the custome of Castell, being one of the cleereft reuenews of the realme.

Moreouer Capitanate is a Corne countrie, and might easilie in a time of dearth fa- mish the land of Labour and Abruzze, whensoever the Spaniards should forbid the trans- port of graine from Apulia and Sicile. Herevpon either part drew what he could out of the reuenews of this custome, feeding still their contentions with new motives. The Spaniards maintained, that the Principallitie and Pazilicate were comprehended in Calabria, which is diuided into two, the hether and the farther, one high and the other lowe, and that the vallie of Beneuent possessed by the French, was a portion of D Apulia. And therefore Gonsalve chafed the French Magistrates out of Tripalde, and sent others to administer Iustice and right vnder the command, and authoritie of Ferdinand.

All things tended to open diuision. But let vs not flatter our selues. Was it not rea- son, that they which had deuoured an other, should afterwards consume them selues? The chiefe Barons of the Countrie, desiring to quench these first fire-brands of dis- cord, did mediate an enterview betwixt the Viceroye of Nemours, and Gonsalve, who agreed to enioy those places in common, that were in controuersie, and in the meane time set vp the banners of the two Kings, expecting what they should de- termine.

E The Viceroy was hotte and vehement, and could not endure a brauadoe. Gonsalve (of whom the Spanish and Italian Authors make no lesse account, then of a Furius Ca- millus; a P. Scipio, or a C. Caesar;) had doubtlesse goodly parts of a Captaine. Braue in armes, vigilant, industrious, patient in trauell, stately, prodigall, liberall, not voluptu- ous, a man of a strong and vigorous complexion: Hee sometimes by liberalltie, sometimes by sufferance, gaue libertie to his souldiers: then againe would restraine their insolencie imperiouslie, within the bounds of dutie: he loned and honoured men of valour: and very ingeniously did fitte himselfe to occurrents, iudging of things to come, with a good naturall discourse; by the comparison of the present, and what was passed, neuer grounding his desseignes vpon any vncertaintie. But all these good- lie vertues were blemished with a perpetuall dissimulation and treacherie: no feare F of God, no loyaltie where hee felt any profit; being accustomed to say, That a braue Souldiour must grossly weare the webbe of his honour.

The vertues
of Gonsalve.

His vice.

As

1502. As Gonsalve then (following the instructions and letters of Ferdinand, who already in A imagination had deuoured the whole Realme of Naples) had sowed the seeds of warre on all sides, the Viceroy protests by a publicke declaration, that he will make warre against Gonsalve, if he speedily depart not out of the Capitanat. And seeing the King of Spain resolved not to leaue the possession, hee enters Tripaldi by force the 19. of Iune: and consequently the other Townes which Gonsalve held in that Country. They are now imbarcked in warre, and the King is at Lions, to provide necessary things more commodiously to crosse the vniust practises of his aduersary. Vpon this desceing he sends 2000. Suisses by sea to supply his men, and entertaynes the Princes of Salerno and Brignan, with an intent to passe into Italy, if neede required.

New broiles
in Italy.

Lewis succors
the Florentines.

The newe tumults which Vittelloze (impatient of the death of his brother Paul Vitellio, beheaded at Florence as we haue sayd) did raise in Tuscane, drew him thither. They begun by the reuolt of Aretze, against the Florentines, at the perswasion of the sayd Vittelloze, of the Vrsins, Iohn Paul Baillon, Pandolfe Petrucci and others which desired the returne of Peter of Medicis, into the state of Florence. The Florentines protecting themselves with their new league with the King, flie to him, accuse the Pope and the Duke of Valentinois, to be the Authors of these stirres: found forth the imminent danger of the Duchie of Milan, if the aboue named (vnited and coniuured to ruine their estate) reduce it into their power.

The King had beene long tyred with the insolency, and ambition of the Pope and his sonne. He did foresee, that the treaties of accord being broken with Maximilian, C the Venetians would soone crosse him: and that hauing open warre with the Spaniards, the inuading of Tuscane, doone by the secret practises of others, would proue very preiudiciall vnto him. And therefore he sent foure hundred Lances to succor the Florentines, with commandement to Vittelloze and his adherents: Not to molest those any more whome he had receyued into his protection: the which he declared to all those that should feare to incurre his indignation. In the meane time the Duke of Valentinois vpon the confusions of Aretze, went out off Rome with his army, and vnder a false pretext to take Camerin, hauing before (to weaken Guidobalde Duke of Vrbino, drawne men and artillery from him,) leapes into that Duchie, and takes all his estate without any let, except the Rocks of S. Leon, & Matuole, to the great discontent & amazement of Vittelloze, the Vrsins & Petruccio, who by an others ruine began plainely to discouer their owne. This conquest had made the Valentinois to assaile the Florentines, if the commandement made him fro the King, or rather the coming of his maiesty, had not diuerted him. Camerin was the object of his armes. He tooke it, & with a barbarous inhumanity caused Iules of Varane Lord of the sayd place to be strangled with his two sonnes.

The Duke of Valentino is his cruelty.

The King arriues at Ast, and Lewis of Tremouille comes into Tuscane with two hundred Lances, three thousand Suisses, and great store of artillery, for the recovery of Aretze in fauour of the Florentines. The Pope with his Borgia, foreseeing that the King being incensed against them, as the chiefe motives of this warre, would spoile Borgia of Romagnia, and other places which he possessed: and that they were too weak to E withstand this storme, they returne to their accustomed practises: imputing the rebellion of Aretze to Vittelloze and his Associates, whome they could not (say they) neither by prayers nor authority diuert from this enterprife. And to pacifie the King, the Valentinois sent word to Vittelloze, that if hee did not giue vp Aretze and other places belonging to the Florentines, he would cast him out by force.

Vittelloze was ready to beare the whole burthen, but by what meanes? considering the weakenesse of his forces, and that the strongest were ready to reconcile themselves, and to leaue him in the mier: therefore makes no delay, but consignes Aretze and the other Florentin Townes, which the violence of his forces had put into his power, Monsieur Saint Souin, Chastillon d'Aratze, Cortone and the rest of Valdichiane: all which F were presently by the Kings command restored to the Florentines. The affaires of this world require euery man to shroude himselfe vnder the strongest. The King hath no sooner set footing into Italy, but all the Princes and common-weales (according to their

A their accustomed manner) flie vnto him, some to get pardon, some to maintaine their estates, and all in generall to draw his Maiesties forces against the Pope and his sonne. But doth it not commonly fall out, that what many desire, succeeds but seldom? Their priuate interest and respects, are most commonly contrary to their outward shewes, and desires. So the King, not so much moued by the Popes exact diligence, (who by all meanes and messages, sought to pacifie him, and to returne againe into fauour,) as by the Cardinall of Amboise perswasion, (who to entertaine the Pope in vnion with the King, presumed to frame himselfe a ladder, to mount vnto the Popedom, & to aduance some one of his house, to be Cardinall) he happily followed of two wayes the worst, fauouring the Pope, and his followers. The wise reader may iudge thereof by the event of the historie.

B True it is, the Emperour was a chiefe motiue to draw our Lewis to this accord. His fingers itched, he could not be quiet: and vnder colour of his passage (which he did so much affect) to receiue his Imperiall Crowne of the Pope, he might happily trouble the state of Italy, to the Kings great preiudice. and indeed he had already sent many horse and foote to Trente, making great offers to the Pope in fauour of this passage. Moreouer, the King was not ignorant, how vnwillingly the Venetians did see the state of Milan, & the realme of Naples in his hands: Adding thereunto, the imperious threats which foure Cantons of the Suisses made. That if the King did not yeeld them the rights he had to Belinzone, and giue them Volteine, Schafouse, with other outragious C demands, they would compound with Maximilian. But to adde more crosses, he must dispute the conquest of Naples by the sword.

Made vpon sundry considerations.

The Suisses
braue the king

All these considerations made our Lewis desirous to entertaine the Popes friendship, whereby Maximilians desires were sodainly disappointed. So the King, (hauing more libertie to provide for the estate of Naples) sent a fresh supply by sea, of two thousand Suisses, and tenne thousand French, the which ioyned to the Viceroy, who had already taken all the Capitanate, except Manfredonia and S. Angelo. They camped before Canoie, the which Peter of Nouarre yeelded by composition, to depart with bag and baggage. The taking of this place, did shut Gonsalve into Barlette, without money, with little vitells, and lesse muniton. And the French Captaines alledging, (against D the aduice of the Lord of Aubigni), that the armie could not all campe about Barlette, for want of water, and many other reasons? they resolved, a part of the armie should remaine thereabouts, to maintaine a kind of seege, and the other should seeke to recover the rest of the realme. After this Counsell, the Viceroy seized vpon all Apulia, except Tarentum, Otrante, and Gallipoli: and then hee returned to Barlette. The Lord of Aubigni entring Calabria with the other part of the armie, tooke and sackt the Towne of Cosenze, with some other places.

The exploits of the French in the Kingdome of Naples.

But our prosper ty lasts not long, we commonly sleepe in the midst of our course. This happie beginning, made our Lewis more carelesse, then the cause required: the which if hee had continued, hee might easily haue expelled the enemy, (before hee E had beene supplied) out of all the state of Naples: but hee tooke his way for France, after he had treated a new with the Pope, and receiued the Valentinois into fauour againe, vpon condition, To aid him in the warres of Naples, when need should require: and a promise from the King, To giue the Valentinois three hundred Lances, to helpe him to conquer Bologne for the Church, and to suppress the Vrsins, Baillon and Vittelloze, against whom the King was wonderfully incensed for the outrages they had done to the Florentines, and for that they had shewed themselves too slacke in the execution of his Maiesties commandements, especially Vittelloze, who had refused to yeeld the Florentines the artillerie which he had taken from Aretze.

This reconciliation made the Valentinois fearefull to all Italy. And doubtlesse who- F soeuer is neighbour to a cruell, and inexorable man, hath need to stand vpon his guard. Moreouer a wicked man hauing so firme and strong supports in the Kings court, where the Cardinall of Amboise ruled all: how could hee but dayly presume to comit new insolencies? The Venetians were wonderfull icalous of Borgias great enie-

A League
against the Valentinoi.

But the King did not build so much vpon the Popes friendship, as hee doubted his hatred. Moreover, he thought (being firmly vnited to him,) no man should dare to attempt any thing against the authoritie of his Crowne, in the estates of Milan and Naples. The Kings answer was. That he neither would, nor ought to hinder the Pope, from disposing at his pleasure, of places belonging to the Church. The Venetians therefore forbearing to crosse the prosperitie of the Valentinoi, for his Maiesties respect, behold, many small brookes ioyned together, make a great streame. The Vrsins, the Duke of Gravine, Vitellozza, John Paul Baillon, Liucrot of Ferme, Hermes, for John Bentiuole his father, Anthony of Venafre for the Siensis, with many other heads, make an offensive, and defensive League: by means whereof, and by the surprise of the Castle of Saint Leon, Guidobalde recouered all his duchie of Vibm. They go to field with seven hundred men at armes, and nine thousand foote: but they displease the King, arming themselves with his authoritie, hoping (it may be) that he would not be discontented to haue the Valentinoi molested by another. C

The Valentinoi flies to the King, and speedily provides for conuenient remedies: first hee pacifieth Cardinal Vrsin, by the means of Iulius his brother, and by diuers policies did so cunningly practise, first one, then another of the confederates, (confused, and troubled with the Kings succors, which the King gaue commaundement to the Lord of Chaumont to send to Borgia, with expresse charge, to countenance his affaires by all means,) that the first which was taken in the snare, was Paul Vrsin, whom he held to be a fit instrument to dispose of his companions, and to draw them innocently into danger. But what did these poore Commanders, capitulating with a wicked wretch, whose sweet wordes was a snare for their death, and who must shortly serue as an instrument of Gods wrath against them. Truly whilst they employ the forces (which they had leuied to suppress him,) in his fauour, for the taking of some places, and that they suffer themselves to be lulled more a sleep with his goodly shewes, and sweet speeches, he prepares for their ruine. After they had by his commaundement taken the Towne, and Castle of Sinigalle: hee comes thither the next day, with all his companies in order: hee causeth them to bee taken prisoners, strips their troupes: and to make the last day of this yeare famous, hee strangles Vitellozza and Liucrot of Ferme. The first must follow the miserable courie of his house, all his other brethren (and according to the order of their ages) being dead of violent deaths. John was slaine with a cannon before Osme, vnder Pope Innocent Camille with a stone before Circelle. Paul was beheaded at Florence. And Liucrot felt in his person, the treason whereby he had in a barker treacherously murdered John Frangine his vnkle, with many Citizens of Ferme, to usurpe the Seigneurie thereof.

Now we shall see a yeare full of memorabill, & famous accidents, begun with the Popes impietie, & treacherie: but he was ignorant what should presently befall his own person and state. Being aduertised of his sonnes exploits at Sinigalle, hee calls the Cardinal of Vrsin to the Vatican: who (trusting in his faith, whom all the world knew to be faithles) was lately come to Rome. Being arrived, he is taken prisoner, and with him Rainold Vrsin Archb. of Florence, the Protonotaire Vrsin, and the Abbot of Aluane, brother to Barthelmeu, & James of S. Croix a Romain-gentleman, whom some few dayes after hee caused to bee deliuered vpon a good caution: but the Cardinal ended his dayes there by prison: and the Valentinoi hearing that the Cardinal was prisoner, hee caused the Duke of Gravine, & Paul Vrsin to be strangled. The hee approached to Sieme, meaning to seize thereon vnder colour to expel Pandolfo Petruccio, as an enemy, and

disturber

A chamber of the quiet of Tuscane, promising, that when he had chafed him, he would presently returne with all his troupes to Rome, without indomaging their territories. The Siensis thinking it no reason, that the whole City should incurre so great danger to maintaine the power of one priuate Cittizen, and Pandolfo desiring rather to accept that with euery mans good liking, which in the end the peoples hatred & the peril of his person would force him vnto, he parted out of Sieme, leauing the same garrard & the authority with his friends, so as his departure bred no alteration in the government. This enterprize displeased the King: for although he were not sorry, to see Vitellozza & his adherents punished, yet desired he not their totall ruine, the which with the conquest of so great estates made the Pope; and his Borgia too mighty. He desisted therefore from this attempt, not so much to obey the King, as finding the taking of Sieme difficult, being a great Towne & strong: conuerting all his forces to the totall destruction of the house of Vrsins, John, Iulio, Francis, Fabian, and Organtin, who hauing ioyned with the Sauelli were in Ceruelre, had taken the bridge of Lamentane, & scoured all the country. When he had refrayned their courses, hee inuaded the possessions of John Jordan, who was then in the Kings protection and pay, bearing armes for his seruice at Naples. The King was greatly moued herewith: and to controule the presumption, & insolencie of the Valentinoi, hee commands him to forbear to molest the estate of Jordan, & to restrain his excellent courtesies: hee procures an vnion betwixt the Florentins, Siensis & Bolognas for their comon defence; to take from the Pope & his son, all means to extend themselves any farther into Tuscane. The Spaniard fortifies himselfe in the meane time, in the realme of Naples, and our affaires decline. The Earle of Mele, the Princes of Salerno & Bygnan, were incamped at Villeneufue. & Don Hugues of Cardone (passing from Messina into Calabria with 16. hundred foote, Spaniards, Calabriens and Siciliens, and a hundred men at armes) marched to succour it. going through a narrow plaine betwixt a mountaine and a little river, ioyning to the way with a cauley, desiring rather to enter into Villeneufue, then to fight. The Earle encounters them beneath the river: & not able to draw them into the plaine, hee passeth the water to cut of their way to Villeneufue, & to charge them. But very indiscreetly, for being troubled with the cauley, they were easily defeated and the Towne reicued. And behold Manuel of Benaude, (hauing Anthony de Le D Deu with him, who of a simple soldiar became a braue Captaine, and shall win many victories) leading two hundred men at armes, two hundred Genetaires, and two thousand foote, takes Lozarne at the second assault, where the Lord of Ambricourt was lately entered with thirty Lances, and the Earle of Mele with a thousand foote. Ambricourt was taken, but the Lord of Aubigni, approaching with three hundred Lances & five thousand foote, forced the victors to retire to Villeneufue, and gaue the Earle means to saue himselfe & to keepe the Castel. Aubigni following them in the rayle to the foote of a high mountaine, cut off threescore men at armes & some thousand foote, with 13 hundred prisoners, taking 15. enscignes. But this was with the death of Grign, a braue captaine, who led the company of the Earle of Caiazzo, being dead of sickenes a little after the taking of Caspoua. At the same time Porta Carrera brought two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, & two thousand foote, who dying at Rhegium, left the command of his troupes to Fernand Andrade his Lieutenant.

The Spaniards
defeated.

Few dayes after, Gonsalue departing from Barlette, set vpon the Lord of Palisse who lodged in Rubos, with a hundred Lances, & three hundred foote, as securely as in an assured peace, & hauing surprised him suddenly, battred it furiously and made a breach: he forced him to yeeld the place, and to remaine prisoner with his troupe, and then he returned safely to Barlette: notwithstanding the Duke, of Nemours companies lodged for their ease in diuers places about Barlette, whilst Gonsalue endured with an admirable patience both hunger & pestilence, within the same City. Moreover fifty French Lances sent to surprise some money, which was brought from Tranito to Barlette, were defeated by such as Gonsalue had sent for the conduct thereof. All these petty losses were without doubt foretellings of a change of our good fortune. But what neede was there in the beginning of this so visible a Catastrophe, to hazard a fruitlesse combat, for 1503. falling to our disadvantage, it must needs greatly diminish our reputation, & make the whole nation to be scorned: although the honor & valour of a whole country consists not in the combat of a few private persons. A Trumpet returning from Barlette (where he had treated of the ransom of some prisoners) reports some speeches which he had heard to the prejudice of the French: who displeased therewith, they defie the Spaniards and Italians. Thirteen French, make offer to fight with thirteen of theirs. The field was chosen betwixt Barlette, Andrie and Quadrate. It chanced that having broken their lances, with no advantage to either party: falling to their other armes, a Frenchman overthrew an Italian, and advancing to kill him, he himselfe was slain by another Italian that came to rescue his companion. In the end, after a rough and bloody fight of some houres, the Italians (having slain many of the Frenchmens horses) remained maisters of the field and bodies, leading their enemies prisoners to Barlette.

The French defeated in combat.

Troubles by the Suisses.

While a State stands firme, every one feares to attempt against it, but upon the first disfaour every one seeks to pull a plume. Some Cantons of the Suisses seek to fish in a troubled water, and to obtaine by force, what they could not get by fauour: which was the case of Bellinzone, the which they had surpris'd in Lombardy. To this end they come before Locarne, camping towards the wall, upon that great Lake which stops the descent from the mountains into the plaine: and the other Cantons seeing the enterprise succeed well in fauour of the first assailants, run to ayde their companions, to the number of fifteen thousand. These were too many mouths in a straight & barren country, whose fury must soone faint, for want of artillery, victuals, money and horse. The Lord of Chaumont did wisely fore-see all this, who furnishing his castles, upon the mountains, & keeping his troupes in the plaine, kept this great warne from comming into open places, whilst that he assembled all the forces of Lombardy, and the allies of Bologne, Ferrare, and Mantoue. The Venetians (being required to send the succours which they were bound unto for the defence of the State of Milan) sent some companies, but so late as they were vnprofitable. Thus the Suisses wanting victuals, the French having sonke many barks which brought them provision upon the Lake, and the Suisses themselves beginning to be diuided, for that the whole gaine of of their armes redounded to them alone that possessed Bellinzone, they retired in the end, upon condition to deliuer what they had taken of the Kings, except Musogues, as not belonging to the Duchy of Milan: and Bellinzone at a certaine time.

A counterfeit peace with the Spaniards.

Thus ended this great shewe, and Philip Archduke of Austria, returning from his voyage, armed with authority from his father in Lawe, and mother in lawe, to make a peace with the King, it was concluded at Blois: That the Realme of Naples should be injoyed according to the first diuision; but Philip should keepe those Prouinces, for the which they had taken armes. That from that day, Charles his sonne, and Claude the Kings daughter, should intitle themselves Kings of Naples, and Dukes of Apulia and Calabria: and both the Kings portions should be governed in the name of the two children, untill the consummation of the marriage: when as the King should giue his part for his daughters dowry. This peace was of a happy consequence. Armes were laid aside betwixt 2. mighty Kings. It bred loue betwixt the Emperour and our Lewis: & new disseines against the Venetians: who the King desired to annoy: & it may be, the Pope (being hated of all the world) had bin forced to vndergo a Councell, a matter which he feared exceedingly. Doubtles there is alwayes an Antipathy betwixt bad Popes and good Councells. But this peace was but counterfeit by the Spaniards: yet it seemes not that Philip proceeded therein like a Foxe, considering his quiet spirit, & the alliance he made with this crowne. Lewis and Philip sent presely to proclaime it at Naples, & to command the Captaines: That attending the King of Spains ratification, & holding what they did possesse, they should abstaine to all acts of hostility. The Viceroy surceaseth: but Gonsalue had his watch-word, how elidurth he'd lobey Philip? Gonsalue answered, That untill he had receiued the same commandement fro his King & Queene, he might not lay down armes. He grew the prouder, for that the king trusting in this peace, had neglected things necessary for wars, & kept backe 30 thousand

But not ratified by the Spaniards.

A thousand foot which should haue bin imbarcked at Genes & three hundred Launces lent to that end, vnder the Lord of Peris: Contrariwise Gonsalue was newly reinterced by two thousand Laniquenets, which the Venetians (against the articles of their accord made with the King) had suffered safely to passe by their gulphes. The Viceroy (foreseeing that he must stand vpon his gard) lends for all the French companies which he had dispersed into diuerse parts, and the forces of the Countrey, except those which made warre in Calabria, vnder Aubigni: but in the assembling thereof, he gaue the first blow, to the ruine of the French, in the Realme of Naples. The Duke of Atri and Lewis of Ars a French Captaine, were ioyned together, to goe vnto the Viceroy, knowing well that Peter of Nouarre was so lodged, as he might indamage them being diuided. Lewis advertised that the Nauarrois had taken the way of Matero, to ioine with Gonsalue followed the tracke of Lewis of Ars. But it chanced at the same time that Rutiliane, (a Towne in the Countrey of Bari), being reuolted, had called backe the Nauarrois, who being vpon this occasion turned from Matero to Rutiliane, incountred the Duke of Atri, charged him, and defeated him, John Anthonie his vncle being slain, and himselfe prisoner.

The Duke of Atri defeated by the Spaniards.

And to increase these mischiefs, Freian Prouensal a knight of Rhodes, was come into the hauen of Otrante, with foure French gallies, with promise from the Venetian Magistrate, not to suffer them to be molested by the Spanish fleet, which hovered neer abouts: who entring soone after into the same port, Freian (to the end his losse should not benefit the enemies) freed his gallie slaues, sincks his gallies, and saues himselfe by land, with his people. An other iniurie, which shal greatly incense our Lewis against the Venetians. Hereafter all things fall out opposite for our men: but see, their violent heate makes them run headlong to their totall ruine. Calabria is the meanes. They had commandement from the King to temporise, and onely to keepe themselves from surpris, expecting either a confirmation of the peace, or some greater succours. But what meanes is there to temper the furious courage of the French, the enemies lying so neere them? Manuel of Benauide, having repaired his armie, and fortified it with five thousand men which Ferdinand had sent him, was ioyned vnto John of Cardone, & the two armies approached within a League and a halfe. Aubigni within Gioie: the Spaniards at Seminare. Aubigni was fortified with foure peeces of Canon, vpon the river side, whereas Gioie is seated, to hinder the enemies passage: the Spaniards being resolute to passe in, they caused their foreward (led by Manuel Benauide) to march on directly to the river, to entertaine Aubigni, who was planted directly on the other side, vnder the colour of some parle, whilst the battail, and the reereward, passed a mile and a halfe about Gioie. Aubigni discouering this cunning stratagem, flies thither in great hast, without any artillery, to charge them before they were alpassed. But it was too late: all marched in order, to help our French running thither without order, & almost out of breath. The charge was sharpe, and the issue doubtful, fighting with great obstinacie, and no man seemed desirous to turne his backe. Doubtles the full decision of controuersies approached to the confusion of our men: who being the smaller number, & having lost many in this resolute fight, they were in the end forced to giue way to the Spanish horse, and euery man to seeke for his safetie, as he could. Ambriacourt was againe taken prisoner, and some other French Captaines, with the Duke of Somme and many Barons of the realme. Aubigni saved himselfe in the fort of Angiole, but being presently beset, and vnfurnished of succours, and defence, hee was forced to yeeld himselfe prisoner. Such is the alteration of the affaires of this world. This noble and valiant Captaine, had but few yeares before, defeated Ferdinand Gonsalue, in the same place: and now by a strange alteration, he is charged, defeated, and a prisoner. Moreover, that the end of a misfortune in Calabria, might be the beginning of another in Apulia, Gonsalue being forced by famine, and pestilence, to abandon Barlette, and to retire to Trignole, a Towne betwixt Canose (where the Viceroy remained) and Barlette: The Viceroy (foreseeing that Gonsalue putt vp with this first successe, would attempt

Aubigni taken prisoner.

1503. tempt some higher enterprises) he calls vnto the Lords of Ars, Alegre, Palisse, Chanda- ou, Traian Carraciolo, and other Commanders. And as he propounded vnto them on the one side the enemies forces, growne glorious by many notable victories, and now presenting themselves to make triall of a new battaile: on the other side, their owne weake troupes, diminished, and terrefied by reason of the former disgraces, asking their aduice, whether they should accept, or flee the hazard of a battaile: many were of opinion to referre it vntill the next day, seeing there remained scarce an houre: when Alegre (in a manner alone among many) blamed the feare and cowardise of such as sought delaies. Then the Viceroy said, For my part, I am ready to fight, but I feare this brave Counsellor will repose more trust in his counsers legges, then in the valour of his arme, when it shall be needfull to fight: foretelling the issue of the fight, and the flight of Ale-
gre. He therefore purs his men in battaile, and leades the foreward, with Captaine Ars: the battaile he giues to Chandiou, and the reerward to Alegre.

It is a frivolous ceremonie to call a counsellor, and conteme good aduice, preferring opinions that doe but resemble the truth. And what reason had our men to feare from succors, hauing so many enemies in front, to hazard all vpon a shew of valour?
 Seeing the discomoditie of the way, being barren of water, and the exceeding heate beyond the ordinarie of the moneth of May, required rest. But man cannot auoid his fortune, when it approacheth he runnes after it. The Duke of Nemours takes the way to Crispino, sending some troupes before, to seize vpon the place: but the Span- iards being arrived first, lodged in certaine vineyards, & intrenched their lodging with a large ditch. The French arriving, (not able to iudge, whether those they did see before them, were all, or a part of the Spanish armie, for that the light horse led by Fabrizio Colonne, the Lances of the men at armes, & the fenel stalkes, which were very high in that Countie, tooke from them all knowledge:) did assaile the enemy with great furie. But the smoke, and dust which the Spanish Canon raised in the ayre, blinded our men, who could not come to handle blowes, by reason of the enemies trench.
 The Viceroy seeking to force them by another way, is slayne with a harguebus, extinguishing in him the name and familie of the Earles of Armagnac, and daunting the courage of the whole armie: the which by the death of their Commander presently fled, (being fauoured by the approaching night, whose darknesse couered their de-treat) preferring some from death, and others from prison.

Chandiou (otherwise called Chandenier, a gentleman of Poitou, neere vnto Niort) was likewise slaine, fighting at the same ditch: d' Ars seeing the most part of his men slaine, and that d' Alegre had fulfilled the Viceroyes prediction, cursing the wilfulness of the man, who by his contumacie, at an vnseasonable time, and vnfit houre, had made a shamefull breach in the honour of the French nation, and diuerted the Viceroy from the true meanes to make warre: in the end he saues himselfe in Venouse. Ale- gre running vp and downe, gathers vp the peeces of this shipwrecke, with the Prince of Salerno, and many Barons of the Countie, whilst that Gonsalue following his good fortune, tooke his way to Naples: at whose approach the French shut themselues vp into the new Castle: and the Neapolitains the fourteenth of May, recei-ued Gonsalue, vpon condition to maintaine them in their rights, and privileges.
Auerse and Capoue were also light in their change.

But what vrgent necessitie thrust our men into this aduenture? They had strong places enough to maintaine themselves foure or five moneths, during the which either some notable succors, or the approaching winter, might breed some alteration. Out of doubt the impaciencie of the French, (who cannot temporise) was the cause of this last losse of the realme of Naples, rather then any necessity that forced them: yet Lewis of Armagnac had equalled the reputation of the brauest Captaines that had bin long before him. When as good commanders haue managed an vnfortunate war, we must iudge modestly of the issue of humaine forces, & confesse that they haue done their duties: that others might haue incurred the like difficulties, & raise our considerations higher, to him that placeth, & displaceth kings from their thrones, as it best pleaseth his diuine

A diuine providence. The King resolved to send two mighty armies, one by sea, and the by land, to saue the castles of Naples, Caiete & some other places, which yet held good:
 and to invade Spaine with two other armies: the one in the countie of Rossillon, which ioynes to the Mediterranean sea: the other towards Fontenabie, and other places lying vpon the Ocean: and at the same instant with an army at Sea to invade the coasts of Catalgne & Valence. But whilst these were preparing, Gonsalue battered the Cittadell, and Peter of Nauarre made a myne, where hauing giuen fire, the violence of the pou-der made a breach, by the which the Spaniards (attending in battaile the issue of this stratagem) enter, some by the breach of the wall, some by scalado. On the other side the French issuing out of the new Castle, to expell them the Cittadell, the Spaniards turne head, and repulsing our men towards the ravelin, they enter pell mell with them:
 and aduancing with the same fury to the gate, they force the French to yeeld them the Castle. Very happily for the enemy, for the next day there arrived from Genes, to succour them, fixe great shippes and many other barkes, laden with victuall, armes, munition, and two thousand foote. But this was physicke after death, and the worke being ended, this army retyres towards Caiete. The Castle de l'Oeuf was taken by the like myne.

The French enioyed Caiete yet, with other places there abouts, and in Abruzzo, A- quila, the rocke of Euandre, Rossare, Matalone, with many other places belonging to the Barons of the Anguin faction: and Lewis of Ars, being with the Prince of Melfe (worthy doubtlesse of our history, seeing that Gonsalue hauing offered to leaue him his Estate absolute, if hee would ioine with the Spanish faction, hee chose rather to depart with his wife and children) being fortified in Venouse, hauing surprised and vanquished Valentine Bernaude with some Spanish troupes, he annoied the whole countie. The conclusion of this warre consisted in the keeping, or losse of Caiete: hauing a very conuenient haven for ships that came from Genes or Prouence, Gonsalue therefore bends his forces thither. But Alegre hauing drawne forth 400. Lances and 4000. foote, preferred at the battell, the which he had lodged in Fondi, Itri, Tracette, the fort Guillaume and else where, enters into Caiete, abandoning the other places to the victors discretion, to saue that which did most import: who hauing battered the wall, made a breach, and receiued great losse at two assaults, hauing intelligence of the arrivall of the Marquis of Saluce (made Viceroy by the King in the Duke of Nemours place) with fixe great Genoa Carackes, fixe other ships and seamen Gallies, followed by others, carrying a thousand foote of the Ile of Crosica & three thousand Gifcons, he retires his men to Naples, well diminished with skirmishes, assaults, and with retreat, amongst others of Sante Armentel, Alphonse Lopes, Iohn Liteftin a Germane: but about all Gonsalue grieved for Dom Hugues of Cardone and Roderike Maurice slaine with a Cannon shot.
 These small good haps were crossed by the taking of the fort of Euandre, Aquila and al other places of Abruzzo, the which drewe all Calabria to the Spanish obedience.

The King in the meane time sent seuen thousand foote, and eight hundred men at armes, commanded with the Title of Generall, by the Lord of Tremouille (who then by common consent was held one of the chief for martiall affaires: but surprised by sickness at Parma, he gaue the charge therof to Francis of Gonzague Marquis of Man- tona) and eight thousand Sussex, to the which the Florentines did adde 2. hundred Lances the Duke of Ferrare, the Bolognois and Gonzague, a hundred men at armes, and the Stennois a hundred more: the which being ioined with those troupes that were in Ca- tere, made about the number of a thousand eight hundred lances, French and Italian, and aboute eightene thousand foote, besides the army at sea, wherein were great forces. For the passage of this army by land, the King desired to bee sarified of the Popes intention, and of the Valentinois; for the Pope (who made an ordinary traffike of other mens losse and calamity) signified, that as a common father (and hee) to both parties, he would remaine a newter, suffering either of them to leaue troupes indifferently in the territories of the Church, he granted free passage to the said armie. And the Valentinois offered the king, to ioine vnto his army 500. men

 Naples.

1503. at armes, and two thousand foote, but some letters intercepted from the Valentinois to Gonsalve, discovered the very botome of his thoughts, capitulating, that Gonsalve hauing taken Caiete, and consequently all the realme of Naples, the Valentinois should seize vpon Pisa, and then ioyning their forces they should invade Tuscane. But as the Pope and his Borgia would serue two maisters, and the King pressing them vehemently to declare their mindes plainly, beheld a strange Catastrophe of the Popes Tragedy. The Pope and Borgia had before time poysoned the Cardinalls, of Saint Angelo, of Capoue, of Modena, Vrsin, and many other rich personages, whome commonly by their death they disrobed of their goods. They had likewise sworne the death of Adrian Cardinall of Cornete. They were to suppe coolely in an arbour in a garden belonging vnto Adrian: & for the effecting of their desseing, the Valentinois had sent before some flagons of poysoned wine, whereof hee gaue the charge to a grome that was ignorant of the busines, with expresse commandement, that no man should touch them. It chanced that the Pope comming before the cloath was layed, distempered with heate and thirst, called for wine.

The taster, thinking this flagon had beene especially recommended for the Popes owne mouth and his sonnes, filled of this wine to the Pope. And as he was drinking, the Duke of Valentinois comes, to whome (beeing desirous to drinke) they gaue of the same flagon. Thus Pope Alexander the 6. died the next day, the 18. of August, whose immoderate ambition, vnrestrained arrogancie, detestable treachery, horrible crueltie, vmeasurable couetousnesse, selling both holy and profane things, had infected all the world, verifying in his person: That the wicked man labours to bring forth outrage, but he shall bring forth that which shall deceiue him: hee hath made a pit, and is fallen into it. And, The eternall God searcheth out murders and remembers them. The Valentinois, through the vigor of his youth, and speedie counter poysons, (beeing put into the belly of a moyle newly killed) prolonged his dayes, to seale many deathes in his foule not dying so soone.

He had often foreseene al accidents that might happē vnto him by the death of his father, & provided remedies for the all: but he reckoned without his host, not supposing to see his father dead, & himself at the same instant in extreme danger of death. And whereas hee did alwayes presume after his fathers decease, partly by the feare of his forces, partly with the fauour of the Spanish Cardinalls, which were eleuen, to cause a Pope to be chosen at his pleasure, hee is now forced to apply his Counsell, to the present necessity. And imagining, that he should hardly at one instant withstand the hatred of the Colonnais, and Vrsins, if they were ioyntly handied against him: he resolved to trust them rather whom he had onely wronged in their estates. So restoring to them their lands and possessions, hee presently reconciles himselfe with the Colonnais, and others of their faction, who by the coming of Prosper Colonne to Rome, had already filled all the City with ieaiousies and tumults: some fearing least this reconciliation should drawe the Valentinois to the Spanish party: others apprehending the coming of the French army. Moreouer the Vrsins assembled all their partisans, and thirsting after the Valentinois blood, sought to reuenge the outrages which all their family had sustayned. So as in hatred of the deceased Pope and his sonne, they burnt all the thoppes and houses of some Spanish marchants and courtiers at Monte-Iordan. All the other Parons in the dominions of the Church, by their meanes, returned to their lands and goods.

The Vitelli returne to Citta of Castello. Iohn Paul Baillon chased from before Perouse at the first siege, returns, and by a furious assault takes it. The Towne of Plumbin receiues her first Lord. The Duke of Vrbino, the Lords of Pesere, Camerin, and Singalle are reestablished in their possessions. The Venetians assemble many men at Rauenne, and giue cause of suspect to invade Romagnia, which onely remayned vnder the Valentinois command, desyring rather to serue one onely a mighty Lord, then to haue a particular Lord in euery Towne. Notwithstanding all these disgraces, yet both the French and the Spaniard made great instance, to enterrayne him, or to winne him to their

A their party: the French, for that he might (beeing armed) crosse their passage into Italie, & hee discovered himselfe in fauour of the Spaniard, and molested them in the estate of Naples: the Spaniard, for that they desired to make vse of his fortres, and to get (by his meanes) the suffrages of the Spanish Cardinalls for the election of a future Pope. But the French armie approached Rome, and the King might hurt or helpe him, more then the Spaniard, both within Rome, and in his other Estates. He therefore passed this accord the first of September, the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin and the Lord of Trans, Ambassador, vnder taking for the King, To aide the King with his forces in the warre of Naples, and in any other enterprise against almen, except the Church. And the sayd Agents bound his maiesty, as well to protect the person of the Valentinois, as all the estates which he possessed, and to aide him to recouer those which he had lost.

The Cardinall of Amboise vpon the first newes of Alexanders death, postes thither, to labour for the Popedom, building chiefly vpon Cardinall Ascanius promises: whome two yeares before he had drawne out of the Tower of Bourges. But so many ambitious braines, fraught rather with diuisions and partialities, euery one for his owne private profit, then assisted with the holy spirit, to whome notwithstanding they gaue the first voice in their election, did in the ende frustrate both the French and Spaniard to install Francis Piccolomini, Cardinall of Siene, beeing old, worne, & sickely: to the which the whole Colledge agreed, both for that this neutrall election might dispesse the diuers pursuits of the pretending nations: as also, for that the newe Popes infirmity gaue them hope to proceed shortly, to the subrogation of another. To reuue the memory of Pius the second his vncle, who had made him Cardinall, hee was called Pius the third.

newe Pope.

Yet this election did not pacifie the troubles within Rome. The Valentinois and the Vrsins being within the walles, fortify in them selues daylie with newe companies, resolved to obtaine by force, the Iustice which their reasonable demandes could not get of the Colledge of Cardinalls, when as their Partisans were arriued. This contention did greatly trouble both the Court and the people of Rome, & did mightily preiudice the French affaires: for this vehement affection, wherewith they see the Valentinois supported by France, drew the Vrsins to the Spaniards pay, whose forces were of no small consequence for an absolute victory. But the desire the Venetians had to see the King disappointed of the Realme of Naples, and the liberty they gaue the Vrsins to leaue their pay, made the world to iudge, that eyther they had perswaded this family to the Spanish party, or at the least they had consented thereto. And this was an other cause of discontent, to be reuenged of them in time.

The Vrsins & Colonnais reconciled, ban-die against the Valentinois.

The Vrsins being enterrayned by the Spaniard, and reconciled with the Colonnais, by the mediation of the Ambassadors of Spaine, and Venice, and ioyntly resolved for a common reuenge vpon the Valentinois, they fall vpon his troupes in the suburbes: the which (beeing vnable to withstand so violent a charge) were forced to giue way vnto their violence, and the Commander to saue himselfe in the Castell Saint Angelo. E hauing likewise with the Popes consent taken the Captaines oath, to depart when hee pleased. The tumult beeing thus pacified, it gaue them free liberty to attend a newe election: for Pius nothing deceyuing their conceyued hope, of his shorthe Popedom, died the twentie sixth day after his creation. But alas, Alexander had seised but as a scourge for that great Iudge: but now hee takes his rodde in hand, to breake Italie in peeces. The Cardinall of Saint Pierre, mighty in friends, in reputation and in wealth, was chosen, the last of October, and named Iulius the second: by nature factious, and terrible, vnquiet and turbulent: but statelie, a great defender of the liberties of the Church, and a most franke receiuer of the loue and fauour of all those that might aduance him to this dignity.

Iulius the 2.
chosen Pope.

The Valentinois flight to the Castell of Saint Angelo, and the dispersing of all the troupes hee had with him, made the Townes of Romagnia (which had till then continued constant & firme in his obedience,) to call home their ancient Lords, or to embrace sundry parties. And the Venetians, good fishermen in a troubled water, aspiring

1503. aspiring to the command of all Romagnia, had seized upon the Castles of the valley of La-A monie, of the Towne of Forlimpoppe, of Rimini, Faenza, Montefiore, S. Archange, Verruque, The vsu pations of the Venetians.
Gattiere, Salignagne, Meldale, and in the territorie of Imole, Tosignagne, Solaruole, Monti- bataille, and had easily seized upon Imola and Furly, if by the new Popes complaints, (whom they had strangely discontented) they had not put their men into garrison.

The Venetian usurpations did wonderfully displease Islio. but what could he doe, being newly aduanced to the chaire, vnprovidd of forces, of money, or of any hope of succours from the Kings of France and Spaine, being not yet resolved whose En-signes to follow? To retaine (in fauour of the Church) some places which the Valen- tinis yet held, and to oppose him in some sort against the Venetians (although he loued the Valentinis heeles better then his face,) he agrees with him, that he should go to Ferrara and Imola, to receiue such forces as he could leuie. But he is no sooner parted, but a new desire of command suggests, that it should be good the Valentinis should deliuer vnto him such Castles and places as he commanded, to the end the Ve- netians should not inuade them in his absence. And to this end, he sends vnto him the Cardinals of Volterre, and Surenne. Upon the Valentinis refusal, the Pope being offended, sends to arrest the Gallies, wherein hee had imbarcked at Ostia, and causeth him to be brought from Magliana to Vatican, honoured and much made of, but safely garded. Thus you see the Valentinis power reduced to nothing, spoiled in a manner of all he had vsurped, his troupes stript by the Florentins, and himselfe at this instant so well watched, as he could not go the length of himselfe. But lets see what becomes of so many great and goodly desseignes of our Lewis. He intends not onely to recouer his losses in the realme of Naples, but also with one breath, to crosse the affaires of Ferdinand in Spaine.

The Lord of Albret, and Marshall of Gié, marched towards Fontarabie, with foure hundred Lances, among the which Peter of Foix Lord of Lantree, and the Lord of Lescun, so famous in our Historie, made first shew of their vertues, and fiew thousand foote, Gaskons and Suisses. And to make warre in the Countie of Roussillon, was sent the Marshall of Rieux, accompanied with Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, by the death of Lewis of Armagnac, the Vicounts of Paulin and Bruniquet, the Earle of Car- main, the Lords of Montaut, Terride and Negripelisse, leading eight hundred men at armes, and eight thousand foote, French, Gaskons, and Suisses. And at the same instant an armie was readie at sea to inuade the coast of Catalogne, and the realme of Valen- but he that ouergripes himselfe holds little: these were but shewes without effect. For the Lord of Albret being entred into the Prouince of Guipescos, whether that the enemies forces were greater then his, or fearing least the Castilian should be reuenged of the King of Nauarre his sonne, he retired, and went into Languedock to the Marshall of Rieux to besiege Sauflès with their ioynt forces.

But the King of Spaine, hauing assembled a great armie at Parpignan from all his realmes, and marching in person, with a resolution to raise the siege by some notable stratagem: our men finding themselves too weake, retired to Narbonne, with a success contrary to the Lord of Albons, in the yeare 1496. And the Spaniards after some roades and spoilings, on this side the mountaines, content to haue repelled the enemy, concluded a truce for fiew moneths, by the meanes of Frederick, (whom Ferdinand King of Arragon and of Castile, held in hope to restore him to his throne) and Queene Anne moued our Lewis therevnto, onely for the regarde of that which concerned the affaires of France.

By this truce, the thoughts and forces of these two Kings, are conuerted to the warres of Naples. The French armie, hauing passed the lands of Valmontone and of the Colonna, marched through the territories of the Church, with an intent to take in the Castle of Secque. Here our men receiued their first affront. Secque well assailed, F was well defended, causing our men to retire: who despairing to winne S. Germaine, take their way by the Sea coast. But the question was, how to passe Garillon, which was not to be waded through at that season. Gonsalue was incamped on the other side

A side: our French by reason of their Canon, winne the passage of the riuer, make a bridge thereon, and aduenture to passe. The Spaniards repulie them, euen to the middest of the bridge, and by the force of their shotte, force them to go to land, hauing lost fiew hundred men, French and Suisses, and some hundred drowned: the enemy two hundred, and Fabius the sonne of Paul Vrsin, a young man and of great hope.

It is a matter of dangerous consequence, to attempt to passe a riuer in the face of a mightie armie, and commanded by a discret Captaine, if they be not well fortified with trenches. This second disgrace incouraged the Spaniard, terrified our French, and made them loose all future hope. Doubtlesse the most important part of an armie, is a good commander, and commonly few doe willingly vndergo the command of a B stranger, if he be not especially fauoured by the heauens, & hath won great credit, and giuen great testimonies of his valour. Herein the Spaniards did exceed them: and this defect in the French armie, had bred great contempt of their generall: and more confusion then concord among the Capitaines. So as the Marquis of Mantoue Lieutenant for the King, cyther thinking himselfe vnfit to gouerne so great an armie, or (as San- drucourt charged him) carrying away with him the Italian forces, that the French might be so much the weaker, or for that hauing receiued this double repulse, he would no farther ingage his honour, parted from the armie, laying all the fault vpon the contumacie of the French.

All difficulties conspired their ruine, the hard season of the winter, the situation of C the moorish countie, the continuall raine and snow, want of pay, the impatiencie of the toyles of warre, and more: uer the great suffrance of the enemy, who fortified with a deepe ditch: and two bastions in the front of the enemies armie, continually garded the passage, whilest that our men wasted themselves with fruitlesse attempts, and by their vnseasonable stay, the which quailed as much the heart of their courage, as the couetousnesse of the victualers, the ordinary theft of the Treasurers, the dissention of Captaines, and the disobedience of souldiers, vsuall in troupes wanting a vigilant commander, and of authoritie, and the increase of ordinary diseases did hurt them. Being inuitoned with these difficulties, the enemy hath a new supply by Bartlemew of Alui- ano, with the rest of the Vrsins. And Gonsalue finding himselfe now to haue 900. men D at armes, a thousand light horse, and nine thousand Spanish foote, aduertised moreouer of the disorders and continuall decay of our armie, the which being stronger in cavalerie then in footmen, those being cut in peeces which they had lately left at Castle
Gaillaume, were so disperfed, as their lodging contained ten miles in circuit: a grosse error of the Marquis of Saluce, hauing an enemy in front, who could well embrace all advantages: he secretly casts a bridge ouer the Garillon, foure miles about that which our men had made at the passage of Suie, where the French kept no gard: he passeth the 27. of December in the night, and possesseth Suie. The Marquis vnderstanding that the Spaniard did passe, riseth sodenly; breakes his bridge, and causeth the armie to E march towards Caiete. Gonsalue hindres his passage by Prosper Colonne, and the light horse men, that being molested by them, they should be inforced to march the more slowly. he ouertakes them right against Scandi, and stayes them with continuall skirmishes, vntill that Gonsalue comes vpon the reereward of them. An armie that retires with feare, receiued the first stroake of death, when they are skirmished with. Our French were driuen to the passage of the bridge which is before Mole of Caiete, and whilest the Viceroy staid there to giue the Canon time to passe, the battaile and tereward of the Spaniards arriue. Bernardin Adorne, the Lords of Cramont and S. Colombe, with some Cornets of French & Italians, make it good a long time, and fauour the retreat of the foot, vntill that by the death of Adorne and many others, with the wound-F ing of S. Colombe, the rest of these horsemen seeing the troupes to haue gotten some ground, doe likewise take their way to Caiete, alwaies beaten behinde, euen vnto the head of two wayes, whereof the one leads to Itri, and the other to Caiete. Here all disband, those which are best mounted saue themselves: the slowest, the wounded, the sicke, the Canon, and the munition, remaine at the victors deuotion.

The French
defeated quine

1504.

At the same time Fabricio Colonne, (having passed the river with five hundred horse and a thousand foot) spoiled the companies of Lodowike of Mirandole, Alexander of Triunale, Peter of Medicis (who followed the French armie) retiring by sea to Caserte with many Gentlemen, and foure peeces of artillerie, their barke ouertaken with a storme in the mouth of the river, was swallowed vp in the waues, and all in it drowned. Gonsalue knew well, that so great a multitude of men being retired into Caserte, would breed a sodaine famine, and soone yeeld him the Towne. He besieged it, and our men not able to dispose themselves, to endure the tediousnesse of a doubtfull expectation of succours, made the first day of the yeare 1504. famous by this accord with him: To depart with liues and goods out of the realme of Naples, eyther by land or by sea, and that the Lord of Aubigni, and all other prisoners, should bee deliuered on either side.

The realme of Naples wholly loit by the French.

So our French are againe dispossessed of the estate of Naples, and exposed to cold, hunger, and to a long and painfull retreat, that although of so great an armie, few were slaine by the enemies sword: yet the most part of them which departed after this capitulation, found their graues in hospitalls, market places and streetes: and of such as tooke their way by sea, few suruiued long the extreame discommodities which they had endured: amongst others, the Marquis of Saluce, Sandricourt and many Gentlemen of marke. It were better to forelee all these difficulties, before wee part from our houses, then to go so farre to seeke our graues. Captaine Bayard returned, admired greatly euen by Gonsalue himselfe, hauing purchased great glory and reputation amongst the French.

The chief causes of this ouerthrow.

Doublelesse, besides the discord and bad gouernment of Captaines, the sharpnesse of the time, and impatience of our men in militarie labours: two things principally had wrested this victory from the King. The one was the long stay of his armie in the territories of Rome for the Popes death, so as winter came, and Gonsalue had leisure to practise with the Frysins before this armie entred the realme. The other was the treacherous couetousnesse and theft of the Commisaries and Treasurers, who commonly emptie the Kings coffers to fill their owne bagges, to the preiudice of the soldiers pay, and the order they should take for victuals. Iohn Herouet Treasurer, condemned of theft, was publicly executed: Alegre, Sandricourt and others, were for a time in disgrace with the King. The losse of Naples, the death of so braue a Nobilitie, the infinite numbers of men slaine in these attempts, had filled the realme and Court with great heauinesse and mourning, euery man cursing the day wherein that miserable desire to purchase new estates in Italy, had first entred into the hearts of our Kings of France. The King seeing well how much his reputation would bee blemished with strangers, and how much the losse of so flourishing an armie, would weaken his forces, was not without feare: eyther that Maximilian would alter some thing in the State of Milan: or that Gonsalue (following his course) would imploy his victorious armie to the subuersion of the sayd Duchie: and those which followed the French partie in Italy, feared least in his way he should alter the estate of Tuscane. Without doubt it was likely, that the King, wanting money, weake of men, and the French daunted in courage, and without any desire to repasse the Alpes, would without any great resistance, haue giuen place to the victors violence. But Gonsalue content with the surname of Great Captaine, which the Spanish boasting had giuen him, restrained his desires within the limits of this happy victorie. True it is, that many extremities kept him back. He did owe much vnto his armie, who made great instance to be payd, and put into garrisons. Moreouer, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, to lead his armie out of the realme, from whence the enemy was not yet fully expelled. But that which stayed the course of his prosperities, was a dangerous sicknesse, so as he could not execute any enterprize in person: he sent Bartlemewe of Aluiane, against Lewis of Aris, who during the stay of the armie vpon the bankes of Garillan, had seized vpon Troye and S. Seuer, and had put all Apulia into armes.

This stay of Gonsalue, held the rest of Italy rather in ialousie, then any way troubled it.

And

A and the Pope (forbearing yet to discouer his desseins,) laboured to get the possession of such Castles as the Valentinois held of Furli, Cesene and Bertinoire. The Valentinois was content for Cesene: but the Pope hauing sent Don Pedro d'Ouiede a Spaniard, to receive it in his name: the Capitaine of the place iudging the composition of no force, for that the Valentinois was a prisoner, caused him to bee hanged. So as the Pope, dispaying to get it without his libertie, agrees with him. That he should bee put into the Castle of Ostia, with commaundement to the Cardinall of S. Croix to enlarge him, when he had consigned the said Castles. This consignment made, the Valentinois escapes with the Cardinals permission, and retires to Naples, from whence Gonsalue sent him afterwards to Ferdinand his King, who confined him prisoner to the Castle of Medina del Campo. An act in truth vnworthy the sinceritie of a great Prince, but most worthie of this Duke, who not satisfied with the wickednesse hee had formerly done, denised anew, to trouble other mennes estates, and to sowe dissensions throughout all Italy. A prison which did greatly comfort all Romagnia, being freed from the euill spirit, which so tormented it.

The Duke of Valentino, prisoner in Spaine.

A common necessitie is vsually the mother of a peace, or truce betwixt Princes, that haue long tormented one another. Behold the Kings of France and Spaine, both wearie of warre, conclude a truce. Lewis sought it, and Ferdinand accepts it willingly, thinking by this meanes to confirme his new conquests, with more safetie, vpon condition: That it should be lawfull for the subjects of either partie, to trafficke throughout all their realmes and dominions, except at Naples. The Kings of Spaine haue alwaies treated vpon aduantage with our Kings. Gonsalue doth cunningly make his profit of this clause, placing vpon the frontiers of those places, which the French did yet possess, (as Rosane in Calabria, Oire in the land of Otrante, Venoufe, Connersan, and the Castle of Mont in Apulia) gards to watch that no man liuing should conuerse in any place that was held by the Spaniard. The which brought the inhabitants to so great a straight, as resolving to yeeld to the enemy, Lewis of Aris, was forced to retire into France.

A truce with the Spaniard.

But what auayles it to auoyd one danger, and fall into another? We haue not yet breathed from our trauels past, and see, we now studie on new iarrs, and confusions. In truth the estate of this world is like a chessboard, where Princes with a variable change, play most couerous games, sometimes with losse, sometimes with gaine: & oft times (treating with men in whome there is no trust) they fall out of one mischiefe, into a greater inconueniencie. At the same time, Ambassadors being come from Maximilian and Philippe, to confirme that which had bin propounded, by the coming of the Bishop of Cisteron, and the Marquis of Final, sent expressly by the Pope for that busines, this peace was in the end concluded: That the marriage of Claude the Kings daughter, with Charles the Arch-Dukes eldest sonne, should take effect: that all the former inuestitures of the Duchie of Milan being disannulled, Maximilian should grant the inuestiture vnto the King for himselfe, and his heires males: and for want of males, should giue it in fauour of the marriage of Claude and Charles: and if Charles should die before the consummation of the sayd marriage, to Claude and the Arch-Dukes youngest sonne, in case hee married with her: for which possession the King should pay vnto Maximilian, vpon dispatch of the letters patents, threescore thousand florins of the Rhin, and threescore thousand more, within sixe moneths after, and euery yeare, on the birth day of our Lord God, a paire of spurs of gold.

A peace betwixt the King & Emperour.

All these Princes were wonderfully incensed against the Venetians, by reason of the usurpations made by them in their estates. They make a League for their common defence, and to offend the Venetians, meaning to pull from them, what they had usurped. And for that the promises which Maximilian had vainely giuen to Lodowike were the cause to hasten his ruine: he was a meanes the King should set him at libertie, and giue him some good pension to liue withall in France. But this was a short comfort for Lodowike, whose turbulent spirit would haue practised some alteration. This capitulation being so profitable to all these Princes, the Pope being com-

A League against the Venetians.

1509. prehended therein, it was likely it should hold. But there must be stronger bands to tie it: that is, a reciprocall loue, without the which all treaties are fruitles. The end of this yeare is famous by the death of Frederike, sometimes King of Naples, the which deprived him of all his vaine hopes, to recouer his Realme of Naples, by the accord of the two Kings, and by that of Isabel Queene of Castile, a vertuous Princesse, noble, wife, and beloved of her subiects.

Frederike of Naples dies.

The yeare following, disposed the two Kings and the Potentates of Italie, to lay aside armes: Ferdinand of Aragon hauing new desseins, and foreseeing that by the death of his wife, Philippe his sonne in law would challenge the Crowne of Castile, (as hauing married the inheritrice of the said Realme) desired only to preferue the Realme of Naples, by meanes of the capitulation lately made. Our Lewis was not altogether freed from doubt, for that Maximilian delayed (according to his vsuall tediousnesse) to ratifie the peace. The Pope desired innouation, but his forces were too weake without the support of some mightie Prince. The last League had put the Venetians in alarm, hauing thereby three mightie enemies against them. To pacifie the needst, they offer vnto the Pope, to restore all they had vsurped, except Faenfe, Rimini, and their appurtenances. And the Pope knowing, that the Emperors warre against the Elector Palatin, would hinder his passage into Italie, ioyntly with the King, for that yeare, accepted the obedience the Venetians offered him, in regard of the said places, without making them any shew of a more mild and tractable disposition. The King (for the accomplishment of that which had beene treated of,) sent the Cardinall of Amboise to Haguenau a Towne of Alsatie (newly taken from the Countie Palatin) where the Emperour did solemnly sweare, and proclaime the articles agreed vpon, according to the which, the Cardinall payed halfe the money, promised for the inuesting of Milan.

The Venetians are reconciled to the pope.

New troubles in France.

During this ratification, there growes new seeds of dissention in Italie. The Cardinall Ascanius, brother to Lodowike Sforce, treated with the Ambassador of Venice at Rome, and had also (according to the common opinion) some secret intelligence with Consul. It was in shew to invade the Duchie of Milan, the which they knew to be vnturnished of French souldiers: the people inclining again to the name of Sforce: and (that which made them the more bold,) the King being surprisid with a dangerous sicknesse as the Pilifutians dispaying of his health, the Queene prepared to send all her iewels into Brittanie, if the Marshall of Gré had not placed men vpon the way to stay the: for the which, the king afterwards was as wel placed, as the Queene, by her dislike, sought to bring him in disgrace. Doubles the people should oftentimes suffer much, if their counsels were not stayed by the prouidence of God. The King recouers his health, and the Cardinall Ascanius dies suddenly of the plague, at Rome, interring with him the desseins of Milan.

Appealed by the death of Cardinall Ascanius.

The King is freed of one danger. And as God by means vnknowne of men, change the great stormes into calme sun-shines: our Lewis, who till then had the greatnesse of the Arch-Duke Philippe in iealousie, fearing to make him his enemy, hee finds now that the death of Isabelle of Castile doth free him of his feare: for that the Arch-Duke, contemning the testament of his mother in Law, deuised to take the gouernment of the Realme of Castill from Ferdinand his father in lawe, the which could not be done but by their common quarels, and the weakning of their forces, the King (remaining betwixt both, free from troubles,) should thereby fortifie himselfe, with men, money, and munition, for the aduancing of his desseins. And the Aragonis, on the other side (forced to seeke a support against his sonne in lawe,) desiring a peace with the King, hee obtaines it, by the marriage of him and Germaine, sister to Gaston of Fais, daughter to his Maiesties sister, vpon condition: That the King should giue her in dowrie that part of the Realme of Naples which belonged vnto him: the King of Spain binding himselfe to pay him within tenne yeares 7. hundred thousand ducats for the charges past: and to indow his new spouse, with 300000. ducats. Which dowrie (Germaine dying in marriage without children) should returne to Ferdinand: but

A peace betwixt the king and Ferdinand.

A but if he died first, it should returne to the crowne of France. A happy conclusion both of a peace, and of the yeare, if it could haue intainted loue betwixt these two Princes. But it shalbe soone broken, and alwayes our peace with the Spaniards hath beene full of discord.

Peace with the Spaniards pronounced to France.

Let vs now open the springs of new warres. The Pope had without the Kings priuie given all the benefices that were fallen voyde in the Duchie of Milan by the death of Cardinall Ascanius and other Clergie men. Moreouer in the creation of many Cardinalls, he had refused to admit into the society the Bishop of Auch, Nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise, and the Bishop of Batoux Nephew to the Lord of Tiemo. And moreouer hee had armed some galleys, to be in a readinesse (as some gaue out) to free Genes fro the rule of the French, in case the King died, as some feared, and other did hope. All these considerations, together with the Kings discontent, seemed to breed some diuision with the Pope: yet his friendship was profitable for the King in the warre he pretended against the Venetians, against whom he knew the Pope to be ill affected, for the desire he had to recouer the Townes of Romagna.

Notices of new troubles.

Hee therefore sent the Bishop of Cisteron his Nuntio into France: to propound vnto him many offers, and desseins, for the execution of this common enterprise. Moreouer the Pope seeing himselfe as it were forced at the Kings instance, to prolong the Cardinall of Amboise his legation in France, and for iealousie hee had that this Cardinall aspired by all means to the popedom, he could not relouie to loyne in all points with the King. But he knew moreouer that being diuided from his maiesty, his Counsellors could not succeed happily: in the ende they treat a new amity & league together, and to make the king the better affected, he giues a Cardinalls hat, to cyther of the forenamed Bishops, and power vnto the King to dispose of all benefices within the Duchy of Milan.

The Pope and King are reconciled.

The more the King confirmed himselfe in the Popes alliance, the more hee loathed that of Maximilian and of Philip his sonne: the passage which hee pretended into Italie with a mighty army to recieue his imperiall Crowne, and to cause his sonne to be chosen King of the Romans, being greatly suspect vnto the Kings: and the greatnesse of Philip (who, by capitulation had sent his Father in law Ferdinand back into Aragon) hauing already so apparently estranged the Kings loue from him, as he gaue Claude his daughter in marriage to Francis Earle of Angoulesme (the next heire to this Crowne, after the Kings discease without heyres males) at the sute & supplication of all the Parliaments of his Realme. The which serued for an excuse to Philip. And the more to diuert Maximilians passage into Italy, the King sent men to succour the Duke of Guelthes (a great enemy to Philips prosperity) and to molest his Prouinces of the Low-countries in his absence. As these things passed, the Pope burning with desire, to restore vnto the obedience of the Church, all such places as had beene taken away (intreated the King (according to their agreement) to ayde him in the recovery of Perouze and Bologne. This request was very pleasing vnto the King: it was a meanes to rye the Pope, whom they had in some iealousie in Court, to haue beene pray to some practise, which Octauian Fregose had made to dispossesse the King of the Seignury of Genes. Moreouer Bentiuole Lord of Bologne, seemed more affected to Maximilian than to him: and John Raul Baillon, the vsurper of Perouze, was in disgrace with the King, hauing refused to ioyne with his army, when it was vpon the Garillon.

Count of Perouze mortally wounded by the Earle of Angoulesme.

The King seeks by all meanes to craile Maximilian, with his sonne Philip.

Notwithstanding the protestation which the Venetians made vnto the King, To take armes for the defence of Bologne, if the Pope did not first make the graut of the rightes of Faenze belonging to the Church, did somewhat diuert him: referring the execution to another time. Yet the Pope (being vehement and peretory by nature) goes out off Rome with five hundred men at armes, and giues notice of his comming to the Bolognais, commanding them to prepare to receiue him, and to lodge 300. French Lancies in their country, whereof he had yet no assurance.

The Popes exhortation.

Then Baillon fearing his comming, goes to meete the pope, and deliuer him the torts of Perouze and Perousin. In the end by the perswasion of the Cardinall of Amboise,

1506. the King commanded Charles of Amboise Lord of Chaumont, to assist the Pope in a person with five hundred Lances, and three thousand foote: amongst the which were Gilson of Foix the Kings nephew, and Duke of Nemours: Peter of Foix Lord of Lautrec his cousin, the Lord of Palisse and others. Bentiuole and his children amazed at this sodaine arrivall, beseech Chaumont to be a mediator, and to procure them some tollerable conditions: who dealing with the Pope, obtained leave to depart safely out of Bologne, to remaine in what part he pleased of the Duchie of Milan, to sell and carry away all their movables, and to enjoy the revenues they possessed by any iust title, without any molestation. Thus Bologne returned to the obedience of the Church: and the Pope having given the Duke of Nemours a sword enriched with precious stones, amongst the which there was one Diamond of inestimable value, eight thousand Ducats to Chaumont, and ten thousand for his men: he converted all his thoughts to annoy the Venetians. At this time dyed Philip the Archduke, of a Fever, within few dayes, in the Cittie of Bourges, young of yeares, strong and healthfull of body, leaving an heire (the fatal scourge of the French Monarchie) who within few yeares shall mount vpon the Theater of our Historie, to acte many and diuers tragically parts. And the Duke of Valentinois, to finish the last acte of his Tragedie, having slipped downe with a corde from the forte of Medina de'l Campo, and sought for refuge with Iohn of Albray King of Nauarre, brother to his wife, was in the end slaine before Vienne, fighting for his brother in law: Too honorable a death for such a tyrant.

Chaumont was no sooner returned, but there sprung vp a new occasion to imploy his forces: the Genouois taking occasion, not of any desire they had to rebell, but onely of ciuill discords betwixt the people and the Nobles, (the which do often transport men beyond their first resolutions,) did sacke the Noblemens houses, and did tumultuously create a new Magistracy of eight popular men, whom, to authorise them the more, they named Tribunes of the people: they seized by force on Speite and some other Townes lying vpon the Easterne riuer. The Lord of Ransstein being absent, flies speedily to Genes, with a hundred and fiftie horse, and seuen hundred foote. The King had sent vnto them Michel Riccio, a Doctor banished from Naples, to perswade them to seeke rather the mildnesse of his mercie, then to tye the rigour of his forces. But a mutinous people is like vnto a wilde horse, which runnes furiously, vntill some downefall stay him: for instead of giuing care to his counsell, they go to besiege Monaco, lying vpon the sea, in a commodious place, and of great importance for the Cittie of Genes. they create Paul de Noue, a Dier of Silke, Duke of Genes, beate downe the Kings armes, and set vp Maximilians: they take Castellat, a Castell built aboue Genes, in the mountaine: and against their faith, cut the French mens throates that were in Garrison.

So the King imputing that to the Genouois as a rebellion, which they had done by ciuill discord, marched himselfe in person, followed by eyght hundred Lances, eightene hundred light horse, twelue thousand foote: and an armie at sea, consisting of eight Gallies, eight Galleons, and many Foists and Brigantins: he raised the siege at Monaco, takes the Bastion which they had built in the top of the mountaine, forceth the Genouois to yeld to his mercy, disarms them: & the 29. day of April, enters into Genoua, in complete armour, with his sword in his hand, vnder a Canopie, accompanied with all his companies of men at armes, and Archers of his garde: who (at the pittifull crye of the people, demanding mercy of his Maiestie) he grants them pardon, paying a hundred thousand Ducats in ready money, and two hundred thousand more to be payd at certaine dayes, for the charges of this expedition, and to build a Citadell. And in token of absolute authoritie, he commanded that the monney of Genes should from that time be coyned with the stampe of France: and then he ended all this tragedie with the death of Demetrius Iustinian, one of the chiefe Tribunes, who by his examination laied open all the prauiues and hopes the Pope had giuen them: and soone after by the death of Paul de Noue, the new Duke of Genes, with three score others, which he put into the hands of the Magistrate.

A In the meane time the Pope (who found himselfe farre engaged in the rebellion of Genes), seemed discontent: hee accuseth the King, that he had perswaded Bentiuole, anwe, to surprise Bologne, meaning to declare himselfe afterwards an enemy to the Church, and by violence to installe the Cardinall of Amboise in Saint Peters chaire, pressing the Emperour and the Venetians to make warre ioyntly against the King. Maximilian had (in a Diet held at Constance) got the content of the Princes of the Empire thereto: and the King, to preuent this storme, which threatned him from Germany, and to free both the Pope and the Venetians from ialousie, soone after the taking of Genes he dismissed his army, and himselfe had presently returned, if the desire of a parle with the King of Arragon his Nephewe had not stayed him. Sauone was appointed to that end, where having promised respectiue a mutuall preferuacion of loue and good intelligence, they treat of the reformation of the Church, by meanes of a holy and free Counsell, and to reconcile our Lewis with Maximilian, and they two assaile the Venetians with their common forces.

Moreover the Pope had sent the Cardinall of Saint Croix, for Legat to Maximilian and the Venetians, Florentins (whome the King would not receiue into his protection, against the passage of Maximilian, but with this clause, excepting the right of the Empire) and all others that depended of themselves (except the Marquis of Mantoua) had sent their Agents to this Imperiall diet of Constance, some for desire of innouation, some for hope, others for feare. Which things troubled the Kings minde: especially the Ambassage of the Cardinall of Saint Croix, whome he knewe to bee alwaies desirous of Maximilians prosperity. In the ende, the conclusion of this diet (the which the Pope attended wauering betwixt hope and feare, sometimes desiring Maximilians coming into Italy, and sometimes apprehending the memory of ancient quarrells betwixt the Emperours and Popes, was, That they should giue vnto Maximilian to follow him into Italy, eight thousand horse, and two and twenty thousand foote, entertayned for six monethes, and that the companies should be in field nere vnto Constance, by the midst of October.

Vpon this conclusion Maximilian demands passage of the Venetians, through those countries which they held in Italy. They graunt it, so as hee come without an army, D else not. But they excuse themselves vpon the necessity of the league they haue with the King, and vpon the conditions of the present time: yet notwithstanding, except that which they should be forced vnto by vertue of the said alliance, for the defence of the state of Milan, in fauour of the King: they would not oppose themselves to any of his aduancement. And in truth, being loath to offend Maximilian, or to giue the King occasion to presume too much, they did not seeke vnto him for any new alliance, hoping it may bee, that Maximilian leauing their frontiers in peace, would turne his forces either against Bourgogne, or against the Duchies of Milan and Genes.

To preuent all inconueniences, the King had sent great numbers of horse and foote towards Milan, and did leaue (with the permission of the Catholike King his Nephew) E two thousand five hundred Spaniards, five hundred Lances in Bourgogne, vnder Tremouilles command, foure hundred French Lances, and foure thousand foote, ioyntly with the Venetians, to preuent any alteration that might happen towards Trente: and to distract the Emperours forces into diuers parts, he fauored the Duke of Cueldres, who molested the Country of Charles, grand-childe to Maximilian. And to begin his voiage, Maximilian beeing come to Trente, caused a proclamation to be publicly made, the third of February: That he was resolved to passe in hostile manner into Italy. And first that time leauing the name of King of the Romans, tooke vpon him that of chosen Emperour. But this was to brag of mountaines, and to bring forth mol-hilles. He goes from Trent with fiftene hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, not of that number F which had beene promised him at Constance, but of the ordinary traine of his Court, & leaues in his owne territories, and the Marquis of Brandebourg with five hundred horse and two thousand foote. But there was no reason the seruant should be more happy then the master. The Marquis returnes, hauing only presented himselfe before Rouere,

The Pope seems discontented with the King.

An interview of the Kings of France and Arragon.

The King seeks to hinder the Emperours passage.

The vaine attempts of Maximilian.

1508. and demanded in vaine to be lodged within the towne. And Maximilian hindered by many trenches which the Mountainers of Singue had made, returned backe foure dayes after his departure. If he had gone back to take a greater leape, (as the Prouerbe saith) it had bene a good signe, but to turne his back, it was a disgrace.

Open warre.

Behold an open warre, and the Venetians are netted with these weake beginnings. But conquests of Villages, are like bonafires of Strawe. Maximilian taking the way of Friul, for the comodity of the passage, & the country being more open, with six thousand men leuiued in those marches, did tunne aboue fortie miles into the Venetian territories: hauing taken certaine villages of small moment (performing the office of a simple Captaine, rather then of an Emperour) he returned towards Tuspruch, to engage some Jewels, and to make prouision of money by some other means. which failing, had caused eight thousand Swisses to leaue his pay, whereof five thousand went to the King, and three thousand to the Venetians. And to increase the mischiefe, Maximilian had left nine thousand foote and horse at Trente. Earle meu of Aluiane (sent by the Venetians to succour Friul) seized vpon the passages of the Valley of Cadore, by the which the Germaines might saue themselves: he charged them, slew aboue a thousand, and tooke all the rest (in a manner) prisoners. So the careful valour of Aluiane made vaine the former exploits of Maximilian.

Poon, Swisses forsake the Emperour.

Maximilians forces defeated.

It is all one to be well or ill beaten. The Venetians put in practise this common saying, not without some offence to the King, who did not willingly behold the prosperous course of their victories, in regard of his owne desseins. They were forced to take armes, and before they lay them downe, they take from the Empire Trieisle, Portonon, and Fiume: then passing the Alpes, Possena. On the other side, the Germaine armie towards Trente, had put to sword three thousand Venetian foote, set to garde mount Bretonic. The Bishop of Trente encouraged by this small stratagem, with two thousand foote, and some troupes of horse, went to besiege Rine Trente, a great bough vpon the Lake of Garde: but as he did batter it, two thousand Grisons, which were in the Germaine Campe, fell into a mutinie by reason of their pay, and spoile the victuals of the whole Campe. So all being in disorder without respect of command, and without obedience, the Grisons being gone, all the rest of the armie (being about seven thousand men) were forced to retire. Thus ended all these great shewes, and Maximilian hauing rashly giuen credit to the Popes suggestions, reaped nothing for his indiscretion, but shame, losse, & contempt. Being thus perplexed, he seeks to withdraw himselfe out of the country, and finding the Venetians well disposed to make an end of this warre, and to preferue (by means of a truce) the places which they had conquered in these garboiles: he easily obtaines a truce for three moneths, where by they laid downe armes, to resume them soone after, but with more dangerous effects. This was the xx. day of April. In corrupted bodie, the remedies we apply to diuert one inconuenience, do commonly ingender another, more dangerous. So the truce (made betwixt Maximilian & the Venetians, wherein they had exceedingly neglected the King) in stead of quiet and rest which they expected, bred more horrible calamities then the former warres. The Venetians sought it by their insolent manner of proceeding. The Emperour studied by what means he might repaie the infamie and losse he had newly received: and now they incense him more, receiving Aluiane into Venice, in a triumphing manner. And the King found himselfe much wronged, for that presuming to name him in this truce, and to comprehend him as an adherent, they had notwithstanding provided for their owne safetie, and left him charged with the cares and troubles of the warre: seeing that in their fauour he had opposed himselfe against Maximilian, as we haue seene. The Emperour being then so weakly assisted by the forces of the Empire, and finding his owne too feeble, deuised to vnite himselfe with the King against the Venetians, as the onely remedie to recover both his estates and his honour lost.

A truce betwixt the Emperour and Venetians.

New motives of warre.

Moreover, this new disdaine reuiued in the King the ancient remembrance of the wrongs he had received by them in the warres of Naples, and since in diuers other accidents: thrust forward with an exceeding desire to wrest out of their hands Perona, Crimona

A Cremona, and many other townes possessed of long time by the Dukes of Milan. And the Pope crossing them, possessed with that first desire to recouer those places which they vsurped of the Church, taxing them that the banished men of Furle had of late dayes, by means of their Senate, sought to enter into the said towne: discontented moreover, that the Venetians had, in contempt of the authority of the Romane Court, given the Bishopricke of Vidence, to a Venetian Gentleman, contrarie to the collation which the Pope had made to his Nephew Sixtus, he perswaded the King against the desiring rather to remaine a newt in the midst of these contentions, & be a spectator, then to inuade. In the end, (vnder a colour to treat a peace, betwixt the Archduke Charles, sonne to Philip, & the Duke of Guilares): they must meet at Cambraie. For the King, came the Cardinall of Amboise: and for the Emperour, Marguerit his daughter Gouverneste of Flanders, assisted in this treaty by Matthew Lange, a trusty Secretary to the Emperour: and for the King of Aragon, an Ambassador of his. The 9. of Decem- ber they conclude a peace betwixt their Masters, and a perpetuall league against all men, euenly one to recouer from the Venetians the places which they had taken from them, and to spoyle them of the territories of the Church vsurped by them: what sooner we treat, the Church must be one, but more with a colour, then any deuotion.

A league betwixt the French King, the Emperour, & Ferdinand against the Venetians.

The Emperour did solemnly confirme this new league, if the Aragonais feared the increase of the King his Vnckles greatness, and preferred the safety of the realme of Naples before any thing which the Venetians enioyed: yet dissembling his conceits he performed all solemnities required. The pope was more scrupulous: hee had sent his commission, but had not yet consented. Many considerations moued thereunto: a desire to recouer the Townes of Romagna, and a disdain against the Venetians. Moreover he feared to incense the King, rejecting this association: yet he held it a very dangerous thing for him, that the Emperour should extend himselfe in Italy. Thus troubled in mind, he resolues, for the mildest course, to obtaine a part of his desires by an accord, rather then all by warre. He lets the Venetians vnderstand, that the storme which threatened them by the vnion of these princes, would proue farre more tempestuous, if they forced him to giue his consent. That yeelding willingly the places they had taken from the Church, it should make him refuse to ratifie the treaty of Cambraie, made in his name, but without his approbation: without the which their alliances would easily turne to smooke, if they refused, he would pursue the with spirituall and temporall armes. Oft times, those which haue the name, the age and countenance of wiser men, conclude to the ruine of their country. The Venetians at this time followe the worst aduice. And the Pope ratifies the treaty the which he had deferred vntill the last day assigned for the ratification. The King armes and passeth the Alpes in person, followed by the Princes of his blood, Charles of Bourbon Earle of Vendosme, Charles of Fourlon afterwards Countesse of France, sonne to the Earle of Montpensier, Lewis of Fourlon, Prince of Roche-sur-Yon, René Duke of Alençon, and his sonne Charles the Duke of Longueville, Gaston of Foix Duke of Nemours, Peter of Foix Vicount of Lantree, Lewis of Tremouille Vicount of Thouars, the Earle of Montmorencie grandfather to the Constable that now liues; the Lords of Palisse, Andouins, Grandmont, Curton, Boissi, Coligni, Ejouteville, and almost all the Nobility of France, which followed (as to a certaine victory) their King, and so many braue and generous Princes, with ioy and courage, amounting to forty thousand fighting men, besides three thousand horse, & six thousand foote, which Chaumont brought out off the Duchy of Milan, and the troupes of Anthony Duke of Lorraine, who accompanied his Maestie in this voiage. The King hauing passed the Alpes, sends Montjoye his Herald presently to proclaime warre against the Senate of Venice. And for that the Pope complained that the time specified in the capitulation expired without any effects of warre, the King commands the Lord of Chaumont to begin.

The Pope enters into the league. The King goes into Italy.

He thereupon passeth the riuer of Adde, the 15. of Aprill, and camps before Treui, battes & forceth it to yeeld at discretion, taking prisoners Iustinian Morosin, Comisary of the Venetian Stradiots or light horse, Visselle Cita de Castello, Vincent de Nalde, &c.

1509. other Senators, and with them a hundred light horie, and a thousand foote. then he repasseth Addé, to attend the Kings coming at Milan. The Emperour was gone into Flanders, to require a leuying of money, from the subjects of Charles his grandchild: a testimonie that he could not begin the warres within fortie dayes after the King, as his promise was.

The Venetians prepared, and seeing a great part of Christendome armed against them, they seeke to dissolue this vniō by reasonable offers. But the Pope could no more accept that which he had before desired. The Catholike King had not credit enough to diuert the rest. The Emperour full of disdain, would not so much as see John de Essoille their Secretarie. As for our Lewis, they hoped for nothing from him, but by the sword. They therefore entertaine two thousand men at armes barded, foure fighting men for euery Lance: three thousand light horie and Stradiots: fiftene thousand foote, of the flower of Italie, and fiftene thousand others chosen out of their territories: they arme many vessels to garde the bankes of Romagnia, the Townes of Apulia, the approaches of the Lake of Garde, Po, and other neighbour places, fearing to be molested by the Duke of Ferrare, and the Marquis of Mantoua their enemies. But behold bad signes, and prodigious fore-runners of losses, wherevnto (besides the threats of men) the Venetians shall be shortly subiect. A Barke carrying ten thousand Ducats to Rauenna, was drowned. The Castle of Bresse was fiered with lightning, the place where the Charters of the Common-weale did lye, was sodenly ruined. And that which did most terrifie them, their great counsell being assembled, fire tooke their Arceball, whereas the Salt-peter did lye, and burnt twelue gallies, with a great quantitie of munition.

Farall prognostications for the Venetians.

The Venetians censured by the Pope.

Moreouer hauing entertained Iulius and Rancevrsus, and Troile Sauelle, with five hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote: the Pope commanded them vpon greuous censures, (as defendants of the Church) not to depart out of Rome. And presently did publish in forme of a monitorie, a horrible Bull, containing: *The usurpations the Venetians had made in the sea of Rome: the authoritie they did arrogate to the preiudice of the Ecclesiasticall libertie, and the Popes iurisdiction. To giue Bishopricks and other spirituall luings being vacant: To decide spirituall causes in secular Courts, and other things belonging to the censure of the Church: specifying moreouer, all their disobediences past, and admonishing them: To yeeld up within 24. dayes next ensuing, the townes of the Church which they possessed, with the fruites receiued since they enioyed them, vpon paine to inturre, not onely the censures and curse of the Cittie of Venice, but also of all the territories vnder their obedience, and of all others that should receiue any Venetian, declaring them guiltie of high Treason, and detested as perpetuall enemies to all Christians, to whom he gaue power to take their goods in all places, & to make their persons slaues. Against this Bull, they cast forth a writing about Rome, containing (after a long protestation against the Pope and our Lewis) An appellation from the monitorie, to the next Council, and for want of humane Iustice, to the seate of Iesus Christ, a most iust iudge, and the Soueraigne Prince of all.*

The Venetian armie being assembled, made their beginning famous by the recouerie of Trent, after the retreat of Chaumont. But it was famous to the Conquerour: for during the heate of the spoile, the King (who came to releue it) passed the ruer of Addé with his whole armie, without any let, the 9. of May. And Trinuice seeing the armie past: This day (sayd he) O most Christian King, haue we wonne the victorie. The King lodged within halfe a league of the Venetian Campe, and (holding it more glorie, if of himselfe, without the assistance of any other, he ended this warre,) he drew the enemy by all meanes to the combate. The enemies desseigne, was to keepe themselves close in places of strength, to aye the necessitie of fighting, and to keepe the French from attempting any matter of importance. So both armies continued a whole day, one in view of an other. The next day, the King stood foure houres before the enemies lodging, with his troupes in battaile, and tooke Riuolté, in their view, without making any other shew, then to want courage to come to the fight. Necessitie must

A must then force them to it. hunger driues the Woolfe out off the wood. The king (to cut off the vitrells that came to them from Cremona & Crema, raiseth his campe, to lodge at Vailé or Pandin: and the Venetians (to ingage their enemies in the like difficulties,) resolute to follow them at the heeles; and alwayes to lodge in places of aduantage. There were two wayes to the said places. The one was longer and lower, which going bias against the ruer of Addé, was in forme like a bow: the other shorter and higher, but straight as a line. The King takes the lower, the enemy the higher, Chaumont led the forward of the French, Aluiane the Venetian. They approach neere vnto Agnadel, when as Aluiane being forced of necessity to fight, plants six peeces of artillery vpon the cauffie of a brooke which was then almost dry, which parted the two armies, and his foote in the vinyardes adioyning to it, and comes resolutely to charge our forward. The combate was long and doubtfull: for that, by reason of the stocks and branches the French horie could not fight commodiously. And now the Suisses begin to waue: when as the King sending Charles of Bourbon to encourage them, and aduancing himselfe with his battaile into a more large and open place, hee redoubled the shock, fauoured by his artillery: the which the enemy could not discouer by meanes of certaine small trees and bushes. So as after a resolute fight of eyther side, about three houres, the Kings presence not suffering any one to faint, and the Suisses returning to their first heat, the Venetians wonderfully spoyled by the horie, and Cannon, and hindered by the raine and haile which beat in their faces, began to yeeld both in courage and force: and finally resoluving to sell this victorie to the French very deare, sayling rather in force then courage, they desired rather to loofe their liues, then their honours, by turning of their backs.

The Earle of Pestilano (with whom was the greatest part of their forces, incoun-tered with a squadron of their owne men flying, greued that Aluiane had contrary to his aduice, presumed to fight: and thinking that his indeauours would preuaile little to obtaine the victorie) he desired rather to saue the rest of the armie, then to see all lost by the rashnesse of an other. The Earle of Bernardin du Mont, was slaine, and some men at armes, & about ten thousand foote. Bartholomew of Aluiane was prisoner, and hurt in the eye, & twenty peeces of great artillery lost. Of the French, no men of mark: but some five hundred foote were slaine. The King caused the dead to be buried, and for a trophie he built a Chappell in the place of battle, the which he named S. Mary of Victory. So ended the battell of Agnadel, or Guiradaddé, or (as others call it) of Vailé, the 15. of May.

This happy victorie purchased the King the next day, Carravage, and then Bergame, Bresse, Crema, Cremona, Pisqueton, Pesquiere, and other places, whereof the King would not accept one, but vpon condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen, that were within any of them, should yeeld themselves prisoners vpon ranfome.

On the other side, the Pope with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light hories, eight thousand foote, and the artillery of the Duke of Ferrare, tooke Cerite, Solara, Basquille, all Valdelamone, Granarole, all the Townes of the territory of Faenze, Ruffi, Rauenna, Imole, and all the Townes of Romagnia, but more through fauour of the Kings victorie, then by his owne forces. The Marquis of Mantoua recouered Asole and Lunato, which the Venetians had vsurped from John Francis of Gonzague his great grandfather. And the Duke of Ferrare, Polesine of Rouigne. In Istria, Christopher Frangipani invaded Pisante and Diutnie.

The Duke of Brunswike entring into Friul, for the Emperour, tooke Feltre. Bellone, Triefté, and then Verona and Padoua returned to the obedience of the Empire. The Earles of Lodron seized vpon some Castles and villages in their iurisdiccions, and the Bishop of Trent, got for his share, Riue de Trente, and Agresse. The King of Arragon making his profit of an other mans paines and charge, recouered Brindes and Tarentum. So euery one pulling his plumes, the Crowe (according to the Pro-uerbe) remained almost bare. Such are the fruits of a battell wonne in a Country not fortified.

is surprized by
the Venetians.

This check had abated the naturall pride and haughtinesse of the Venetians, but their ruine toucht the hearts of the Italians diuerly. Some were well pleased, for that without any obseruation of faith or equitie, (thrust on with an insatiable ambition and couetousnesse,) they made profession to seize vpon ail, that opportunitie offered them. Others began to sigh, lamenting the generall calamitie of Italie, ready to yeele to the seruitude of a stranger. The Pope was one of the first that grieved at this great fall: and fearing the Emperours power and the Kings, he deuised how to cross their affaires, and to take from them all meanes to ruine this common-weale, the ancient fear of I bertie. He accepted of the Venetians Ambassage and submission, and reuoked the sentence by the which they were excommunicate. The which gaue them a beginning of hope: but more when they see the King content to haue recovered his owne, and not to exceed the limits of the capitulation of Cambray. And that which reuiued their spirits, certaine banished men, newly restored at Treuisse by the Venetians, to make the memory of this benefite famous, troupe together, plant the banner of S. Marc in the Market place, and expell Leonard of Dreßine, who without any armes or force, had receiued the City in the Emperours name: they bring in seuen hundred Venetian foote, and consequently, all the forces they had assembled in Sclauonia, and Romagnia.

Without doubt Treuisse alone repaired the Venetians honour: and the chiefe cause of this accident, as also to put the Venetians in more hope, was the negligence and ill gouernment of the Emperour, who during the course of so many victories, had made shew but of his name onely: and these importune delayes had caused the King to take his way towards Milan, to returne speedily into France. The Kings dislodging of his armie, gaue courage to the Venetians to recouer Padoua, which they knew to be furnished of men for the defence thereof. Andrew Gritti one of their Commissaries, had assembled two thousand men of the Country, with three hundred fouldiers, and some horse, and finding by chance the port of Codalungue halfe open, by reason of some Carts laden with Haye, that were lately entred: he seized thereon without noise, and kept it, untill the companies lead by the Cheualier Volpe, Titole of Perouse, and Lußana of Bergamo were arriued, who held it almost an houre before that any alarme was giuen in the Towne. This reprisall made the way to recouer Legnague, a very commodious towne, to annoy Vinence and Verona.

One of the ancients sayd, that we must reuerence fortune, else she will shew herselfe terrible. Hereafter she leaues the Emperour, and returnes to the Venetians. The Marquis of Mantona lodged in the Isle of Escale, in the countrie of Verona, attending the preparatiues which the Bishop of Trente, gouernour of Verona made, to besiege Legnague. Luc Maluezz, with two hundred light horse, and Titole of Perouse, with eight hundred foote, and fiftene hundred of the country, besides the garrison of Legnague, entering one morning into the said Ile, surprized the Marquis his troupes sleeping, spoile them, leading the Marquis with his Lieutenant Boissi (nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise) prisoners: leaving a lesson to commanders in the warre, to be vigilant, to weigh their owne forces, and not to contemne their enemies. On the other side, the Venetians in Friul recovered Valdefere by force, Bellone by composition, and fortified themselves in the Vincentin, by the taking of many places, as of Serauale, a passage of great importance, the which Maximilian recovered soone after, with the like crueltie vpon the Italians, as the Italians had vsed vpon the Germanes, at the taking thereof: for hauing not yet assembled sufficient forces to go to field, they make small attempts, besieging now one bourgh, then another, with small honour and reputation, for the qualitie of an Emperour: solliciting notwithstanding all his confederates, to vnite their forces for the taking of Venice. But who should haue reaped the profit? The Pope would not haue the Emperour nor King possesse it: and the Catholicke King detested this enterprize as vniust and dishonest, moued therevnto, not with the loue of vertue, but with enuie, the which he bare to the greatnesse of our Lewis his vnkle, who he thought should haue the greatest benefit by this conquest.

The siege of Padoua.The Empe-
rours army

Whilst that the Emperour filled all Italy with a vaine feare of his forces, hee sent the Prince of Anhalt with ten thousand men into Friul, who at his entry tooke Cadore with a great butcherie of those that defended it: and the Duke of Brunswike, whome the Emperour had likewise sent, did put to route eight hundred horse and siue hundred foote, which John Paul Gradenc, Commisarie of Friul, brought to the succour of Cintra of Austria, which the Germanes besieged. Christopher Frangipan did also defeat the Venetian officers followed by the forces of the Country, hee wasted the Countrie, and seized vpon Chasteanneuf, Fiume and Rasprach. And the Venetians sending Angelo Treusan Generall of their army at sea thither, recovered Fiume and Rasprach. To conclude: by sundrie prizes, and reprises, mens goods and liues were continually in prey.

The Emperour hauing now assembled all his forces, prepares for the siege of Padoua. Besides the forces of the Empire, he had seauen hundred French Lances, commanded by the Lord of Palisse: two hundred men at armes, which the Pope had sent him: Two hundred more from the Duke of Ferrare, vnder the command of the Cardinall of Esse: six hundred men at armes. vnder diuers Italian Captaines, eightene thousand Lansquenets: six thousand Spaniards: six thousand aduenturers of diuers nations, and two thousand foote, which the sayd Cardinall brought vnto him for the Duke with so wonderfull a preparation for peeces of battery and munition, as the issue of this siege held all Italie in suspence. The Emperour had already taken Limini, neere Padoua, by force, when as there chanceth a signe of happy successe for the Padouans and Venetians. Philip Rosse, and Frederick Gonzague of Bessole, went with two hundred light horse, to gard the artillery that came out of Germany. siue hundred horse issuing out of Padoua, hauing intelligence thereof, charge them in the night, defeat them siue miles from Vinence, and take Philip Rosse.

And in exchange, Maximilian hauing extended his companies about twelue miles off from Padoua: to be assured of the commoditie of victuals and pasture, takes by assault and sackes the bourg of Esse, Montselice and Montagnane, ouerthrowes three thousand peasants at the bridge of Bouolente, and carries away a great prey of cattle, which they had gathered together: at length after many delayes (which gaue the Padouans Dyleture to fortifie and furnish themselves with victualles) hee is planted before the Towne walles, the fiftene day of September.

As for the defence of Padoua, the Venetians had furnished it with six hundred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, & fiftene hundred Stradiot, or Albanais, commanded by Captaines of great experience, the Earle of Petillane, Bernardin of Montone, Anthony Pie, Luc Maluezz, John the Gre, and twelue thousand choise foote, vnder the charge of Denis de Nalde, Titole of Perouse, Lactance of Bergamo, Saccocio of Spolite, and many other of meaner qualitie, and ten thousand foote Sclauones, Creskes and Albanais. And why should not two and twentie thousand foote, and three thousand six hundred horse defend Padoua, with that multitude of Venetian youth, who (to make proofe of their valour and piety to their countrie) had willingly thrust themselves into the Towne, seeing they could not haue forced them in field, within any small trench? Padoua was furnished with great store of all kinde of artillery, victualles, and a great number of peasants, who continually labored in the fortifications.

The fortifications of Pa-
doua.

The ports and other fir places were furnished with bastions without, and cuier vault vnderneath full of barrells of poulder, to blowe vp such as did assaile them. And within round about the Citie a palisado, or fortification of piles, trees and peeces of timber, fortified with a deepe ditch sixteene fadome broade: thanked with Cafemats and small Towers full of artillery: and behind the ditch a rampart of the same breadth, round about the Towne, except some places where they could not plant any artillery, and before the rampart, a parapect of seauen cubits high, to couer them that should defend the ramparts.

Behold all the Imperiall army is now planted before Padoua: but this was not to attempt

1509. tempt a Towne besieged, but rather an army camped in a Towne which made against an army, holding the field. The artillery thunders eight dayes together, and pretailes so much, as it seemes they neede not to shoot any more. They giue an assault to the bastion, at the point of the port of Cadaluigne.

The Spaniards and Languenets (seconded by some men at armes on foote) winne the bastion, and plant two ensignes: but both the fortresse of the ditch, the valour of the defendants, the abundance of instruments for defence, artillery, stones, artificers, and all other kind of offensive armes, force them to abandon it in hast, many remayning dead or wounded: so as the army being ready to assaile the wall (the bastion being won,) he retired and disarmed without any farther attempt. Maximilian despairing of victory by these preiudiciall beginnings, after seauenteene dayes (seeing rayseth his campe, and passing in his retreat by Vinence and Verona, receiues their oath of fidelity: he then dismisseth almost all his army, and tooke the way to Trente, determining to make a truce with the Venetians for some monethes. But growne proud with this prosperity, seeing his associates to aide him so coldly, and supposing that a surceasing of armes would be preiudiciall vnto them, they prepared to recouer Vinence, Citelle, Bassan, Monfalcone, Montagnagne, Esse, Polesine, & in the end to make warre against the Duke of Ferrare.

But he that vndertakes too much, repents sometime. Desire of reuenge is a dangerous Counsellor, and the resolution not to endure a wrong eyther done, or pretended to be done, grounded rather vpon passion then reason, is commonly the cause of the Authors ruine. Alphonso Duke of Ferrare recouering of Polesine, had (in hatred of the Venetian name) wonderfully spoiled the gentlemens houses of the Country: heerecained the Towne of Esse from Maximilian in fee, and Montagnagne in mortgage. The Venetians (building the motives of their disdain thereon) send their Generall Angelo Treuisan with seauenteene galleys, and a great number of other smaller vessels, towards Ferrare, and a good number of horse by land, to second their army at sea: the which being entred into the riuer of Po, and hauing burnt Corbole, and some other villages neere adioyning, they spoiled all the Country, euen vnto the Lake of Scure, and without difficulty recouered all the territory of Polesine. To withstand these violent courses, the Ferrarois plants his artillery vpon the bankes of Po, to stop the passage of this army, and forceth Treuisan to cast anchor in the midst of the water, behind a small Island right against Pulicelle: a commodious place to molest the Ferrarois, and there hee fortifies himselfe with two bastions vpon the bankes, the one on the side of Ferrare, the other opposite, whilst that other vessels assaying the Duke of Ferrare Country in an other part, take Comache.

The Duke strengthened with a hundred and fiftie Lances, which the Lord of Chivillon brought him, & two hundred men at armes, which the Pope sent him, (discontented that the Venetians had inuaded this Duchie, without respect of the superiority which the Church hath ouer it) fauored with the knowledge of the Country, and the nature, and opportunity of the riuer, hauing brought his Cannon to the banke opposite to the enemy, being couered with a strong causey, after an assault giuen to the bastion, where his men had the worst, hee saluted the Venetian shippes so furiously, as some not able to resist, yeelded: others fiered with the shot were miserably burnt with the men that were in them: others sinking, escaped the enemies hand, and the generall saved himselfe by flight in a Cock-boate, his galley flying, shooting and defending it selfe, was in the end suncke.

To conclude, the riuer being full of blood, fire and dead men, fiftene galleies came into the Dukes power, some great shippes, many foistes, and other small vessels in great number: threescore ensignes taken, and two thousand men slaine. This army defeated, Alphonso sent presently Hippolite Cardinall of Esse his brother, against that army which had taken Comache: but the losse of the other hauing forced them already to retire, the Cardinall employed his forces to recouer Lorete, which the Venetians had fortified.

This

A This done, the Pope desirous to tie the Duke of Ferrare vnto him, to the end that acknowledging the good he should receiue by his intercession, he should depend more vpon him, then on the King, against whome he layed the foundation of great hatred, was a meanes the Venetians should yeeld Comache to the Ferrarois, and should no more molest his estate. And to reconcile them with Maximilian, he sends Achilles de Grassi, Bishop of Pesere, his Nuncio vnto him. But through the Emperours excessiue demands, and the Kings Ambassadors crossing it, Achilles returned without effecting any thing.

The season made them proceed coldly in matters of warre, vntill the end of this year. Maximilian and Ferdinand had contended before the King for the gouernment of the realme of Castile: the first for Charles his grandchild, the second building vpon B his wifes testament, as we haue seene before. In the end, the Cardinal of Amboise, (not considering how much this accord did preiudice the Kings affaires) drew Maximilian to content, that the Catholike King, in case he had no heires male, should be gouernor of the realmes of Castile and Naples, vntill that Charles his grandchild should come to the age of fiftie and twentie yeares, and should pay vnto the said Charles fortie thousand ducats yeerely, fiftie thousand to Maximilian at one payment, and should ayd him according to the treaty of Cambray, to recouer that which belonged vnto him. A match which gaue courage to Ferdinand to incounter the Kings greatnes: the which, in regard of the realme of Naples he alwaies feared. Doubtlesse ambition did so blind the eyes of this good Cardinall, as hee could no more discouer this grosse policie, then C foresee that death prepared him a bier in stead of a Pontificall chaire. In the end of this year died the Earle of Petillane, Generall for the Venetians, old and of great experience in martiall affaires.

Although they proceed slowly in matters of warre, yet Princes mindes were disquieted with many distemperatures, especially the Emperours, who despairing to get the victorie of the Venetians by his owne proper forces, perswaded the King to attempt the recouerie of Padoua, Vinence and Treuisse, receiuing a sufficient recompence. The King knew well, that whilst the Venetians possessed a foote of land, he should still be compassed in with continuall charge, and dangers. But hee was diuerted from repassing of the mountaines, by the sicknesse of the Cardinal of Amboise. D to whom onely hee committed all his affaires: fearing likewise, least a new armie should wholly withdraw the Popes affection, who long before deuided, by what means he should disloodge the French out off the Estates of Italie, and fearing (as we haue said elswhere) least the King (being armed) should dispossesse him of his chaire, to placethe Cardinall of Amboise in it, hee labored to draw the English from the Kings friendship: he practised to ioyne with the Suisses, by meanes of the Bishop of Sion, to the preiudice of his Crowne, and protected the Venetians.

In truth, we may behold three Princes act three diuers personages vpon this theatre. The King of a faithfull alitie: the Emperour of a weaker: and the Pope of a d. f. loval. In the end, the King (the better to supplie the affaires of Italie) goes to Lions, with an intent to pacifie the Pope, or at the least, to keepe him from being his enemy. To this end he sends Albert Pie Earle of Carpi, with commission to offer the Pope both the Kings forces and authoritie in all occasions, to impart vnto him the affaires that were now handled. The requests which the Emperour made vnto him, and to leaue it to his discretion, to passe or not, into Italie: were not these sufficient submissions, to pacifie any discontented mind?

Contrariwise, Julius receiued the Venetians into fauour, and the foure and twentieth day of Februarie gaue them full and absolute remission. Hee still solicits the English to take vpon him the title of Protector of the sea of Rome, against the King of France, against whome (sayd hee) if hee made warre, many others (to whom his power was odious) would take armes. But hee drew the Suisses with more efficacie to the protection of the Church, paying a thousand florins yeerely to euery Canton. The boldnesse and presumption wherewith they refused to re- nue their alliance with our Lewis (but vpon condition to augment their pensions) Pope,

1510. had justly displeased the King: but this vnseasonable repulse shall proue very preiudiciall to this Crowne. The King in exchange allies himselfe with the Valaisans and Grisons, who bind themselves to giue passage to his people, and to deny it to his enemies, and to serue him for pay, with such forces as they could make. The Pope fortified with this new alliance, bends all his thoughts to support and raise the Venetians, to reconcile them to the Emperour, and by their rising to pull downe our Lewis.

But the Popes alienation serued only to kindle new fires in Italie. The Emperour and the King discontent with the shewes, which the Pope made in fauour of the Venetians, vnited themselves more strictly together: and the Duke of Ferrare gaue the King occasion to aduance his forces, for the protection of his estate: for the Duke hauing set an impost vpon all the marchandise that passed by the Poto Venice, the Pope commaunded him to free it, as not being in the disposition of the vassall to impose tribute without the libertie of the Lord of the fee. And in case he disobeyes, he denounceth warre against him. The Duke thus threatened, flies to the King, who had before taken him into his protection, giuing thirtie thousand ducats, his estate also importing the King much for his affaires of Lombardie: yet loth to contend with the Pope, for the Duke of Ferrare, he propounded conditions, whereby the Pope might rest satisfied of the interests, which the Church, and hee, pretended against the Duke. In the end, as the Pope (the more he sees himselfe fought vnto) shewed greater signes of bitterness, the Lord of Chaumont enters into Italie with fiftene hundred Lances, and tenne thousand foote: to whom the Duke of Ferrare sent two hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and two thousand foote. At their first landing, they take Polesine Montagnagne, and Esse. Then the Prince of Anhalt, Lieutenant to the Emperour, parting from Verona with three hundred French Lances, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand Lansquenets, ioyned with Chaumont, and ioyntly together, they march against Vincence.

The Vincetians abandoned by the Venetian armie, which retired towards Padua, flee to Chaumont: to obtaine some reasonable conditions of the Prince, who wonderfully moved with their rebellion, would not receiue them with any other condition, but to haue their goods at pleasure: and their liues saved. These victories were fruitlesse, without the taking of Legnague: the which the riuer of Adice diuides into two parts, whereof the lesse is called Porto. This riuer is diuided into many branches: about Legnague, passing the last branch, they incounter some footemen, set to gard Porto. Our men charge them, repulse them, kill a great number, chase the rest, and enter pelmet with them into Porto. The taking of Porto made the meanes easie, to batter the Towne on either side the riuer, for the effecting whereof Chaumont sent Captaine Molare with foure thousand men, and sixe peeces of artillerie, who hauing in a manner battered downe the bastion, which was vpon the cause, at the point of the Towne, the Venetian Comissarie retired himselfe into the castle, and the Captaine which commanded the bastion, yielded to depart with bag and baggage. The bastion taken, the Towne was sackt by Molare, and the Castle battered, yielded the next day, vpon condition, that the Venetian gentlemen remayning Chaumonts prisoners, the souldiars should depart with a white fluke in their hand. At this time died the Cardinall of Amboise, vnlike to the Lord of Chaumont, a man of a great spirit, and long experience in affaires, but with the seruice of his master, he did not forget the content of his owne priuate ambition.

Ciuitelle, Marosique, Basiane, Feltre, P'Escale, and other places there abouts (abandoned by the Venetians) opened their gates vpon vew of the Canon. To conclude, all places wheras the armies passed were exposed to takings, & retakings, sackings, and burnings: and all persons were at the victors mercie. Monfelicie remained yet. The Towne is seated in a plaine, and the Castle on the mountaine compassed in with three wals, wherof the lower required two thousand men, for the defence thereof. By reason then of a new conuention betwixt the King and the Emperour, That his armie should 1510. continue yet a moneth longer in Italie, and that the extraordinary charge, about the payment of the companies, which the King had till then defrayed, should afterwards be payed by the Emperour, and the foote-men also, for that moneth: and in consideration of fiftie thousand Crownes, which the King should adde to fiftie thousand others, that hee had formerly lent the Emperour, Verona with the territories thereof should remaine in pawne to his Maiestie, vntill it were satisfied: Chaumont besieged it. Seven hundred foote, and some companies of horse hauing vpon their approach abandoned the Towne, kept the fust wal. He batters it, and makes a breach in diuers places. The French (followed with fiftene hundred Spanish Launces, newly arriued, vnder the command of the Duke of Termini) mount to the assault, chase the garrison, and skirmishing with them, they enter pelmet within the other two walles, and so to the Castle, the most part being flame. Such as were retired into the dungeons, yielded, when as the Germains setting it on fire, burnt both the place & the men: so as of this number few escaped, either the furie of their armies, or of the fire. The Towne was likewise consumed to ashes. This done, a new commandement from the King, calles backe Chaumont, with his army, into the Duchie of Milan, which the Pope began to disturbe. Moreouer two armies of diuers nations ioyned to gather, to make greater conquests: hardly can the commanders remaine long vnited in one will. And the Germains (who can doe little alone) lodged in Lonique.

We haue hether to seene, that Pope Iulius desleins tended, not onely to restore the Church to her pretended estates, but also to expell the French out of Italie. His first proiect was effected. And now many considerations draw him to the second. The Venetians are partly restored, and all at his deuotion, hauing reuoked their censures. Hee is strictly allied with the Suisses. He knowes well, the Arragonois will be alwaies glad to see the Kings greatnes diminished, to haue the better meanes to settle himselfe at Naples. He finds the Emperours forces, & authoritie to be feeble. He is not out of hope to draw the King of England into armes. And that which feeds this courtoous passion, he is well informed, that the King hath no will to make warre against the Church: and that at all euents, it shall be in his power to make peace with him: and this is the last helpe the Popes haue alwaies relied on. But with what colour may Iulius arme against our Lewis? The King will not giue ouer the protection of the Duke of Ferrare, & Iulius desires exceedingly the possession of his Duchie, grounded (although the Seignourie of Comache, from whence Alphonso drew the salt belonging directly to the Emperour) vpon the discord for the salt pans, and customs which Alphonso leuied vnlawfully, and without the leaue (sayd he) of the Lord of the Fee. This was a crosse deuice, to cloake his courtoousnes. To colour this, he vrgeth the King againe to renounce the protection of the Ferrarois absolutely: vpon his refusal, he protesteth to renounce the treatie of Cambrai: that he will not ioine with him, neither yet be opposite vnto him, and that without tying himselfe to any person, he will hereafter seeke to maintaine peace in the Church. But on S. Peters day, hee discouers in effect the motions of his spirit: that day the rents due to the Apostolike see are paid: hee refused to accept those of the Duke of Ferrare, alleaging for his reasons, that Alexander the 6. marrying his daughter Lucrece, could not (to preiudice the see,) reduce foure thousand ducats to a hundred. And the same day (hauing before refused to giue the French Cardinalls leaue to returne into France) aduertised that the Cardinall of Archie was gone to field, with his dogs and nets, he sent to pursue him, as after a fugitive, and held him prisoner in the Castle S. Angelo. And to win vnto him the Catholic King, against the most Christian, hee graunts him the inuesting of the Realme of Naples, vpon condition, to pay the same rent which the ancient Kings of Arragon had payed, and entertaynement for three hundred men at armes, for the defence of the King.

But behold a strange vnquiet spirit, who attempting at one instant to assaile Ferrare, Genes and Milan, troubles himselfe infinitely to bring forth paine and confusion. The Ferrarois offered to giue him the salt made at Comache, and to bind himselfe, there 1510. should be no more made: yet proceeding against him, as against a notorious offender, he sends his troupes, led by the Duke of Urbino, into the territory of Ferrare: who with his first arrival, and at the onely summons of a trumpet takes Cento, Picue, Bagnacavallo, and Lugo. But as he camped before the Castell of Lugo, Alphonso coming with his people and some French companies, the Duke of Urbino raised the siege, leaving three peeces of Cannon behind him (it is a dishonor for a Commander to loose his artillery) and retired into Imola, giving Alphonso means to recover that which they had taken from him in Romagnia. But the army of the Church was no sooner refreshed, but they take the same places, and likewise Modene.

He sent eleven Venetian gallies against Genes, whereof Grille Contarin was general, and one of the Popes, in the which were Ottavian and John Fregoses, Ierome Duce and many other banished men. And by land Marc Anthoine Colonne with a hundred men at armes, and seaven hundred foote. About the same time six thousand Suisses (in the beginning of September) passing by Bellinzone, camped at Varese: where foure thousand more joyne with them: but this pious but fire of strawe. Iulius hoped that Genes being assailed both by sea and land, it would breed some infallible alteration, that the greatest part hating the French commande, would easily mainteine the name of Fregoses, and that the French (amazed with this alteration at Genes, being likewise prest by the Suisses) would recall into the Duchie of Milan, all such companies as they had both in the Emperour and the Duke of Ferrare: that by consequence, the Venetians would recover Verona, and hee enjoye Ferrare, and then with their united forces invade the state of Mil. But he reckoned without his host: let vs now see the proceedings of these armes. They shut those gates against him which he expected to find open. Chaumont the first brunt of the enemies approach, had manned Genes with some companies. Brian Prouençal was entred the port with six great gallies, the sonne of John Lewis of Isiquie, with eight hundred men of the Countrey, and a Nephew to the Cardinall of Mail, with no lesse number, was come into the Towne, for the King, and these together prevented all insurrections. So the Pope and the banished men, frustrated of their chiefe hope, retire to Rapalle. And Colonne foreseeing that hee should hardly recover any place of safety by land, for that the commons were risen, he shipt himselfe in the gallies with three score of his best horse, and sent the rest by land to Spette, who for his most part were spoiled vpon the Marches of the Genouois, Luquois, and Florentins. On the other side, the Suisses which camped at Varese, vnder colour (as they sayd) to go to serue the Church, found in the end to their harme, that they did but serue the ambition of one priuate man. Chaumont hauing manned all the passages with sufficient forces, sends Trinuice to Mont Brianse, that with his troupes & the helpe of the countrey men might keepe the Suisses from seizing on that passage, and he himselfe coasting along by them, and still skirmishing with them, with his horse and foote, and many field peeces, cuts off their viualles, and performing the duty of a good Captaine, without hazarding of any thing, he annoyed them at the passages of riuers. To defeat a poore but a warlike nation, there is nothing but blowes to be gotten: and in loosing they hazard an estate. In the end, besides the continuall charges of the French army, oppressed with want of viualles & money, they free our men (who are not accustomed to spend much in spies) of the doubt which troubled them, that is, whether they would passe to Ferrare by the Duchie of Milan, or turne by the hills vnder Come, Lecque, Bergami and Bresse, or els by the Guissardade, through the territory of Mantoua: for taking their way by the high places of Come, they went to lodge at the bridge of Trese, where (brought to extremities for want of bread and money) they retired by troupes to their houses. Whilest the French were else where busied, the Venetians (making profit of their absence, and of the Germaines retreat,) recover (without toile) Esse, Montselice, Montagnagne, Marostique, Basciane and Vincence. Legnague stayed their victories, but Verona ouerthrew them. They beseege it with eight hundred men at armes, three thousand light horse and ten thousand foote, besides an infinite number of peasants, and batter it from a mountaine opposite, being counter-battered and wonderfully 1510. A wonderfully spoiled by the artillery from the Towne. But the Venetians desire was great, to conquer this City, and the valour of the beseegeed was no lesse to defend both their honors and liues.

They had foure hundred French Lances, three hundred Spaniards, a hundred Germaines and Italians, five hundred French foote, and foure thousand Germaines, which the Prince of Anhalt (dead some fewe daies before) had left there: A thousand foote, with some Cornets of French issue forth in the night, put them to the sword that kept the artillery, cloyed two peeces, and carried them away, when as quale of Perouse flying to the rescue, and being slaine with almost all that followed, Denis of Nalde arrived: who recovering the prey, repulsed and beate them within their walls. But the Venetians daunted with this checke, seeing no rising of the people, as they expected, aduersed of the Suisses retreat, and that Chaumont came to succour them, they retired to S. Pomisee. The warres continued in Friuland and Isria, with the accustomed infolencies and cruelties on either side, but more to the ruine of the Countrey, and buildings, then of the people. At the same time, the Marquis of Mantoua came out of prison, at the Mantouans sute to Biazet Prince of the Turkes, whose loue the Marquis had many yeares held himselfe.

The Pope was not growne wise, neither by his owne, nor other mens losses: his unfortunate attempts had nothing quenched his hopes: and they found the proverbe true, to their cost: He that hath a companion, hath a maister. A wit blinded with presumption: who (seeing his practises now discovered, the port of Genes furnished with a strong armie, the Towne provided of all things necessarie for defence) hopes to obtaine that now which he could not get: when the port was disarmed, hee persuades the Venetians to a second triall. They come to Genes with fiftene light gallies, three great, one galleasse, and three Biscaine ships. The French fleet going out off the haven, with two and twentie light gallies, after they had giuen order, that the contrary faction should not rise, met with them at Porto Venere: where by the thunder of their Cannons, and by the Tower of Codisa, they forced them to retire to Cristauccetia, whence the Venetian fleet parting to recover the gulfes, a tempest cast five gallies vpon the coast of Messine: the others beate and brused, were driuen vpon the coast of Barbarte, and in the end recovered the port of Venice, halfe lost. The armie which came by land, led by the Arch-Bishop of Salerno, brother to Ottavian Fregose, by John of Safatelle, and Renier of Safate the Popes Captaines, seeing the fruitlesse attempts of the fleet at sea, in stead of Genes, went to take Fanane in the mountaine of Modene. A small recompence for so many presumptiue sturres.

This disgrace did rather increase the Popes obstinacie, then make him faint. Hee might easily obtaine a peace of the King, and with such conditions, as might well content a Conquerour. The King was content to referre the Duke of Ferrares cause to iustice, and gave power to the Pope, to name such Iudges as he pleased. But Iulius following the holy Oracle, Loued cursing and cursing followed him: and for that he took negligence in blessing, it forsooke him. (seeing the King yeeld to so reasonable conditions, he impudently demands, that Genes be set at libertie, and with such bitterness, as the Duke of Sauoies Ambassador (offering his Princes intercession for their place,) he puts him in prison, and tortured him as a spie. Hee conuerts all his thoughts against Ferrare. The Venetians thrust him forward, fearing (least in the end, loosing the hope of this desseins) hee should bee reconciled to the King. And the King sufficiently informed of the Popes bad affection, resolues to defend the Ferrarois, and both by spiritual, and temporall armes, to crosse the Popes infolencies.

In the end of September the Pope comes to Bologne, with an intent to assaile Ferrare, both by water, and land: the Venetians on the one side, and he on another, pertrading himselfe, that at the same of his forces, the people would rebell against Alphonso. But the Venetians companies hauing brought many barks by the riuier of Po, into the territorie of Mantoua, to make a bridge: the Duke of Ferrare with the French forces, set vpon them vnawares, tooke them, and many vessels in certaine chanelles of Polefine, with the Venetian Commissarie. Then was there discovered a practice which the Venetians had in Fresche, for the which the Earle John Maria of Martinengo was be-headed there. This stay of the fleet did nothing discourage the Pope, but perswading himself that his own forces were sufficient to conquer Ferrare, he assembled them at Medene, under the Duke of Urbino being General, the Cardinal of Pauc, John Paul Baillon, Marc Anthonie Colonne, and John Vitelle, Captaines of authority, whilst that Chaumont incamped right against them at Rubiere and Marfalle, trying them with daily skirmishes: he gave the Ferrarois means, with the Lord of Chastillon, to recover Polefine, Final, and Cenue. Having sackt and burnt it to ashes, hee went to ioine with Chaumont, even as three hundred men at armes, many light horse, and foure thousand Venetian foote, to winne the passage of Po, and to ioine with the Popes forces, having already taken Ficqueroles & Stellate on the other side, forced Alphonso to go to the court of his countie. Thus the two Venetian fleets, having free passage ypon Po, did greatly annoy the Ferrarois territories, by daily inroades and spoiles: when as the Duke issuing out of Ferrare, put to route that fleet, which was entered the river of Po, by Primare, and came vnto Adria: the other which consisted of foists and small vessels, being entred by Fornaces, and come to Pul selle, seeking to passe into the river of Adie, by a river adioyning, they found the water to low, as they could not enter, but were to battered with the Ferrarois artillerie, as they abandoned their ships, seeking to save themselves and their Canons.

8. Conclusions made by the French Church against the Pope.

The Pope seeing he could preuaile nothing by his temporall forces, he flies to the spirituall: excommunicating Alphonso of Este, and all those that were, or should come to his succour, namely Charles of Amboise, with all the chiefe of the French armie. This furious course made the King to assemble all the Prelats of his realme at Tours, with the most famous Doctours of all his Vniuersities, as well in dauntie, as in the civil and canon lawes, who resolve vpon eight notable conclusions against the Pope. That it was not lawfull for the Pope to assaile any temporall Princes, by force, in their territories, not belonging to the Church. That it was lawfull for any such Prince for the defence of his subiects and countie, so onely to repell this iniurie by force, but also to invade the territories of the Church, if they by any such hope, not with an intent to hold them, but to the end (the more being disposed thereto) should haue no more means to molest his estate: seeing the Pope himselfe, the aide of the said Prince, recovered the same lands, & usurped before by certain tyrants. That for so manifest a wrong and a misse attempt, any such Prince might with draw himselfe from the Popes obedience, for the defence of his temporall estate. Seeing he had formerly many other Princes and common-weales, to invade the dominions of the said Prince, who refused reward and one of the Apostolick see. That this subtraction being made, they should forsake Ferrare the common and ancient lawe, and the Pragmaticke sanction, enacted by the Council of Basil. That any such Prince might by force defend another Prince his confederate, and of whom he had lawfully taken the protection, for these Seigneuries which he had long enjoyed, and with a just title, seeing this consideration had beene made with the consent of the said Pope, who as the cause was comprehended therein: and that this Prince allied, according to the forme of the league, had giuen aide for the recovery of the patrimonie of Saint Peter. That the Pope pretending any thing due for any rights belonging to the Church of Rome, and the Prince on the other side challenged to holde of the Empire, and should referre this controversy to the consyre of indifferent Iudges, as equitie required, that in this case it was not lawfull for the Pope, without further knowledge of the cause, to make warre against any such Prince: the which if he did, the said Prince might oppose his forces with other Princes his confederates, so as that right had not become possessed by the Romaine Church within a hundred yeares. That if the Pope would not accept this honest and lawfull offer, but contrary to order and right, should give sentence against any such Prince, maine, among his right not to depend vpon the Church: neither he nor any other by opposing, should incurre the censure of the sentence, seeing that Prince had no free access, neither to go, nor send to Rome to defend his rights. That if the Pope uniuersally, (the due course of lawe not obserued,) should by his sentence, pronounce any censures against any such Princes, their allies and subiects residing in such a case, the sentence were of no force, neither could it by any means binde.

These conclusions taken, the King according to the resolution of the Council sent Ambassadors to Julius, in the name of the French Church, to admonish him by brotherly, & spirituall correction, that leaving his desseins, he should attend to peace, concord, loue, and charitie, and reconcile himselfe with the foresaid Princes: vpon refusal, they should summon him to call a Council, according to the decrees of the holy Council of Basil. That his answer heard, things should be ordered according vnto reason. In the meane time fortie light horse, & five hundred foot (having at the first summons of a Trumpet, yeelded Carpie to Albert Pic), were encountered by foure thousand foote, led by Palise, defeated, and in a manner all slaine. And Chaumont desirous to charge the Church forces, before they should ioine with the Venetian Companies, and three hundred Spanish Lances, which Ferdinand had sent him, in consideration of the inuention of Naples: but not able to drawe them, but to some light skirmishes, by the perswasion of the Bentiuolis, he turned his forces against Bologne, where the Pope remained sicke, both doubtfull of the peoples faith, being beleeged, and so discontented with the long stay of the Venetians, as he protested publicly to Ierome Donat their Ambassador, that if their succours entred not the next day into Bologne, he would agree with the French. And at that instant sent John Francis Pic, Earle of Mirandole, to treat with the Lord of Chaumont. Chaumont not to alter this good disposition, vnderstanding the Kings pleasure, keeps his troups within their lodgings, and sent backe the Earle with these propositions: That, Alphonso of Este, and all those the Pope had comprehended in his Censure should be absolved: That in regard of the Venetians, nothing should be done contrary to the treatie of Cambrai: That the controuersies betwixt Alphonso and the Pope should be decided within 6. months by Iudges chosen by their common consent. That Modene should be restored to the Emperour: Cotignole to the King, & the Cardinal of Auche set at libertie: & that the gift of all benefices within the Kings dominions should be according to this nomination. But Chappin Vitelle, entering into Bologne with 600. Venetian light horse, and a Squadron of Turks, which they had in pay, made the Pope to sing another note, That there was no means of accord, if the King did not absolutely abandon the defence of the Ferrarois. And Chaumont seeing that neither by treaties of peace, nor by force, he preuailed any thing, the people of Bologne holding themselves quiet, & at the Popes deuotion, being also afflicted with the warre, & want of victuals, he returned to Chastellaufranc & Spilberte, the which he had lately taken. Chaumont is no longer gone, but the Pope wonderfully incensed, exclaims against the King to all Christian Princes, as thirsting after his blood & the territories of the Church, having caused him to be beleeged with all his Cardinals & Prelats in Bologne, and returning to his former course with more vehemencie, he sends his troups to field, augmented by five hundred men at armes, sixteene hundred light horse, five thousand foote, and three hundred Spanish Lances. But whilst this armie sojournes about Modene, some squadrons running towards Rhegium, being defeated by the French, they left a hundred horse, and the Earle of Matelique was taken prisoner. Moreouer the Duke of Ferrare with the Lord of Chastillon, incamped vpon the Po, betwixt Hospital and Bondin, opposite to some other Venetian companies, that were on the other side of the river: they sunk nine of their vessels, and forced the rest to returne to Venice. These final victories were creft by the taking of Salsuole & Forminge, whilst that Chaumont resided himselfe within Pania, and Aubigne at Rhegium. These conquered townes needed Julius more violently against Ferrare, the which he knew was well furnished with men, and things necessarie for defence: and the French through the continual toyle of the warre, were tyred both in bodies, & mindes. And presuming to make the enterprise more easie, he went himselfe in person, the second day of January, before Mirandole, advertised that Chaumont had made an escape to Milan, drawn thither (as they said) with the loue of a young gentiewoman, a iourney which did greatly quail the courage, and hope of them that defended Mirandole, who see themselves abandoned, not so much by the negligence, as by the dissention betwixt Chaumont, and John Laques of Triuulce, (who then was gone into France) whereby, it may be, he was not much displeased to see the Earles Mirandole, (grandchildren to Triuulce, by reason of Francis their mother, his bastard daughter) deprived of that place. In the end, after all the duties that might be performed by men besieged, dispayring of succours, seeing a breach made, and the water of their ditches so frozen, as it bare the souldiers, they obtained in the ende (by the intermission of the Cardinals which assisted the Pope) to depart with bagge and baggage: vpon condition that Alexander Triunle Gouverneur of the towne, and all the Captaines, should remaine prisoners: and to redeeme the towne from sacke, which he had promised to his souldiers, they should pay a certaine summe of money.

After the taking of Mirandole, two things were propounded in Council by the French, whether they should assaile the enimie, or besiege Modene, or Bologne, to draw the Popes forces out off the Estate of Ferrare, & by that meanes to draw them into a convenient place for a battaile. Great Captains hold it for a firme maxime: & experience hath alwaies taught it, That we ought neuer to vndergo the hazard of a battell, but for some great advantage, or when as vrgent necessity doth constrain. This was the aduice of Triunle, newly returned to the Campe: & accordingly resolution was taken to go to Modene. But let vs obserue a Spanish trick. The policie & secret aduertisements of Ferdinand did more harme to the King his vncke, then the Popes open force. He thinks this to be a meanes to pacifie the Emperours spleene, and to sowe some diuision betwixt the King and him. Modene was held, time out of minde, to be a fee of the Emperour, and the house of Este had not inioyed it, but by the Emperours inuestiture. Ferdinand then aduise the Pope, to the ende the French should not haue it, to restore it to the Emperour, as a towne of his Iurisdiction. So Vitfruch, Maximilians Ambassador, hauing receiued it in that forme, gaue notice vnto Chaumont, That Modene did no more belong vnto the Pope, but to her ancient and lawfull Lord. And to enioy this restitution quietly, Vitfruch and Chaumont agreed together, that the French forces should not offend Modene, nor the territory thereof: and during these garboiles betwixt the King and the Pope, it should fauour neither party.

Then died Charles of Amboise, a Captaine, whom the name of the Cardinal of Amboise his Vncke, and the gouernements of the estate of Milan and of the Kings armes held in great reputation in Italie: a faithfull seruant to this King, but (to beare to great a burthen) he wanted a longer experience in the art of warre: seeing that after the death of his vncke, through that default he was become contemptible to his souldiers: to whom (to keepe them the better at his pleasure) he gaue too much liberty. Jehan Jaques of Trinulle, as Marshall of France, tooke vpon him the command of the armie, attending the Kings pleasure, and inflamed with an honest ambition to performe something worthy of his vertue, hauing in the moneth of May gathered together euell hundred Launces, and seuen thousand foote, he besieged, tooke, and sacked in one day the Towne of Concorde, and won Chastelaufiane by composition. Then approaching Bologne, he so amazed the Pope, as hauing founded the Bolonois minds, & drawn from them an oth of fidelity, he left the Cardinal of Pauie there, & retired to Rauenne. He is no sooner gone, but the people looking to the preseruatiō of their priuate & present estates, and seeing themselves surcharged with two armies, they take armes and hinder the Cardinal of Pauie from bringing in of any forces. The Cardinal being out of heart, fearing the armed people should seeke reuenge for their honourable citizens, whose heads he had lately cut off, as fautors to the Bentiuoles, flies in the night disguised into the Cittadell, and from thence towards Imola, with a hundred horse.

Bologne
taken.

The Legats flight being known, the people began to find out the name of Popolo, with great mutinie and tumult. Laurence Ariosto, Francis Rinuche, & other Captains of the towne, affected to the Bentiuoles, run to the gates of S. Felix, and Lames: break them downe, call the Bentiuoles, and receiue them into the towne. The Duke of Urbino, aduertised of the Legats flight, and of the peoples rising, dislodged in the night, (leaving most part of his tents and pavilions standing) with all his armye, except such as for the gard of the campe, were on the other side of the riuer towards the French, to whom he gaue no intelligence of his departure. The people vnderstanding of his retreat, and

A the peasants comming downe from all parts, with great cries and shoutes, pursue them, take fittene peeces of great artillerie, and many leile, the Duke of Urbino standard, their munition and baggage. The souldiers had time to saue themselves, whilst that Raphael of Parsi one of the Captaines of the Church, made a stand at the bridge of Rene, vnill that by the taking and route of all his people, the whole armie had a free passage to Belongne. A victory extraordinarily happy, hauing in one night conquered a great Citie, & without perill or fight, broken a whole armie. The Bishop Vitelli held the Cittadell, and Vitfruch, posting thither in the night, perswades him to deliuer it into the Emperours hands: but three thousand Ducats which the Bolonois gaue him, made him to open the gates, the people hauing recovered it, to free themselves both from subiection, and the realousie of nations, and also from the feare they had, least the King should retaine it, they ruined it to the ground. The Duke of Ferrare making his profit of this victory, recovered Cente, Pieue, Cotignole, Lugo and other townes of Romagnia.

At the same time, the Emperours and the Kings Deputies, assisted by the Cardinals of S. Croix, S. Mala, Baieux, Cosenze, Albret, and many others, publish a Councell at Pisa, for the first of September, the which was lately returned to the obedience of the Florentines. To crosse this Councell, the Pope (following the aduice of Anthoine de Mont of S. Sanfouin, one of the eight Cardinals newly created at Rauenne) appointed a generall Council the first of May, at S. Iohn de Lateran in Rome. And to keepe the Kings forces quiet, he colourably gaue care to a peace, which the Bishop of Tiuoli his Nuncio, C and the King of Scots Ambassador treated for him with the King, and the Cardinals of Nantes and Stragonia with the Pope. But these practises of peace are broken by the Popes infirmities: the which hauing brought him euē to the pits banke, gaue him yet respite to sture vp long calamities. Iulius is no sooner freed from the danger of death, but he makes a new league with the Senate of Venice, and the King of Arragon against the French: To mainteine (said he) the vnion of the Church: to defend it from apparent Schisme, and to recouer all such places, as mediately or immediately depended on the Church.

A new league
against the French.

The first day of Septem. was come, when as the Cardinals Attorneys, in their names, do celebrate the acts appertaining to the opening of the Councell of Pisa. And the Pope very wroth, that the Florentines had yielded to the celebration of this pettie Councell (as he termed it) in their estate, declared Florente and Pisa subiect to the Ecclesiasticall censure, by vertue of the Bull of the Councell which he had caused to be published, and he pronounced the aboue named Cardinals from the dignity of Cardinal, & subiect to the punishments of heretikes and Scismatickes. The Florentines & Pisans appeale from this censure to the holy councell, (not of Pisa, but to erre least in their termes) of the vniuersall Church: and by the Magistrates commandement, the priests continue the publick celebration of diuine seruice in their Churches. The pretext to reforme the church was godly and of great profit. But oh pleasant reformers: the Authors of this Councell, thrust on by their owne priuate ambitious desseignes, vnder colour of a generall good, contended of their owne priuate interest, so as euery one might plainly see, that whosoever should be chosen Pope, would haue no lesse need of reformation, then those they now vndertooke to reforme. So as euē at their first entrie the Cardinals tried both the contempt and hatred of the commons. They call the Clergie to assist in the Cathed: all Church at the first session. No one appeares, the Priests denie their ornaments to the Cardinals, offering to celebrate the Masse, & shut the Church doores. So as the Cardinals fearing they should not remaine safe at Pisa, vnlesse they were backed with forrein forces, & the Florentines vnwilling to admit any, remēbring the Pisans rebellion vnder Charles the 8. they decreed to haue the Councell transported to Milan.

They found the like difficulties at Milan. The Clergie abstaine from saying seruice, as before accursed persons: the commons curse them, and laughe at them in open streete, namely at the Cardinal of Saint Croix chosen President of the Councell, whom euery one noted to be the Author of this assemblie, hoping by fauour thereof to make himselfe a foot-stable to climbe to the Popedom. This disgrace of the Milanois made 1511. made them againe to transport the Councell to Lions. When Julius being suspected a fro his Popedom, & prohibitions made throughout all France, not to send any money to Rome, nor to bring any Bulles from thence: hee did not onely excommunicate all the French, but also graunted Bulles of pardon and remission, to any one that should kill a Frenchman: giuing the realme of France (& that of Nauarre, in hatred of John of Albret allied to the King, and at the perswasion of Ferdinand King of Aragon, who had long gaped after some occasion to lay hold of it,) in prey to the first conquerour. So this Councell did nothing but increase their spleenes and kindle new troubles.

But as the King had an intent to assaile Romagnia, or to maintaine the war in anothers Country, attending his owne coming in person, the next spring with all the forces of his realme, behold sixteene thousand Suisses, with seauen field peeces (new raised by the cardinal of Siō, vnder the authority of Julio) come a lād at Varese & Galere & forthwith they send a trumpet to desie Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, who with the Councell of Triunle commanded the French armies, as Lieutenant general to the king his Vncle, Gaston (having speedily assembled seauen hundred horse, and such foote as the vrgent necessity would suffer him, the companies being diuided into sundry garrisons) presents himselfe before Galere, with much artillery.

The Suisses go forth in battail: yet vnwilling to fight in so open a place, they retire to Busti. In the meane time the companies of men at armes, and foote, come from all parts to Milan. Capitaine Molare with his Gascans came from Verona, and the Lansquenets fro Carpi, who cheered the mindes of the Milanois, being some what daunted by Sodaine an assault. And the more, for that, certaine letters were surprisid which the Suisses had written to their Lords, that they had no newes, neither of the Pope nor of the Venetian army. So as having found some difficultie to passe the river of Adie, they tooke (as in their iourney) the way of Come, and so euery one to his home. Shewing, that for want of conduct, assistance and paiement, they do commonly terrifie more then hurt.

Their retreat.

Warre in Romagnia.

After the Suisses retreat, behold all the Townes the Ferrarois held in Romagnia were exposed in prey to the Spaniards, being ioyned to the forces of the Church, who assembling at Imola, a thousand men at armes, eight hundred Genetaires, and eight thousand Spanish foote, with many Barons of the Realme of Naples, vnder the command of Fabrizio Colonne, their generally, and for the Pope eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and eight thousand Italians, vnder Marc Anthoine Colonne, John Vitelli, Malateste sonne to John Paul Baillon, Raphael of Passy, and others, all subiect to the command of the Cardinall, of Medicis Legat in the army, resolving to beseege Bologne. The Duke of Nemours had put into it, (besides the inhabitants and some horse and foote entertayned by the Bentivoles) two thousand Lansquenets, and two hundred Lances vnder Odet, sonne to Peter of Foix Viceroy of Lautrec, Yues of Alegre, Anthony of Fayette, Peter Terrail, surnamed Capitaine Bayard: and in the meane time assembled all the forces of Italie together at Final, to persueue Bologne from the enemy. A headie hundred fadome of the wall neere to Saint Stephens gate were layed euen with the ground, the Tower at the gate was already abandoned: and the Spaniards had already planted an enseigne vpon the wall, when as the beseeged placing their Cannon in counterbattery, and hauing slaine some of them that were mounted, they forced them to retire in disorder.

Bologne besieged by the Spaniards.

These first attempts had troubled the people, if Gaston had not suddenly reinforced the Towne with a thousand foote and a hundred and fourescore Lances. The beseeged thus fortified, a strange successe doubles their courage. Peter of Nauarre hauing let fire to a mine which he had made at the port of Chastillon, where there was a chapell, both the wall and the Chapell leaped so into the aire, as the army without, descouered the Towne plainly, and the soldiars prepared to defend the assault, but both the wall and Chapell falling downe, settled in the same place from whence the violence of the fire had forced them. Doubtlesse the Bolonois had reason to make a miracle of this aduenture, and to belecue, that this fall vpon the same foundation, was a manifest testimonye

A miraculous chance.

A monie of Gods assistance. This happy successe brought Gaston to Bresse, whether the Venetian armie marched, to effect some intelligences: but perswaded by the Capitaines of Bologne, that his absence would double the enemies courage, he parts from Final, and marching all night (notwithstanding the snow, and violent windes) enuied the Citty in the morning, with thirteene hundred lances, six thousand Lansquenets, and eight thousand French and Italians, before the enemy had any notice thereof: who being assured of the truth, retired their artillerie secretly, and tooke the way to Imola. In the meane time Andrew Gritti, generall of the Venetians (perswaded by Count Lewis Anogare, where James of Aillon Lord of Lude kept the Castell still. People newly conquered do

Bresse taken by the Venetians.

B commonly the like in all occasions. Fergame (the two Castels excepted, Orcineche, Orcineche, Pontui, &c many places thereabouts, obey the victors. The Duke of Nemours leauing three hundred Lances, and foure thousand foote in Bologne, poited with all speed to Bresse, and hauing intelligence that John Paul Baillon lodged in the Ile of Esele, with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, and twelue hundred foot, he goes to charge them with three hundred Lances, & seuen hundred Archers: hauing ouertaken them, as they were ready to passe the river of Adie, at the tower of Magname, he chargeth them, defeats them, and kills almost a hundred horse, takes many prisoners (amongst others Gui of Rangon, & Balthazar Signorel of Percuse) disperes all his foote, whereof the most part were drowned in passing) and takes two Fauconneux.

C which he had. The next day, in an encounter, he ouer came Meleagre of Furli, Capitaine of the Venetian light horse, the commander remaining prisoner: to continuing his defense, he arrived at Bresse nine daies after his departure, besieged it, takes it by force and sacks it. Doubtlesse this braue Prince did hazard his owne tume, if he had not, with great iudgement and order, commanded, that no man should looke to any speile, before the towne were fully at his command. And he did so well put it in practise, as the first that made shew to abandon his ranke, was slaine by his companions. But who doth vt such discipline at this day, when as being greedy of bootie, they loose so good occasions? Our French lost some men at armes, and many foote: but the enemy lost about eight thousand: some inhabitants armed, some Venetians, who were five hundred men. Frederic Count in Comillary of the Stradiots was slaine. Andrew Gritti, Anthoine Justiman, John Paul Marfion and his sonne, the Cheualier Volpe, Balthazar of Sipion one of the sonnes of Anthoine of Pis, Count Lewis Anogare his two sonnes, and Dominique Buzon Capitaine of the Stradiots were prisoners. Count Lewis and his children, the chief leaders of this rebellion, were afterwards beheaded. A reuolt deere bought by this Citty, which yielded not to any other in Lombardie, in Nobilitie and dignity: and in wealth (in primito Milan) it exceeded all the rest.

Bresse recovered by the French.

A new league against the Spaniards.

This chastisement made Fergame and the other reuolted Townes, to call backe the French whom they had lately expelled. These prizes and reprints, conquests and happy successe, prolonged the stay of the French in Italy, and yet they did nothing settle their affaires seeing what they enioyed, was rather a charge and expence to them, then any profit. But behold strange crosses both by land and sea, do hereafter, bandie against the happiness of our men. They giue the King intelligence from Rome, that Henry the 8. King of England, notwithstanding his promise, was ioyned in league with the Pope, & it was confirmed by writing, that a Galeasse laden with wines, corne, and other provision arriving in England from the Pope, had exceedingly altered Henry, with the Nobles, Clergie, and commons of England. That he should with his armie at sea invade the coasts of Normandie and Brittanie, and send 8000. foote into Spain to begin warre in Quene ioindy with the Arragonois. And they made already great preparations of men and shipping in England, and likewise of ships in Spain, to passe into England.

Moreover the Emperour was altered and changed in his affection, complaining that the King (contrary to the capitulation of Cambrai) did hinder the aduancement of the Empire in Italy. Hee required that Rene the Kings yongest daughter should be promised to Charles his grand-child, giuing him Bourgongne in dowrie, and that that the Maide should then bee presently deliuered into his hands and custodie. A

That the controuerfies, for Ferrare, Bologne and the Councell should be referred to him. And moreouer hauing made a truce with the Venetians, for eight monethes, he protested, not to suffer the King to increase his estate in Italie: But these were but bare shifts to couer his bad intent. Besides, the Cantons of the Suiffes were so incensed against this Crowne, that although the King fought to winne their loues with store of gold, yet the persuasions of the Cardinall of Sion (whereby wee may see that Cardinalls haue bene alwayes dealers in matters of state) had newly made them graunte to the confederats a leuie of six thousand men. And the Pope, to straine all his strings against our Lewis, fearing least his extreeme rigour should induce the Florentins to followe the Kings fortune, to the preiudice of his desseins, he reuokes, without any fute, B the Censures wherewith he had bound them.

To quench this fire before it flamed farther, the King commanded his Nephew to march with speede against the confederats army, of whome he promised himselfe the victory, being amazed and yet the weaker, and then to assaile Rome and the Pope with all violence, desirous that this warre (to seeme the lesse odious) should be made in the name of the Councell, called first at Pisa, and that a Legat deputed by the Councell should receiue the conquered Townes, in the name thereof. The Cardinall of Saint Seuerin was appointed Legat of Bologne in the army.

So the Duke of Nemours, furnishing all places with men necessary for defence, gathers together all the forces the King had in Italie, he makes a company of sixteen C hundred Lances, five thousand Lansquenets, five thousand Gasccons and eight thousand French and Italians, to whom the Duke of Ferrare added a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, and a great quantitie of good artillery: Gaston hauing left his at Fi-nall by reason of the bad way. The enemies army was 14000 men at armes, a thousand light horse, seven thousand Spaniards & three thousand Italians newly leuied.

The French
army in Italy.

Gaston thrust forward as well by the Kings commande, as by his owne valour and desire of Glory, was desirous to see if the enemy would willingly trie the hazard of a battaile. They on the other side temporized, attending their Suiffes, and that the English and Spaniards beginning warre in France, should force the King to call backe all or the greatest parts of his troups: and yet coasted alongest the French army lest the Townes of Romagnia should bee left in prey, and the way layed open to go to Rome, lodging alwayes in strong places, neere to some strong towne, which might serue them for a retreat at neede. So the Duke of Nemours (not able to cut off their retreats through the commodity they had of the Townes of Romagnia, nor force them to fight, without great disadvantage) goes and incamps before Rauenna, hoping they would not be so base minded, as to suffer such a Citie to bee left before their eyes, and by this meanes an occasion should be offered to fight with them in an equal place.

The enemy discouering this purpose, sends Marc Antoine Colonne to Rauenna, with three score men at armes of his company, Peter of Cist with a hundred light horse, Salezar and Paral with six hundred Spaniards. The Towne is seated betwix two ri- E uers, Ronque and Montone which descending from the Appenin hills, straighten themselves neere vnto Rauenna, with so small a distance, that on either side they passe close to the walles, then joining together they runne into the sea three miles from thence. Gaston incamps himselfe betwixt the two riuers, & plants his artillery, some against the tower of Ronque betwixt Fort Adrian and Ronque, and some on the other side of the riuer of Montone, whether almost halfe his troups were passed to batter in diuers places, and to hold the riuer at his will. Hee batters the wall, makes a breach of thirty fadomes, chooseth ten out of euery companie of men at armes to couer the foote: diuides his army into three squadrons, & giues a furious assault, although they could not mount but with Ladders, the wall remayning yet about three yards high. Those F within maintaine it valiantly, and fighting the space of three houres, in the ende they repulie our men, with the losse of three hundred foote and some men at armes, with a great number of hurt: amongst others the Lord of Chastillon, the master of the or-

A distance, and Spineuse, who being hurt with the artillery from the Towne, died within fewe dayes after. In the meane time the Cittizens amazed, and fearing a more dangerous charge, treated of their yeelding, without the priuety of Marc Antoine Colonne, when as beheld the enemy comes, marching to their succour, who camps at Minach three miles from Rauenna, fortifying themselves with a trench, such as the shortnesse of time would permit, leauing an entry of about twentie fadomes.

Gaston raiseth the seege, turnes the mouth of the Cannon towards the enemies, and on Easter day the eleuenth of Aprill, passeth Ronque, leauing his reuerward led by Jus d'Alegre vpon the riuers side towards Rauenna, to succour the armie at neede; B to make head against those that should issue out off the Towne, & to keepe the bridge which they had made vpon the riuer of Montone: then disposing of his troups, he giues the avant-gard to the Duke of Ferrare, the battaile to the Lord of Palisse, and the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin, who great both in minde and body, couered from the head to the foote with most shining armes, performed the office of a Captaine rather then of a Legat. Gaston referred to himselfe no priuate charge, but would bee free, to see and succour in all places, the beauty of his armes, his cassake, his cheerefull countenance, his eyes full of vigour and shyning for ioye, made him very glorious. The enemies seeing our French passe the riuer, were ranged in battaile. Fabrice Colonne led the fore- ward the Cardinall of Medici Legat of the Councell of Lateran, the battaile, but (a fa- C tall figure) in a peacefull habit: Caruagial a Spanish Captaine, the reuerward. So the two armies approaching one to the other, stood immouable about two houres, the enemies being loath to abandon the compassse of their pallisado. The Spaniards artillery thunders, and at the first volee ouerthrowe many French.

The battaile
of Rauenna
wonne by the French.

The French answers, but with a greater losse to their horse. Peter of Nauarre hauing caused the foote to couch flat vpon their bellies, Fabrice cries, presseth and importunes to go to the battaile, and not to suffer them to bee consumed by the Cannon. The Nauarrois contradicts, presuming that the more the danger increased, the more famous would the victory be which he expected. But the Cannon had so scourged their men at armes and light horse, as they could no longer keepe their ranks. There might D youtee men and horse fall dead to the ground, heads, armes and legges flie into the aie, when as Fabrice cries out. Shall wee die shamefully heere, by the obstinacie and naice of a willaine? Shall this army bee consumed, without the death of any one enemy? must the honour of Spaine and Italie bee lost for the pleasure of a Nauarrois? Speaking thus, he presseth out of the trench with his companie, all the horse-men followe him, the foote rise, and with fury charge the Lansquenets. All the squadrons ioyne, danger, glory, hope and hatred of nation against nation flesh them in the combate. Fabrice Colonne is already taken by the Duke of Ferrares companie, Alegri chargeth in flanke with his reuerward. The Viceroy of Naples and Caruagial are put to flight, leading with them E their Captaine prisoner, being couered with wounds and bloud. The Marquis of Padulle is likewise defeated with his squadron, and taken prisoner. The Italians foote forsake and began to turne their backs, if the Spaniards had not speedily come to secound them against the Lansquenets. But all the horsemen fled, and the Spanish battallion retired in order, when as Gaston turning to charge them with a great troupe of horse, withholding the victory absolute, if those retired whole, he went courageously to assaile them. But alas, as they charge the hindermost, they are enuironed by this battallion, cut in peeces for the most part, & he (throwen vnder his horse) was slaine, being thrust into the flanke with a pike. Doubtlesse a happy death for him, hauing this content in his soule, to die in so young an age, honored with so much glory, the which he had pur- F chased in fewe monethes by so many and so notable victories: but a fatall victory, polluted with the death of so braue a Commander, who but euen now began to make his name and his valour knowne, and by his fall carried with him the happinesse of the French, and the strength of this army.

Gaston of Faix slaine.

1512 The Viconte of Lautrec his Cousin, remayned almost dead, by him, maymed with a twentieth wounds: but led afterwards to Ferrare, and being carefully looked vnto, hee escaped, to do the King notable service. Gascon being dead, the Spaniards retire without trouble or let: the rest of the army is broken and disperfed. The baggage taken, ensignes and artillery. Prisoners of marke, Fabrizio Colonne, the Marquise of Pescara and Padulle, Eselle, and Bisonte, the Earle of Monteleon, Iohn of Cardone, Peter of Narre, manie Barons and Noblemen Spaniards, Neapolitans and Italians, and the Legat of the Councell of Lateran.

A new designe of the French.

Treachery in Paris commends.

There were slaine, according to the common estimation, ten thousand, & a third of the French, amongst which were Alegre and Vincerois his sonne, Raimond of Saint Mary, Molare and some other Gascon Captaines, Jacob Colonell of the Lansquenets, a braue man, and commended to haue assisted much with his troupe for the winning of this victory. Two thirds of the enemies, but almost all their chiefe Captaines and the beauest of their army, a great number hurt, and most of them that fled, were slaine and beaten downe by the Countrymen, which lay in troups by the way. And (for the last act of this Papal tragedie) Rauenna is taken by assault and cruelly sackt, and spoiled. Imola, Furl, Cesena, Rimini and all the torts of Romagnia followed the victors fortune, and the Legate of the Councell of Pisa, receiues them all in the name of the said Councell. The body of Gascon was carried to Milan, with an honorable conuoy, a litter followed by the aboue named prisoners, & interred with a wonderfull mouement pompe, namely of the soldiars, whose hearts he had so wonne, as they protested that nothing was impossible vnto them, vnder the leading of such a Commander. And the King his Vncle receiuing these heauie tidings: I would to God (sayd he) I were driven out of Italy so as my Nephew de Feix and the other Noblemen liued. I wish such victories to mine enemies. If we vanquish once more after this sort, wee shall bee vanquished. Without doubt he had reason, for from that time this army (not able to finde a Commander of that credit) on the one side rich with spoile, on the other weake both of force and courage, by this so bloudie a victory, seemed rather vanquished then victorious. This battaile had filled the Court of Rome with terror and tumult, and the Cardinals running to the Pope, prest him with instant prayers to accept a peace, with such conditions as the King offered by the Cardinals of Nantes and Strigonia, where D with the King was yet content, notwithstanding the happy successe of his affaires: That Bologne, Lugo and all other Townes which Alphonso held in Romagnia, should be restored, and the Councell of Fifa disannulled. Iulius seeing these conditions very honorable for him, & that vnder colour of these parles he should stay the Kings army, vntill he heard resolution of those, on whome hee grounded the rest of his hopes, subscribed these articles nine daies after the battaile, promising on his faith to the Cardinals, to accept them. But our Lewis must try once more, how dangerous it is to moue a warlike nation. The Suisses wonderfully discontented with the Kings refusall, to increase their pensions, by whose valour (sayd they) hee had conquered so great Estats without his realm, and for that he had enteyned Lansquenets, as if he had meanes to make war without their forces: they haue no sooner receiued a florin of the Rhin for euery man from the Pope (whereas before the King was enforced to giue much gold, and great presents to their Colonells, to haue them fight) but descending into Lombardie with fifteen or eight thousand men, they force Palisse Lieutenant general of the Kings army, to retire to defend the citie of Milan: Robert Vrsin, Pompey Colonne, Anthony Sabelle, Peter Margane and Rance Mandin had, since the battaile accepted the Kings pay: and now the defect of the Suisses, and the dislodging of Palisse, makes some to lead such men as they had leuiued with the Kings money, vnto the Pope: others retain the money to themselves, onely Margane (more modest then the rest) restores it againe. All this freed the Pope from feare, and confirmed him in his obstinacy. He begins the Councell of F Lateran in the third of May, pronounceth a monitory vnto the King: That he deliver, vpon the peines set downe by the holy Canons, the Cardinal of Medicis, taken prisoner in the war, being a Milan: and after some sessions he surceaseth, to attend the warre.

lehn

A Iohn Paul Bailion, general of the Venetian army, attended the Suisses in the territories of Perona with foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and six thousand foote: being ioyned, they surprise a letter which Palisse did write to the generall of Normandy, who remained at Milan: That it would be very hard to resist the enemies, if they turned towards the Duchie of Milan: A sufficient instruction to direct the in their course, which makes them march towards Milan. Palisse had not with him about a thousand Lances, six or seauen thousand foote, all his other troups being diuided into places for defence: and this generall of Normandie, as bad a warrior as a treasorer (I would not forget to name him, if I had learned his name) hauing after the battaile of Rauenna, vnder colour of sparing for the King, contrarie to the disposition of present affaires, B indelicately discharged the Italians foote and some French. And besides the small number of men, the diffention and disobedience of Captaines, and the soldiars contempt of their commander, ioyned with the discomodities of a tired army: a generall little regarded, ill accompanied, in a Country farre from succors, environed with mightie and many enemies, must needs produce some grear and foddren disorder.

Disorders in the French army.

The best meanes our Captaines could finde, was to abandon the field, and disperse their troups into the most important places. In Bresse two thousand foote, a hundred and fifty Lances, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentins, in Crema fifty Lances and a thousand foote, in Bergame, a thousand foote, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentins. The remainder of the army consisting of six hundred Lances, two thousand French foote, and foure thousand Lansquenets retired to Pontique, a strong place of situation, and fit to succour Milan, Cremona, Bresse, Bergame, and to withstand the enemy.

But it is a great inconuenience to relie most vpon forcaine forces; so subiect to change. The Emperour giues the first stroke, hee calles home his Lansquenets, and their departure making Palisse loose all hope of possibility to defend the Duchie of Milan, hee retires to Pisqueton. So the Cremonois abandoned, yeelds (except the Castell) at the first approach of the confederats, and pay fortie thousand ducats to the Suisses. Certaine banished men returning into Bergame, cause a reuolt, and Palisse D being too weake to stoppe the enemies passage over the riuer of Adde, puts himselfe into Pavia. But hee sought to preuent the ruine of a great building with a rush. Then Iohn Iaques of Triuulce, the generall of Normandie, Anthony Marie Paluiois, eldest of Esconte, and many other gentlemen and seruants to the King, saueth themselves in Piedmont, leaue Milan in prey, which bound it selfe at the first summons to pay a great some of money. Pavia battered and abandoned by the French, is saued by the same meanes from spoile. All Townes except Bresse and Crema, make halt to do the like.

The estate of Milan lost by the French.

All the Country cries against the name of the Empire. All is taken and gouerned in the name of the holy League (for so they called it) The Cardinall of Sion gouernes at his pleasure, and causeth all the taxes of the conquered Townes to be giuen to the Suisses, so as vpon the brute of this money, an infinite number of others ruine and follow with the first. Rimini, Cesenne and Rauenna returne to the Popes obedience, Plaisance and Parma yeeld willingly vnto him, as members of the gouernment of Rauenna. The Suisses seise vpon Lucarne, the Grisons (who also in this crosse left the French alliance) vpon Voltoine and Chiauenne. Genes rebels, expells the French, and Iohn Frangoise, a Captaine in the Venetians army, returning, causeth himselfe to be created Duke, as his father had beene.

At the same instant the Pope recouers all Romagnia, the Bentiuoles abandon Bologne, and the Duke of Vrbis seiseth thercon in Iulius name. So euery one pulls his peece from the whole, and all these estats conquered with so great toyle, so much money, and such losse of blood: are lost at the first attempt, after this great victory of Rauenna, with little labour and lesse bloudshed. Truly, the best wits are confounded in the content of these things: and wee must confesse, that the issue of humane affaires depends

1512. depends of a higher Councell then that of Man. Notwithstanding, according vnto A man, to whome shall we impute the cause of these mischances, but to the death of the Duke of Nemours? for if he had liued, it is likely, that gouerning well his victory, hee had (with his helpe that giues and takes) reaped the fruits worthie thereof. But great neesse comes neyther from the east, nor from the west, nor from the desert, for it is God which gouerns, he pulis downe one, and raiseth an other.

The Pope still gaped with his olde desire, to haue Ferrare in his power. But by the intercession of the Marquis of Mantona, the Ambassador of the King of Arragon (for that Alphonso was borne of a daughter of olde Ferdinand King of Naples) and the Colan- nes, Alphonso hauing demanded and obtrayned pardon of the Pope, vpon promise hereafter to do the deeds and duties of a faithfull feudatarie and vassall of the Church, Iu- B lius turnes his reuenge vpon the companies, wherewith the Florentins had aided the King, whome hee caused to bee spoiled by the Venetian soldiars, with the consent of the Cardinall of Sion, who notwithstanding had giuen them a passport to passe safely into Tuscanie. And by the praides of the sayd Iulius, who (according to the ancient desire of all Popes) fought to haue authority in this common weale, the Medicis, with the helpe of the Confederats, returned to Florence, & settled themselves by force in the dignity which their father was wont to enioy. Italie being for this time freed fro the feare of the French forces, the King holding nothing but Bresse, Crema, Legnague: the Chaste- let and the Lanterne at Genes, the Castells of Milan, of Cremona and some other forts, all these Confederats gaped after the Duchie of Milan: and the Swisses, on whome the C Pope then partly depended, opposing themselves, not to suffer this estate to fall into the hands of any other Prince, but of such a one as could not maintaine himselfe without their aide and succour: Maximilian grandchild to Lodowike Sforce was named Duke of Milan: who made his entrie in the end of December, receiuing the keyes from the hands of the Cardinall of Sion, as confirming the sayd Maximilian: That he held the possession of Milan in the Swisses name. An honorable act and worthy of their generositi:
not to yeeld the honour which belonged vnto the other confederats, the which notwithstanding they should much esteeme, and (it may be) might haue obtained it for money. Nauarre returnes soone after to the obedience of Sforce.

Sforce restored to Milan.

Then the Genoais recouered the Chastelet of Genes, for ten thousand Ducats giuen D to the Capitaine: and the Venetians besieging Bresse, Aubigni who defended it, resolues to deliuer it to the Spaniards, to breed a ialousie betwixt them: euen as a fewe daies before Palisse had giuen Legnague, to the Emperour, to nourish a discord bred betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians, who besieged it. Ottauian Sforce Bishop of Lode and gouernor of Milan, sent foure thousand Swisses to conquer Crema, for Maximilian Sforce: but Benedict Cribario, corrupted by gifts, deliuered it to the Venetians, with the consent of the Lord of Duras, who kept the Castell. This was of purpose to breede aduiou betweene the Swisses and the Venetians. A counsell generally concluded by the French, which remayned of this ship-wrecke, the which in the end wrought some effects:
but the losse fell vpon the French, for with this first disdain of the Venetians against the E Emperour by reason of Legnague, behold a newe leuaine of discontent is laied by the Bishop of Gurse, Maximilians Ambassador at Rome. Hee made great instance, that the Venetians should deliuer Vincence to the Emperour: wherevnto, neither soliciting, intearings, nor the Popes threats could induce the Venetians. The Pope (desiring to gra-tifie Maximilian: that in his fauour he should approue the Councell of Lateran against that of Pisa) protested to the Ambassadors of Vence: That he should be forced to pursue their common weale both with spirituall and temporall armes. So as nothing moued with this protestation, the Pope, the Emperour & the Arragonis renue the league of Cambraye, declaring the Venetians to be excluded. So the Emperour (by the Bishop of Gurse, in the next session of this Councell of Lateran) disauowed all them that had vised his name in the Councell of Pisa, and allowed that of Lateran.

Spain.

A Spain towards France, to assaile ioyntly (according to the conuentions of the two Kings of Arragon and England, father in Lawe and sonne) the Duchie of Guienne: vpon this pretext the Arragonis had intreated Iohn son to Alain of Albret and King of Na- uarre, but by reason of Katherin of Foix his wife, heire of the sayd realme, to remayne a newtie betwixt the King of France and him: and that, for the assurance thereof, hee should deliuer certaine places into his hands, promising to redeliuer them when the warre should be ended.

But the Nauarrois knowing well the demanders intent, obtains a promise of succours from King Lewis: who, to diuert the Arragonis forces, treated with the Duke of Ale Lieutenant generall for Ferdinand in this army. But when the one partie is vigilant and politike, and the other slouthfull, there soone appeeres great effects.
The Industry & vigilancie of Ferdinand, the slackenesse and too great facility of Lewis, who abused with the policie and deuises of his Nephew) did equally hurt the Nauar- rois, who suffered himselfe likewise to bee deceiued with the fraudulent hopes wherewith the Arragonis entertayned him, who (seeing the succours of France farre off, the realme vnfurnished of forces, and the places not yet fortified) enters into Nauarre, takes Pampelune, and the other Townes of the realme, abandoned by Iohn (being vna-ble to defend it) and fled into Bearne.

Nauarre usurped by the Arragonis.

And hauing no lawfull title to possesse it, publisheth, that hee is lawfully seized thereon, by the authority of the Apostolike see, whereby the sayd realme was giuen to the first that should conquer it, by reason of the alliance which Iohn had with the King of France, a sworne enemy to the Church, and by the Popes bull, both beeing subiect to the censure, as heretikes & schismatikes. Without doubt the Pope holds not this prerogative of Iesus Christ, to giue kingdomes, and to expose them in prey: for he exhorted to yeeld, and not to take from Cesar: and the Apostles did not busie themselves, to diuide earthly possessions. Moreouer, is it lawfull for the Pope to vsurpe an other mans right, giue away that which is not his owne, and consequently vse the spirituall sword against those he cannot iudge, hauing declared himselfe a party?

After the Conquest of Nauarre, the Englishs perswaded Ferdinand to the Sege of Bay- onne, who without this place made no reckoning of the rest of Guienne. But he held D that which he long wished for, as a commodious Country and very necessary for the safetie of Spain, and could not affect the warre on this side the Pyrence mountaines.
So as the Englishs, seeing that Ferdinand did vse them onely to satisfie his priuat coue-teousness, tooke shipping, and sayled into England.

To recouer this vsurped realme, the King sent Francis Duke of Longueuille, gouer-nour of Guienne, Charles Duke of Bourbon, sonne to Gilbert late Viceroy of Naples, Odet of Fois Viceroy of Lautrec, Iohn of Chabannes, Lord of Palisse, Marshall of France, Peter of Terral, the Lords of Maugiron, Lude, Barbezicux, Turenne, Escars, Ventadour, Pompadour and other valiant Capitaines and Gascons, which hee assembled from all parts. But the army being diuided by the dissention of the Duke of Longueuille, who as Gouer-nour of Guienne, pretended the commande to belong vnto him: and the Duke of E Bourbon vnwilling to yeeld vnto him, by reason of his quality, proued fruitlesse for the King of Nauarre. Thus the realme of Nauarre was inuaded by the Spaniards, who remained master thereof.

The departure of the Englishs, and the enterprize of Nauarre being made frustrate, nothing affects the affaires of Milan, with greater vehemencie, whilst that the Castell, and that of Cremona held good: but the opposition of so many enemies bred many plots. There were many hopes to drawe some one of these from this common alliance, the Bishop of Gurse had courteously giuen care to a friend of the Cardinall of S- ion, whome the Queene of France had sent vnto him, and held one of his people at the Kings Court to make a motion, that the King should bind him selfe to aide the Emperour against the Venetians: that Charles grand-child to Maximilian, should marry the Kings youngest daughter, to whome he should giue the Duchie of Milan, and that the King should yeeld vnto them the rights he pretended to the realme of 8513. of Naples, and that the said Duchy being recovered, Cremona and Giaradadda, should be held by the Emperour. Moreouer the Venetians were wonderfully grieved at the Popes new treaty with the Emperour: which put the King in hope to draw the Venetians vnto him. The Aragonis came betwene by a politike stratageme: to assure his new Conquest of Nauarre, he had sent two Fryers into France (it is the Spaniards custom to manage affaires by the meanes of religious persons, to make their negotiations the more graue, and to colour their policies with more subtilty) to treat with the Queene, touching a general peace, or a priuate, betwixt the two Kings. The amity of the Suisses did import much. But remembring, that by their forces, Charles the 8. had first troubled the peace of Italy, Lewis his successor, by meanes thereof, had conquered the Estate of Milan, recovered Genes, and ouerthrow the Venetians: that at this present the Pope and other Potentates of Italie payed them annuall pensions, to be received into their confederacie: They grew obstinate in refusing the Kings alliance, which he sought by the Lords of Tremouille and Triunlee. In the end, the King being reiecte by the Suisses (seekes the Venetians, who conclude to make a league with the King, according to the capitulations made formerly betwixt them, by the which Cremona & Giaradadda should remaine to the Robertet, Secretary of the State, Triunlee and almost all the chiefe of the Councell approued this league. But the persuasions of the Cardinall of S. Seuerin opposite to Triunlee, and the Queenes authority, (who desired much the greatnes of her daughter by the foresaid marriage; so as she might remaine with her, vntill the consummation thereof,) made the King and his Councell incline to the Emperours party. But discouering, that these were but practises of the Emperour, to make the King proceed more coldly in his courtes, he soone gaue it ouer.

Whilest that armes ceased on all sides, the Popes passions encreased. He renewed his desseines against Ferrare, Sienna, Luques, Florence and Genes, and as if it had beene in his power to beat all the world at one instant: he thrust the King of England into warre, in whose fauour he had dispatcht a Bull in the Councell of Lateran, whereby the title of most Christian was giuen vnto him, and the Realme of France againe abandoned to him that should conquer it. But as he deuised of all these things, and without doubt of many other more high secrets (according to the capacity of his terrible spirit, howe great foener) death ended the course of his present toyles, the 21. day of February at night.

Pope Julius dies.
A new election.
A truce betwixt France and Aragon.

A Prince doublelesse of courage, of admirable constancie, and most worthy of glory, if he had directed his intentions to aduance the Church by peace, as he sought to grow great in temporall things, by policies in war, John Cardinall of Medius succeeded him, and was called Leo. 10. The happy memory of his father, his lawfull election free from bribes and Simonie, his faire conditions, his liberality and mildnesse of spirit, gaue great hope of the quiet of Christendome. Yet soone after his instalment, he shewed plainly that he was rather successor of his predecessors hatred and couetous passions, then of S. Peter.

According to the treaty of the aboue named Friers, the Kings of France & Aragon concluded a truce, whereby our Lewis hauing more liberty to thinke of the waies of Milan, refused to send an army, knowing well that the people of that estate, oppressed with excessive taxes, leaued to pay the Suisses, and with the lodging and payment made to the Spaniards, desired earnestly to returne to his obedience. And to make this enterprise the more easie, the accord propounded before with the Venetians was againe renewed: so as the Venetians considering, that a concord with Maximilian keeping Verona from them) was not sufficient to protect them from troubles and dangers, and that hardly they should get such an occasion to recover their estate, they binde themselves by Andrew Gritti: To ayde the King with eight hundred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, and ten thousand foot: to recover Ast, Genes, and the Duchie of Milan. And the King: to assist them, vntill they had recovered all they had possessed in Lombardie, and in the Marquisate of Treuis before the treaty of Cambray.

The

A The King knew well, it were but labour lost to seeke the Pope, who desired to haue 1513. to Frenchman in Italy. Yet the deuotion he had to the Romaine sea, made him sue vnto Leo: not to hinder him in the recouerie of the aboue named places, offering not onely not to passe any further, but also at all times to make such peace with him as he pleased. But Leo treading the steps of his Predecessor, perswades the King of England to ioyne with the Aragonis in the oppression of France, according to the Bull giuen by Inlio: he protested to continue in the league made with the Emperour, with the Catholicke King and with the Suisses. The King thus frustrate of a peace with the Pope, sends the Lord of Triunlee, with fiftene hundred Lances, eight hundred light horse, and fiftene thousand foote, halfe French and halfe Lansquenets. The whole Countrie was already in a mutinie, the Earle of Mussocagne, sonne to John James of Triunlee, was entred into Ast and Alexandria: the French had taken Cremona, Soncin, Lode, and other places nere: and the Milanois had executed themselves to their Duke, who was at Nouarre: for that hauing no man to defend them, they made their composition with the French: yet giuing him hope to returne to his subiection, when as the Suisses and his confederates should ioyne in field. Bartholmew of Aluiane, Generall of the Venetian armie, had taken Valege, Pesquiere, and Bresse, when as the Kings armie at sea approaching to Genes, and finding Othobon and Sinibaud, the sonnes of Lewis of Fiesque, leading foure thousand foote: and on the other side Antonel and Ierome Adornes, with a great number of the country men: they tooke Genes from the Fregoses, where the victors entring, (transported with the farric of reuenge,) the two Fiesques bretheren, caused Zacharie brother to the Duke of Genes to be slaine, and then to be tyed cruelly to a horse tayle, and dragged through the Citie, being present a little before, at the death of Ierome their brother, who comming out of the Palace, had beene murdered by Lodowike and Fregosus, brothers to the Duke.

All this succeeded well: but forty thousand Ducats, lately sent by the Pope to the Suisses, had drawne an infinite number into the estate of Milan, thrusting themselves into Nouarre, at the first brate that the French meant to besiege it. It was the same Nouarre, wherein Lodowick Sforce, father to this present Duke, was taken prisoner. In the Kings campe were the same Captaines, Tremouille and Triunlee: some of the same Ensignes and Colonels which had sold the father, accompanied the sonne in this warre. And these persurations caused Tremouille to make this ouer-bold promise to the King: That he hoped to deliuer him the sonne prisoner in the same place, where before he had giuen him the father. The remembrance of happinesse past, comforts the hope: but lets vs take heed, least vnder this colour we grow insolent and carelesse. Now the arrogancie of our French, findes a firmer resolution in the Suisses, whereof followes a strange catastrophe, and an ouerthrow of the desseine. The armie batters Nouarre furiously, and layes a great part of the wall euen with the ground: but whereas the descent was wonderfull hard and dangerous, so as Tremouille aduertised, that new Suisses were entred into it, and that Altosifz a very famous Colonell, brought a greater number, which comming by the valley of Aouft, approached to Turee, despairing to take the Towne, he retired his Campe, to go fight with the succours that came, making his account to breake the enemies, rather by their owne disorders for want of pay, then by the force of his armes.

But by the perswasion of Atorin, one of their Captaines, ten thousand Suisses issue forth in the night, the 6. of Iune, without horses and artilerie, against a mightie armie, and better provided: they set vpon our French, not asleepe, but in a lodging vnfortified. The men at armes assemble at the first alarum of their Sentinels, range themselves in battaile, and the foote vnder their colours. The artilerie laide many Suisses on the ground, when as the sunne beginning to appeare, the body of their armie resoluing rather to be cut in peeces then retire, futen thousand of them fall violently vpon the Lansquenets who garded the artilerie: and 3000. of them plant themselves with their Pikes charged, against the horse. The Suisses and Lansquenets, thrust on with a mutuall hatred, and a desire of victory, bewee one another with a bloudy furie, one while the one thrinkes, by chaled and recoiles, and then the other: filling the field with dead bodies wounded men, and with bloud, in view of the men at armes, lodged so as they could not succour the foot, by reason of brookes and ditches, that were betwixt them. So the Suisses after two houres combate remained victors, winne the Artillerie, turne the mouth of it against our men, and put both foote and horse to flight, of whom there is nothing remarkable obserued, but that Robert of la Marke, Lord of Sedan, vnderstanding that Flouranges and Jamets his sonnes, Colonels of the Regiments of Lansquenets, lay among the dead carcases, moued with furie, and a tatherly affection, heruns into the midst of the Suisses troupes, and in despight of them, laies the eldest vpon his horse, and the yongest vpon one of his men at armes, bringing them aliue out on the conflict, being referred to shew future prootes of their valour. There died about threene hundred Suisses, with the Author of this glorious Council: Of ours, the most part of the Lansquenets fighting, and of the French flying, vnto the number (as the Italian Authors say) of ten thousand. All the horse in a manner saued themselves: the Suisses not able to pursue them for want of horse: all their baggage was lost, and two and twenty peeces of great Artillery, with all the horse appointed for the same. Doubtlesse it was one of the most glorious batailles that euer the Suisses wonne: whereby we obserue, that to bee surprised and preuented, takes away all iudgement of command from the best commanders, daunts the soldiers courage, & breeds confusion in order.

The memorable valour of Robert of la Marke.

This victory being gotten, all places which had declared themselves for the French, craue pardon, and purchase their peace for money. Milan for two hundred thousand Ducats, & the rest according to their power, to be distributed to the Suisses, to whom was due the glory and profit of this victory gotten by their bloud and valour. Otho Fregoso (aided by three thousand Spaniards, commanded by the Marquis of Pescare) enters Genes, and causeth himselfe (to the preiudice of John his brother) to be created Duke of Genes. Aluiane (fearing least this happy successe of the Suisses and Spaniards should draw them vpon him) retires himselfe, takes Legnague from the Germanes, besiegeth Ferrari, but in vaine, and then lodgeth his armie within Padoua. The two chiefe Authors of the Councell of Pisa, Bernardin, Carnagial and Frederic of S. Severin, amazed w. h. this route, went and craued pardon of the Pope, and were restored to the ranke of Cardinals. In the end of the yeare, the Castels of Milan and Cremona, returned to the Duke of Milan obedience, so as the King held nothing in Italy, but the Lanterne of Genes, the which wee shall see taken and razed by the Genouois. Without doubt, he that seekes profit farre from his owne home, is oft times forced to returne poore and naked.

Troubles in France by the English.

The King thus dispossessed of his estates in Italy, turnes his thoughts now, & armes to crosse the attempts of England. Henry King of England hauing (at the Popes perswasion) resolved to invade the realme of France, agrees with the Emperour to giue him six score thousand Ducats, to enter Bourgonne at the same instant, with three thousand horse, and eight thousand foote, Germanes and Suisses, promising the Suisses a certaine summe of money, to ioyne their forces with Maximilian, being content they should receive a part of Bourgonne, vntill they were fully satisfied. According to this agreement, the English enters the marches of Picardie, & camps before Therouenne, with five thousand horse of combat, and aboute fortie thousand foote. But the English forces did not molest France at land only: the Admiral of England ran along the coasts of Normandie and Brittanie. And the King to resist their incursions, caused foure Gallies to passe the straight of Gibraltar, vnder the charge of Captaine Pregent. At the first encounter the Admirall chased Pregent into Brest. Here Pregent turnes his force, fights with the Admirall, and hurts him, whereof he died within few daies after. After that, foure score English ships, and twenty Normands and Brittons ships, fought with equall forces, ours hauing the winde. But in the end Primauguet a Britton, Captaine of the Nunne, which Queen Anne had caused to be built, beset by ten or twelue English ships, and resolute to sell his death dearly, graped with the Regent, the chiefe ship of the enemies fleet, and fiering it, burnt both the one and the other, with all that was in them.

Therouenne

Therouenne was defended by two hundred and fiftie Lances, and two thousand foot, whilst the King prepared two thousand five hundred Launces, ten thousand Lansquenets led by the Duke of Gueldres, sixe thousand others, which the Duke of Norfolk brought (being fled long before out of England) and tenne thousand French, to succour the beleeged, who in the meane time molested the enimie, day and night, with their artillerie, with the which the great Chamberlaine of England was slaine, and Talbot Captaine of Calis lost a legge. The troupes assembled, the King sent them to Aire, vnder the command of Louis of Longueuille, Marquis of Rotelin, Captaine of the hundred, gentlemen of his household. Victuals grew scant in Therouenne, when as the Lord of Picardie, gouernour of Picardie, and the French Captaines, chose out the most resolute of all their troupes, and gaue them charge to carrie victuals to the Towne. And for that their enterprise had happily succeeded, retyring too confidently, and reproching the enimie of cowardise, hauing no intelligence of their intent, the English hauing sent their horse, and fiftene thousand foote, to cut off our mens passage, who did ride on their mages disarmed; they charge them vniuares (being readie to wade through a riuer, that passeth at Huchin), they kill about three hundred, and take many prisoners: amongst others, the Marquis of Rotelin, Bayard, la Fayette, Clermont of Anjou, and Eussy of Amboise: all the rest casting away their Launces, and trusting to their heeles, and horses, saued themselves by flight. And therfore they call it the bataille of spurres, which caused the yeelding of Therouenne, the which was dismantled: to take away all cause of discord, betwixt the Archduke Charles, (who by ancient right pretended it,) and the English, who challenged it, as conquered from the enimie by the sword.

The counte of Spaur.

From Therouenne Henry went to campe before Tournay, following in this resolution, not so much the actions of a good Commander in the warre (seeing the taking of this place, lying within the low Countries brought him small profit) as the perswasions of Maximilian, hoping that this Towne pulled from the French, might in time returne to the obedience of his grandchild Charles, to whome, they pretended it appertained. Tournay vniuersified of men of warre, and dispayring of succours, for that the King not being master of the field, nor of sufficient force to incounter the English, could not succour it; saued her selfe from spoyle, paying a hundred thousand Crownes. To crosse the English, at home, the King had stirred vp James King of Scotland (an ancient allie to this Crowne,) but the chance of armes was nothing fortunate for him, neither at land, nor at sea, for ioyning with the English armie, where Queene Catherine was present, he was vanquished vpon Til, and slaine, with aboute twelue thousand Scots. After these victories, the end of October approaching, Henry left a great garrison in Tournay: dismissed his strangers, and toke his way towards England, carrying no other recompence for so great, and sumptuous a preparation for warre, but the Cittie of Tournay. But some desleins vpon Scotland (fallen into a pupils hands,) hastned him home. An other storme threatened France. The Suisses armed according to the former conventions: the King sends Tremouille vnto them, to disperse them, vnder whome many of the Colonels, had received the Kings pay. But neither by presents, nor promises, preuailed he any thing: onely he had a secret intelligence giuen him from some Captains, to provide for the defence of his gouernment of Bourgonne, whether the Pope, the Emperour, & Sforce did thrust them. And behold foure score, or fiftene thousand Suisses, with the troupes of the French Countie, a thousand horse, and the artillerie which the Emperour gaue them, vnder the conduct of Ulric Duke of Wirttemberg camped before Dijon: Tremouille was returned, with a thousand Launces, and six thousand foot, who by his practises had greatly altered the Colonels, when as the multitude doubting the faith of their Captaines, takes the artillerie, and batters the wall. Tremouille not able to resist the force of this nation, which increased daily, flies to the last remedy, and without expecting any authoritie from his Maiestie, agrees with them: That the King should renounce the rights he had to the Duchy of Milan, & should pay them 400000 crownes within a time prefixed, which they pretended was due for their seruices in the former wars: and for assurance therof, he gaue for hostages, his nephew of Mekieres Bailife of Dijon, and

and foure bourgeois of the said towne, who saving themselves awhile after in Germany, escaped the threats of this people, to cut off their heads, if the King did not ratifie it. Doubtlesse, these were wise men, to save their heads from the Suisses choler. A very prejudiciall accord for the King, if he had beene constrained to ratifie it. But was not better to lull the Suisses a sleepe, then to loose Dijon?

Our Lewis is now freed off two incombrances, the English, and the Suisses. But the exemption of present dangers freed him not from a relaps, for the English departing, threatened to returne in the spring, and prepared already, being loth to stay any more so long at the warre. The Emperour had the like intent to annoy him. The Catholike King desired (as was discovered by a letter, written to his Ambassadour resident with Maximilian) the meanes to draw this Duchie of Milan to Ferdinand their comon granchild, younger brother to Charles the Archduke, shewing that by that meanes, all the other estates of Italie should bee forced to take their law from them, that it should be easie for the Emperour, assisted with the armes of Arragon and Naples, to make himselfe Pope (the which he had alwaies desired since the death of his wife.) & being installed in S. Peters chaire, he should renounce the Imperial Crowne, in favour of the said Archduke. Moreover, the bad affection of the irreconcilable Suisses was apparent. The flight of the hostages had newly incensed them, who threatened Bourgogne or Daulphine.

The Pope desired greatly the whole extirpation of the Counsell of Pisa, especially for matters decreed, either by the authoritie of the sayd Councell, or against the Popes authoritie, the which (not revoked) must needs breed great confusions. Yet could he not obtaine this abolition before the King did ratifie it. Three Cardinals were therefore appointed to redresse these disorders. But the greatest difficultie was about the abolition of Censures, which the King (said they) had incurred, thinking it a thing unworthie of the Apostolike see to graunt, if the King did not demand it: the which his Maiestie would not yeeld unto, whereby both his person and his realme had beene taxed of schisme. In the end, the King overruled by the earnest sute both of the Queene and his subjects, wearied with so many crosses, resolves to yeeld to the Popes will, hoping he: eafter, by this meanes, to find him favorable. And therefore at the eight session of the Councell of Lateran, which was in the end of the yeare, the Kings agents, in his name, and by his command, renounced the petty Councell of Pisa, adhering to the Councell of Lateran, and so obtained full renunciation of all things committed against the Romaine Church.

Amidst so many forraigne vexations, which infinitely troubled the Kings mind, there chanced a home-bred affliction, the death of the Queene his wife: A Princess endued with most vertues incident to an honorable Ladie, and for this cause greatly lamented of the whole realme. This death was the accomplishment of the marriage betwixt Francis Duke of Valois, and Earle of Angouleme, and Claude the Kings eldest daughter: the which had bin deferred till then: for that the Queene loved not Lorise of Suavia mother to the said Francis, affected more to haue Charles of Austria, afterwards Emperour, for her sonne in law. The Realme being reduced to the obedience of the Church of Rome, the Pope (to whom the Kings greatnesse was commonly fearefull) begins now to feare least his power should bee too much suppressed, and that the enemies of France should hereafter ioin their forces to the prejudice of the Romain Court. To balance things in such sort, as he might subsist in the midst, and that the meanes which ayded one of his intentions, should not hurt another: considering that the irreconcilable hatred of the Suisses, might force the King to resigne his rights of the Duchie of Milan to the Emperour and Catholike King, in regard of the marriage which they pretended (a very prejudiciall thing to the common libertie of Italie): and holding it also dangerous to haue the King to recouer it, hee perswaded the Suisses, that their extreme hatred might force the King to take a course no lesse hurtfull to the libertie of their common weale (considering the little loue which Maximilian and Ferdinand did beare them) then to the Church and all Italie. Moreover, to make the Kings

A King descent into Italie more difficult at all euents, he labours an accord betwixt the Emperour and the Senate of Venice: who being resolute, either to haue a firme peace concluded, or open warre, would by no meanes giue care to any truce, for that had beene to settle the Emperours affaires, and busines, in those Townes which hee inioined.

The Popes perswasions were fruitlesse with the Suisses: the Emperour and Venetians made him Iudge of their controuersies, but without decision for either partie: hee once commands them to surcease from armes, vntill the pronounciation of his sentence. The Catholike King could not more firmly assure the realme of Nauarre, then by a peace. Our Lewis & he prolog the truce for a yeare, adding to the former articles, one that was secret. That during the truce, the King might not molest the estate of Milan.

That which the Pope could not get of the Suisses, hee obteyned of the King of England: Henry discontent that his father in law had againe deceiued him, by the prolongation of a truce, without his consent, grew daily more vnwilling to make warre in France. The Pope desiring by some kindnesse, to win the Kings loue, and fearing daily, that Lewis oppressed with enemies, would allie himselfe, both by a peace, and consanguinitie with Maximilian and Ferdinand: he sent the Cardinall of Yorke, to perswade his King: That remembring what correspondencie of faith he had found in the Emperour, the Catholike King, and the Suisses, and contenting himselfe with his happy passage, and returne, hee should cease any more to afflict France with his forces.

The Cardinall finding Henry disposed to peace, whome the Duke of Longueville (a prisoner, taken in the warre) had already moued, and Lewis desiring it, with all his heart, (hauing sent the Generall of Normandie) but more vnder colour to treat of the deliuerie of the Duke of Longueville, and his companions in prison, they made an agreement betwixt the two Kings, in the beginning of August, for their liues, and a peace after their death, vpon condition, That the King of England should enioy Tournay, and the King of France should pay him sixe hundred thousand Crownes. That they should bee bound to defend the estates one of another, with tenne thousand foote, if the warre were by land: and sixe thousand, if it were by sea: That the King of France should furnish the King of England with twelue hundred Launces at need, and the King of England with tenne thousand foote: but at his charge that should haue neede.

A peace with the English.

This peace was confirmed by the marriage of Lewis with Mary sister to Henry. But the Pope was not perswaded, so great a hatred might so sodainly bee converted into amitie, and alliance. For as hee had made the first motion, so did hee expect to bee made acquainted with the conclusion: wherein hee made accompt to reserve this clause, That the King should not inuade the Duchie of Milan for a time. The Emperour and Catholike King were exceeding iealous: yet the last assured him selfe to receive two contents. The one, that the Archduke his granchild was out of hope, to giue his sister in marriage to Lewis: The other, that Lewis being in possibilitie to haue heires males, the succession of Francis Earle of Angouleme should remaine doubtfull, whome hee hated exceedingly, seeing him greatly inclined to restore the Realme of Nauarre, to the ancient estate. The Suisses reioyced, not for any affection they beare vnto the King, but foreseeing that Lewis hauing truce with the Arragonois, and peace with the Venetian, and English, would employ his forces to recouer Milan, and this should bee a new whetstone to sharpen their hatred, and make their vertue knowne to the whole world. No man doubted of the Kings resolution herein, and in deede hee prepared for it, hauing retained the Lansquenets, which the Duke of Gueldres had brought against the English.

Lewis King of France marries Mary of England.

And the Pope, although it were a verie troublesome thing vnto him, to haue the King recouer this estate, yet knowing that his perswasions could not diuert the enterprise, he acquieseth him (but faintly) not to prolong it, giuing him to vnderstand that 1514. that things were ill prepared to resist. The Emperour had no forces, and as little money; the Arragonis armie was growne weake, and not paid: the people of Milan poore and brought almost to despair: no man could furnish money to make the Suisses marche: and Fregose was not out of hope to agree with his Maiestie for the Seignourie of Genes.

The Popes
pollicie.

But let vs obserue his pollicie. All these prouocations came not from a sincere heart. The Pope sees every one tired with trauels past, and ill prouided. And now the French had taken breath, and fortified themselves with new alliances: he begins to feare the King, and would assure himselfe of his forces, in case he came into Italy. Moreover he knew well the King could not this yeare molest the estate of Milan, by reason of a clause mentioned in the truce with the Arragonis: and if it should so fall out, this good inclination and will, should serue him for an excuse with the King, when as he should require either his consent or helpe. During this truce, the Lanterne at Genes being reduced to all extremitie, for want of victuals, and not able to be succoured, yields to the Genouois, who made it euen with the Causey. Thus the King was dispossessed of all his conquests in Italy. We must not wonder if the people, make heapes of Stones of the Castles within their Townes, when they fall into their powers: for they are but shackles of their libertie.

In the meane time, the new confederacie which the Pope contracted with the Emperour, betwixt whom and the Venetians, Leon laboured an agreement, not giuing the King any notice thereof. Lending him fortie thousand Ducats, and receiving from him Modene in pawne, gaue our Lewis new causes of ialousie and distrust. To bereft him then of the Popes intent, he sends to intreat him, to declare himselfe in his fauour, adding moreover, that if he might not be in good termes of friendship with him, he would accept such conditions of Maximilian and Ferdinand as he had refused. On the other side, Maximilian and the Arragonis wanted no perswasions full of efficacy, to vnite the Pope vnto them, for the defence of Italy: shewing, that if vnited together, they had beene able to chase the French out of the Duchie of Milan, they were not now more vnable to defend it against him. They did not omit to shew, that if the King remained in his d. feins, he would not faile to be reuenged at the same instant of all the injuries he had received, namely of the money, where with Leon had lately thrust the D Swiss into Fourgogne. And the authoritie of the Suisses, (who continuing in their fidelity, offered for six thousand Florines of the Rhin, to take and defend the passages of Mount Senis, Mount Geneure, and Finat: and for fortie thousand Florines a month, to invade Fourgogne with twenty thousand men) did strangely moue the Popes minde, who restrained by feare of that he most desired, made some scruplet to bewray his conceit, giuing them all good hopes vnder general termes.

In the end, being prest by the King, behold his answer: That he had perswaded him to passe into Italy, in such a way as without danger or effusion of blood, he might haue reaped an assured victorie. That now other Princes haue so ordered their affaires, as there is no more hope to vanquish but with much hazard and blood. And, for that the Turke had lately increased his power much by a notable victorie against the Sophi of Persia, Leon therefore forgoes not to adde: That it is was neither conformable to his nature, nor agreeable to his office, to fauour Christian Princes armes against themselves. That he could not but exhort him to such, attending some more easie and better oportunitie, which being offered, he should alwayes finde in him the same disposition, to his glory and greatnesse, that he had some few months before made shew of.

This answer was sufficient to quail the Kings hope of Leons fauour: yea to let him vnderstand, that he would oppose both his Councell and forces against this enterprise, which the King had resolved for the Duchie of Milan, according to the charge he had giuen to the Duke of Bourbon. But death, which commonly cuts off the counsels of a man with his life, stayed this resolution, to reuiue it soone after in the minde, of his next successor. For as Lewis pleased himselfe exceedingly in the excellent beautie of his new Spouse, being but eightene yeares old, behold a feuer, accompanied with a flux,

A flux of blood, frees him from the troubles and cares of this world, to enioy an eternall 1514. and happy rest in heauen, noting the first day of Ianuarie, with the exceeding greefe which his memorie graued in the hearts of all his subjects.

His vertues.
He was a godly Prince, iust, chaste, milde, temperate, loyall, louing his Princes, his Nobilitie and his people, and likewise beloued of them; a friend to sinceritie, plainnesse, and truth, an enemy to enuie, lying and flatterie. Let vs obserue, for a testimonie thereof, that soyaill apothegme, being vrged by the flatterers of the Court, to take reuenge of Lewis of Tremouille, who had overcome and taken him at the battaile of S. Aubin, the King of France (saith he) doth not take upon him: the quarrels of a Duke of Orleans. If hee hath faithfully serued the King his Maister, against me who was but Duke of Orleans, he will do the like for me, who am now King of France. But about all, he was good to his subjects, whom he did alwayes studie to ease: for how many leuies hath he made both of horse and foote, without the oppression of his people, by any new imposition? How often haue his subjects, willingly granted him an increase of subsidies, to supply his forreine and domesticall affaires, and yet would he not allowe of these impositions, preferring rather to cut off the expenses of his owne person, and his house, to saue his people from oppression and spoile.

Francis was neuer leane (so populous, so fruitfull, so riche, so well tilled, nor so well built, as in this raigne). A happy raigne in the obseruation of Iustice, martiall discipline, liberie of traffike, increase of goods, cheapnesse of victuals: and which is more, every man to eate his bread quietly at his owne board, free from our ages and Souldiers violence. To conclude, neuer King loued his people so much, neuer subjects loued their King more: neuer subjects gave with greater ioy to their Soueraigne, then the French did to him, that glorious surname of Father of his people.

FRANCIS the first of that name, 58. King of France.

Non

1515.

Happie is that Realme (saith the wise man,) which falls not into a child's hands. This was the first comfort which reuiued the hearts of the French, oppressed with mourning, and heavinesse, for the death of their good King Lewis, the twelfth. The second was, that they cast their eyes vpon a worthy successor, a Prince well borne, iudicious, and of a generous spirit: liberall, courteous in the prime of his age, and fit for gouernment, affable to the people, Princes good countenance,) and (that which all subiects admire in their Soueraigne) of an excellent beautie. Thus capable was he of the royall dignitie.

Francis being then two and twentie yeares old, before Duke of Valois, and Earle of Angoulesme, took vpon him the gouernment of this Monarchie, as sonne to Charles Earle of Angoulesme, sonne to John Earle of Angoulesme, who was the youngest sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans, (murdered by the Bourguignon at Paris, in the time of Charles the sixth) who was also the youngest sonne of King Charles the fifth. Hee was anointed at Rheims, the five and twentieth of Ianuary, being attended on by the Dukes of Bourbon and Alanson, the Earles of Montpensier, Vendosme, and Saint Paul, & the Prince of Roche-sur-Yon, al of the house of Bourbon. Then hauing made his entry into Paris, & a sollemne Tournie kept, in Saint Anthones street: he confirmed all the ancient officers of the Crowne, and to supplie those which were vacant, hee created Charles Duke of Bourbon Constable of France, (being void by the death of John the second Duke of Bourbon), Antonie Prat, Chancellor (for then Steuen Panchier Bishoppe of Paris was keeper of the seale) Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Vendosme, Gouernour of the Ile of France, making the said Countie a Duchie, and a Peere of France: the Lord of Lautrec, Gouernour of Guienne, Palisse Marshall of France, Boiss, his gouernour in his youth, Lord Steward and Superintendent of his house, with whom he ioyned Fleuremond, Robertet, Secretarie of State. With this title of King of France, he took vpon him that of the Duke of Milan, not onely as descending of the house of Orleans, the true heire of that Duchie: but also as comprehended in the inuestiture made by the Emperour, according to the treatie of Cambrai. And for that hee succeeded equally, both to the Crowne, and the desire his Predecessor had to recouer that goodly estate of Milan, he therfore (to worke it with more facilitie) renued the peace, made betwixt the deceased King, and the King of England, sending home Mary, the widowe of Lewis, with a dowrie of threescore thousand Crownes a yeare: who afterwards married with the Duke of Suffolke. Hee also confirmed the alliance this Crowne had with the Senat of Venice. The Archduke Charles, sent a very honorable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Nassau was the cheefe, to doe him homage, for the Counties of Flanders, Arthois, and other Lands, which held of this Crowne, and (the which gaue great hope, of a future peace, betwixt these two Princes, both being yong, but marked for great matters) to treat a marriage betwixt the said Charles, and Renée the Queenes sister, who was after wife to the Duke of Ferrari. And for that the sayd Earle was greatly fauoured by the Prince Charles, the King desirous to gratifie him, caused him to marrie with the daughter of the Prince of Orange, bred vp in his Court.

Charles was yet vnder age, but so carefully instructed by that wise Lord of Chivres, of the house of Croye, whom the deceased King Lewis had made choise of, to gouerne him in his youth, (for that Philippe the father of Charles had by his testament intreated Lewis to accept the charge of his sonne) that euen in his yonger yeares hee made him capable to vnderstand the affaires, presenting vnto him all packets that came, causing him to make report thereof vnto his Councell, and to determine all things in his presence. He did foresee, that after the death of Ferdinand his grandfather by the mother, the French might crosse him in his passage from Flanders.

Flanders into Spain: holding it dangerous, to stand in the midst, betwixt the Kings of France and England vnited together, and not to fortifie himselfe, with this common alliance. Moreouer his subiects of the low Countries, would haue no waies with the Realme of France. The King likewise desired, to take from him all motives, to gouerne himselfe hereafter, by the counsell of his two grandfathers. They therefore agreed: That the marriage proceeding betwixt the Archduke, and Renée, the King should giue him six hundred thousand Crownes, and the Duchie of Berry for euer, to her, and to heires: vpon condition she should renounce all rights of inheritance, both from father and mother, namely to the Duchies of Milan, and Brittanie. That after the death of the Catholike King, the King should ayd the Archduke with men and shippes, to goe and receiue his Realmes of Spain.

The Arragonois demanded a continuance of the truce: but the King meaning to put out that clause. Not to molest the Duchie of Milan during the truce, their parole was fruitlesse. The Emperour (who ioyned his desseins to the counsels of Ferdinand) opposed against the amitie of the French. The Suisses were as forward as before. As for the Pope, Francis desired to be freed from all bond to him, that he might resolve for the best, according to the course of his affaires. To build vpon these foundations, he now employes his Capitaines, men at armes, and the prouisions which his Predecessor had first prepared, and makes his armie march with speed to Lions: whether his Maestie comes in Iuly, hauing left the Regencie of the Realme to Louise of Sauoy his mother. The Duke of Bourbon Constable, led the foreward, accompanied with his brother Francis, newly created Duke of Castelleraud: the Marshalls of Palisse, and Tremouille, Charles of Tremouille Prince of Talmont, sonne to Louis Vicont of Ionars, the Earle of Sancerre, the Baron of Beard, the Lords of Bonniuet, Imbercourt, and Teligny, Senet, all of Rouergue, Peter of Naurre (whome the King had drawn to his seruice, giuing him his libertie without ranfome) commaunded six thousand Gascons, and the Lords of Lorges (grandfather to the late Montgomerys) Pirault of Margiron, Richbourg, Jortel, little Lainet, Onatilleu, Hercules of Dauphine, and Capitaine Commarque: euery one commaunding five hundred foote, making foure thousand, and eight or nine thousand Lansquenets, led by Charles Duke of Guelders.

The King led the battaile: followed by the Duke of Vendosme, Lorraine, and Albania, the Earle of Saint Paul, Claude of Lorraine Earle of Guise brother to the Duke of Lorraine, the Lords of Lantrec and Lescut, brothers to Arual, a yonger brother of the house of Albret, Tremouille, René bastard of Sauoy, (who was afterwards Lord Steward of France, and gonerour of Prouence, whose daughter Anne of Montmorency, the Constable married) and Capitaine Bayard, to whom the King did that honour the day of the battaile, as to receiue his knighthood at his hands, hoping that the happines of so gentle and braue a Knight, would accompanie his armes. The Recerward was committed to the Duke of Alanson, who had married with Marguerite of France, afterwards wife to Henry of Albret, King of Naurre, grandfather by the mothers side to our King happily reigning at this day.

At the first brute of this armie, the Emperour, the Arragonois, Sforce, and the Suisses contrai a League together, to force the King to renounce his rights to the Duchie of Milan: the Suisses, receiuing thirtie thousand Crownes a moneth of the other confederates, should keepe the passages of the mountaines, and made Fourgogne, or Dauphiné: and the Catholike King of France, by Papiguan or Fontarabie. The Pope (although the King made some accompt of his friendship, for that Julian of Medici his brother, had lately married with Philberte, sister to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and Aunt by the mothers side to his Maestie) in the end ioyned with them.

The Duke of Genes, swomme betwixt two streames, (and as they say) held the Wolfe by the eare. Both the French forces, and the confederates victorie were fearefull vnto him, namely the Popes, who vnder colour to keepe this Duchie from any Stranger, desired exceedingly to vnite it to the Church. In the midst of these contrarieties

to the King.

1515. trarities, hee yeelds Genes to the King, vpon condition: That he should lay aside the title of the Duke of Genes, and take that of Gouverneur of Genes, perpetually for the King, with power to giue the offices of Genes (this was to retaine some markes of Soueraignie,) That the King should giue him an hundred men at armes, the order of Saint Michel, and a yeerely pension during his life. That the King should not repaire the Fort of Todia, and should restore vnto the Cittie, all the priuileges which King Lewis had disannulled. That he should giue certaine Ecclesiasticall liuings, to Frederick Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Octavian, and to himselfe: if hee should bee expelled Genes, some places in Prouence.

The armie approached neere the Alpes, which diuide France and Italy: and the Suisses, according to their capitulation, had stayed vpon the passages of the mountaines & vallies, as well of Montsenis, which is of the iurisdiction of Sauoy, the shortest way, but the most vncasse, as of the mount of Geneure, which is of the iurisdiction of Daulphiné, the longer way, but the lesse painfull, being the ordinary passage of the French armies. The King had intelligence, that Prosper Colonne was at the foote of the Mountaines within Piedmont, with fiftene hundred horse, which the Pope had sent to succour Milan, not fearing any enemy, for that the Suisses (as he thought) had seized vpon all the approaches. But (some guides belonging to Charles of Soliers, Lord of Morete, hauing shewed them a passage neere to Roque Espierre,) the King sent Palisse (whom hereafter we will call the Marshall of Chabannes), Imbercourt, Aubigni, Bayard, Buffs of Ambos, and Montmorency, at that time highly fauoured by the King, leading foure Cornets of light horse, vnder the charge of the said Morete and his guides, who hauing waded through the Po, beneath Villefranche, whereas Colonne lodged: they came to the gates not discovered, but by some inhabitants, who runne speedily to preuent their entrie: but two hardie men at armes of *Imbercourt*s company, which led the Scouts, whose names were Beauuais the braue, a Normand, and Hallencourt a Picard, set spurs to their horses (so as Hallencourt was carried into the Ditch) and amazed the inhabitants: Beauuais thrusting forward his Lance, kept the gate open, vntill the troups arriving, surprised both Villefranche, and Colonne as he dined: they made boote of the baggage, and about twelue hundred Neapolitane horses, and carried away the Commander and his troupe prisoners to Fessan.

Prosper Colonne surprised.

King Francis his first passage ouer the Alpes.

In the meane time the forces passe, some with the Artillerie betwixt the Alpes towards the Sea, and the Coitiennes, descending towards the Marquisate of Saluce: the toile of men exceeding all the difficulties, which the steepe and craggie mountaines, and the rough downefalles, in the deepe valleys of the riuer of Argenterie, did present vnto them, where the artillerie, not able to passe in those straights, the horses being vnprofitable, in fve dayes it was forced vp with roapes by maine strength, in those places where as neuer Canon nor horfeman was seene to passe. Others, with infinite paines and difficulties, recovered the pace of Dagonniere: some, the high toppes of the rock of Perrot and Chert, (passages lying towards Prouence) where the Marshall of Chabannes had passed. Thus the Suisses deceiued of their hope, abandoned the Straight of Suze, where they defended the passages of Mont Senis and Geneure, and that of Coni, returning with shame toward Milan, spoyling and sacking Chinas, Vercil, and other places, where they entred: wh left that Ainard of Prie, hauing passed with the first, had with the helpe of Octavian Fregose, reduced Alexandria, Tortone (and all that lyes beyond the Po) to the Kings obedience: who hauing passed the Po at Montcalier, and presenting himselfe before Nonarre, receiued the Towne at his deuotion, and then Pania. The Milanois sent Ambassadors to the Kings lodging at Busaloe, to beseech him to rest satisfied with victuals, and a promise from the people to remaine affected to his Crowne, and so to march on against his enemies: assuring him, that Milan should most willingly giue him entrie, when hee should be maister of the field. It is an ordinarie stratageme of inconstant Townes, to set vp the Ensignes of the stronger partie. The King hauing a mightie armie in front, granted their demands for that time.

Then

1515. A Then the Duke of Sauoy did mediate an accord betwixt the Suisses and the King his Nephew, wherein he preuailed so much, as they concluded: That the King paying vnto them foure hundred thousand crownes promised by the treaty of Dijon, and all which they pretended to be due for their ancient seruices, they should yeeld vnto the king his Duchie of Milan, and the vallies which the Gritons enjoyed: and the king should giue vnto Maximilian fforce threescore thousand Ducats of yeerely pension.

But some hope to gaine, who loofe all: especially in these cases. A new supplie of Suisses, fierce and bold, by reason of their forepassed victories; being dissuaded by the Cardinal of Sion to breake this treaty, and bring matters to the same estate they were before. Thirty fve thousand take the way of Monse, to lodge in the suburbes of Milan, vnto the Popes army led by Laurence of Medici, and the Spanis by Raimond of Cardane, should ioine with them. Maximilian fforce and the Cardinal pressed them, but distrust one of another staid them. Raymond had surprised letters of credit, sent from the Pope to the King, and was well aduertised that Laurence had secretly sent (whether vpon his owne motion, or by the Popes command he knew not) a gentleman to the King, to excuse himselfe for the army which he led against him, being forced by the dunt hee did owe vnto his Vncle, promising that without offence to his Vncle, or b'emith to his owne honor, he would endeouour to content his maiesty, according to the desire hee had alwayes had, and now especially more then euer. Moreouer the Arragonis desired was to remaine quiet, so as this army did not threaten his new conquest of Naples.

Inconstant treachery of the Suisses.

C And Laurence on the other side, seeing the delayes of Raimond, conceived, that hee had some secret charge from the King his master, to forbear to fight, and giue others, leaue to decide the quarrell, & both ioynly feared to ingage themselves betweene the Kings army, & the Venetians led by Bartolmew of Aluiane, the which was very available for the King. Without doubt all their priuate intent, was to act this tragedie with the blond and losse of the poore Suisses. Thus these two armies of Arragon and the Popes, did onely labour to keepe the Venetian from ioining with the French: and the French these two fro the Suisses. A miserable estate of Italie, the which at one instant was oppressed with fve sundrie armies: French, Venetian, Suisses, Spaniards and Italians. Vpon hope of this treatie of peace, the King had countermanded Aluiane, who was at Lande, and Lautrec to carrie vnto the Suisses all the mony they could get out of the Kings coffers, or borrow of the Princes and Nobility: but through the perswasions of this mutinous Cardinal, they resolue, both to take the money from Lautrec and sodenly to giue the King battaile, when he least doubted any enemy. This counsell had preuailed with some drouishe commander. But Lautrec aduertised by his spies of the treacherous resolution of these Suisses left the way, and retired into Galere. And the Suisses sayling of their purpose, passed on, to wreake their choller vpon the King.

The King was come from Marignan, to lodge at Saint Donat, the 13. of September: when as behold they come with a resolution, and charge the artillerie of the vanguard which the Lansquenets garded: they ouerthrew the first they incountred, recover some peeces of Cannon, and amaze a battaillion of Lansquenets: who (supposing that the treaty of peace with the Suisses had continued firme) feared least they should deliuer them into the hands of their ancient enemies. But seeing the horse, and the King himselfe in person come to second them, they recover their courage: enter the combate, stay this violence of the Suisses, and with a soare fight, maintaine the shooke with variable and doubtfull euents, vntill the dust and approaching night made them retire. At this first charge were slaine Francis of Bourbon Duke of Chastelleraud, the Earle of Sancerre, Imbercourt and many other braue gallant gentlemen.

The battaile of Marignan.

F The King seeing the greatnesse of the danger, planted his artillerie in conuenient places, ordred his battaillions, gathered his horse together, sent for Aluiane, and lay all might armed with all peeces but his helmet, vpon the carriage of a Cannon. The fume was scarce risen, when as the Suisses (growne proude with the conceite of some aduantage)

Nnn 3

1515. aduantage) charge the Lansquenets, & force them to re-coyle about a hundred paces & but for horsemen (who repelled the violent force of the Suisses) the issue had been very dangerous. The Cannon thunders through their squadrons; the French and English shot make a horrible slaughter; the horie charge them in flanke, Aluiane comes vpon their backe in the fury of the fight: They had all continued many houres very hot in skirmish, whenas the Suisses (hauing lost most of their Captaines, being charged in front, in flanke and behinde) grow amazed: despaire of victory, turne their squadrons, and make a goodly retreat, some to Milan, others home to their houses. A great number shut themselves into the Constables lodging: where (refusing to yeeld to the Kings mercy) they were all burnt, and many of our men, that were entred pell mell with them, amongst others John of Mony Lord of Mailley, who carried the white Cornet. In this second battaile were slaine the Prince of Talmont, Buffy of Amboise, the Lord of Roye and many other valiant Knights: Gilbert of Leui Lord of Fontenay was hurt, Claude Earle of Guise ouerthrowne and troden vnder the horie feet: but he was releued by Captaine Jamez a Scottishman, a Gentleman of the Kings chamber. The King was often in danger of his person, receiuing many a push of the Pike vpon his armour.

Without doubt this was the most furious battell that euer the Suisses gaue, the which by the testimony of Triunlee, seemed rather to haue beene fought by Giants then by men. For that the eightene wherein he had beene, were like the encounters of small children in regards of this. That which happened to Gaston of Foix at the battell of Rauenna, made the King to giue them that fled, free passage: leauing foureteene or fiftene thousand slaine vpon the place. The King lost of French and Lansquenets, about three thousand. The Cardinal of Sion (the chiefe author of this battell, led at the first charge, to Milan, and from thence (seeing the Suisses in a mutiny, as well for their losse as for three moneths pay, that were due vnto them) into Germany, to Maximilian. We may iustly say, that the Suisses had need of this correction: for the remembrance of their forepassed prosperities had made them insolent beyond the bounds of modesty: but they reaped a benefit by their shame, growing more tractable, & friendly to them that corrected them. Moreover this should be a good aduancement to the King, to consider rightly of the warres of Italy, in the which (for want of iudgement) D both he and his Realme were afterwards in a manner ruined.

des.

After this happy victory, Milan and all other places of the Duchy, followed the Conquerors fortune. Peter of Nauarre, had by a myne blowne vp a Castle at the Castle gate. Maximilian Sforce and the Suisses besieged therein by the Duke of Lorraine yeeld it, vpon condition: That the Suisses should depart with baggage, and baggage, and Maximilian should deliuer the Castle with that of Cremona, vnto the King, and all other places held by him, and should go into France, where the King during his life should giue him threescore thousand Crowns a yeare pension. According to this capitulation, Maximilian brother to Tremouille, Francis Earle of Pontreue with many other Gentlemen conducted him into France. The King entred into Milan armed, accompanied with the aboue named Princes, and the Nobility of his army, whether the Potentates of Italy sent vnto him, some to reconcile themselves, others to reioyce at this victory.

The Pope did not forget his ordinary practises, to stay the course of the Kings victory: and finding the King very obedient to the Sea of Rome, they concluded an annual league for the defence of the Estates of Italy, of the Pope, the Church, of Julian and Laurence de Medicis, and the Estate of Florence. By this accord the King gaue the Duchy of Nemours to Julian, who had married a sister to the Kings mother which Duchy (after the death of Julian) the King did giue to Philip of Sauoy, who tocke to wife one of the daughters of René, Duke of Alanson: to whome the Duke of Nemours, now liuing is Grand-child. And the Pope deliuered Parma and Plaisance to the King. These Articles were confirmed by an enterviewe, betwixt the Pope, and the King at Bologne, in the beginning of December: where they treated of manye things touching the Realme of Naples, which the King resolved to inuade: for the recovery where whereof the Pope promised him his fauour, after the death of Ferdinand, which every man thought to be neere) or at the least when as the truce were ended. He promised also to giue him power to leaue the tenth part of the reuenues of the Clergie, within his Realme: and the collation of benefices, the which before belonged vnto the College and Chapters of Churches; and for the Kings sake, he made Adrian of Conse brother to the Lord Steward, Cardinal. And the King, to gratifie the Pope, granted an abolition of the Pragmaticall Sanction, making new conuencions in steed thereof vnto the French Church and the Vniuersities opposed.

The Venetians sent foure Ambassadors to the King, the chiefe and most honorable persons of their Senate: Anthony Crimani, Domine Trenisan, George Cornari, and Andrew Gritti to congratulate his victory, and to beseech him to make them partakers of the fruits thereof: that by his ayde they might recouer their townes, according to their agreement. At their request, the King gaue commission to the Bastard of Sauoy, and to Theodore Triunlee, to ioyne with Aluiane, with six hundred lances, and six thousand foot led by Peter of Nauarre. Then leauing the Duke of Bourbon his Lieutenant generall in the Duchy of Milan, he returned into France, about Candlemas, whether the deffences of Henry King of England did call him.

Henry discontent, that the King had taken the yong King of Scotland into his protection, and to that end had sent John Steward Duke of Albany, both to gouerne his person and his Realme: (which John had punished euyther with death or banishment, all such as he found to fauour the English: and euen the mother of the yong King, sister to the late Henry) for reuenge whereof he thrust the Suisses to new attempts against the King. In returning to their first sincerity, they ioyne in league with this Crowne, binding themselves to giue vnto the King for euer, in Italy or out of Italy, and against all men (except the Pope & the Emperour) such numbers of men, as he should require vnder his pay. The King did also confirme their ancient pensions, promising to pay, within a certain time the same due by the treatie of Dijon, and three hundred thousand crownes more, yeelding vnto him the townes and vallies which they held belonging to the Duchy of Milan, but the five Cantons which did enioy them, hauing retained to ratifie this accord, the King began to pay vnto the other eight, that part and portion of money which was due vnto them: who accepted thereof, but with an expresse condition: That they should not be bound to march vnder his pay, against the other five Cantons. A meane to draw the others to the alliance of France.

Maximilian alwaies his mind bent to seeke meanes to annoy his neighbour. The Kings prosperity, makes the Emperour, with the kings of England and Arragon, to desire to crosse him. The Emperour (alwaies desirous of innovations) could not but with his owne forces hold the townes he had taken from the Venetians, and the English remembring the fruitlesse promises which Ferdinand his father in law had made him (the which he respected not where he might gaine) stood vauering betwixt the dislike he had of his father in law, and the hatred he bare to our Francis: but this treaty is to last but a while by the death of Ferdinand, who died in the moneth of January. A prince exceeding in counsell & many vertues: so as if the promises had bin accompanied with their effects, he might well haue bin numbred amongst the most perfect.

A new league
against the King.

Ferdinand
dies.

This death seemed to make the Kings enterprize vpon Naples more easie, purposing to send the Duke of Bourbon for the execution thereof. Many reasons moued him thereto. There was some reuolt in the Realme, after the decease of Ferdinand. The Archduke Charles was young, and could not come in time to succour it: the Popes fauouring it aide him much (yet the King trusted to him who deceived him in the year of alibon world) but above all, the private interest of this Crowne, to whome the meanes of Charles here to so many realmes by the death of the Catholike king and the Emperour, should bee wonderfully inspect. But the deffences of Naples are crossed by the Emperours landing with ten thousand Germanes and Spaniards, threescore thousand Suisses, and five thousand horie, to succour Basil, jointly beleeged by the French and Venetians, which made them retire to 1515. aduantage) charge the Lansquenets, & force them to re coy le about a hundred paces: & but for horsemen (who repelled the violent force of the Suisses) the issue had bin very dangerous. The Cannon thunders through their squadrons; the French and Gaston shot make a horrible slaughter; the horie charge them in flanke, Aluiane comes vpon their backe in the fury of the fight: They had all continued many houres very hot in skirmish, when as the Suisses (having lost most of their Capitaines, being charged in front, in flanke and behinde) grow amazed: despaire of victory, turne their squadrons, and make a goodly retreat, some to Milan, others home to their houses. A great number shut themselves into the Constables lodging: where (refusing to yeeld to the kings mercy) they were all burnt, and many of our men, that were entred pell mell with them: amongst others Iohn of Mont Lord of Maillelay, who carried the white Cornet. In this second battaile were slaine the Prince of Talmon, Busy of Amboise, the Lord of Roye and many other valiant Knights: Gilbert of Lemi Lord of Vendour was hurt, Claude Earle of Guise ouerthrowne and troden vnder the horie feet: but he was releued by Capitaine Iamez Scottisman, a Gentleman of the Kings chamber. The King was often in danger of his person, receiuing many a push of the Pike vpon his armour.

Without doubt this was the most furious battell that euer the Suisses gaue: the which by the testimony of Triumle, seemed rather to haue bene fought by Giants then by men. For that the eightene wherein he had bene, were like the incounter of small children in regards of this. That which happened to Gaston of Foix at the battell of Rauenna, made the King to giue them that fled, free passage: leaving foureteene or fiftene thousand slaine vpon the place. The King lost of French and Lansquenets, about three thousand. The Cardinal of Sion (the chiefe author of this battell) died at the first charge, to Milan, and from thence (seeing the Suisses in a mutiny, as well for their losse as for three months pay, that were due vnto them) into Germany, to Maximilian. We may iustly say, that the Suisses had need of this correction: for the remembrance of their forepassed prosperities had made them insolent beyond the bounds of modesty: but they reaped a benefit by their shame, growing more tractable, & friendly to them that corrected them. Moreover this should be a good aduertisement to the King, to consider rightly of the warres of Italy, in the which (for want of iudgement) D both he and his Realme were afterwards in a manner ruined.

The number
on the dead.

After this happy victory, Milan and all other places of the Duchy, followed the Conquerors fortune. Peter of Nauarre, had by a myne blowne vp a Ca'ernate at the Castle gate. Maximilian s'pore and the Suisses besieged therein by the Duke of Bourbon: yeeld it, vpon conditiō: That the Suisse should depart with bagge and baggage, and Maximilian should deliuer the Castle with that of Cremona, vnto the King, and all other places held by him, and should go into France, where the King during his life should giue him three score thousand Crowns a yeare pension. According to this capitulation, Maximilian brother to Tremouille, Francis Earle of Pontremie with many other Gentlemen conducted him into France. The King entred into Milan armed, accompanied with the aboue named Princes, and the Nobility of his army, whether the Potentates of Italy sent vnto him, some to reconcile themselves, others to reioyce at this victory.

The Pope did not forget his ordinary practises, to stay the course of the Kings victory: and finding the King very obedient to the Sea of Rome, they concluded an annual league for the defence of the Estates of Italy, of the Pope, the Church, of Julian and Laurence de Medicis, and the Estate of Florence. By this record the King gaue the Duchy of Nemours to Julian, who had married a sifter to the Kings mother: which Duchy (after the death of Julian) the King did giue to Philp of Sauey, who tocke to wife one of the daughters of René, Duke of Alanson: to whome the Duke of Nemours, now liuing is Grand-child. And the Pope deliuered Parma and Plaisance to the King. F These Articles were confirmed by an enterviewe, betwixt the Pope, and the King at Bologne, in the beginning of December: where they treated of manye things touching the Realme of Naples, which the King resolved to inuade: for the recovery where whereof the Pope promised him his fauour, after the death of Ferdinand, which euery man thought to be neere) or at the least when as the truce were ended. He promised also to giue him power to leaue the tenth part of the reuenues of the Clergie, within his Realme: and the collation of benefices, the which before belonged vnto the Colleges and Chapters of Churches; and for the Kings sake, he made Adrian of Gouffres brother to the Lord Steward, Cardinall. And the King, to gratifie the Pope, granted an abolition of the Pragmaticall Sanction, making new conuentions in steed thereof, whereunto the French Church and the Vniuersities opposed.

The Venetians sent foure Ambassadors to the King, the chiefe, and most honorable persons of their Senate: Anthony Grimani, Dominic Trevisan, George Cornaro, and Andrew Gritti to congratulate his victory, and to beseech him to make them partakers of the fruits thereof, that by his ayde they might recouer their townes, according to their agreement. At their request, the King gaue commission to the Bastard of Sauoy, and to Theodore Triumle, to ioyne with Aluiane, with six hundred lances, and six thousand foot led by Peter of Nauarre. Then leauing the Duke of Bourbon his Lieutenant generall in the Duchy of Milan, he returned into France, about Candlemas, whether the dessein of Henry King of England did call him.

Henry discontent, that the King had taken the yong King of Scotland into his protection, and to that end had sent Iohn Steward Duke of Albania, both to gouerne his person and his Realme: (which Iohn had punished eyther with death or banishment, all such as he found to fauour the English: and euen the mother of the yong King, sifter to the said Henry) for reuenge whereof he thrust the Suisses to new attempts against the king. But returning to their first sincerity, they ioyne in league with this Crowne, binding themselves: To giue vnto the King for euer, in Italy or out of Italy, and against all men (except the Pope & the Emperour) such numbers of men, as he should require vnder his pay. The King did also confirme their ancient pensions, promising to pay, within a certain time the summe due by the treatie of Dijon. and three hundred thousand crownes more, yeading vnto him the townes and vallies which they held belonging to the Duchy of Milan, but the five Cantons which did enioy them, hauing refused to ratifie this accord, the King began to pay vnto the other eight, that part and portion of money which was due vnto them: who accepted thereof, but with an expresse condition: That they should not be bound to march vnder his pay, against the other five Cantons. A meanes to draw the others to the alliance of France.

Man hath alwaies his mind bent to seeke meanes to annoy his neighbour. The Kings prosperity, makes the Emperour, with the kings of England and Arragon, to deueise how to crosse him. The Emperour (alwaies desirous of innouations) could not vnder his owne forces hold the townes he had taken from the Venetians, and the English remembre the fruitlesse promises which Ferdinand his father in law had made him (the which he respected not where he might gaine) stood vauering betwixt the distrust he had of his father in law, and the hatred he bare to our Francis: but this treaty is E to lastly broken by the death of Ferdinand, who died in the moneth of Ianuary. A prince exceeding in counsell & many vertues: so as if the promises had bin accompanied with their effects, he might well haue bin numbred amongst the most perfect.

This death seemed to make the Kings enterprife vpon Naples more easie, purposing to send the Duke of Bourbon for the execution thereof. Many reasons moued him thereto. There was some reuolt in the Realme, after the deceate of Ferdinand. The Archduke Charles was young, and could not come in time to succour it: the Popes fauouring it made him much (yet the king trusted to him who deceived him in the rest of all the world) but above all, the priuate interest of this Crowne, to whome the meanes of Charles heire to so many realmes by the death of the Catholike king and p the successor of the Emperour, should bee wonderfully suspect. But the dessein of our Francis are crossed by the Emperours landing with ten thousand Germanes and Spaniards, foureteene thousand Suisses, and five thousand horie, to succour Brissac, jointly besieged by the French and Venetians, which made them retire to Milan.

The Emperours voyage
into Lombardy

1516. Milan to the Duke of Bourbon. So Maximilian passing the rivers of Mincio, Oglio and Adde, without any let, had all the countie betwixt Oglio, Pa, and Adde, at his command, except Cremona and Crema, the one kept by the French, the other by the Venetians. Then having taken Laude by composition, he sends to summon the Milanais with threats: That if within three dayes, they did not expell the French armie, hee would intreate them more rigorously, then Fredrick Barbarosse, one of his predecessors had done: who not content to haue burnt Milan vnto Athes, did sowe Salt there, in memorie of his wrath, and of their rebellion. The inhabitants began to rise, and our men grew amazed, when as Albert Peter, leading thirteene thousand Suisses and Grisons, arriuing, confirms them: he made them to change their resolution, to burne their suburbs, and to resolute vpon defence.

Maximilian
reures.

The Cardinall of Sion, and many others banished from Milan, followed the Emperour, feeding him with hope, that at the first brute of his approach, the Citizens would set vp his Ensignes. Mare Anthonie Colonne likewise followed his armie, with two hundred men at armes, at the Popes charge (a manifest signe of his Councils and dissemblings.) But Maximilian seeing no shew from the Towne (the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, being expelled by the Constable of Bourbon, as adherent to the Emperour) remembering the treacherie of the Suisses, to Lodowick Sforce: and fearing least through the ancient hatred of that nation to the house of Austria, the Suisses in the French armie, and those in his (which refused plainly to fight one against another) vniuing their forces, should deliuer him to the enemy, for that James Stafflet Colonell of his Suisses, had with much arrogancie demanded their pay. he secretly departs from his armie in the night, with two hundred horse, so as he was twentie miles off before they were priue to his departure. His armie (wanting both a commander and money) tooke the same course. The Earle of S. Paul, with the Lords Montmorencie and Lescu, pursuing them, defeated a great number, whereof three thousand, part Germaines and part Spaniards, yeelded to the French and Venetians, being in Campe: and our Suisses (notwithstanding they had bene paid for three moneths) went home to their houses, except some three hundred which remained with Peter.

During these garboiles, the Pope smothering his conceits, laboured to be as pleasing as he could to either party: yet was he grieved, the Emperour had brought so great forces: for he could not remaine a victor, but he must afterwards seeke to oppresse all Italy, or put Leo from the Papall seat, to hold it himselfe, according to the common report. On the other side, (as we iudge of causes by the effects) the King had many reasons to suspect the Pope. He had consented to the Emperours descent. Colonne the Popes pensioner, did accompany Maximilian. He refused to send five hundred men at armes for the defence of Milan, and to pay three thousand Suisses, as he was bound by the treatie of Bologne. So as the King, to let Leo know, that the brightnesse of his Miter did not so dazell his eyes, but he discovered his praifises, he made him Ebrewise of the same bread: declaring, that seeing the league they had made, was fruitlesse in time of warre, he would contract a new one, which should not tye him but in time of peace. The Emperours armie being dissolved, the Duke of Bourbon returns into France, and of his owne motion resignes his gouernment into the Kings hands, by whose command the Lord of Lautrec, taking the charge of the armie, to free the King from that bond, ioyning with the Venetians, returned to Bresse, which pressed with two batteries, one by the French, the other by the Venetians, yeelded to the King, their liues & goods saved, and Lautrec deliuered it to the Venetians. Verona had a harder issue, for being battred by the French towards Mantoua, and by the Venetians towards Vincence, giuing two assaults: afflicted with want of victuals and munition, and troubled by the huring of Mare Anthonie Colonne, gouernour of the City, yet being assured of eight thousand men, led by Cont Roquendolfe, that came to their succour, they held out vntill Christmas, at what time famine forced the Spaniards to yeeld the Towne, the which was in like sort deliuered to the Venetians. The Pope, to make profit of the Kings victory and forces, solicits Lautrec to aide him, to dispossesse Francis Maria of Rouere of the Duchy

A of Vrbis. The motives of this warre which Leo pretended against him: were for that Francis had denied the Pope those men, for the which hee had receiued pay of the Church, and had treated secretly with the enemy: That hee had slaine the Cardinall of Pavia, and committed many other murthers:

That in the hottest of the warre against Pope Iulius his Vncle, hee had sent Balthasar of Chastillon to the King, to receiue his pay, and at the same instant he denied passage to some companies that went to ioyne with the army of the Church: and pursued (in the estate, which he held as a feudatarie of the Church) the soldiars which saved themselves at the defeat of Rauenna. Lautrec desiring to please Leo, sent Les his brother, the Lord of Cbiste, the Knight of Amburn, the Lords of Auffun and S. Blimond, and many other Captaines with good numbers of horse and French foote. Who in fewe daies reduced the sayd Duchie to the Popes obedience, who did inuest in the Laurence of Medicis his Nephew in the sayd Duchie. Moreouer the Kings friendship was very necessary for the Catholike King. Charles the Archduke tooke vpon him that title, after the death of Ferdinand his grand-father by the mothers side) to make his passage more easie from Flanders into Spaine, and to assure himselfe of the obedience of those realmes.

Fitting therefore his resolutions according to the time and necessitie, by the aduice of the Lord of Chieures his gouernour, hee sent Philip of Cleues, Lord of Rauenna to the King, to make choise of a place where their deputies might meete, to decide all controuersies betwixt them. Noyon was named. and for the King there came Arthur of Gouffiers, Lord of Roiffy, Lord high Steward of France for the King of Spaine, Anthonie of Croye Lord of Chieures, both gouernors of their masters nonage, and both assisted with notable personages. Who concluded: That within sixe moneths the Catholike King should yeeld the realme of Nauarre to Henry of Albret, sonne to John of Albret and Catherine of Foix, deceased the same yeare: or els should recompence the sayd Henry within the sayd terme, to his content: els it should be lawfull for the King to aide him to recover it. That the King should giue his daughter Louise (who was but a yeare olde, in marriage to the Catholike King, and for her dowrie, the rights he pretended to the realme of Naples, according to the diuision made by their Predecessors: vpon condition, that untill she came to D yeares of marriage, Charles should pay vnto the King a hundred and fiftie thousand Ducats yeare, towards the maintenance of his daughter. That she dying, if the king had any other daughter, hee should giue her to the Catholike king, vpon the same conditions. If hee had none, then Charles should marrye with Renec, Daughter to the deceased king. To propound and conclude marriages so disproportionable of age, is it not properly to mocke one another? Seeing that onely two yeares time bring forth occasions which make Princes to alter their courses, whose wills are often inconstant. This treaty was respectiue sworne by both Kings, who appointed an enteruew at Cambray, attending the which they sent their orders of knighthood one to another. And fence the Emperour ratified these conuentions, but wee shall see small fruits thereof.

France reaped an other benefit of this peace. The Suisses (seeing a surceasse of armes betwixt the Emperour and the King) compounded, as the former had doone: That the King should paie vnto their Cantons, within three moneths, three hundred and fiftie thousand auncats, and after that a perpetuall and annuall pension: That the Suisses should furnish him, whensoever hee demanded, a cerasue number of men, at his charge. But diuersely, for the eight Cantons bound themselves to furnish against all men indifferently, and the five, no otherwise, but for the defence of his owne estates. As for the Castells of Lugan and Lugarne, strong passages and of great importance for the surety of the Duchie of Milan, they desired rather to raze them, then to take three hundred thousand Ducats, for the restitution thereof.

Let vs now lay our all armes aside for a certaine space, and giue our warriours time to take their breath, and returne againe shortly to warre by the ambitious factions of two most great and mighty Princes. This yeare in February 1517. was borne Francis, Daulphin and succellor to this Crowne, if his end had not benee violently forced. Laurence of Medicis, did present him at the Font, for the Pope's Vncle. A Christening celebrated, with iousts, skirmishes, incounters, besieging and taking of places, and other such stately shewes, as the memory of man hath not obserued greater. And the King, to make a more stricter league with the Pope, he caused the said Laurence to marry with Magdaleine, daughter to John Earle of Auvergne and Auragues, and of Joane sister to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Vendosme, who died at Perth, when as King Charles the eight returned from Naples. Of this marriage came Katherine of Medicis, whom we shall see Queene of France, and Mother to the three last Kings of the name of Valois.

At the same time, the King sent Gaston of Breze, Prince of Fouquarmont, brother to the great Senehall of Normandie, with two thousand French foote, to succour Christian King of Denmarke, against the rebels of Sueden, who (after they had worne a battaile for the King) being abandoned in the end by the Danes, in a combate vpon the Ice, (where those Northerne Nations are more expert then ours,) were overthrowne, and the most part slaine: such as could escape the sword, returned without pay, without armes, and without clothes.

1518. The yeare following, the last of March, Henry the Kings second sonne was borne, who by the death of the Daulphin his brother, shall succeed his father. Henry King of England was his God-father, and gaue him his name. During this surcease of armes among Christian Princes, the Pope motioned (but saith the Originall) rather in shew then with any good intent, a generall warre of all Christendome, against Selim Prince of the Turkes, Baiazet (as we haue sayd) in his latter age, studied to install Acomath his eldest sonne, in the throne of the Turkish Empire: Selim the younger brother, through fauour of the Janisaries and Souldiers of his fathers gard, forced him to yeeld the gouernement vnto him. Selim was no sooner in possession, but (as they say, hee poisoned his father, and murdered his bretheren, Acomath and Corcut, and in the end, all that descended from the line of the Ottomans. Then passing from one warre to another, he vanquished the Adulians, overthrowne the Sophi of Persia in battaile, tooke from him Tauris, the chiefe seate of his Empire, and the greatest part of Persia, rooted out the Sultans of Egypt, and the Mamelius: tooke Caire, and seized vpon all Egypt and Sina. So as hauing in few yeares almost doubled his Empire, and taken away the humilitie of so mightie Princes, who were zealous of his Monarchie: Christian Princes did not without cause, feare the happy course of his victories. Hongarie was weak of men, and in the hands of a Pupill King, governed by Prelates and Barons of the realme, diuided amongst themselves. Italie diuimbered by former warres, feared least the partialities of these Princes should cause Selim to turne his eyes towards it.

The Pope and all the Court of Rome (making shew to prevent this imminent danger) thought it expedient to make a great provision of money, by a voluntarie contribution of Princes, and a generall taxe ouer all Christendome: That the Emperour accompanied with the horse of Polonia and Hongarie, and an armie of Reisles and Infrequents, fit for so great an enterprise, should assaile Constantinople: and the King of France, with the forces of his Realme, the Venetians, Suisses, and Potentates of Italie, should invade Greece, being full of Christians, and ready to rebell vpon the first approach of certaine forces. The Kings of Spaine, Portugall and England, should passe the straight of Gallipoli with two hundred saile: and hauing taken the Castell at the entrie thereof, they should approach neere to Constantinople: That the Pope should follow the same course, with a hundred great Gallies. These were goodly plottes in conceit. This counteite shewe to send an armie into Turkie, was but a deuice to fill the Popes coffers, which was made emptie by the former warres, especially by that of Frbin.

To treat of these propositions, Leo published in the Consistorie a generall Truce for five yeares amongst all Christian Princes, and vpon rigorous censures to them that

A that should breake it. Appointing for Legats, the Cardinall of Saint Sixte, to the Emperour: the Cardinall of Saint Marie in Portico, to the King: the Cardinall Giles, to the King of Spaine: and the Cardinall Laurence Campege, to the King of England: hee proclaymed his Bulls of pardon, to all such as should contribute a certaine summe for so worthie an expedition.

All Princes accept of this truce, and shewe themselves verie willing to so honorable action. But the meanes, howe in so short a time to make a firme Union among so many Potentats, who had bene long at deadly warre? Euery one studies of his priuate interest, and finding the danger to concerne one more then another, they care for themselves, and manage these affaires carelesly, more with shewe, then devotion.

This negligence of the publicke state, and greedinesse of priuate men, was the more confirmed by the death of Selim, who leauing his Empire to his sonne Solimant, young of age, but of a milder spirit, and not so enclined to warre, then all things seemed to incline to peace and loue, betwixt so many great warriors. The Kings of France and England, renued their friendship, by a defensive League betwixt them, vpon promise of a marriage betwixt the Daulphin, King Francis eldest sonne, and the onely daughter of Henry King of England, both very young: which contract, many accidents might hinder, before they came to sufficiencie. And Henry yeelded Tournay for foure hundred thousand Crownes, the one halfe for the charge in bulding the Crutell, and for the artillery, powder and munition which the King of England should leaue in the place: the other halfe, for the expenses in conquering thereof, and for other pensions that were due vnto him.

Thus often times the looser paies the short. On the other side, the Kings eldest daughter being dead: whome they had appointed to bee wife to the King of Spaine: a peace betwixt these two Kings was reconfirmed, according to the first Capitulation, with promise of the yonger. An alliance which eyther Prince did confirm, with great outward shewes of friendship, King Francis wearing the order of the golden fleese on Saint Andrewes day: and the King of Spaine that of Saint Michell, on the said Saints day. The Venetians also, by the Kings meanes, had prolonged their Truce for five yeares with the Emperour.

But the soueraine Iudge of the world (hauing decreed to punish the disorders of Christendome with sundry afflictions) tooke Maximilian out of this world: in whose life we may obserue a strange alteration of affaires, for if prosperity did often present vnto him goodly occasions, aduersity did as often crosse him in the execution. A good Prince, mercifull, courteous, very liberall, a great spender (the which did many times hinder his good successe) painfull, secret, well seene in the arte of warre: but his happy beginnings did commonly proue fruitlesse, through his owne delays and inconstancie.

This death bred an equall desire in the mindes of two great Princes, Francis King of France, and Charles King of Spaine. Francis sent the Lord of Boissy, Lord Stuard of France, to purchase the fauour of the Germane Electors, for the Empire. Some promised all fauour for the King his master: yet the cause was not so fauorable for the French, hauing no correspondencie with the Germaines, neyther in tongue, manners nor life. Moreouer the Commons of Germanie, were sutors that the Imperiall dignitie might not go out of the nation. The Pope fauored the King, but in shewe onely, hoping that by these demonstrations of loue, hee would hereafter giue more credit to his Councells: whereby discouering that in his inward thoughts, the election both of Francis, and Charles were alike suspect vnto him, hee labored to perswade the King (that seeing there was small hope for him to carrie it by voices,) he should seeke by his authority to aduance some other Germane Prince, to this Crowne, rather then Charles.

But whilest that Francis feeds himselfe, with vaine hopes giuen him by the Elector of Brandebourg, and the Archbishop of Triers, who (to drawe money from the King) gaue

1519. gaue him great assurances: Charles in steed of gold, brings armes to the field. An-my approacheth neere to Francford, for the King of Spaine, vnder colour there should be no force in the election: the which increased their courage that fauoured his cause, made them yeeld that wauered, and troubled the French faction. So Charles of Au-
The election of Charles. stria King of Spaine, the first of that name, was chosen Emperour of Germanie the 28.
of June.

The Election of a new Emperour consists in the voyces of fixe Germanie Princes.
Three are of the Clergie, the Archbishops of Maience, Cologne, and Treues: Three se-culars, the Count Palatin, the Duke of Saxony & the Marquis of Brandebourg. The King of Bohemia is Vmper, when as the voyces are equall. The Emperour is chosen at Francford, and crowned at Aix la Chapelle.

Who could doubt, but these two yong princes, hauing so many occasions of Ielo-sie and quarrel, would soone breake forth into fierce and cruell warres, the which had taken deepe roote in both their hearts. The King desired infinitely to recouer the Realme of Naples, and did greatly affect the restitution of Henry of Albret, to his kingdome of Nauarre, whereof he sees himselfe now frustrate by the sodaine aduancement of Charles to so high a dignitie: and all that which the French held in Italy was in great danger. The Emperour on the other side was discontented, that the King contemning the accord first made at Paris, and knowing the necessity of his passage into Castile, for the which his fauour did much import, had in a manner forced him to agree to new Articles. Moreouer the king had taken the Duke of Guelldres into his protection, (an enemy to the Flemings, who were subiects to Charles.) a sufficient cause to drawe both Francis and Charles into armes. But aboue all, the recouerye of the Duchie of Bourgonne, caused strange alterations in the minde of this new Emperour. The Duchy of Milan was a sufficient motive of quarrell: the King since the death of Lewis the 12. had neither demanded nor obtained inuestiture, and therefore they pretended the possession to be of no validity, and his interest to be void: yet all these were not sufficient motives to stirre vp those horrible confusions, which so afflicted the Estates of these two Princes for the space of thirty yeares. Ambitious hatred is alwaies grounded vpon light beginnings,

1520. In the meane time the Preachers of this voyage against the Turke, dispersed through out all Christendome, grew vehement, promising (according to the Popes Bulls) pardon for all sinnes, and the kingdome of heauen, to such as paid a certaine summe of money. Without doubt Leo vsed the authority of the Apostolike seat too boldly, dispersing throughout the world, without distinction of time or place, most large pardons: not onely for the liuing, but also to redeeme the soules of the dead from purgatory for money. And for that, every one did plainly see, that these pardons were granted to get money: which the Commissioners (appointed for such exaction) demanded after an impudent and shamelesse sort; being also well knowne that the greatest part of them had purchased their authority from the Popes officers. Leo incurred great dislike: many were discontented with this insolent proceeding, especially in Germany, where the ministers of this collection, appointed (according to the common opinion) for the deliery of poore Christians fighting vnder the burthen of the Turkish yoake, sold for a small price, yea played away in their Ale-houses, their authority to re-deeme dead mens soules from purgatory.

And that which did more increase the peoples spleene, it was generally reported:
that Laurence of Medicis, had carried a breche, fro his vncle to King Francis, whereby he allowed him to imploy the money gathered throughout his Realme for this warre, to what vses hee pleased: vpon condition, to yeeld it, when it should be demanded for the voyage beyond the seas, and to imploy fifty thousand crownes, to the benefit of the said Laurence his Nephew. A worthy cause to make the French repine, seeing the money they gaue to a good intent, was conuerted to contrarie vses. But that which made the Germanis wonderfully impatient: Leo had giuen to his sister Maudlin, the profit of the exaction of Indulgences in many parts of Germany: who appointed the Bishop

A Bishop Arembault a Commissioner in that part: Worthy (saith the history) of such a charge, the which he executed with great couetousnes and extortion. Being the more odious for that this holy money went, to satifishe the greedinesse of a woman. So as not only this exaction, and the Agents thereof, but also his name and authority that granted it, became odious in many prouinces.

Martin Luther, a religious man of the order of S. Austin, learned and vehement, began to preach against these indulgences in his publike sermons; he taxeth the Popes authority, complains of Albert of Brandebourg, Archbishop of Mayence: and of the doctrine which these gatherers did teach, inducing the people to beleue confidently that by the purchase of these pardons they must needs be saued: as if the vertue of these money-pardons could wipe away any sinne, and the money put into the coffers of the Church or of the Commissioners, could drawe mens soules out off purgatory, and send them into Paradice. And therevpon he exhorts every man to beleue sobriberly, and to gouerne himselfe wisely in this busines, and rather to imploy their money otherwise then in this friuolous marchandise.

The people giue care vnto him, finde his doctrine plausible: and Frederic Duke of Saxony his Prince doth embrace it, Luther supported by the fauour of his Prince and the people, proceedes: he publisheth propositions wherein he doth dispute at large:
Of purgatory, of true repentance, of the office and duty of Charity, of indulgences and Pardons, to seeke out (saith he) the truth, calling all such to dispute as would propound any argument to the contrary. He intreated all such as could not assit, to answer by writ-ting: protesting that he would not maintaine any thing, but submit himselfe to the censure of the holy Church: yet reiecting all things that should not be conformable to the holy Scripture and the decrees of the fathers. In the end he encounters the Popes authority, the Images of the Church, the celibate of religious persons, restraining the Popes authority within the limits of the Bishoppricke of Rome, and publishing the doctrine, which hath caused the Generall schisme vnto this day.

The Pope to quench this fire, cites Luther to Rome, forbids him to preach, declares him contumax, if hee do not obey, and submit himselfe to the Ecclesiasticall censure.
Notwithstanding the Originall faith, he did not reforme many things that were of bad example, which Luther did blame with reason, being very odious to all men, v-sing his pontificall office with small reuerence. But this was to cast oyle into the fire.
These Ecclesiasticall armes did but increase Luthers reputation with the people. Neither the religious men, which Leo sent to preach against him, nor the letters which he did write to the Princes, and Prelats, nor all the other meanes he imployed to sup-presse him, could any thing withdraw the peoples inclination, nor the fauour of Fre- derick from him.

This action seeming still of greater importance to the Court of Rome, made them to feare some great disgrace to the Popes greatnesse, to the profit of the Court of Rome: and the vnion of Christian Religion. Many assemblies were made at Rome, many consultations in the Popes chamber betwixt the Cardinalls and Diuines appointed to preuent these inconueniences. Some did shew, that for as much as they did not correct in themselves to many vices and damnable things which did scandalize all Christendome, the persecution of Luther, would but augment the hatred of nations against him: giuing Councell like vnto that of Gamaliel in the fifth of the Acts of the Apostles, that it had bene better to haue wincked at such a folly which happily would haue vanished of it selfe.

Notwithstanding the heate and violence of others preuailed, so as not one-lie the persecutions were doubled against him, and his followers (who by his name, were called Lutherans;) but an excommunication was decreed against Fre- derick Duke of Saxony: the which did so incense him, as of a fauourer hee became a vehement protector of the cause: the which since hath bene dispersed ouer all

1520. all Christendome, so as neither prisons, nor banishment, fire nor water, nor other tortures, nor any other punishments, could preuaile against it. Without doubt, we haue learned by experience, that religion is not planted, nor rooted out by violent meanes. The altars of pietie are enemies to armes, drums and trumpets. Mens consciences must bee gently intreated, not violently forced.

Let vs attend this so desired re-union from heauen. The mediation, of the most Christian King is necessary: let vs hope, that the continuance of a holy peace will giue him the meanes, as hee hath a desire to chote men capable thereof, who not regarding their priuate interest, will seeke the aduancement of Gods glorie. But let vs returne to our history. Whilest that Charles the fit, was crowned at Aix, the people of Spaine foreseeing, that by the meanes of his aduancement to the Empire, he should remaine for the most part out of Spaine, being also incensed against the Lord of Chievres, and some Flemings which had gouerned Charles in his youth, through whole couctousnesse, offices, graces, priuileges, and expeditions, (which had beene vsually giuen to Spaniards) were now deere sold vnto them: they rebelled, refusing to obey the Kings officers. They erected a forme of popular gouernment, with the aduice almost of all Spaine, whilest the Nobilitie sought by force to suppress this popular libertie. The King, by the Popes Counsell (who makes his profit of Christian Princes quarrels, that he might haue peace, whilest they are at war) seeing that the Emperour, being often vrged, did in no sort performe the articles of the treatie of Noyon: lent an armie into Nauarre, vnder the command of Espare, brother to Lantrec, who in lesse then fiftene dayes, reduced Nauarre, to the obedience of Henry of Albret their lawfull King.

This was enough for Espare. It had beene better to returne a victor triumphing, with glory and honour, then to follow the aduice of too violent a Counsellor, Saint Colombe Lieutenant of Lantrecs company, (promising to himselfe, it may be, the conquest of Spaine, as easily as that of Nauarre: or fed with a hope to make some good bootie:) carried Espare euen to the frontiers of Catalogne: who hauing taken Fontarabie, did runne as farre as the Grongne. The Spaniards being incensed, (the Nobilitie against the people) had endured the losse of the kingdome of Nauarre, but seeing them to invade their owne marches, they put in practice the byword of the dogs, who fighting together, laied aside their quarrell, to fall vpon the wolfe, their common enemy. So these, being at great discord amongst them selues gaue ouer their intestine quarrels, to pursue their generall professed enemies.

The Nobles and Commons ioyne their forces, they encounter Espare, who to saue the souldiars pay, had dismissed some part of his armie, giuing leaue to all that would, in yeelding halfe a pay: they charge him, defeat him, and take him prisoner, being hurt in the eye with a Launce, whereof hee was blinded. The Lord of Tournon was likewise taken with many other good men. So the Spaniards finding Nauarre vnfortified, recovered Pampelune, with as great easie as the French had conquered it. The first breeder of the horrible confusions which shall follow. But let vs see an other motiue of warre, betwixt these two Monarchs, which rising from a small fire, shall flame ouer all this Realme, and many other estates.

The Prince of Simay, of the house of Croy, had before time obtained a sentence against the Lord of Aimeries, giuen by the Peers of the Duchie of Brillon, (which iudge souerainly) for the Towne of Hierges in Ardenne: yet through the fauour and credit which Aimeries had with Charles of Austria, and the greatest in his Court, hee was releued, although hee had not appealed from the said sentence in time, grounding the causes of his reliefe vpon the lets and hinderances hee had had, during the former warres, at the which hee had alwayes assisted in person. So as a Commission being granted before the great Chancellor of

A of Brabant, and a day assigned to the heires of Simay, to come to heare the reasons of Aimeries releefe: and if neede were, to see the former sentence (giuen to their behoofe) renoued. They found this commission so vniust, and vreasonable (seeing that both their father, and they had beene in long and quiet possession of the said Towne) and that this decree was not subiect to appeal: as they repaired to Robert de la Marke, Duke of Brillon, as to their Lord, and Protector, that with their right hee might defend the liberties, and priuileges of his Duchie. Robert discontented, that his companie of men at armes had bin cassied for the extorsions and robberies they had committed in Italie, and else where, had left the King, and was retired to the Emperour. But seeing that iustice was denied him, as well for the priuate interest of Burgis (whose vnkle and Tutor hee was, hauing married their Aunt, sister to the Prince of Simay) hee made his peace with the King, by the mediation of his wife, and his sonne (Fleuranges being daughter to the Earle of Brenne) with the Kings mother.

Robert hauing assured his affaires with the King, sent to defie the Emperour at Wormes, where he had called a Diet of the Princes, and free Townes of Germany, against the new-bred troubles, by reason of Luther. A bold attempt of a pettie Prince, against an Emperour, mightie in meanes, men, and courage. A great riuer runs quietly betwixt the bankes that bound it, but at the first breach, it overflows the whole Countrey: so there is nothing more easie, then to incense Princes, but being once moued, they are hardly appeased. This defie giuen, Fleuranges the eldest son of Robert, notwithstanding the Kings expresse prohibition, made leue, as well in France, as in other places, of three thousand foot, and foure or five hundred horse, with the which hee besieged Vireton, a small Towne in Luxembourg belonging to the Emperour. But soone after he retired his armie, by the Kings commandement, and dismissed it.

But their spleens were wonderfully incensed vpon new occasions. The King, for that the Emperour sayled in the payment of the pension, for the Realme of Naples, and in the restitution of Nauarre: and withall, his preferment to the Empire had greatly discontented him. The Emperour was greued, for the enterprise of Nauarre, and the attempt of the Duke of Bouillon, being also well informed, that the King sought the meanes to recouer the Realme of Naples. Francis had sent a gentleman to the Pope, to know when it should please him to performe his part for the execution of that which they had concluded together (the which his Maiestie knewe according to the disposition of Leo, to bee more counterfeited then currant.) And Leo giuing to the gentleman a note of the horse, foot and artillerie, that was necessarie for this enterprise: assigned the King two and twentie dayes to arme, whilest the Venetians might enter into this League.

The Pope had no meaning, that Naples should bee subiect to the French. If the King had not in the meane time neglected his affaires, Leo had beene forced to runne another course. And the Pope glad to haue some colourable shew of disdaine, accused the King, either to be carelesse, or ill affected, hauing not drawn the Venetians into the said League for the defence of Italie. He complained, that his maiestie had not payed, but the first moneth for the leue of Suisses, which they had beene forced to make against the Spaniard, who a little before, had invaded the territories of the Church, whereof the King should pay a moitie, and makes a shew as if the King had treated some thing with the Emperour, without his priuie, and to his prejudice.

Thus Leo, seeming iustly displeased, recetued into Regium, (contrary to his agreement with the King) all the banished men of Milan. hee inuested Charles of Austria, in the Realme of Naples, made a defensue League with him, including the house of Medeus and the Florentines: and deuising how to conquer Milan, they agreed: That Parma and Pianfance should remaine to the Church, to hold them with the same rights it did

A bold and insolent fact.

The Pope capitulates with the Emperour

1521. did before: That Francis Storce, brother to Maximilian, should be put in possession of the Duchie of Milan, as having right, from his father, and his brothers renunciation: and that the Emperour should aid the Pope against his subiects, and feudataries, namely to conquer Ferrara. This mutuall resolution of allyance was a meanes, by Gods prouidence, to shew his wonderfull iudgements, and a scourge to punish both French, Italians, and Spaniards for many yeares: whereby followed for many euersions of Townes, oppressions of people, deuolations of Prouinces, and the death of so many men of valour.

La Mark's estate ruined.

The Emperour in the meane time, leuies a great armie of horse and foote, vnder the command of Henry Earle of Nassau, who tooke Lorgnes from Robert de La Mark, raised the Towne, and hanged the Captaine, with twelue of the chiefe of his troupe. The Captaine of Musancourt, (deliuered by some of his souldiers, with the place, to the said Earle) escaped the gallows, at the intreatie of the chiefe of his armie, but twentie of his Souldiers were hanged, and the place likewise razed and spoiled to the ground. About this time, there was much controuersie touching the Duchie of Milan, the Emperour pretending it to belong absolutely to him, not onely by conquest, but much rather by inheritance: concerning which, the most learned in the lawes of the Empire produced many and very probable reasons, and arguments.

These two prizes caused Fleuranges and Sanse his brother (the sonnes of Robert) to put themselves into Tametz, with a resolution to die or to keepe it. The Earle, after fouredayes siege, hauing seene the garrisons firme resolution, raised his campe, to take the way to Fleuranges. The Germaines which kept it, yeelded vp both the Towne and their Captaine the Lord of Tametz, the sonne of Robert, into the Earles hands, who hauing ruined it, did the like vnto Sanse. Bouillon was afterwards yeelded vnto him by intelligence. After this, Robert obtained a truce of the Emperour for six weekes. But the Emperour Charles dreamed of a more important warre. If his spleene had bene onely against the house of La Mark, why should he grant them a truce, being almost ruined? and being a conquerour, and strong enough to subdue the said Robert, why did he still increase his armie?

The Kings
armie against the Emperour

The King hauing intelligence, that warre was proclaimed against him, prepared his forces to withstand the Emperour: and to this end he gaue a commissiō to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Paul, to leuie six thousand foote: to the Constable of Bourbon eight hundred horse, and six thousand foote: and to the Duke of Fendisme the like charge. And to reuenge the disgrace receiued by Esparre, he sent six thousand Lafsequenels, of whom Claude of Lorraine Earle of Guise was generall, vnder William of Gouffiers, Lord of Bonniuet, Admirall of France, to whom he gaue fixe companies of horse, and commissiō to leuie what number of Gascōns and Basques he should thinke necessarie. The Lord of Lescut was in like sort teleued with French and Swissers, for the warre of Italy.

Open warre.

The armies on eyther side were in field: there remains nothing but for the one to make a breach: the imperiallis begin. There had bene a long and a great quarrell between Lewis Cardinall of Bourbon, and the Lord of Liques, a Gentleman of Hainault, for the Abbie of Saint Amand, which the Cardinall enjoyed. Liques takes this occasion to assault the Abbie, which being of no strength, was deliuered vnto him by Champeroux, Lieutenant for the King in Tournaisis, in the which de Loges Gouvernour of Tournay was surprised. We might pretend, that these were but private quarrels: but Liques advanced with his forces to Mortaigne, a place subiect to the King, the which he said he had some times enjoyed.

Siege of Tournay.

In the end, Pranzy, Captaine of the sayd place (hauing no hope of succours,) yeelded it, not to Liques, but to the Lord of Portien, vpon condition to depart with their liues and baggage. But contrary to the lawe of armes and honestie, they were pursued, stript, and hardly escaped with their liues. On the other side, Fiennes, of the house of Luxembourg, Gouvernour of Flanders, besieged Tournay with a thousand horse, eight thou-

A thousand foote, and six Canons, continuing there fixe moneths, whilest that the Bourguignons did take, spoyle, and raze Ardes, the Lord of Teligni in exchange, did charge, defeat, and cut in peeces, six hundred Bourguignons, that were entred the realme to spoile it. In the beginning of these garboyles, Henry King of England did offer himselfe an Arbitrator betwixt these two Princes, Charles and Francis, and Calis was named for the treatie of a good peace. But what meanes was there to yeeld to the Emperours vnrasonable demaunds, to restore him to the Duchie of Bourgongne, with an abolition of the homage which hee ought vnto this Crowne, for the low Countries? being vnrasonable, as he pretended, that an Emperour should doe homage to a King of France: as if wee did not commonly see Princes hold their lands by homage of simple gentlemen. So this parle tooke no effect.

Hitherto the Imperialls dealt vnder had, protesting not to make warre against the King: but now they discouer them elues, and come with enseignes displayed, to beseege Mouzon: they batter it in two places, the one by the medow, towards the Port of Rhems: the other from the mountaine going to Tuoy. The footmen newly leuied, and not yet trayned, grew amazed, and force Montmort the Captaine of that place, to demand a composition: for the obteyning whereof, hee went with La Signy his companion to the Earle, and obtained, That every man at armes should depart, with a curtill vnarmed, and the foote men, and archers without armes, and a white wands in their hands: what policie was this, to see two Lieutenants to a King, go forth off a place to capitulate with the ene mie: without doubt they disreued the shame which many haue suffered for the like rashnesse, to be detained prisoners, put to ranome, and forced to yeeld the Towne at discretion.

The taking of all these Townes without opposition, drew the Earle to Mezeres (commaunded by the Cheualier Bayard), but hee found a more valerous resolution then at Mouzon. The experience, and valour of the Captaines, and the deliue which Anne Lord of Montmorency had to doe the King some notable seruice in his youth, had drawne him into the Towne, with many well minded gentlemen of the Court: amongst the rest, the Lords of Lorges, d'Annebault, Lucé, Villedair, Iohn de la Tour Lord of Bremont, Iohn Durcil, Lord of Berbee, Nicholas of Thours Lord of Suilly, Mathurin, and Charles des Cleres, (whose valours, and fidelitie, deuene a place in our Historie.)

Anthony Duke of Lorraine, whose Lieutenant Bayard was, and the Lord of Orval, gouernour of Champagne, commaunded either of them, a hundred men at armes. Boucart, and the Baron of Montmoreau, had either of them, a thousand foote. This might seeme too much, for a small place, but it was strong, and of importance. The Canon did no sooner begin to batter, but most of the foote grew amazed, and in despite of their Captaines fled, some by the gate, others ouer the wals: Bayard by the balenesse of them that fled, tooke occasion to assure the resolutions of such as remained, For (said hee) preferuing the Towne with the helpe of few men, we shall haue the more merit, and reputation: our troupes are of the more force, being discharged of this vnprofitable burthen.

The Earle comming neere to Meziers, sent to summon the Commaunders to yeeld the Towne vnto the Emperour. He reports to the Earle of Nassau (sayd Bayard the Valiant resolution of Bayard.) That before hee shall heare mee speake of yeelding up the Towne, which the King hath giuen mee in charge, I hope to make a bridge of my enemies carcases, ouer the which I may march. Henry makes two batteries, and shakes the wals, for the space of a moneth. But finding by sundrie sallies, (in the which the beseeged did most commonly carrie the honour and profite,) the resolution of the Commaunders, men at armes, and souldiers: hauing also intelligence of the defeat of a hundred choise horse of the Emperours Campe, and two hundred foote, led by the Earle Reinsfourket, to spoile Attigni, vpon Aisne: all which Francis of Silli, Baylife of Caen, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alençon, had put to the sword, except fixe or six, which were carried prisoners to the said Earle, to Rhems, the Towne hauing bene also releued, the 1521. first of October with a thousand foote led by Lorges, four hundred horse by Angeli, and some munition, hee abated the first furie of his artillerie, and despayring to take the Towne by force or famine, hee raised his Campe, and made his retreat by Mont-Cornet in Ardennes, Maubert fontaine, and Aubenton, to Veruin and Guse, spoiling, burning and killing, men, women and children without distinction: a mournfull beginning of the cruelties which haue bene committed in the succeeding warres. By a for a worthie reward of his vertue, was honored by the King with a companie of a hundred men at armes, and the order of Saint Michell. In the meane time the King assembles his forces at Fernaques, to cut off the enemies way about Guse, and to fight with him: during whose retreat, the Cont Saint Paul recouered Mouton, for the King.

The Earle of N. Pau leues Mouton.

Mouton recovered.

The enterprise of N. Pau.

Such was the estate of Picardie, and Champaigne, whilst the Admirall of Bonnivet arrived at Saint Iohn de Luz, for the enterprise of Nauarre. His purpose was to surpris Fontarabie. To hold the enemy in suspence, hee first tooke the Castell of Poignan vpon the mountaine of Roncevaux: then making shewe to take the way of Pampelune, hee turned head through the mountaines towards the Towne of Maye: and whilst he lodged his artillerie, he caused the Earle of Guse (who commanded the Lansquenets) to take the way by the riuer of Behaubie, running at the foote of the mountaines which come from Nauarre, and so passeth into the sea before Fontarabie: and in the morning he followed with his army.

Having some Spaniards in front, which camped on the other side of the water, hee passed the riuer at a ford, the sayd Earle marching before them with a pike in his hande. Don Diego de Vere chiefe of the enemies armie, being equall in numbers, and hauing an aduantage ouer those that came wett from the passage of a riuer, amazed at the resolution of our men, lest the field, and fled with his men through the mountaines.

The Castell of Behaubie, kept all victualls from our Campe, and held it in great distresse. But the first Volée of the Cannon, hauing split one of their best peeces, and slaine the gouernour with some others that did assist him, the soldiars being amazed, forcetheir Capitaine to yeeld at discretion: whereof the Admirall sent the best prisoners to Bayonne, the rest hee turned away beinge disarmed. The way being thus layd open to Fontarabie, (a place which they held impregnable, and one of the keyes of Spaine) fortified on three parts, with the sea, riuer and mountaine, in fewe daies hee made a breach, but not assailable. Notwithstanding the Gasccons, Basques and Nauarrois, demanded the assault, the which was defended with as great resolution as it was assayed: but the besieged hauing discovered some peeces, which the Admirall had planted on the mountayne, to beate them the next day in flanke at the second attempt: and knowing the resolution of the assaylants, by the prooffe they had formerly made, caused them to yeeld, vpon condition to depart, with all their bagge and bggage. James of Aillon Lord of Lude, was made Capitaine.

Fontarabie taken.

Let vs returne to Fernaques, where we haue left the King preparing to fight with the enemy. To this end hee giues the foreward to the Duke of Alençon (who had married Marguerite of Valois the Kings sister) accompanied with the Marshall of Chastillon, (this was the first motiue of the Constable of Bourbons discontent, the which place was due vnto him as Constable of France.) He tooke the battaile himselfe, taking the sayd Duke of Bourbon vnto him, and committed the reeward to the Duke of Vendosme.

The ruine of Bapaume.

Bapaume did much annoy the frontier towards Peronne, Corbie and Dourlans. The Earle of Saint Paul, the Marshall of Chabannes and the Lord of Fleuanges tooke it, beat downe the defences, and burnt it to ashes. The Duke of Vendosme had Commission to do the like vnto Landree: who arriuing late, foure or fife enfeignes of the bands of Picardie march, without commandement and without ladders, ladders, and file tumultuously to the port, wherethey plant their Ensignes vpon the drawe bridge, but they were repulsed by seauen or eight hundred Lansquenets and some of their Ensigne bearers slaine. This fury of the Picardes did so amaze the Germanes, as without attending batterie, breach, or assault, they retyred into the next fort, where they could not pursue them, by reason of the riuer running thorough the Towne. Thus Landree vnfurnished of men, was the next day taken, razed and burnt.

The Emperour was retyred with his army towards Valenciennes: the King makes a bridge ouer the Riuer of Escau beneath Bouchain, eyther to fight with him, or to make him abandon the country with dishonour. Charles hauing intelligence of this bridge, sent twelue thousand Lansquenets and foure thousand horse to stop the passage, but the Earle of S. Paul with those six thousand men which he commanded, was already in battell on the other side of the water, in a marsh towards Valenciennes, and the King followed him speedily with all his army, which were about sixteene hundred men at armes, and six and twenty thousand foot, with the light horse. The which the enemy perceiving, he left seauen or eight hundred horse, to recover the retreat of his footemen, taking the way to Valenciennes. Tremouille and the Marshall of Chabannes offer to charge them in the reere, the Suisses cried out for battell, to giue a testimony vnto the King, that they desired to seale the confirmation of their new alliance with some notable seruice: and if their aduice had bene followed, the Emperour had that daye by all likelihood lost his honour, and the flower of his army. So the enemy retyred without any losse, except the bastard of Aimeries and some prisoners. GOD doth often minister occasions, the which being once neglected, are neuer recouered with so great aduantage. But howloeuir, the Emperour retyred by night into Flanders with a hundred horse, leauing all the rest of his armye behinde him.

The Emperours dishonorable retreat.

The next day, Bouchain yeelded at the first summons of the Duke of Bourbon. This shamefull retreat of the Imperials drawes our armie to Hedin, being vnfurnished of souldiers, when as the Inhabitants feared no enemy, beinge busied at the marriage of the daughter of the Receiuer generall of Arthois. The Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme and the Earle of S. Paul, with the troups commonly called the blacke bands, notwithstanding the continuall raine, were at the Towne gates, before the Cittizens had anye intelligence of their departure from the armie.

The Towne beinge resolutely attempted, was taken by assault, and was spoiled by the footmen, the which abounded in wealth: for that in old time the Dukes of Bourgonne had made their chiefe residence there. But in the midst of the spoile, one quarter of the towne was fired, contrarye to the Constables expresse commandement, the which depriued the souldiers of part of their bootie.

The Lady of Reux and the garrison of the Castle departed with their baggage: but all the inhabitantes that were retyred and come into it, were put to ranfome. The Lord of Biez had the gouernement of the Castle, and Lorges of the Towne, with a thousand foote. This happened on all-Saintes day.

Winter was come, and the enemy appeared no more: the King disperfed his army, and giuing the most of the Gentlemen that had followed the Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme, the command of twenty fife horse a peece, putting his companies into garrison, and disposing of the rest of the armie, hee retyred to Compiene, about Christmas, not able for the distemperature of the weather to releue Tourmay, necessarily forcing the Lord of Champroux to depart with an honourable composition, armed, their Ensignes displayed, Drummes founding, and their baggage saued.

Nowe may wee see, what effects the Popes league with the Emperour shall bring bring forth. Being both equally desirous to expel the French out of Italy, they thought it best, before they came to open force, to shadow their practises with a Foxes skune, and by meanes of the banished men, to assaile the Duchies of Milan and Genes, at one instant, with the Citties of Parma, Plaisance, Cremona, and Crema. But he that attempts too much, performs little: so many sundry enterprises do most commonly terrifie more then hurt. According to this plot, the Emperours galleys, remaining at Genes, the Popes come sodenly into the Port of Genes, with two thousand Spaniards, led by Adorne, hoping that the Partisans of that familie, would not faile to mutine: but the good order which Fregefe had set, made their dessein frutelesse. On the other side, Lautrec, before his coming into France, to marry the Daughter of the Lord of Orail, had expelled many out of Milan, that were ill affected to the King, whereof they said the most part had beene banished for sleight occasions, or to seize vpon their goods.

Without doubt, seueritie looseth those hearts, which clemencie and moderation in a temperate commander would make vse of at need. Francis Sforce, Ierome Moron, Manfroy Paluiofin, and Soto of Brindesi, were the chiefe, who hauing assembled a great number of their Partisans, for the execution of their desseins, retired to Regium, belonging to the Church, although neither the Pope, nor the King (according to their treatie) ought to haue supported them in their territories. Lescut Marshall of Foix, Lieutenant to his Brother, aduertised of these stirres, by Frederick of Bessle, parted from Milan on Midsummer eue, accompanied with foure hundred Lances, and followed by Bessle, leading a thousand foote, to require Count Guy of Ragon, gouernour of the Towne for the Pope, that according to the treatie, he should deliuer these banished men into his hands. Whilst that Lescut and Ragon, conferred together vpon their faith, at a posterne entring into the Rauelin, at the gate which goes to Parma, the one complaining, that contrary to the Articles of the League, they did support (in townes belonging to the Church) the banished men assembled, to trouble the Kings estate: and the other, that hee had sodenly entred with armes into the territories of the Church: behold a gate being opened for the letting in of a Cart laden with meale, the Lord of Ponneul aduanceh with some men at armes, to seize vpon the port: but they were repulsed, and the gate shutte. Some banished men being vpon the walles, discharged their Harquebuses, and hurt Alexander Triuulce, whereof he dyed two daies after. Nothing saved Lescut, but the feare which the Harquebusier had that aimed at him, to kill the Gouernour. The indiscretion of one man, is pernicious to such as accompany him.

During this garboile, the Earle, to assure Lescuts person, led him vpon his faith into the Rauelin. The men at armes taking this for an imprisonment, fled to carrynewes to the troupes, which stayed two miles from Regium: who standing doubtfull, whether they shoud marche against the Towne to recouer their leader, or returne to Parma, thinking it a practise to surprize the Towne in their absence: the Marshall arriued, being released by the Earle, forbearing to stay him, hauing giuen him his faith, and received commission, not to proceed against the King by open warre. This enterprise as badly effected as rashly attempted, was of consequence. It was a good colour for the Pope to accuse the King, and to iustifie his confederacie with the Emperour. To prevent this, Lescut sent La Motte Grouin to Leo, to disauowe the attempt at Rhegium, and to let him vnderstand, that what he had done, was neither to attempt against him, nor against the estate of the Church. For answer: The Marshall of Foix (sayd the Pope in great choller) hath lodged (in armes like an enemy) vpon my territories, I will make him know the wrong he hath done vnto the King. Presently after this threat, he did excommunicate the Marshall out of the Church.

The dessein vpon Como, succeeded no better then that of Genes: for Manfroy of Paluiofin, and Soto of Brindizi, hauing in the night approached to the walles, with eight hundred Italian foote, and Lansquenets, hoping that Anthony Rusque a Citizen of Como, would make a breach for them in the wall behinde his house, as hee had promi-

A promised to Benedict Lorme, another of that cittie, that was banished: Captaine Garrou a Bisque by nation, a man well practised in armes, did mingle the townesmen with the souldiers, at the gard of the wall: to prevent the execution of their intelligence, if happily they had any. So as the conspirators not daring to discover themselves, Paluiofin decciued of his foolish enterprise, hauing planted his gards about the town, where he thought most fit, went to sleepe. Garrou, issues forth to giue them a skirmish. he kills the greatest part: some seeke their safety vpon the lake, others vpon the mountaine. Three barkes were sunke in the Lake, and seuen taken by Garrou. Many were taken prisoners: amongst others Manfroy and Soto, who after they had confessed the reuolts and practises in the estate of Milan, were publicly quartered at Milan: and Bartlemew Ferrier their complice, a man of authority in the Towne was beheaded, vpon the returne of the Lord of Lautrec: whom the King (being aduertised of these disorders) sent presently to Milan. The Lansquenets had leaue to depart into their Country.

Seeing the Popes secret practises could not succeed, he now discouers himselfe: he complains in the consistorie of Cardinalis, of the attempt of Rhegium, and concludes, that the King is ill affected to the Apostolike see, and (concealing the capitulations he had secretly made with the Emperour) he protest, that he is forced to alie himselfe vnto him, who (said Leo) had neuer committed any thing vnworthy of a Christian Prince, and very zealous to religion. So, the Wolfe in the fable accused the sheepe C for troubling the water. There vpon he presently makes shew to contract with Dom John Emanuel Ambassador to Charles, the league which he had formerly concluded, and resolues, by the aduic of Prosper Colonne, to invade the Estate of Milan, with sixe hundred men at armes, and the companies of horie which the Emperour had in the Realme of Naples, sixe thousand Italian foote, two thousand Spaniards (which Adorne had in the riuer of Genes) two thousand Neapolitanes, (which the Marquis of Pescara should bring) foure thousand Lansquenets, and two thousand Grisons (which should be leauied at their common charge) and two thousand Suisses, which had remained voluntarily, of a greater number vnder the Popes paie.

Whilst this was working, behold a fatall signe to our Frenchmen, of their instant calamities: for on S. Peters day, the Sunne being set, and the skie cleere, a lightning D fell vpon the great Tower of the Castle of Milan, and ouerthrew sixe fadomes of the Curtaine on either side, consumed two hundred and fifty thousand weight of powder, twelue hundred fire pots, the prouision of salt for five yeares: and vnder the ruines were slaine, Richbourg Captaine of the Castle, and about three hundred Gentlemen & souldiers that were walking there. Leo did not forget to triumph at this accident, and to impute it to the wrath of God laid vpon the French.

An ominous
signe to the French.

This heauy accident was a spur to hasten his resolutions, for the ruine of our men. And knowing that the estate of Mantoua did import him much for the warres of Lombardy, he intertained Frederic Marquis of Mantoua with two hundred men at armes, & E two hundred light horse, giuing him the title of Generall for the Church: for the accepting whereof the Marquis renouncing the order of Saint Michel, sent backe the collar to the King, wherewith his maiestie had honoured him.

The Marquis of Mantoua and Prosper Colonne, hauing armed for the Pope, and the Marquis of Pescara for the Emperour, they besieged Parma, seated vpon a riuer of the same name, and easie to be passed: but after great raine, and the day after the beheading of S. John, hauing battered the port of S. Croix towards Milan (which at that time was but the suburbe:) and made a breach of fifty paces, giuen three sharpe assaults and were repulsed, about foure thousand Italians, of six thousand that were within the Towne, went out at a breach, and yeelded to the enemy.

F The Marshall of Foix, who had vnderaken the defence thereof, the Lord of Pont dorny Gouernour of the Towne and the other Captaines, hauing kept the bafe Towne about fiftene dayes, retired into the Towne beyond the Riuer, leauing 1521. leaving an Italian Captaine at the breach, to favour the retreat of their men at armes, who, to worke his owne with safety, deceived the enemy by a gentle stratageme. Hee caused every one of the harguebuziers, to lay an end of a match light vpon the rampar, where they did vsually make their gard, so as it was an houre after the breake of day, before the enemies had knowledge that the breach was abandoned: which hauing discovered, they passe their artillery, spoile the suburbs, make their approches to the Towne at Noone daie, and begin to batter the wal, which defends the other banke of the riuer.

But small accidents do often disapoint attempts of great consequence. The same night that the enemy entred into Codipont (which is the suburbe they had abandoned), newes comes, that Alphonso of Esle, Duke of Ferrare, with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, two thousand foote, (whereof Lautrec had sent him a thousand Italians and Corsegues, and twelue peeces of artillery) had surpris'd Final and Saint Felix, and threatned Modene. Prosper Colonne would not diminish his army, when as he feared the enemies approach. But to assure Modene, they must drawe out of the Papes armie, two hundred light horse and eight hundred foote, led by Cont Guy of Rancon, to ioyne with six hundred others that were left within the place.

On the other side, Lautrec approached with his army, which consisted of seauen or eight hundred Lances, thirteene or foureteene thousand Suisses, foure thousand French, which S. Valier had newly brought: five hundred men at armes Venetians, and foure thousand foote vnder Theodore Triunlee generall of the Venetians, and Andrew Crui Commissary, accompanied with the Duke of Erbin & Mare Antonie Colonne. These two considerations, with the obstinate resolution of the beleeged, forced the enemy to raise the seege, and to take the way of Po, to enter the estate of Milan. Lautrec follows them: but hauing lost two or three dayes in taking the Castell of Roquebiquet, he gaue them leysure to passe the riuer. It is good to obserue the errors of a Commander, that others may iudge and make their profit thereby. The Popes armie lay open to the spoile: the Lanquenets mutined for want of pay, refusing to followe, and refused to ioyne with the French. The retreat was made in confusion: the armie was full of feare, for this sodaine dislodging: they had in front a great difficultie, being to passe the riuer of Po. When a great armie passeth any riuer, it is easie to disturbe them, if the enemy be diligent & valiant. Were they not then likely to be put to rout, if Lautrec had surpris'd them hotly. Thus they passed the Po, the first of October, spending a whole day & a great part of the night at the passage, but the sparing of spies makes commanders oft times to let slip goodly occasions, being ignorant of the disorders & difficulties that trouble the enemy.

This is not all, other accidents happen, which being neglected, the French shall receive a shamefull disgrace. The enemies army was so weake, as the Spaniards and Lanquenets were now reduced to about seauen thousand. the Italians (for the most part new soldiers,) serued rather to make a number, then for any strength, and lodged at Rebec, attending a supplie of Suisses, so prest for victuals, as the prouision of meale, which was brought vnto them in small quantitie, was distributed to the companies by measure. The soldiers, for want of Ouenes, baked their portions vpon the embers: their Suisses came not many. Italians fled away secretly, and all men confessed, that if the French army which lodged at Donnellane, two miles neere to the enemies campe, had charged them at their rising from Robert, halfe vanquished with so many difficulties, there had remain'd little or no hope of safetie. For these necessities had forced them to retire: where the retreat being long and the enemy neere, the danger had bene euident, considering that from the Castell of Pont-Suy, belonging to the Venetians, they might disorder their battaillions with the Cannon. But the fruitlesse and long stay of our commanders at Rebec, after the enemies departure, gaue them leysure to passe the riuer of Oglié, and to lodge in the village of Ossiane, with an intent not to rise, before the arriual of their Suisses.

The feast of all Saints drew neere, the nights grew long, the continuall rayne and Errors of the French army.

A and cold annoyed our Suisses, who demanded that pay which the lawe of armes giues vnto soldiers that haue wonne a battaile, saying, that it was not their fault they had not obtained a victory. But in this case, not the will, but the effect merits such a pay: so as of all their company there remain'd about foure thousand. Thus being full of disdain and discontent, suborned likewise by the practises of the Cardinals of Medicis and Sion, (who as Legats to Leo marched in the midst of the armie with their crosses of siluer, environ'd (sayd the Originall) with humbers of armed men, artillery, blasphemers, murderers and theues, they did greatly weaken the Kings army, to terrifie the enemy, ioyning with Prosper Colonne, and rejecting the chiefe cause thereof, vpon the want of paiement. Without doubt, it is a great error, in a Kings Officers, especially in an army, to conuert the money appointed for the paiement of an armie, to other vses.

It was at the passage of the riuer of Adde, that the last act of this tragedie must be play'd: for the defence whereof, Lautrec sent the Lord of Pont-dormy, with his Company that of Ostauian Fregefe (led by Count Hugues of Pepols a Bolonois) a thousand or twelue hundred foote, and two faulcons. But it pleas'd God, at this time to satisfie the Popes couetousnesse with the spoile of our men, that might execute the iust judgement of his Vengeance soone after vpon his person. The enemy beates backe our gardes, and puttes them to flight, killies some and amongst others, Gratian of Lucé and Chardon, neighbours to the forrest of Orleans: who commanded either of them a regiment of five hundred men. They passe Adde at Vaut, and force Lautrec to retire to Cassin, and so towards Milan with his whole army.

The passage of Adde recouered *Prosper Colonne*s reputation, who for the retreat before Parma, and his ordinarie tediousnesse, was ill reputed of, as well at Rome, as in his army. Contrariwise, Lautrec wanting neyther valour nor braue resolution, but Violence and happinesse, purchas'd contempt of his men and hatred of the Milanois, whome he did the more exasperate, in causing Christopher Paluiojin to bee publicly beheaded, a man of great Nobility, great authoritie, great age, and a long time deteyned a prysoner.

Colonne aduertised of the retreat of the French to Milan, lodged at Marignan, and D his Suisses in the Abbie of Cleruant, doubtfull whether hee should passe on to Milan, being fortify'd with so many men: or turne to Pauc, being destitute of soldiers. Being thus irresolute, there appeeres vnto the Marquis of Montoua, an aged man, Lautrec odious to his army. meane in shewe and apparell, who being brought before Colonne and the other Captaines, assures them, that he is sent from the parishioners of Saint Cir of Milan, to let them vnderstand, that at the first approach of their armie, all the people of Milan are resolu'd to take armes, against the French, by the found of the belles of euery parish: wishing them to set forward with speede, without giuing the French leysure to bethinke themselves. And so he vanished away, not knowne to any man.

E The Commanders gaue credit to this intelligence. The 23. of November the Marquis of Pescara with his Spanish bands, presents himselfe at the port of Rome, at sunne setting, and presently chargeth the Venetians, appointed to gard the suburbs with a bastion, which they had newly begunne: hee putts them to flight, making no resistance, and the Suisses likewise that were lodged by them: killies some and hurts others, before our men had any knowledge of their arriual. Theodore Triunlee, who (being sicke and disarm'd) came to this alarum vpon a little moyle, was taken. The Gibelins seizing on the part, brought in the Marquis of Pescara and Montoua, the Cardinall of Medicis, Colonne, and a part of the army: Milan taken and sackt. the victors not able to conceiue, by what happinesse and meanes they had so easily obtained so notable a victorie, the which was confirmed by the sacke of the Citie, which continued fiftene dayes.

We cannot but blame our Commanders herein of negligence, and too great confidence, in not discovering the enemies remooue that day: and beleue, that they would aduenchur.

1521 would not assault the Rampars without their artillerie, the which could not hurt, the wayes being broken with continuall raine.

Lautrec, troubled with the feare and the darknesse of the night, not able to discover in so short a time, the estate of the enemy confusedly lodged, some in the Cittie, others in the Suburbs: he left Masgareu (a Gentleman of Gascogne) within the Castell, with fiftie men at armes, and six hundred French foote, and retired his armie to Come, where leaving John of Chabannes Lord of Vandenesse, brother to the Marshall of Chabannes, with fiftie men at armes, and five hundred foote, he repassed the river of Adde at Lezins, and tooke the way of Bergama, to put his men at armes into Garrison in the Venetians Countrey, and other places which held yet for the French.

It is an usuall thing, to yeeld vnto the Conqueror. Laude, Pavia, Plaisance, Alexandria, Cremona, hold for the Empire and the Duke of Milan. Janot of Herbouville, Lord of Buham, held yet the Castell of Cremona. Lautrec sent his brother Lescut thither, (who since the retreat of Parma, had ioyned with the armie) with part of his forces to recover it. Who being repulsed, Lautrec brought all his troupes, which were but fiftie hundred men at armes, foure thousand Suisses, a few other footemen, foure hundred men at armes Venetians, and six thousand foote. As all things were readie for the assault, the enemy being amazed, demanded a composition, the which they obtained with their liues and baggage. A small comfort for men halfe discouraged.

Frederic of Bossole came with his forces, by Lautrecs commandement. He had no sooner passed the Po, but Vittelli seized thereon, with a most pleasing consent of all the people. All these victories were glorious to the enemy: but the teache-rie of one blemished their former reputation. Come besieged & battered ten or twelve dayes, despairing of succour and defence, had yeelded vpon condition, that as well the French companies, as those of the Towne, should haue their liues and goods saved, de- part with their Launces vpon their thighs, and be safely conducted into the Venetians country: and yet when the French would depart, the Spaniards entred, and spoiled both the Souldiars and the Citizens. Vandenesse accusing the Marquis of Pesara to haue broken his faith, challenged him to the combate. If you will mainteine (answered he) that this sacke is happened by my commandement or permission: I say you haue lye. But before the quarrell could be ended, Vandenesse was slaine at Romagnen, at the retreat of the Admirall of Bonniuet, whom the end of the warres of Nauarre had drave beyond the Alpes.

At the same instant, those of the League sent the Bishop of Verule to the Suisses, to withdraw their affections from this Crowne. But displeased that their men had marched against the King, and complaining of the Cardinal of Sion, the Pope and all his officers, who had perswaded them to breake the conditions of their alliance, they put this Bishop in hold at Bellinzone, and called home the troupes they had in Italy. On times the victor is partaker of the discommodities of warre: they made preparation to assaile Cremona and Genes. But their desseins are broken by the death of pope Leo, who hauing newes of the taking of Milan, but especially of Parma and Plaisance (for the recouerie whereof to the Church, he had chiefly moued this warre,) he was so wonderfully transported with ioy, as he falls into a quotidian, with a Catarre, amidst all his iollitie, the which carried him within three dayes after to the graue, being the first of December.

This death did greatly impair the Emperours affaires in Italy, and bred new gouernments, new Councils, and a new estate of affaires in the Duchie of Milan. The Cardinals of Medicis and Sion, went to assist at the election of a new Pope. The imperials retained fiftene hundred Suisses, and dismissed the rest. The Lansquenets likewise departed. The Florentine companies returned into Tuscanie. Guy of Rangon lead part of those of the Church to Modena, the other remained with the Marquis of Montoua, in the Duchie of Milan. And the Duke of Ferrara (making his profit of this occasion) recovered with the liking of the inhabitants, Bondene, Final, the mountaine of Modene and Garfagnane: he tooke Lugo, Bagnacaval, and other Townes of Romagnia. Like.

Abandoned by Lautrec.

Cremona re- couered.

Come spoiled contrary to the capitulation.

Death of Pope Leo.

Alterations after this death.

Likewise Francis Maria, being expelled his Duchie of Vrbino, by Leo, and called home by the people, recovered it in few dayes. Our Commanders slept not, but the chance was turned. The Admirall of Bonnaue, with three hundred Launces, Frederic of Lozole, and Marc Antonie Colonne, leading five thousand French, and Italians, went to besiege Parma: the which after many distresses incident to the Townes besieged, was preferred by the wise resolution, and singular direction of Francis Guicardius gouernour thereof.

In the meane time, the Cardinals at Rome did sturue for Saint Peters chaire. The Cardinal of Medicis, for the reputation of his greatnesse, for his reuenues, and glory gotten in the Conquest of Milan, had already gotten the voices of fiftene Cardinals. But the rest could not endure two Popes together of one familie, which might haue beene a President to vsurpe a right of succession in the Popedom. The most ancient Cardinals opposed themselves against his nomination, euery man pretending, that dignitie for himselfe, which an other sought so greedily. During their controuersies, Cardinal Adrian Bishop of Dertuse, borne at Treut, and former scholemaster to the Emperour Charles, was put in the election: not with any intent to install him in the place of the deceased, but onely to spend that morning, and by delays coole the heat of the most violent suitors. But the Cardinal of Saint Sixte, hauing by a long o-ration amplified his vertues, and knowledge, some yeelded vnto him, (it may bee the Emperour would haue beene displeased, if they had reiected his election) others fol- lowed them: so as all the Cardinals agreeing, by a common consent hee was created Pope, when as he least dreamed of it, being absent, a stranger, vnkowne, hauing re- uerence Italie, and without thought, or hope, euer to see it. Being loth to change his name, he was called Adrian the sixth.

But what shall this poore Fleming get, to runne so far to sit in a chaire, so much en- uied? He came from Spaine, (where the Emperour had made him gouernour in his absence) to seeke his death at Rome. He shall bee little esteemed, during his Pope- dome, and they will bee glad, to send him speedily after his Predecessor. The win- ter passed, and our souldiars scattered their harnesse, to arme againe, the one sort to preferre their Conquests, and the other to recouer their losses. To this end the King sent René, bastard of Sauoie, Earle of Villars, Lord Steward of France, the Marshall of Saint Chabannes, Galeas of Saint Seuerin, maister of his horse, and the Lord of Montmorency, newly created Marshall of France, to make a leuie of sixteen thou- sand Suisses, for to succour Lautrec. And to crosse him, the Emperour, by meanes of the King of Englands money (estranged from the loue of France) sent Ierome Adorne to make a leuie of six thousand Lansquenets, to put into Milan, with Francis Sforce. Adorne coming to Trent, vnderstood that the Milanois had already enter- tained foure thousand foote, with the which hee retired to Milan, whilst the other six thousand did arme.

In the meane time there wanted no practises at Milan, by Ierome Moron, and his partisans, to kindle the peoples hatred against the French. It is not alone in our late troubles, that wee haue tried, with what efficacie seditious sermons touch the peoples hearts. Andrew Barbato, an Augustine by profession, preaching with a great concourse of people, did wonderfully incourage them, to defend their religion, goods, families, liues, and Countrey. A vehement Preacher, and gracious to the people, leads them as hee pleaseth: and it is the ordinarie mask of the wise men of this world, to settle their affaires.

It is no lesse honour to preferre, then to get. Tenne thousand Suisses were al- ready come: and Prosper Colonne (to keepe the French from entring into Milan, by the Castle, and to furnish it with victuall, and munition,) hee caused to bee made, after the manner of the ancient Romaines, without the sayd Castle, betwixt the gates that go to Vereuil and Come, two trenches, distant twentie paces one from another, about a mile long: and at the end of either of the sayd trenches, a Cavalier, or Mount, verie high, and well furnished (to indammage the ennemie,) with Parma be- sieged in vaine.

A new Pope called Adrian the sixth.

1522. with Cannon, if hee approached on that side, so as the succours could not enter, nor the beseege go forth.

Lautrec hauing by chance surpris'd, and defeated the troupe of Lewis of Conzague, repayed his Companies, and the Venetians assembled theirs, about Cremonas who being ioyned with the Suisses, passed the riuier of Adda, the first of March, and John de Medici with them, who perswaded by the Kings great and certaine entertainment, was newly drawn to his seruice. They march like men resolu'd to assault the rampar, but the trenches stay them: the third day Marc Anthony Colonne and Camillo bastard sonne to John Isques of Triuulce, walking together in a house, and desiring to make a mount to shoot from with their artillerie, betwixt the enemies two trenches, a voice of Cannon shot from the Towne, did beate downe the sayd house, and buried them in the ruines thereof.

Thus Lautrec despayning to take Milan by assault, conuerteth all his thoughts to vanquish it in time by famine: he waists the Countrie, stops the victual, breaks the milles, and cuts off their water. But not to fall into their hands whome they feare, they dread not death. The peoples hatred against the French, and the desire of their new Duke whome they expected, makes them to endure all distresses patiently. Francis Sforce comes to Trent with six thousand Lanquenets, who by the taking of the Cattle of Cravare, hauing opened the passage of Po, arrived without any let at Pavia. The way was difficult from Pavia to Milan: for at the first brute of their approach, Lautrec went to lodge at Caslin, and the Venetians at Binsque, vpon the way to Pavia. There fell out an accident, which helps Sforce. The Marshall of Foix came out of France with money, and some troupes of footmen. Lautrec sent Frederike of Bassole, to receiue him into the estate of Milan, with foure hundred Launces, and seven thousand Suisses, and Italianes: being ioyned together, they went to Nonare, and through the fauour of the Castle, tooke it at the third assault, with the slaughter of most that defended it. A small gaine which shall cause a great losse.

For Lautrec wanting a great part of his forces, hee gaue Sforce meane to enter into Milan, with his Lanquenets, and three hundred horse, with an incredible ioy to the Milanois. The coming of a new Prince is very pleasing to an estate, whereby the people hope for ease. Lautrec seeing Sforce dislodged from Pavia, and receiued into Milan, resolues to beseege Pavia, where the Marquis of Montona commanded, with two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. Lautrec batters the Towne, and makes a breach of thirtie fadome, hee giues two assaults, and is repulied. There was a postern in the Towne, ioyning to the riuier of Tesin, where they watred their horses, which by reason of the riuier was ill garded, whilist they did busie the Imperials at the breach. Saint Colombe had charge to passe the riuier, at a foard, with two thousand foot: and Riberac and Rocheposay, with foure hundred horse, of the companies of Lautrec, and the bastard of Sauoy, who marched along the wall, where there was no flankers, should by the swiftnesse of their horses, seize vpon the Postern, and hold it until their foote came. Riberac and Rocheposay execute their dessein, they enter the Towne, plant a Guidon vpon the postern: but Saint Colombe was content to bring his men to the riuers side, without wetting of his foote. So that the Citizens had leasure to come to succour it, and to repulse our men: who if they had bene followed, had taken the Towne. Riberac was slaine fighting, and Rocheposay had a leg broken with a musket shot. This attempt did wonderfully amaze the Inhabitants, considering their want of men, and munition: and the Marquis made it knowne, that without succours he should in the end bee forced to yeeld the Towne. Prosper knowing the danger, sent twelue hundred Corses and Spaniards, who marching by night, speaking Gascon, were taken for Gascons, by the Venetians, and passed their first guards, and meeting with some French scouts, speaking Italian, were taken for Italians. So as deceiuing the companies by this Stratageme, they passed without disorder, but very late, by the horsemen, who charging them behind, slew some small number. The death of Riberac, kinsman to Lautrec, made him to double the fire of the Cannon,

A Canon, and all prepared for an assault: when as Colonne fortified with Sforce troupes, goes to field, and comes to campe at Chartrousse, three miles from the French. What meane then was there to giue an assault, hauing a mightie armie behind them, and all things else succeeding crossely? The money which Lesclut had brought, was spent, and that which came from France, was stayed in Ayone, by the Vicount Anchise, who was sent to that end from Milan to Buste. The continuall raine had ouer-flowed the riuier of Tesin, and small brookes grew to be great riuers: so as the victuals which came from Omelino, to the campe, could no more passe: whereby they were forced to raise the siege, and draw towards Monce, to enioy the commodities of Laudefan and Cremonois.

B The enemy seeing the French armie take the way to Monce, fearing they would recover Milan, went to lodge at Bicoque, a Gentlemans house, but of so great a circuit as twentie thousand men might easily be put in battaile, vpon the way from Laude to Milan. Without doubt the valour and wisdom of Prosper, gaue the first wound to the French affaires, but the impatience of the Suisses did utterly ruine them. Their Colonels gaue Lautrec to vnderstand, that their companions were wearie of camping so long without any profit: that they demand of three things the one, eyther money, leave to depart, or a battaile. Our Commanders hoped by famine to driue Colonne out of his borrow. And what reason was there to assaile a mightie enemy in a Forte intrenched with Trenches, & flanked with great platformes, well furnished with artillerie: But neither perswasions, prayers, promises, nor authoritie could diuert them from their first resolution. Seeing then there was no other meane to reiect them, Lautrec resolued, rather to hazard his armie by a battaile, then to giue any occasion to be suspected of cowardise. An vnfortunate condition of a commander, who sees himselfe a slave to those whom he should command: and what a greefe is it to be forced to doe that which must needs bring shame and confusion? but where force rageth, right hath no place.

The day of Quasimodo, the armie marcheth towards Bicoque. The marshall of Foix led the foreward, Lautrec, the Marshall of Chabannes, the bastard of Sauoy, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin the battaile. Francis Maria Duke of Urbis, with the Venetian armie, by the reeward. Count Peter of Nauarre marched before, to make the way. The Lord of Montmorency should assaile them on the one side with eight thousand Suisses. Lesclut, with three hundred Launces, and a Squadron of French and Italian foote, should charge at the Bridge, entering into the enemies lodging, and Pontdormy should marche before the Marshall of Foix, with a troupe of horse, to watch, least the Imperials should come behinde and disorder the armie, and likewise to succour where neede should require.

Besides force, Lautrec vsed this pollicie, to raise the men at armes, to set red crosses vpon their Calflocks, the marke of the imperiall armie, in steed of a white, the liuerie of France. But the prouidence of Colonne made this deuise fruitlesse, as we shall see. E On the other side, Colonne had sent for Sforce, who hauing sodenly assembled foure hundred horse, and six thousand of the commons, was set to garde the bridge, and all the troupes were put in battaile vpon the Trench. Montmorency accompanied with a great number of the Nobilitie, was come close to the enemies rampar, intreating the Suisses to attend the Artillerie, and that the Marshall of Foix should be ready to assaile them on the other side: that Colonne being charged on all sides, might be constrained to diuide his forces. But a rash furie transporting the Suisses, to their owne ruine, all runne furiously to the enemies Fort. The Canon entertaines them before they approach, and kills about a thousand of them. A vollee of small shotte kills most of their Captaines, and chiefe Souldiers: and the Rampar being about a Pike in height, flaves them sodenly. The Earle of Montfort, eldest sonne to the Earle of Laual, Atolans of Sauoy, Grawille, brother to the Vidame of Chartres, Roquelauze, la Guiche, the Lords of Tournon and Longa, Launay a Gentleman of the Kings Chamber, and many others dyed there: Colonell Albert Peter (who about all others, thrust

In the meane time, the Marshall of Foix forced the gards vpon the bridge, and charging the enemy within his fort, gaue hope of victory. But this violent heat of the Swisses was soone quenched. All retire, yet keeping a kinde of order. The Imperials freed from the Swisses, turne all their forces vpon the Marshall: and Vandenesse, who had not aboute foure hundred horse, and force them to repasse the bridge with the losse of some men. On the other side the Spaniards issuing forth, charge the Swisses in the rearward, and had put them to route; if Pontdormy had not by a furious charge kept them within their fort.

The Venetians kept themselves safe from danger: but if they had charged with the Swisses and men at armes, and the Marshall of Foix had bene well followed, the French in shew had wonne the victory. But when things are done, there neuer wants an if. The Swisses lost about three thousand men, and two and twentie Captaines. The enemy lost few: no men of quality, but John of Cordone Earle of Cuslance. So Lautrec returned with the rest of his army, the Swisses and the artillery, to Monce, from whence the Twelofday after, the Swisses returned to their houses, and the Bastard of Savoie, the Marshall of Chabannes, and Galeas of Saint Senerin retired with them. Now shall we see this nation so daunted, as of many yeares they shall not shew their accustomed vigour.

The remainder of the French hopes was chiefly grounded vpon the Towne of Cremone, for the passage of the river of Adda, and preferuation of the Country of Cremone. Lautrec sent John de Medicis, and Frederic of Bossole thither with their troupes, which were about foure hundred men at armes, three thousand foote, comprehending those which Bonneuil, Captaine of the place had. These companies used with their march in the night, arrived in the morning, and leaving the gards of the Towne to Bonneuil, they tooke their lodgings, to refresh themselves and their horse. The Marquis of Pescara had followed them, and his forward marching nere vnto the Towne, gaue occasion to the garrison to come forth to skirmish: in the which our men were so roughly repulsed, as the enemy entred with them pell meel, into Lude, and surprisid most of the soldiars in their beds at noone day. Thus, foure hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote were shamefully taken in a towne without batterie, without breach and without ladder. John de Medicis and Bossole saved themselves in Cremone.

The losse of Lude for the French, was the cause the enemy recovered Pisqueton, one of the strongest places vpon Adda. Here vpon Pontdormy offers to put himselfe into Cremone, with such as would followe him, and being strong or weak, fight with all that should come, desyring rather to die by the enemies sworde, then to fall into the mercie of villaines, or returne into France without armes, and without honour. Lautrec yeelds, and hee gathers together a troupe out of many companies. The Marshall of Foix would haue his part of this glorie, five or sixe dayes after the Imperials campe before it. At their arrivall, John Medicis mutines, he demands pay for fiftene or sixtene hundred men, which hee had gathered together presently after his retreat: he seizeth vpon one of the gates, towards the enemies campe, and threaten to deliver it for want of payement. They search their puries and pay him the summe demanded.

But hee was corrupted, and our men seeing his treacherous intent, hauing no hope of succors, did capitulate: That, if within threemonths the King did send a strong army, able to passe the river, they should depart with their baggage, armes and all their artillery, marked with the armes of France, and should bee conducted in safety into Suize: and the said Marshall should deliuer into Prosper hands all whatsoeuer was held in the Kings name, in the estate of Milan, except the Castells of Milan, Cremone and Nouare. This capitulation was found of hard digestion: for Montmorency was in possibilitie to renewe the League with the Venetians: but aduertised of this

A this composition, they changed both affections, and partie. The reason which made Prosper yeeld to so honorable a composition, was the desire he had to restore the Ad- The Venetians tooke the King.
dornes into Genes, before the leuie of foure hundred Lances, and foureteene thousand Gassons should be readie to enter into Italie. Prosper Colonne plants himselfe before Genes, which was then gouerned by Ottavian Fregese, a man of excellent vertue, who for his iustice, and other commendable parts, was as much beloued, as any Prince might bee, in a Citie diuided into factions, hauing not yett lost the remembrance of the ancient libertie Fregese being Ierome and Anthony Adorne, to take armes in fauour of the Imperials, and the people inclined to sedition, treated of an accord, when as Peter of Nauarre enters into the port with two gallies, and some two hundred to assure the Towne, attending the succours of France. But a Towre which the Marquis of Pescara had battered nere vnto the gate, made them returne vnto their parte. Being readie to conclude, the Spaniards discouering the small gards they made within, vnder colour of this hope, seized on the Towre, entering the Towne thereby, and by the wall which was ruined, killing all they met: and getting a great spoyle, Fregese being sicke, yeelded to the Marquis of Pescara, and within few dayes after died.

Peter of Nauarre was taken fighting in the market place. The Archbishop of Salerno, brother to Ottavian, and many Captaines saved themselves by sea. Anthony Adorne, was chosen Duke of Genes, and within few dayes received the Citadell, the Chapellet, and the Church of Saint Francis, by composition. Sixe thousand men newly sent by the King, vnder the command of the Lord of Lorges, for the succour of Genes, and the armie of Claude of Orleans, Duke of Longuenille, to repaire the affaires of Lombardie, returned without any effect, being already entred into the territoire of Ast and Lescut, prest by the terme limited by the composition, deliuered Cremone to Colonne, leaving Bunon Captaine of the Castle.

Thus the French were againe expelled out of Italie. Lautrec seeing the enterprise of Lude made fruitlesse, his armie ruined, and the Swisses, and Venetians rettyred, hee returns into France, bringing to the King, rather iustifications of his actions, then any signes of his victories, imputing the cause of these disorders to want of money, D without the which, hee could no longer keepe the men at armes together, who had serued eightene moneths, without any pay, the Kings mother hauing stayed foure hundred thousand Crownes, appointed for the payment of the armie, which summe (she sayd) she had spared out of her reuenues, and had long before put it into Semblysais hands, being ouerser of the Treasor of France. Here vpon the King appointed certaine Iudges, and Commissioners to determine of this controuersie, and to araigne the sayd Semblysais, for the which he lost his life.

Let vs now passe ouer the Pirenee mountaines, and then we will returne to the frontiers of Picardie: an other Theatre, where there was likewise acted a mournfull and bloudie Tragedie. The Admirall of Bonniuel was no sooner returned into France with his troupes, but the Spaniards went and incamped before Fontarabie, and had so prest it with seige, for the space of a yeare, as many were dead of hungar. The Marshall of Chastillon marched with an armie, to releue the Towne, and Lude, being then gouernour, comming to Dax, (six Leagues on this side Bayonne) hee died of a violent sicknesse. A Nobleman of great experience, and credit, Montmorency (who was then at Venice) succeeded him in the office of Marshall, and the Marshall of Chabannes in that of Lieutenant generall for the King in his armie, who hauing gathered together his troupes, lodged in Endaye, hauing a river berwixt the Spanish armie, and him, attending Lartigue Viceadmiral of Brittanie, with an armie at sea, for the victualling of the Towne. But he not appearing, either through sloth or misfortune, he resolues of another course. he passeth the river, dislodgeth the enemy with his Cannon, and by continuall skirmishes, makes them flee through the mountaines. So Chabannes hauing vitallid the Towne, returnes, leaving Frauget to gouerne there in the Kings name: he was Lieutenant to the Marshall of Chabannes, leading away Lude to refresh himselfe in in France. Without doubt, Lude deserves to be registred in this history. Having (as the Originall) wonnesuch honour in the defence of this place, as he may well be compared to any that have mayntayned sieges in our dayes, or our forefathers. Contrarywise, France shall purchase as much infamie, as his predecessour did honour. During these confusions beyond the Alpes and Pirenee mountaines, the warre continued throughout all the garrisons of Picardie, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with lesse. The day of the Annuntiation, twelue hundred Lanquenets going out of Arras, having spoiled Bernaillie and other villages about, led away their bootie, when as Estree commanding the comparie of the Duke of Vendosme, which was in garrison at Dourlans, advertised hereof, goes to horse-backe about midnight, with thrie men at armes onely, fiftie archers and three hundred of the Country men, without pay: he attends them at a passage of the river of Othie: upon their retreat, he chargeth them, defeats them, and kills a hundred and fiftie, making the rest to leaue their prey. And if this handfull of men could give them so great a checke, what had bene the issue, if their footemen had come to fight? In this encounter were slaine the Lord of Ricame, and the bastard of Dampont.

The enemy greued at this disgrace, sought to be reuenged by the surpris of Dourlans, where there were no foote-men. With this desseigne, the Earle of Bures, Lieutenant generall for the Emperour in the Lowe Countries, incampes before the Towne, with all his garrisons, batters it with six peeces of artillery, makes a breach neere to the Tower of Corniere, gives an assault, and plants many ladders. Here the Inhabitants shew themselves better Frenchmen, then in our late troubles: who backt by this small troupe of men at armes, repulse the enemy, and ouerthrowe a good number dead in the ditch.

To raise this seege, the Earle of Saint Paul (vnder the authority of the Duke of Tendosse, his brother) gathers together such forces as the garrisons could furnish, whereof the Bourguignons advertised, they shamefully returned to Arras, leaving their ladders within the trenches. Dienal, Diunion, Brucil and other places about Betune, (wonderfully annoying the frontier,) were ruined by the Duke of Vendosme. But oftentimes a small gaine is crost with a notable losse. Telligny came from Monstreuil, to ioine with the Dukes troupes at Atouchy le Cayen, when as passing by Hedin, he encountered three hundred Bourguignons on foote, diuining the bootie before them: hee chargeth these armed clownes, slue some and tooke others. A very preiudiciall victory, in regard of that valiant Knight, so well experienced in martiall assayes, who being thrust into the shoulder, died within fewe dayes after. In the meantime the Emperour passed into Spain, to punish the authoris of the sedition before mentioned, imparting his desseigne to the King of England. His voyage was not fruitlesse: they remayned well satisfied one of another, to the preiudice of this Crowne, of heauen against their common attempts.

A League betwixt the Emperour &
the King of England.

The first effect of their treatie, was to send their Ambassadors ioynly together to Venice, to require the Senat to ioine with the Emperour, for the defence of Italie. For the second; The King of England complayning that the King did not conuene the paiement of fiftie thousand Crownes yearly, which hee ought him (as wee haue sayed,) hee proclaimed warre against the King by his Herald, in case hee would not make a generall Truce with the Emperour, comprehending the Church, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentins.

The King refused this truce, and as for the pension, It is not reasonable (saied hee) to give money to him, that aides mine enemies with money. Henry King of England had before lent a notable some of money to the Emperour: but not discovering himselfe openly: hee sent the Duke of Suffolke, husband to Queene Marie, widow to Lewis, the twelfth, to Calais: and the Emperour ioyned his forces with him, being led by the Earle of Bures.

The King opposed the Duke of Vendosme, commanding about a thousand men at armes

A armes, with their archers, and eightene thousand foote, assisted by that reuerend old man Lewis of Tremouille. The enemies army was not ready in fiftene dayes. The Duke therefore diuided his forces into Bologne, Therouenne, Hedin, Monstreuil, Abbeville and other places subiect to the enemies inuasion. Hee must not suffer their courage to quail through idleness: Bapaume serued them for an exercise. The Earle of S. Paul led the Earles of Guise and Lorges thither, equall in charge, with foure hundred men at armes, six thousand foote and foure Cannons. who having taken, burnt and razed the towne and Castle, they tooke their way to the passage of Sluce, and finding it guarded by the Bourguignons, they charge them, and chase them to the gates of Douay. Here Francis brother to the Duke of Lorraine and Earle of Guise, of the age of sixteene or seuentene yeares, carried his first armes: who seeing in this chase, seuen or eight Bourguignons on foote, seeking their safety within the woodes: being alone, not seene by his followers, hee lights and chargeth them: but Martin du Bellay arrives happily accompanied with ten or twelue horse, by whose means these runn-awaies were cut in peeces.

Hereupon the English arrive at Calais, and at their first entry, they become maisters of the Castle of Comtes, betwixt Monstreuil and Hedin. To prevent theie incursions, the Duke sent the foresaid Earles into the trench of Bologne (Ardes was then ruined and desert) who by the recovery of the said Castle, put all to the sword they found within it, except the Captaine: and afterwards ouerthrew many other troupes, that were dispersed in the land of Oye, while the two armies, English and Bourguignons assembled betwixt Ardes and S. Omer, consulting vpon the first object of their forces.

Hedin seemed the easiest to be attempted, yet it must needes cost blowes. The Lord of Biez commanded there with thirty men at armes, and thirty Dead-paies: Sereu with a thousand foote, and La Lande with foue hundred. The battery continued fiftene dayes, and a breach was made of forty fadome, but no assault giuen: the enemy being diuerted by continuall alarumes. The Earles of Guise and Pont-dormy, vnderstanding one day amongst others, that foure hundred English were gone towards Biez, and the Commander of Oison: they part from Monstreuil with their companies, and some of the Duke of Vendosmes, they ouertake them, charge them, and kill or take them all. Some fewe dayes after, Pont-dormy incountring some other troupes, which had burnt Fressin, a house of his elder brothers, he put them all to the sword.

Thus kept within their lodgings, by continuall enterprises, and afflicted with a general flux, which went through their army, proceeding in part by the continuall raine, after six weekes seege, they raised their Campe with shame, to march towards Dourlans, which was not defensible. At that time there was no Castle: and from the mountaine where it is now built, they discovered the towne on all sides. The Earle of S. Paul prevented the enemy, and (least the enemy should make vse thereof) hee spoyled the victualls, and tooke off the gates: then hee rettyred to Corby, to withstand the attempts of the English. Then arrived the Marshall of Montmorency, bringing with him the two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber, with authority from his Maestie to rule and command at Corby, if the enemy did beseege it.

But there was too great resolution in Corby, the wayes were too foule, the infirmities were many in the English and Bourguignons armies: and winter approaching (it was about all Saints) inuited the to set saile. Being able to do no worse, they burnt Dourlans, and the Villages about, and rettyred into Arthois, putting the Bourguignons into Garrison: and the English tooke their way for England. Let vs conclude this year with an ignominious and farall losse for the Christians. Soliman did not forget to make his profit of these horrible confusions: who by the painefull and constant siege, for the space of eight moneths, brought the Isle of Rhodes vnder his obedience: where (to the great contempt of our Religion) he made by the Turke, 1123. his entrie the day of the birth of our Lord and Saviour. In the beginning of the following year, the Castell of Milan (prest with diseases and want of all things) compounded, to depart with bag and baggage, if they were not releued by the fourth of Aprill. But death preuenting most part of the garrison, hindred them from enioying any benefit of the Capitulation.

At the same time Liuet, a soldiar of the garrison of Guise, treated with the Duke of Alot, to deliuer him the Towne, (but not according to the buyers intent) by the consent of Nicholas of Bussu Lord of Longueuall, Capitaine of the Castell. The party was well made and the plot cunningly layed, to take the marchants when they should come for their possession. The Lord of Fleuranges, with three hundred men at armes, and foure or fiftethousand foote, should lie betwixt Auenmes and Guise, to stoppe the enemies retreat. The Duke of Vendosme, with five hundred men at armes, foure thousand Germaines, and foure thousand French, should cut off their way betwixt the Abby of Bonhourie and Guise: so as the enemy seeking to retire, had the one before him, and the other behind. The chiefe of all their troups would be partakers of this enterprize: When as newes comes vnto them, that the King (who would countenance this exploit with his presence) was come in post to Genlis, neere vnto Chauxis. This made them turne head without any effect, giuing him the strappadoe that sold it, &c. was their guide: the which Longueuall required with the like to the hostages, which the Duke of Arefiat had giuen him for the performance of covenants.

His maiestie, to make vse of these troups which hee had assembled, commanded them to victuall Terouenne, the which Fiennes besieged with fiftene thousand Flemings and sixe hundred English: the King had a little before repayed it. Bailloul vpon the hill a strong place, betwixt Arras and Dourlins, and defended by three hundred Spaniards, was also inderance to this desieine. The Duke of Vendosme tooke charge of the armie, whereof the Duke of Norfolke led the Germaines: the Lords of Sercu, Bourmonville, la Hergerie, Fontains and Halli commanded the French. Bryon had foure hundred archers of the Kings gard, and la Fayette commanded the artillery: he made his approches at noone day, without any trenches, but with the losse of three gunners that were slaine, and the Lord of Piennes shot into the arme: hee battred it the same day, gaue them the it lies that were within it, and razed the Castell. The enemy lodged in Andintion and Dellente, halfe a League from Terouenne: and le Lude Marshall of the Campe (having lodged his army at Fouquemberg, to haue victualls more commodiously from Montreuil, and to keepe them from the enemy) did cut off the way to Saint Omer, and the garrison of Terouenne, that of Aire. Fiennes seeing them approach so neere, dislodged in the night, and went to campe at Elfaut. The Duke of Vendosme followed, with an intent to fight, whilest that Bryon marking directly to Terouenne were leueed it with such victualls as were brought from Montreuil. The Earle of Dammartin and the Lord of Esguilly began the skirmish, when a soden feare surpriseth the Flemings, puts them in route towards the riuer of Coldes, where many were drowned in the passage, not able to be stayed, although no man followed them: for that Bryon returning from Terouenne, brought commandement from the King to the Duke of Vendosme, not to hazard a batrayle, but to keepe his forces whole for the voiage of Italie, which his maiesty pretended to make in person.

But he must likewise prouide for the frontier, especially for Terouenne, being onely refreshr for some dayes. The victuall and carriages being ready, and the troups camping before Andintion, vpon the riuer of Lis, the forward led by the Marshall of Montmorency, was on the one side of the riuer, and the battaile on the other: the Flemings and Bourguignons (aduertised of these diuided lodgings,) come and charge them both by night at one instant, fall vpon the gards of the light horse-men of the battaile, and repulse them to the men at armes, whereof part being then on horse-backe, they sustaine the shooke: and if they had not busied themselues with the spoile, before a small victorie, it would haue caused a great disorder in the army.

A commaunded them: who at the first alarm given by his skouts, being advanced to discover, he was compassed in, and taken prisoner. Our historie owes the report of his name, to the faithfull affection he bare vnto his Country: for fearing least the Campe should be surpriseth, he respected not his life in regard of the aduertisement he might giue in crying to armes. So the enemy seeing him selfe discovered, made the victualling of Terouenne easie by his retreat.

This exploit increased the Kings desire to repasse the Alpes. With this intent, he sent the Marshall of Montmorency, to make a leauy of twelue thousand Swisses, appointing the Rendez-vous for his army, at Lion. In the beginning of August, he dispatched the Admirall of Bonniniet, with six thousand French, led by Lorges, to get the passage of Suze, & will he might follow with the rest of his forces.

The Venetians having tried in former times, that the neighbourhood of the King of France and the Emperours of Germany, had caused them to attempt against their common weale, desiring that the Duchy of Milan might remaine in the possession of Francis Sforce, whose power they nothing feared: and for that the Emperour, not able to proceed further, inclined to the restoring of Sforce, they imbraced his friendship, and concluded a peace and perpetuall league with him, with Ferdinand Duke of Austria, and with Francis Sforce Duke of Milan, whereby they bound themselves: To arme for the common defence of Italy, sixe hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and six thousand foote. And the Emperour, with the like numbers of men should defende all that the Venetians possesse in Italy. Moreover Pope Adrian, desiring (in shew) the generall peace of all Christendome, had soone after the comming to the Pontificall seat, made some shewe to interpose his authority for the reconciliation of our warriers.

But he had beene of long time at the Emperours deuotion: so as he did willingly giue care to such as perswaded him, not to suffer the King of France to repollesse the Duchy of Milan. And certaine letters of the Cardinal of Volterres, intercepted by the meanes of the Duke of Sesse, Ambassador for the Emperour at Rome, thrusts him on to make his declaration against the King. This Cardinal aduised the King, by the Bishop of Xaintes his Nephew, to assaile the Hand of Sicile, with an army by sea: to constrain the Emperour to turne his forces to the defence thereof, and to make the way more easie to recouer the estate of Milan.

And according to this Councell, a practise was discovered in Sicile, in the Kings fauour, which was the death of the Earle of Cambrate, the maister of the Ports, and of the high treasurer of the land, who was quartered. These reasons, and the landing of the French, which was butted throughout all Italy, did easly draw the Pope to ioyne with the Emperour, the King of England, the Archduke Ferdinand, brother to the Emperour, the Duke of Milan, the Florentines, Genouois, Sienois & Luguois: who agreed to leaue an army to oppose it against any one that should inuade any of the confederates in Italy. Neither the Emperours league with the Venetians (who had played the turne-coats) nor the vnion of so many Princes and Estates conspired together, could daunt the resolution of our Francis: and now the rumor of his comming bred new tumults in Italy. Lionel brother to Albert Pie surpriseth the Towne of Carpi, which the Emperour had taken from him, proclayming him a rebell to the Empire.

Francis Sforce, riding one day from Monce to Milan, and his troupe remaying behind, least they should annoy the Duke with the dust which their horses did raise, Boniface Viconte, a yong Gentleman, grieved that a kinsman of his had beene put to death within Milan, by the consent (said he) of the said Duke, watching his opportunity, hee pricks forward with a dagger in his hand to strike Sforce in the throat: but being mounted vpon a little Moyle, and Boniface vpon a tall & swift Turkish horse, Sforce had meanes to slip aside, so as he hurt him in the shoulder: and then the murtherer began to strike him with his sword: but his traine comming to his rescue, they forced him to leaue him, and so by the swiftnesse of his Horse, hee saued himselfe

Bourbon reuolts.

The French army passed the Alpes in small troupes, and the King prepared to followe them. But it is a matter of dangerous consequence for a King, to thrust a great Prince into despaire, who hath meanes of reuenge, if without respect of his degree or quality, they seeke wholly to oppresse him. Notwithstanding Princes should forbear to cause any inuouations, if they did but duly examine the causes and reasons whereby men colour their bearing armes against their Country. Of the Kings iourney is stayed by the like occurrent. We haue noted before, that the leading of the foreward (giuen by the King to the Duke of Alanfon, and to the Marshall of Chastillon) was the first motiue which estranged Charles Duke of Bourbon, Constable of France, from the Kings seruice, and this other did wholly withdrawe him. Of the marriage of Peter Duke of Bourbon and Anne sister to King Charles the 8. Susanne was borne, their only heire, the which being made sure to Charles of Valois Duke of Alanfon. Charles of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier, and afterwards Constable, waged in lawe, after the decease of the sayd Peter, that all the lands of his succession belonged vnto him, as the heire male, issued from a yonger brother of Bourbon. To ende this controuersie, a marriage was made betwixt the sayd Earle of Montpensier and Susanne, and he called him selfe Duke of Bourbon. Susanne dying soone after the first discontent of Charles Duke of Bourbon, the Kings mother being Regent, (by the Counsell as they say of Anthony Prat then Chancellor) pretended, that such lands as came by the succession of Peter of Bourbon, and were held by gift, belonged to the King: and such as were held by inheritance, appertayned vnto her, as the next heire, and daughter to a sister of the sayd Peter married with the Duke of Sauoye.

The sute depended in the Court of Parliament at Paris, & Charles eyther distrusting the equity of his cause, or fearing least the Regents authority should preuaile against his right, & so by consequence dispossesse him: choosng rather to abandon his Country, then to lue in want, he practiseth with the Emperour, by the meanes of Adrian of D Croi Earle of Reux: and to make the articles of his transaction the more strong, hee obtaynes a promise from the Emperour, to marry Eleanor his sister, widow to Emanuel King of Portugall.

The King being past the Alpes, the Constable should inuade Bourgonne with twelue thousand Germaines, which should bee secretly leuied by the Emperour and King of Englind, who at the same instant should inuade Picardie, whilst the Spaniards recovered Fontenabie, as they did. Of their Conquests he onely reserued Prouence, pretending to call himselfe King of Prouence, as belonging vnto him (sayd he) by the houle of Aniou, yeelding all the rest to the Englysh. A practise sufficient to shake France, before the King (being absent with his forces) should returne in any time to succour it. But they reckoned without their host, and the gardian of this Crowne did preuent them: for Argouges and Marignon, gentlemen of Normandie, and house-hold seruants to the Duke, had aduertised the King, of his pretended retreat to the Emperour: but they were ignorant of the agreement made betwixt them.

To diuert him from this resolution, the King passing by Molins, did visit the Duke in his chamber: who made a shewe to be sick, and that cunningly. I vnderstand (sayd the King) of some practises which the Emperour makes to withdrawe the loue you vndoubtedly beare vnto the Crowne, as issued and neere allyed to the houle of France. I do not beleue, that you haue giuen eare to any such perswasions, mooued with any dislike of mee, or of my realme. Some feare of distrust to loose your offices, hath perchance made a breach in the loue you haue alwayes made shewe of. Let not this conceyt trouble you. I promise you, in case you should loose your sute against my selfe and my mother, to restore you to the possession of all your goods. Prepare therefore to followe mee, after your recovery in the

A voyage of Italie. The Duke (being very wise) dissembled his intent cunningly, consulting vnto the King, that in truth the Earle of Reux had fought him for the Emperour, but he would giue no eare vnto him: that his intention was to haue aduertised his Maestie at the first view, being loth to commit it to any mans report: that the Physicians gaue him hope to be soone able to go in a litter, and that he would not faile to come to Lions, to receiue his Maiesties commandements. But considering that he had to deale with too strong a partie, and that hardly he should enioy his goods, which were already sequestred by a decree of the Court, he retired to Chantelles, in the beginning of September, a house of his owne, where he had the most sumptuous mouebles that any Prince could haue. From thence he sent the Bishop of Autun, of the house of Hurants, to the King, with instructions signed with his hand, promising, To serue his Maestie well and loyally, in all places, whersoever it should please him, during his life, and without any breach, vpon restitution of the possessions of Peter of Bourbon.

The King finding this manner of proceeding hard and insolent, sent the Bastard of Sauoy, Lord Steward of France, and the Marshall of Chabannes, with foure hundred men at armes, the Captaines of his gardes, and the Prouost of his houle, to besiege the Duke in Chantelles. And vnderstanding that many Lansquenets did troupe together vpon the frontier of Bourgonne, he caused the Bishop of Autun, the Chancellor of Bourbonnois, the Lord of Cars, Saint Vallier, Buffy brother to Palisse, Emard de Priis, La Fanguion, and many others, to be taken prisoners: who for the loue of him were content to abandon their country, families and goods, notwithstanding they found grace with the King.

But the Duke (despairing of his estate) resolved to hazard all, and to begin a furious Tragedie, in the which we shall see our Francis act the part of an vnfortunate prisoner of the warres, and Charles reserued for a bloudie and tragicke end. He disguised himselfe, and taking the Lord of Pomperant for his onely companion, whose seruante he seemed to be. After many turnings, being often feared, as appears in the Originals, the wayes being layed, and the passages stoppt, or full of troupes, marching into Italy, he recouers the French Court, and so by Ferrete, crossing through Germaine, he came into Italy: and according to the choise which the Emperour gaue him, eyther to passe into Spaine, or to remaine in Italie with his armie, in the end hee continued at Genes, to see the end of these two great armies.

The Duke of Bourbon lies disguised.

The Marshall and Lord Steward, seized vpon Chantelles, with the mouebles of Carlat, and generally of all the lands of the houle of Bourbon, for the King. In the meane time, the Marshall of Montmorency had made such speed, as his twelue thousand Suisses were ioyned with the Admirall, attending the Kings comming at Turin. But his presence was necessarie in France: there were strange practises against him. He therefore sends part of his forces to the Admirall, and commands him to execute the enterprise of Milan, as they two had concluded. Hee had eightene hundred Launces, twelue thousand French, ten thousand Suisses, Six thousand Lansquenets, and three thousand Italians, a sufficient armie for a great attempt: but want of iudgement to imbrace occasions, and negligence of his businesse, made the Admirall loose the opportunitie to recouer Milan at the first, and to bee vnfortunate in this voyage.

Prosper Colonne, considering the Venetians league with the Emperour, and the treachery of the Duke of Bourbon, could not beleue that the King should continue constant in his resolution, to inuade the Duchie of Milan that yeare. This perswasion had made him catechise to make necessarie prouision for this warre. But now (notwithstanding his infirmities) he employes all his meanes and forces, to keepe the French from passing the river of Tesin, neglecting to repaire the Bastions and Ramparts of the Suburbes of Milan, being for the most part ruined and spoiled. But the French finding the waters lowe, some passed at a Foard, others in Boates, about some foure myles from the imperiall Campe, making a Bridge for the Artillery. Colonne knowing that an incounter of the French is very dangerous, in 1523. in their first heate retired into Milan, and finding the Cittizens and Souldiars wonderfully amazed, seeing no meanes to keepe the Cittie in the estate it was, he abandons it, to prouide for the defense of Laude. Without doubt, the captious propositions of an enemy must be duly examined: and moreover, an assaillant that hath prevented his enemy, should not loose any houre, neither by his too great lenitie, nor his base negligence.

The Milanais fraide.

Hereupon Galeas Viconte, giues the Admirall to vnderstand, that if he enters forcibly into Milan, there will be no meanes to saue it from spoile, and so by consequence, the King shall make no vse thereof against his enemies: but if he would suffer him to go and compound with some Cittizens, which did sollicit him, he would giue order, the imperialis should depart, and furnish the King with a good summe of money, which might greatly auale him in his affaires. The Admirall is carryed away with these perswasions. But whilst that Galeas Boyer, Generall of Normandie, and some others doe treat: they spend some time in vaine by the riuer of Tesin, during the which, Prosper deluded our men with parlees, renewed the hearts of his men (who had already packt vp their baggage for their recreate) and with exceeding diligence, puts the Rampars in defence. And then knowing his forces vnable to defend the hole Duchie, he restrained them to keepe Milan, Cremona, and Paula, whilst the furie of the French should grow golde by an idle aboad, and the Winter approaching nere, ruine them.

Milan besieged.

The Admirall, finding the error he had committed by his too great credulitie, employed all his forces against Milan, but too late. The Cittizens had gotten heart: and Prosper had now gathered together eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, four thousand Spaniards, six thousand five hundred Lansequents, and three thousand Italians, besides the inhabitants who were all armed. He doth notwithstanding besiege it, betwixt the wayes to Laude and Paula, and seeing other places abandoned, he takes Monce for the King, to cut off the victuals from Milan: he sends Bussy d'Amboise, with two thousand franke Archers, to seize vpon Alexandria, and the Cheualier Bayard, with four hundred men at armes, eight thousand foote, and ten peeces of Artillerie to Laude, where leauing a strong garrison, he went sodenly to attempt Cremona. The Castell held yet for the King, but the enemies had made two great trenches betwixt the Towne and the Castell. There Rence de Cere, a Baron of Rome ioyned with him, leading four thousand Italians. This supply encouraged Bayard to attempt the Towne in another place. They make their approches, and within three dayes make a reasonable breach. But all fall out crossely for the French. Being ready to goe to the assault, a continuall raine of four dayes, made the ascent so slippery, as they went as much backward as forward, and did so breake the wayes, as no victuals could come to the Campe from any part. Even so it chanced to Lautrec before Paula. Moreover, the Venetians armed on the one side, and the Spaniards on the other, cut off their victuals. So Bayard prest with famine, resieft the Castell with men and victuals, and returned to Milan. Without doubt Buron with the whole garrison that kept this Fort, deserued great commendations: where hauing continued two yeares in extreame necessitie, desiring all rather to dye, after the example of their Captaine, then to yeeld the place by treacherie, there remained onely eight Souldiars, whom Bayard found languishing, but resolute in their constancie.

The Castell of Cremona recovered.

We haue vnderstood, that by the intelligences of the Duke of Bourbon, the Emperor at the same instant should assaile Bourgongne, and Champagne, the English Picardis, and the Spaniards Fontarabie. According to this desseine, and to make the siege of Fontarabie easie, the Spaniards Campe before Bayonne the 17. of September. Lautrec Gouverneur of Guienne, although he were vnprouided of men, (the Kings forces being dispersed in Italie, Champagne and Picardie), furnished the Towne with victuals, munition, and such men as the time and necessitie could afford, and he himselfe went into it. Where the valour of this Nobleman, who continued three dayes and three nights continually vpon the walls, prouiding for all things necessary, especially for the Bayonne besieged.

A the entrie of two riuers which passe at Bayonne, giuing such couraget to men, women, and children, as euery one falling to worke, the most coward made shewes of great willingness.

So as the fourth day of the seege, the enemy feeling, that hee did but loose there his time, left Bayonne, to beseege Fontarabie, which shewed no proofes of like valour. It was furnished with good store of men, and other things necessary. Fontarabie yeilded. Hee was an ancient gentleman, & all his life had had the reputatiō of a good souldiar. But now to saue his goods, not attending any force, hee yeelds the Towne, which was not to be forced. A cowardise which brought him to a scaffold at Lions, to bee there degraded of his Nobilitie, and himselfe, with his posteritie, declared base, for that hee had bene so faint hearted, and carelesse, to preuent the conspiracie, which hee sayd Don Peter of Navarre, (the sonne of Peter, Marshall of Navarre, whome the Spaniards had lately caused to die in prison) had with the Spaniards.

On the other side, the Lanquenets, which had bene lent for the Duke of Bourbon, were come vnto Champagne, vnder the commaund of William Earle of Furstemburg, and spoyled the Prouince, after they had taken Cossy, a place vpon the confines of the French Comte, and Montclair a Castle seated vpon a mountaine, neare to Chamont in Basigni. The Duke of Guise, whome the King had made his Lieutenant generall in Bourgongne, in the place of the Lord of Tremouille, lately aduanced to the government of Picardie: hauing, with his companie of a hundred men at armes, those of the Dukes of Alanfon and Vendosme, ioyned with the forces of Oruall, gouernour of Champagne, and some other troupes, making about six hundred men at armes, hee so restrayned the enemy, as hauing no meanes, for want of horse, to gard their foragers, they were in few dayes famished, and forced to seeke their retreat at Neufchastell in Lorraine.

The Duke of Guise aduertised of their course, sent some three hundred men at armes before, to charge them in front, at the passage of the riuer of Mense, whilst that he should set on them behind, being laden with a great bootie. The Duke came, and finding them halfe past, hee cut the remainder in peeces, and recovered the bootie. But a quarrell chanced betwixt Couruille, and Chaslelet, a Lorraine enseigne bearer to the said Duke, the which (Couruille being thrust through the mouth, with a sword) ouerthrew the better part of this gooly enterprise. The Duke of Suffolke was lately landed againe at Calais, with foureteene or fiteene thousand English, which ioyned with the forces of the Earle of Bure, made five or sixe thousand horse, and about five and twentie thousand foote. But if in their former voyage, they made a great stirre and reaped small benefit, so likewise, they will make but a bare conquest by this last descent.

In Picardie.

Tremouille (although he had so few men, as hee was forced, when the enemy had left the place, to retire his men, to put them into that, whether the enemy seemed to E bend) had so furnished the Townes with valiant Commanders, and all things necessary, as the Duke and Earle, hauing made a shew to beseege Terouenne, Hedin, Pourlans and Corbie, in the end they campe before Bray vpon Somme. The wall was weake, and three mountaines commanding the Towne, were the cause they could not fortifie it: yet that braue Pontdormy had thrust himselfe into it, with a hundred and fiftie men at armes, and some fiteene hundred foote, to defend this passage against the enemy. Let vs not blame a valiant Captaine, if he receiue a disgrace, in a weake place. Hee made his accompt (in case he were forced) to retire by the Cause, and to breake the bridges after him. But he was so prest, as he had no meanes to retire, but in disorder, with the losse of foure score, or a hundred men: and if he had not maintained the fight with his men at armes, whilst his footmen recovered Corbie, there had been no hope of safetie for the rest.

But see how hee reuenged this disgrace. The enemy threatned Montdidier: and the small forces Tremouille had, made all men vnwilling to leade any succours thither.

1523. Pontdormy was neuer daunted with the difficultie of any enterprife.

Night being come, he goes to field, and without any encounter, puts into Montdidier Rochebaron, an Auvergne, and Fleuras Lieutenant of the Earle of Damers. The valour of Pontdormy. his company, either of them commanding fiftie men at armes, and René of Palletiere, with a thousand French. And fearing least Tremouille should haue need of him, he had not the patience to attend for night to make his retreat, hee doth it at noone day, resolute to charge all hee should incoutre, hauing but his owne companie, with that of the Vicont of Laudedan. With this resolution he meets with five hundred horse, chargeth them with such furie, as hee puts them to rout. But two thousand men comming to succour the rest, he was forced to leaue the chase, to saouer the retreat of his troupe. In the which, his horse being slaine, hee left Barnicuelles, and Camilles his brother and nephew, to beate the shooke, with twentie men at armes, whilst that he saued the rest in Amiens, the enemy cutting off the way to Corbie, Barnicuelles and Camilles (ouerthrowne from their horses,) were taken prisoners, with seven men at armes, of their companie. So Roye remayned at the enemies mercie, wholely taken, and burnt it, marched to Montdidier, where a breach being made, they within distrustung of their forces, departed with their baggage, and came to Tremouille.

Bayard and Montdidier taken.

The enemy had opened the passage of Oise, and approched within eleuen leagues of Paris. But their courses are stayed, and Paris is assured by the arriual of the Duke of Vendosme, with four hundred men at armes, so as the English and Bourguignons fearing to be compassed in by the Duke and Tremouille, and so famished, took their way to Artois, and a little after All Saints day, (a notable season for the losse of Corne, which was frosen generally throughout the Realme) they dismissed their armie, carrying no other spoyle of their victorie, but the taking of the Castle of Behan, which was yeilded vnto them without somons. But the enemy was no sooner retired, but Tremouille, before the Duke of Vendosmes arriual, made to furious a batterie, with sixe Cannons, as the garison seeing their armie broken, yeilded by composition. Thus Picardie is freed from a mightie armie, which at their departure held not one foot of land of their Conquest.

In like sort, the Duke Bourbons attempt against Bourgogne turned to smoke, for wanting money, to pay his Lanquenets, the King did practise some of their Captains, who came to him with their troupes. So despayring to get any thing in France, he retired into Milan. Augustus the Emperour loued treason, but not the Traitor. So the Emperour Charles loued his actions, but not the Duke of Bourbons person. To keepe him from passing into Spaine vnder hope of marrying with Eleonor, sister to the Emperour Charles, made him his Lieutenant generall in Italie, whilst that hee prepared to passe into France in person, as we shall see.

Pope Adrian dies.

Let vs now returne into Italie, where wee shall see a Pope, of more turbulent spirit then Adrian, who died the foureteenth of September, little lamented, and of small esteeme. Hee was a stranger, and little acquainted with the affaires of the Court of Rome, hee was learned, and not greatly vicious. The Colledge of Cardinals repined to see any other sett in Saint Peters chaire but an Italian, or at the least, one bred vp in Italie: Iules Cardinall of Medicis after many and sundry strits and contentions, euery one of the Cardinals seeking the choise and election by the support of such as fauored him, in the end he carried it, the nineteenth of November, through the fauour (saith the originall) of the great revenues of his ecclesiasticall linings.

Clement the 7. chosen.

In all his actions, wee shall see him discover a spirit wonderfully ambitious, of a great courage, active, desirous of innouations, giuen to affaires, especially of the world, not much subiect to his pleasures, and giuing hope of great and extraordinary matters: and for that presently after his insailement, hee vsed clemencie to the Cardinall of Volterre, declared vnusufficient to come into the Conclau by Adrian, for the subiect wee haue formerly noted: hee therefore tooke vpon him the name

A name of Clement the 7. In the meane time our Admirall tooke cold before Milan, which he thought to famish, cutting off conduits that went into the Towne, & bearing down the milles: but the great number of hand milles (which Colonne had caused to be made) preserved the Citizens from famine. And to cut off the victualles that came from Laudesan to the French Campe, Colonne had put the Marquis of Mantoua, with five hundred horse into Pausia. The Admirall fearing, least he should seize vpon the bridge hee had made at Vigene, by the which victuals came vnto his armie, he commanded Bayard and Rence, to come and lodge at Vigene: but by their dislodging from Monce, the passage was open to the enemy, and then victuals entered abundantly into Milan, which caused the ruine of the French army.

The enemies victories.

B Nothing succeeds happily with them, whome the prouidence of God doth not fauour. The hope to famish Milan is frustrate, and the intelligence which the Admirall had within the Towne with one Morgand, a Corporall of the Squadron of Iohn de Medicis, is discovered with the losse of all their lines, that had consented (hee should haue receiued the French into a bastion, when the gard thereof fell vnto him.) Moreover the enemy growes proude of small aduantages and light victories, who being accustomed to ouercome by degrees, resolues to vanquish all at once. Iohn de Medicis being to garde the victuals that came from Tresse to Milan, with five hundred horse and a thousand foote, met with foure score French Lances: and by a fayned retreat drew them into an ambush of five hundred hargnebuziers, which he had layd, he easily

Iohn de Medicis frustrated.

C ly defeats them, slue some and takes the rest. In an other encounter, Succe a Bourguignon put to rout threescore men at armes, of the companie of the maister of the horse. Our men being in gard at the trenches, which were made to gouern vnto the rampars, assailed by many skirmishes, had most commonly the worst. So decreasing in number, prest with abundance of snowe and the sharpnesse of the winter, which they had endured fixe monethes together, the Admirall retired his army, to lodge it in Biagras, and other places thereabouts. He sent the Earle of S. Paul from Biagras, with Rance de Ceres, and Lorges generall of the French foote, to beseege Aron, a towne vpon the Lac-Maiour. They make their approches, plant their ordinance, batter it about five and twenty daies, and giue two or three assaults. But Colonne foreseeing this dessein, at the retreat of our men, had manned the Towne with twelue hundred soldiars, who made our attempts fruitlesse. That which they could not do by assault, they seeke to effect by mine, blowing vp a great part of the wall. But they kickt against the pricke. The wall falls vpon the same foundation, and stands firme. So frustrate of their intention, hauing lost many good men, they returne to the Campe.

An extraordinary chance.

At that time Prosper Colonne, the chiefe pillar of the Emperours affaires in Italie, died the last day but one of the yeare. A famous Captaine throughout all the course of his life, well practised in matters of warre, slowe to embrace the occasions which the weakenesse or disorders of his enemies might present him: but commended to haue managed the warre, more by counsell then with the sword. Don Charles of Lannoy, Viceroy of Naples, was substituted by the Emperour: Don Charles, hauing taken vpon him the gouernment, imployed all his wit to expell the French out off the Duchie of Milan, eyther by force or famine: and to appoche neere vnto them, attending a supplie of six thousand Lanquenets out of Germany: an occasion was offered to make the first fruits of his armes famous.

Prosper Colonne dies.

They giue him intelligence, that Bayard, Mezieres and Saint Mesme with two hundred men at armes, and Lorges with the French foote, whereof hee was Colonell, lodged at Rebee, two myles from Biagras. To giue them a Camifadoe on the fodaine, he sends the Marquis of Pescare, and Iohn de Medicis, who came from the taking of Marignan by composition. Sometimes renowned Captaines, are lulled a-sleepe with conceit of their owne reputations: and although the enemy feares them, yet he most obserues them, and desires most to circumuent them. But Bayard was sick, and that day had taken physicke.

The Spaniards fallies vpon the French gardes, two houres before daie, and presently beats.

beates them backe vpon their men at armes, Bayard (being sicke) and Lorges, gather together what men they could, and mainteine the shocke, whilst the rest retreie to the Campe: few men, but all the baggage was lost.

Hereupon the Lansquenets arriue, and the Imperiall armie ioyned with the Venetians: and the Popes (a right Florentine, and no lesse counterfet then Leo the tenth, his kinsman, for hee assured Saint Maxian, the Kings Ambassador, that hee would assist neither partie, and yet hee did ayd the Emperour, both with men, and money,) being come to lodge at Casere, fūe miles from Biagras. There were in the Imperiall troupes, sixtene hundred men at armes, fūteene hundred light horse, seuen thousand Spartiards, twelue thousand Lansquenets, and fūteene hundred Italians. The chiefe Commanders, were the Dukes of Milan and Bourbon, the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis of Uersaire. The Duke of Urbino commaunded for the Venetians, sixe hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and seuen thousand foote. John de Medicis led the Popes forces. The Admirall besides his companies deuided into garisons, and the French troupes camped at Biagras, (attending sixe thousand Suisses to refresh his armie) had with him eight hundred Lances, eight thousand Suisses, (and with in few dayes after, three thousand more ioyned with him) foure thousand Italians, and two thousand Lansquenets. The lodging was safe, and no meanes to force them: only feare of famine must dislodge them. With this dessein, the Imperials passe the ruer of Tessin, and lodge at Cambale to cut off the victuals that came from Omeline to the French: they take Garlas from them, and Saint George, seated aboue Monce. Garlas furnished their armie, with victuals which came freely to them, from Paula, and Saint George cut off the prouision, that came to our men from Biagras.

So the Admirall fearing to be distressed for victuals, and to loose the other places of Omeline, the which being taken, he had beene in a manner besieged of all sides: he leaues a hundred light horse, and a thousand foote in Biagras, vnder Serome Caraccioli, a Neapolitaine, and went to lodge at Vigene. Hee was farre inferiour in number, yet he presents his armie in bataille, three dayes together, but the enemy refuseth the combat: he would not hazard a victorie, which he held assured, without losse of men. It was better to dislodge the French from Vigene: for the effecting whereof, the Imperials march to Sartiane vpon Po, fit to cut off the victuals from our men: High Earle of Pepoli, and John of Birague kept it for the King. The Admirall followes them a saue both the men, and the place. But vpon the way he had newes, that it was forced: most part of the men slaine, and the Commanders prisoners.

Fercel supplied our men, with most part of their necessary victuals. The enemy by the meanes of Petit Vercelais, stirr vp the Gibelins being stronger then the Guelfes, in the sayd Citie, who by their mutinie bring in the Imperials, which gaue them great hope to haue the French armie at their mercie, for want of victuals: and if neede were to stop their retreat into France, and to this end they scaze vpon the passage of Camarlian. Mischiefe vpon mischiefe is no safetie. Monteian and Boutieres, Lieutenant of Bayard his company, had chosen a hundred, or sixe score of their best men at armes, for the execution of an enterprise they had plotted. But being ill guided, they encountered a stronger partie: were defeated, and all taken prisoners. A great weakening to the armie, in an after season. The Admirall did still temporise, grounding his hopes vpon foure hundred Lances, which the Marquis of Rotelin did bring: who passing by the mount of Geneure, should ioine with ten thousand Suisses, and Rance de Cere brought sixe thousand Gijons, by the Countie of Bergamo, to passe at Lande to Frederike of Lofsole, who led a great number of Italian foote, to assaile the Duchie of Milan on that side, and force the enemy to repasse the ruer of Tessin. With this dessein, the Admirall comes to lodge at Nouare.

But the ruine of our men approached. Sforce sent John de Medicis against the Gijons, with fūtie men at armes, three hundred light horse, & three thousand foot, who ioyned with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, & foure thousand foot of the Venetians, and stopt their passage, so as being discontented hauing no escape of horse

A horse nor foot, as Rance had promised them, they returned to their Countie. This thorne pulled out of the Emperalls foote, John de Medicis takes Carauage, batters downe with his Cannon the bridge, which the French had vpon Tessin at Bisfalore: and nothing remaining of all the Townes betwixt Milan and the Tessin but onely Biagras, which lying vpon the great chanell that runnes to Milan, did cut off the victuals which were wont to come to the Towne, in a great aboundance: Sforce followed by all the youth of Milan, besieged it, accompanied with John de Medicis: he battered it foure or five dayes, was repulled from the first assault, forced it at the second, and spoyled it. A poile deereely sold to the Milanois. Biagras was infected with the plague, so all the houses of Milan, whether any of the boone came, were infected with the same contagion, which was the death of aboue fūtie thousand persons.

Biagras taken, (to stoppe all passages from the French) the Viceroy went to lodge at Mirignon, and the Admirall, considering that it was better to hazard the rest of his armie, then to perish by famine, and pestilence, which had greatly diminished his troupes: hee tooke the way of Romagnan, to ioine with eight thousand Suisses, which were come to Turee. But they strook the last stroke. They send him word, That it should suffice them, to retire their companions, and conduct them into Suisse, seeing the King had broken his promise with them, by the which they should meet at Turee with Claude of Longueville, and foure hundred Lances to accompany them. Their Countreimen, which remained in the campe, vnderstanding that their companions were vpon the banks of the ruer of Stesse, fled away for the most part, to ioine with them that were newly come.

In the meane time the Imperials, by the perswasion of the Duke of Bourbon, followed the Admirall at the heeles, who to take from the enemy the knowledge of the Suisses disorder, endured the shocke, with such men at armes as hee could gather together: but being hurt at the first charge, with a shot in the arme, and forced through the griefe of his wound to leaue the retreat of the armie, to the Earle of Saint Paul, and to Captaine Bayard, Bayard and Vandensse (performing wondrous deeds of armes) died there: Vandensse presently, Bayard thrust through the bodie, caused himselfe to be layed at the foote of a tree, by his steward, his face turned to the enemy, as he that neuer turned his backe. The Duke of Bourbon pursuing the chase, seeing him in this pittifull estate. I am sorry for you, said hee, hauing knowne you so valorous a Knight. Sir sayd Bayard (drawing towards his end) there is no pittie of mee, I die an honest man. you are to be lamented, who serued against your Prince, your Countie, and your oth: and soone after hee gaue vp the Ghost. Lorges arriuing with those few French which remained, repulled such as pursued vnto the bodie of their armie, and the Earle of Saint Paul hauing passed the ruer, with the losse of few, but the brauest of his men, deliuered the artillerie to the Suisses, who made their retreat by the valley of Aoufle, and himselfe by Turin. Laude, Alexandria, Nouare and generally all which the King possessed in Italie, remained at the victors deuotion.

The estate of Milan was thus freed from the French, and Italie from their present calamities, but the roots were not yet cut vpp: it was but deferred for a time. Then the Duke of Bourbon gaue the Emperour Councell, to transport the warre into France. The King of England did willingly giue eare vnto it. The fauour, the authoritie, the many followers, and the great intelligence which the Duke of Bourbon presumed to haue in France, invited him thereunto. To this end, the Emperour treated with the English, and the Duke of Bourbon: That the Duke should enter into France, with a part of his armie, which was in Italie. That hauing passed the Alpes, the King of England should pay him a hundred thousand Crownes for the charge of the first moneth, and should continue the same monethly, vntlesse hee would invade the Realme, with a mightie armie: That France should be conquered for the English, and Prrouence for the Duke of Bourbon, according to the treatie wee haue before made mention of. That the Emperour, at the same instant should make warre vpon the confines of Spainie, and should procure the potentates of Italie, to concurre in this enterprise, for the freeing of themselves for ever from the 1524. the invasion of the French. Marseilles is a commodious port to annoy France, and to passe from Spaine into Italy. According to the Emperours desire, and the former treatye, the Duke of Bourbon, and the Marquis of Pescara, march to the conquest of Marseilles.

The King advertised of their desseine, sends Rante de Cere, a man well experienced in warre, and the Lord of Brion, with two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, for the gard of Marseilles: repayed his army, and sent to make a leaue of foure-reene thousand Swisses, and six thousand Lansquenets. The Duke and Marquis had now lien six moneths before Marseilles: the King hauing vnited his forces, marched with an intent to fight with his enemies before Marseilles, who seeing to great a power to approach, imbarcked their great Ordinance for Genes: the lesser they laid vpon Moyles, and so made a speedy retreat. The Marshall of Chabannes, who had the leading of the foreward, sent foure or five hundred horses after them: who overthrew many, and returned with great spoile: euery one leauing his baggage behinde him, and the Souldiars casting away their armes, to bee more light to runne away.

The Imperiall
allert in confusion.

The king
goes into Italy

The King seeing himselfe to haue a goodly army ready, and his enemies retired, resolues to cut off their way, or to come before them into Italy: many dissuaded him, the season might well diuert him (for it was in the midst of October) the Regent his mother aduised him to make warre by his Captaines, and not in person: and the Bishop of Capoua, came from the Pope to treat of a generall peace. But the heate which transported this good Prince to his owne ruine, and dishonour, made him to say vnto the Bishop: That hee should treat with him by letters, and attend him at Auignon with his Mother. If the King makes hast to pursue, the Duke and Marquis made as great hast to arriue in time, for the defence of Milan: so as in one day the King arriued at Perceil, and the Marquis at Alba: the Duke followed one daie after him with the Lansquenets.

At that time Claude Queene of France, died at Blois, leauing three sonnes by the King and her, Francis the Dauphin, Henry Duke of Orleans, and Charles Duke of Angoulême: and two daughters: Magdalene, married afterwards to the King of Sotie, and Marguerit, which shall be Duchesse of Sauoy. The Viceroy seeing the King to march directly towards Milan, without stay, hee put Anthony de Leue into Paui, with twelue hundred Spaniards, and six thousand Lansquenets: posting himselfe with exceeding speed to Milan with the rest of the armye.

Milan.

Milan had changed her minde, the plague had wonderfully wasted the Citizens: many (to auoide this danger) had absented themselves: there was no such store of victuals within it as was visuall: the traffick had ceased, there was no meanes to recouer money: they had made no accompt to repaire the fortifications: and the King had from Vigene sent Michel Anthony Marquis of Salusses, with two hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foote: who at the first, ouerthrew the Spaniards: that were set to gard the suburbes of Milan: beate them into the Towne, and kept the suburbes: notwithstanding their continuall fallies, by meanes of the Lord of Tremouille, who came to second him.

Milan taken.

The Viceroy finding the Citizens mindes to be little at his deuotion, issued forth by the port Romaine, leading with him the Duke of Bourbon, the Marquis of Pescara, and the rest of the army, and went to Laude. The Milanois freed from the danger of the Imperialls, receiued in the Marquis of Salusse and Tremouille. The Imperiall army retired in great confusion and disorder, tyred with the tediousnesse of the way, hauing lost many horse and armes. if they had beene wholly pursued, without doubt they had beene easily ouerthrowne. Moreover, if our men had presently gone to Laude, the Imperialls had not dared to stay there: and it may be, passing the River of Adda with speede they had disordered the rest of the armie with the like facilitie. But when as the prouidence of GOD meanes to chastise any people, hee blindes the eyes of their vnderstandings, in such sort as they cannot

A not iudge of occurrents, but often times they imbrace those wayes that bee most dangerous.

Thus it fell out with our Francis: for according to the aduice of such (as held it not fit for his Maiesties affaires, to leaue a strong Towne behinde him, manned with martiall Souldiars) he turned head to Paui, in the end of October. He had with him Henrie of Albret King of Nauarre, the Dukes of Alanson, Lorraine, Albaine, and Longueville, the Earles of Saint Paul, Vaudemont, Laval and Tonnerre: the Marshalls of Foix, Chabannes and Montmorency, the Bastard of Saintoy Lord Steward, the Admirall of Bonnivet, the chiefe author of this Counsell: Lewis of Tremouille, the Marquis of Salusses, Anthony of Rocheaucourt, the Lords of Brion, Escar, Bonneuil, Fleuranges, Paulmy, Rothelin, de la maine: the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigny, Clermont, Bussy d'Amboise, de Conty, Fontenay a younger brother to Rohan, d'Aumont, and a great number of others: two thousand Launces, eight thousand aduenturers, eight thousand Lansquenets, six thousand Swisses, and foure thousand Italians, which number did afterwards greatly increase.

The Imperialls gathered together the remainder of their shipwracke, and made a new leue of twelue thousand men in Germanie: but want of money did greatly trouble their affaires. The Emperour could not helpe them: to draw any out of the Duchie of Milan, there was no meanes. From their ancient confederates, they hoped for small or no succours at all. The Pope and the Florentines contented them, but with generall words. Clement sought to mainteine himselfe in the midst of these stormes, and would make no League with any other Prince. The Venetians, vrged by the Viceroy, to furnish the men wherevnto they were bound by the Capitulation, made colde answers. They grew now more ialous of the Emperours ambition. All Italy complained, that hee would not inuest Sforza in the Duchie of Milan, vnto which the Popes authoritye did mooue him: to whose examples and counsels they had then great regarde, being willing in like sort to frame themselves to present occurrences. And the King of England, in stead of furnishing them with the money hee had promised, demanded all that which hee had lent.

All these considerations, made our Francis resolute to the siege of Paui. He battered it in two places, makes a breach, and giues an assault, they winne the breach, but had not meanes to enter: they side large and deepe trenches to stay them, and the nearest houses pierced and furnished with shotte, forced them to abandon the breach after the losse of many good men. As they despaired to take Paui by force: James of Silly Bayliffe of Caen, propounds a more easie meanes to force it. The ruer of Tesin diuides it selfe into two branches, two miles about Paui, and ioynes againe a mile beneath the Towre, before it runnes into Po. By reason of the depth of the water, the Wall was nothing fortified vpon the greatest streame. Hee undertakes to cut this arme, and to drive all the Streame into the lesse, hoping that the course of the water being dried, and making a sodaine and furious batterie on that side, the Towne should bee forced, before the enemy had any meanes to prevent it.

They spend many dayes, imploy an infinite number of men, and make a great expense in this worke. But the water is of more force then the labour of men, or the industrie of Enginours. A continuall raine did so swell the ruer, as breaking the Sluces and Bankes which were made within the Chanell, in one houre it made all this great labour fruitlesse. So all the attempts of our men were reduced to a hope, to force them to yeeld at length by necessitie. The Pope in the meane time, (mooued with the sodaine spoile and conquest of the Duchie of Milan, by the King, desirous to settle his affaires and businesse, and to pacifie Italy the better, hee sent John Mathieu Gilbert, Bishop of Verone his Daire, to exhort our warriours to peace and concord. The Viceroy, trusting in the strength and valour of Paui, refused to giue eare to any agreement or composition, whereby the King should hold any foote of land in the Duchie of Milan: The King on the other side, 1524. Putt vp with this good successe, the greatnesse of his armie, the hope not onely to mainteine it, but also to increase it, to preserue vnto himselfe the estate of Milan, to recouer Genes, and afterwards to assaile the realme of Naples, made him as vnwilling to yeeld to any peace.

The Pope makes a league with the King.

The King sent an army to Naples.

Thus the Pope hauing failed to reconcile these two Princes, the chiefe cause why he sent his Datarie, tooke effect. Clement bound himselfe, Not to giue any succours, either open or secret, against the King. And the King receiued the Pope and the Florentines into his protection, especially to mainteine the familie of Medicis in their greatnesse. The Pope supposed, the Emperour should go to the wall: but he will soone repent him. This agreement drew the King to the enterprise of Naples: for the execution whereof, he made John Steward Duke of Albania his Lieutenant generall, accompanied with Rance de Cere, six hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, ten thousand foote, and ten or twelue peeces of Artillerie. His intent was to force the Viceroy to abandon the estate of Milan, to flie to the defence of Naples, where, as there remained no garrisons. But he should haue consulted hereof, after the absolute conquest of the Duchie. The enemy will make his profit of this indiscreet diuision of his armie in so vnseasonable a time. Hee did foresee, that in succouring Naples, the Duchie of Milan would be wholly lost. The Viceroy hauing resolved to make head against the King within Lombardie, sent the Duke of Tyrette, to giue order for the defence of the realme, in case the French did assaile it. Let vs leaue the King a little at his siege, and see some exploits of armes.

The Marquis of Salusses, Lieutenant for the King at Sauonne, had in the beginning of March, sent two thousand men in garrison to Varas, a small towne, all walled vpon the sea shore, midway betwixt Sauonne and Genes. Don Hugues of Moncade, Viceroy of Sielle, then Gouvernour of Genes for the Emperour, brought the Emperours galleys to beat downe the gate of Varas with their Canon, hoping that the weakenesse of the place would force the Souldiars to make their retreat to Sauonne, and with this designe he put him selfe in Ambush, with foure thousand men, betwixt Varas and Sauonne. The Marquis aduertised of this batterie, flies thither, with those few men which the present necessitie would suffer him to gather together. At his approche, the besieged take courage, and rampar vp their gate quite ruined. The Gallies of Genes growe amazed, and turne their prowes. The Marquis pursues them. Dom Hugues seeing himselfe abandoned by his forces at Sea, begins likewise to make his retreat to Genes, along the shore. La Mailleray, by the commandement of the Marquis, goes to shoare, drawes forth the garrison of Varas, and leads them in the pursute, whilest that he coasted along, seeking to disorder them with his Canon, being forced to Marche by the sea side, by reason of the mountaines. Moncade falls into the rearward, with some of the chiefe Captaines, to endure the shock. They charge him, and put his troupes in route, and he, with all them that did accompany him, are taken prisoners. The Marquis takes two Gallies, and pursuing his victorie, findes the Admirall of Genes in the roade, forceth her to yeeld, makes a great bootie of Artillerie, munition, and other riches. And if his forces had beene sufficient to assaile Genes suddenly by land, as well as by sea, considering the feare which had seized vpon the Cittie, it had beene in danger to haue beene lost for the Emperour.

A notable victorie gotten by the Marquis of Salusses.

On the other side, Anthoine of Crequy Lord of Pontdormy, parting from Monstruel, at such time as the King lay incamped before Pauia, to put victuals into Terouenne, and to trie if he could force Neuffosse, (which was a great trench full of water, that shutt vp the Valley of Cassel, from Saint Omer vnto Aire, furnished with Bulwarkes at every entry with Artillerie, and well manned, to garde the entries and passages of the said Valley, (whether they retired all their goods and cattle) he came to Foucamberg, with three hundred men at armes, some twelue hundred foote, and two Culuerins. And after the men at armes had fed their horses, hauing put the victuals they had brought into Terouenne, he parted for the execution of his enterprise, and comming to Neuffosse before day, he forced the passage, canying away an inestimable prey: and passing, 1524. In his retreat neere to Arques, halfe a league from Saint Omer: he ouerthrew the garrison of the sayd Saint Omer, which issued forth to succour the valee. In this charge Esfree tooke Lieques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Ascot, who the same day had married his mistresse, to whome Esfree was likewise a seruant: but with a curstie neuer heard of, at the request of the new Bride, hee sent backe his prisoner. Those of Aire, and Beune, likewise came posting, to the number of eight or nine hundred native Spaniards, five or sixe hundred Wallons, and three hundred horse, of their ordinances, and ioyned with the troupes of Saint Omer, to stoppe or hinder the retreat of the French. Pontdormy chargeth them, beates back their horse vpon their Spaniards foote, and entering pelmel, breakes them, flew two hundred and fortie, and caried away eyght or nine hundred prisoners to Terouenne, all which hee sent backe for a moneths pay, and for hostages, retained their Captaines.

111

The worthy exploits of Pontdormy.

Moreouer, Fiennes Gouvernour of Flanders, hauing suborned a Souldiar of the Garrison of Hedin, which had beene taken in the warres, to deliuer him the Castle of Hedin: the Souldiar aduertised Pontdormy, of the meanes hee had to deliuer into his hands the sayd Gouvernour, the Duke of Ascot, and most of the Noblemen of the countrie. The Souldiar brings this troupe at the day appointed. Pontdormy is there with two hundred men at armes: and couers balles of wilde-fire with straw, in a raelin of stone, where the enemy must passe, into the which those that were aboute the gate should cast fire, when as they should see a sufficient number of the enemies entred. Men incounter their enemies both by fraude and vertue. But fraude is oft times fatall to the Author.

Pontdormy hauing his mouth open to speake, the fire was so suddenly cast, by him that had it in charge, as entering in at Pontdormy's mouth, it burnt his bowels, whereof hee dyed two dayes after. Canaples his Nephew, had his face likewise so burnt, as there remained no forme thereof: so as their enterprise to charge the enemy behinde in this disorder, came to nothing. Foure score or a hundred Bourguignons being entred within the Raelin, were burnt: the rest saued themselves in this amazement, and many were lost in the wood vpon their retreat. But all were not sufficient to repaire the losse of that worthy and valiant man of warre.

Pontdormy's name.

1525. The siege of Pauia was continued, when as the Duke of Bourbon bringing five hundred men at armes Bourguignons, and six thousand Lansquenets, the Imperials resolute to succour Pauia, and to that end part from Lande the 25. of Ianuarie. The Imperials approach, assured the King hee should haue battaile, and to provide for it, hee had caused Tremouille, whome hee had appointed Gouvernour of Milan, to come vnto him, leauing Theodore Triulsee, with Chandon within Milan. John of Medicis, with three hundred light horse, and three thousand foote, was newly come into the Kings pay, and had wone him many Italian Captaines: amongst others, Guy and Francis, Earles of Rangon, and John Lewis Paluofin, brother to him whom Lautrec had beheaded at Milan. Tremouille, the Marshalls of Foix and Chabannes with other Captaines of experience, aduised the King to retire his armie from before Pauia, and to incampe in some strong place, whereof there are many in that Countrie, by reason of the Channels which ouer flowe the Medowes. They gaue him to vnderstand, that the enemies armie being vnfurnished of money, they should be forced within fewe dayes, to breake off their companies, and to put them into Townes. That the Strangers for want of payment of their money, would make some dangerous mutinie. That the enemies did not mainteine themselves together, but with hope to giue battaile: and if they did see the warre prolonged, they would bee engaged in many difficulties and confusions. To conclude, it was (say they) exceeding dangerous, to thrust himselfe betwixt a Towne defended, by five thousand men, and an armie that came to succour it, being mighty in numbers of men, in valour and experience.

The two armies approach.

But all this, was to cast Oyle into a fire which already flamed. The King will not leaue the siege, & yet will hee keepe the enemy from entering into Pauia. He referred (saith the

the 1525. the Originall the gouernment of the armie to the Admirall: he beleueed his counsell only to gaue care to Anne of Montmorencie, and Philip Chabot Lord of Brion, men pleasing vnto him, but not yet of any great experience in matters of warre. Moreouer, he had not that number of men in his armie, as they gaue him to vnderstand. The Duke of Albany had led away part of his horse: some remained for the gard of Milan, many were dispersed into Townes and Villages about. There were but eight hundred Launces in the Campe: and the negligence of his officers, with the deceit of his Captaines, especially the Italians, abused him, not furnishing the number of footmen, for the which they receiued pay. But howsoeuer, he must needs fight. Behold pittifull first fruites, forerunners of a generall ouerthrow.

Sad forerunners of an ouerthrow.

Two thousand Valaisans lodged at Saint Sauueur, betwixt S. Langfranc and Paula. They within charge them sodenly, and disperse them. Pirrhus brother to Frederick of Bossole, held the Castell of Saint Ange, with two hundred horse, and eight hundred foote. This place lying betwixt Laude and Paula, stoppeth the victuals which might be brought from Laude. Ferdinand of Aualo approcheth with his Spaniards, takes away the defences, and forceth the garrison to yeeld: that Pirrhus, Aemilius Cauriane, and three sonnes of Phabus Gonzague, remaining prisoners, all the rest should depart without armes or horses, and for a moneth, should beare no armes against the Emperour. Belioyense, and then all the other places which lay behind them, except Saint Colombain, which they had so besieged, as no man could issue forth, came into the power of the Imperials.

Moreouer, the King caused two thousand Italians to come, of those which had maintained the siege of Marseilles. Passing the confines of Alexandria, neere to the riuer of Trbè, wearied and toyled with the tediousnesse of the way, Gaspard Maine Captaine of Alexandria, chargeth them sodenly, breakes them, and chaseth them into Castellat, and there forceth them to yeeld, with fouenteene Ensignes. The like successe had John Lewis Paluiofin. The King had sent him to surprise Cremona, which was garded onely by fise or six hundred foote. Sforce aduertised, that he lodged at Cassal the great, with foure hundred horse, and two thousand foote, sent Alexander Bentiuole, with some number of horse, and two thousand foote, sodenly leuiet, to Cremona. Too great confidence doth no lesse preiudice men, then feare. Paluiofin (holding himselfe strong enough, without attending of Francis of Rangen, who came to ioyne with him, with three or foure thousand men) abandons his Fort to fight with them, marcheth directly to the enemy, and at the first, puts Sforces horsemen to flight: but Bentiuole comming with his foote men, John Lewis was ouerthrowne in the midst of the combat, taken prisoner, and all his men put to route, which was a great preiudice to the Kings affaires. Behold another disgrace, of no lesse importance.

John James of Medici, a Milanois, Captaine of the Castell of Mus, had intelligence, that the Captaine of Chiauenne, a Castle vpon the Lake of Como, belonging to the Grisons, hauing no enemy neere to annoy him, went daily to walke without his Fort, (the taking of this place, was a fit meane to diuert six thousand Grisons, newly come vnto the Kings Campe), John James lying one night in ambush close to the Castle, failed not of his prey, but holding this insufficient Captaine, he brought him before the gate, with a Dagger at his throte, ready to stabbe him, if his wife had not let downe the bridge. The gate being open, three hundred men issue forth off another ambush, seize vpon the Castle, and so on the Towne. The Grisons, supposing that Medici had other enterprises vpon their places, call home their men, who notwithstanding the shame they should purchase in forsaking (vpon the point of a battaille,) a Prince, whose pay they had receiued, and to whom they had giuen an othe, returned fise daies before the fight. All these difficulties chancing one vpon another, were infallible forerunners of great misfortune: which when he sees come, he ought carefully to prouide for the preteruation of his estate, or with a firme and constant resolution, to trie the hazard of a battaille. A commander may lawfully trie this last remedie: but a King must vsethe other. The two armies approached within halfe a mile: the forward lead by the Mar-

1525. A shall of Chabannes, lodged with the Suisses at Ronces, in the suburbs neere to Saint Iustins gate: the King at the monasteries of Saint Paul and Saint Lames, places of aduantage neere vnto Paula: the Duke of Alanson at Mirabel with the reterward, so as holding Paula girt in of all sides, the Imperials could not enter, vntil they did passe the riuer of Tesin or the Parke of Paula. The Imperials lodged at Prati towards Saint Iustins gate, and extended vnto Treleuere and la Motte, and in a wood by Saint Lazare; so neere as they did greatly indomage one another with their Cannon, being deuied onely by a little brooke, which they call Vernicule. The lodging of both armies had infiont on their wings, and on the left flanke, great rampars enuironed with trenches, and fortified with bastions. But the Imperials had this aduantage, being approached so neere vnto Paula, as in a day of battaille they might be assisted by them within the Towne. In the meane time Anthony de Leue did greatly annoy our men by continuall sallies, and in many skirmishes had most commonly the better.

The 17. of Februarie, John de Medici, to be reuenged of a disgrace which his troups had receiued by a former sallie, layed a bayte for them of the Towne, seconded with a double ambush, the one in the trenches neere vnto the Towne, the other farther off. The Spaniards drawen on by their former victories, pursuing them which had charged them, they discouer the farthest Ambush, and began to retire, when as the nerer cutting off their way, putts them all to the sword. But this small victory did greatly preiudice the generall. John de Medici had the boane of his heele broken with a shot, and was carried vnto Plaisance. His troups were so dispersed after his hurt, as the annie was diminished about two thousand, and his absence did coole his soldiers courage and heat, in skirmishes and assaults: for he was a great soldiär, and the good successe of a battaille, doth partly depend of the presence of such personages.

The Imperials had no more meanes to mayntaine themselves within their fort, want of money had soone driuen them forth: yet they considered that by their retreat, Paula would be lost, and they were out of hope to preserve the rest, which remaind in the Duchie of Milan. To assaile the French within their lodging, were a dangerous and vaine attempt. Also the enemies resolution was not to giue battaille, vntil some aduantage were offered them; but onely to retire their men that were within Paula, and to man it with newe troups, the which they could not do, without passing in view of the French Campe. They therefore prepare themselves to two effects, eyther to execute their dessein, or to fight, if the King issuing out of his fort would stoppe their passage.

The night before Saint Mathias day, the 25. of February, the day of the Emperour Charles his nativity, they disquirt and tire our men with many false alarmes, and make Battaille of two squadrons of horse and foure of foote. The first, vnder the commande of the Marquis of Guast, consisting of sixe thousand Lanquenets, Spaniards and Italians. The second under the Marquis of Pesquaire. The third & fourth of Lanquenets, led by the vice-roy and Duke of Bourbon. They come to the Parke wall, cast downe about threecore sadme, enter within it, take the way to Mirabel, leauing the Kings army vpon their left hand. The artillery planted in a place of aduantage, doth much indomage their battalions, and forceth them to runne into the valley for shelter. Here impatience transports the King. He sees the enemy disordred and thinks they are amazed: moreouer he had intelligence, that the Duke of Alanson had defeated some Spaniards that would haue passed on the right hand, and had taken from them foure or fise Cannons. Thus the King loosing his aduantage, seekes his enemies; and passing before his owne Cannon, hinders their execution.

The Imperials desired nothing more, then to haue the King out of his forte, and to be coniered from his artillery. They now turne head against him which was directed to Mirabel. The King (supported with a battaillon of his Suisses, being his chiefe strength,) marched directly against the Marquis of Saint Ange, who ledde the first of the horsemen, ouerthrowes them, killes many, and the Marquis himselfe.

But

1525. But oh villanie! The Suisses in steed of charging a battallion of the Emperours Lanquenets, which did second their men at armes, they wheele about, and go to faule them selues at Milan. The Marquis of Pesara came to charge the King with his battalions: Francis Brother to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Norfolke, who led about five thousand Lanquenets, marched resolutely against him, but they are fodeinuirowed with two great battallions of Germaines, defeated and cut in peeces. The Suisses thus retired, the Lanquenets lost, the whole burthen of the battailay upon the King, so as in the end being hurt in the legge, face and hand, his horse slaine under him, charged on all sides, defending himselfe vnto the last gaspe, he yeeled vnto the Viceroy of Naples, who kissing his hand with great reuerence, receiued him as prisoner to the Emperour.

battale.

At the same instant, the Marquis of Guis had defeated the horse that were at Mirebel, and Anthony de Leue issuing out of Paule charged our men behinde. Thus seeing the pittifull estate of the Kings person, all giue way, all seekte to saue themselves by flight. The Duke of Alanson seeing no hope of recouerie, preferres the reward in a manner whole, and passeth the river of Tesin. The vanguard (for a time) maintained the fight, but in the ende it thronke by the death of the Marshall of Chabannes. This day deprived vs of a great number of the chiefeft Noblemen of France, amongst the which the Marshalls of Chabannes and Foix, the Admirall of Bonniuet, Lewis of Tremouille, about thre score and fiteene yeares old, (a worthy bedde for so valiant a Nobleman, whole Councell deferred, to be followed) Galeas of Saint Senerin master of the horse, Francis Lord of Lorraine, the Duke of Norfolke, the Earle of Tonnerre, Chaumont Sonne to the great master of Amboise, Bussy of Amboise, the Baron of Buzansois, Beaupre, Maras the chiefe Quirie of the Kings stable, and about eight thousand men. The battard of Sauois Lord Steward of France, died of his wounds being prisoner. There were taken, Henry King of Nauarre, the Earle of Saint Paul, Lewis Lord of Neuers, Fleuranges sonne to Robert de la Mark, the Marshall of Montmorency, Lanval, Brien, Lorges, la Rochepot, Montian, Annebault, Imbercourt, Frederic of Bessole, la Roche Du Maine, la Maileray, Montpesat, Boissy, Curtion, Langey and many others. Of the enemy there died about seauen hundred, fewe men of Marke besides the Marquis of Saint Ange: Trinuite and Chandions who remayned at Milan, aduertised of the ruine of their army, returned with D their men into France, so as the very day of the battaille, all the Duchie of Milan was freed from the French forces.

The Regents
forefight.

The next day the King was led to the Castell of Pisqueton, vnder the gard of Captaine Alarson, alwaies intreated according to the dignity of a royall person, but so farre forth as the quality of a pri^{son}er would permit. The Duke of Albanie was farre in-gaged in the realme of Naples, and all passages by land were by this disgrace stoppt. To drawe him out of danger, the Regent mother to the King, giuing order for the affaires of the realme, sent Andrew Dortie generall of the Kings gallies vnto him, with la Reine
the Viceadmirall beeing at Marfeskis, who (without any losse of men, but of some scouts chased by the Colonnos euen to the very gates of Rome) returned safely into France.

soner.

The estate seemed now neerer a shipwracke, as well by the imprisonment of the head, as by the death of many worthy personages, who might haue serued greatly in the preservation thereof. But God by many corrections would often chastise France, but neuer ruine it. And now touching the King of England (who was then readie to imbarke for Calais,) he suddenly changeth his hatred into Loue, so as growing jealous of the Emperours exceeding greatnesse, the Regent hauing intreated him by John Ioschin, a Genouois his Ambassador, to giue care to some mylde treaty, rather thē to invade the Estate, of a Capriue Prince: he promiseth all succors both of men and money for the Kings deliuey, and without any demand of restitution for his charges he dismisseth his army.

In the meane time, the Emperour aduifeth in Councell, what course he should hold with the King. The Bishop of Osme, the Emperours confessor, is commended

A. who have aduited him to shew a brotherly loue, and to set him free, retaining this notable victory to the expresse will of God: shewing that the chiefe vie thereof should bee the peace of Christendome, threatened with a total ruine by the Turkish armes, whereof we shall soone see farall effects. But the aduice of Frederic Duke of Alba, a man of great authority with the Emperour, was of more force. Hee yielded to the kings libertie, but with so excesfull conditions, as it might haue been the meates, for Charles to lay the foundation of an absolute monarchie in Christendome.

According to this aduice, he sent the Earle of Reux, his Lord Steward, to offer the King liberty, so as hee would resigne all the rights hee pretended in Italie, reitore the Duchie of Bourgogne, as belonging to him by right, with Prouence and Dauphiné for the Duke of Bourbon, to incorporate them with other lands, which he had formerly enjoyed, and to make all together a Kingdom. Moreover the Emperour offered to giue him his sister in marriage, propounding many other conditions, to ablynd and vnde of reason as it is better to let the curious read them in the Originalls themselves. Amongest all losses, that of liberty toucheth nereit; but our Francis having learned to withstand all aduersities with a constant resolution, I will die (sayd he) a prisoner, rather then make any breach in my realme for my deliuerance. Whereof I neither wil nor can altere any part, without the consent of the soueraine Courts and Officers, in whose hands remaines the authoritie of the whole realme: Wee preferre the generall good before the private interest of Kings persons. If the Emperour will treat with mee, let him demand reasonable things, which are in my power, then shall he finde me readie to iync with him, and to fauour his greatnesse. And to redeeme his libertie with honor, and his subiects content, who wonderfully desired his enlargement, hee then offered, To marrie his sayd sister, widow to the King of Portugall, and to hold Bourgogne for her dowrie, the which should belong to the Children that should come of this marriage, to reigne his interest to the realme of Naples and the Duchie of Milan: To accompanie the Emperour with an army both by land and sea, when he should go to Rome to receive the Imperiull Crowne. Was not this properly to giue him all Italie in prey? To yeeld vnto the Duke of Bourbon his offices, lands and moouables confiscated, and the reuenues reserved by reason of this seizure, and to giue him to wife the Duchesse of Alanson his sister, newly a widow by the death of the Duke of Alanson, instead of Eleonor, the widow of Portugall, which had beene promised him. To content the King of England with money, and to pay what summes of money should be let downe for his ranfome.

Hereupon the Earle of S. Paul, having corrupted his guards, escaped out of prison, & jointly with the Earle of Vaudemont, and the Marquis of Salusses, treated by the means of Francis Earle of Pontrefme, with certain Princes and Captaines of Italie, to stay the King frō being transported out of the Duchie of Milan, hoping that the Potentates of Italie (fearing least the Emperour should seeke to supplant them) would seeke his maiesties deliuerie with their commūne forces. And the Venetians being not aduertised of the reconciliation of the English with the King, retired themselves from their League with the Emperour. But the Viceroy discovering these practises, gaue the King to vnderstand, that hee had commandement from the Emperour, to passe him into Spaine, that being there, their maiesties by a gracious and fauorable enteruewe, would easily conclude a peace, which should cause his libertie. So the King vnderstanding that the Duke of Bourbon pursued his marriage in Spaine with Eleonor, yielded to this passage, hoping the would rather desire to marrie a King of France, then a Prince dis-honoured. They imbarke the seauenth of Iune, and within fewe dayes after (the Emperour having commanded, that hee should bee receiued, with all the honour that might bee, as hee passed,) they arrive happily in Castille: the King was lodged at Madrid, a place of hunting and pleasure, but farr from the sea, or the confines of France.

The King transported into Captivity

The Emperour would not admit the King to his presence, before the accord were made, or in such terms as there were no doubt thereof for the advancing whereof a truce was concluded & until the end of December, during the which Marguerite the Kings Sister, 1525. Sister, Duchesse of Alanson, came with a large commission into Castile, to treat with the Emperour. Her arrivall was very pleasing and healthfull to the King: who finding him so sick, as few men hoped for his recovery, she did more reuive him then all the Physicians art. But hauing found the Emperour (who was come to visit the sick King) constant in his vnreasonable demands, especially for the restitution of Bourgonne, whereunto the King would not yeeld, but vpon the former condition, or that they might trie it by lawe, to whom it belonged: and seeing that the King had recovered his former health, she returned into France, leauing with the Emperour, the Archbishop of Amburn, afterwards Cardinall of Tournon, & John de Selue, chiefe President at Paris, to pursue the treatie begun, bringing with her an ample declaration from the King, whereby (resigning vp his Crowne) hee gaue her power to inuest the Dauphin B his sonne, the King remaining resolute, rather to continue in perpetuall prison, then to passe any thing to the preiudice of his realme.

The King set at libertie.

But the Emperour seeing the King constant in this resolution, in the end agreed to his Maiesties deliuerie, whereof we will set downe the most important points: That within sixe weekes after his deliuerie, he should consign the Duchie of Bourgonne to the Emperour, with all the dependences, as well of the Duchie, as of the Countie, the which should hereafter be sequestred from the Soueraignie of the realme of France. That at the very instant of his enlargement, they should deliuer into the Emperours hands, the Dauphin, and with him the Duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne, or twelue of the chiefe Noble men of France, such as the Emperour should name, to remaine as hostages, untill the restitution C of the sayd lands, and ratification of the peace, with all the Articles, by the generall Estates of the realme: and vpon the restoring of the Hostages, they should deliuer vnto the Emperour the Earle of Angoulesme the Kings third sonne, to be bred up with him, the better to assure and maintaine the peace. That he should resign vnto the Emperour, all his rights pretended to the Estates of Naples, Milan, Genes and Ast: That hee should quitte the Soueraignie of Flanders and Arthois, and should marry Eleonor, sister to the sayd Emperour, with two hundred thousand Crownes dowrie, and Jewels fit for her estate, and the Emperour should renounce all his pretensions, to any place belonging to the Crowne of France: especially to Peronne, Mondidier, Roye, Bologne, Ponthieu, and other Seigneuries, lying on eyther side the river of Somme. Without doubt, these were hard conditions, and beyond all the bounds of reason. But the King being a prisoner, garded, and not his owne man, of what validitie could they be in lawe? It was therefore in his power to redeeme his children by money. These bee the fruites the Spaniard would gather by his victorie, to teach the French not to fall againe into their hands. The iudicious reader may consider, whether they be growne wise by their owne losse.

Then the King and Emperour did see one another againe, with great demonstrations of loue: they shewed themselves together in publike places, had often, long, and secret discourses: they went in one Carrosse together, to see Queene Eleonor, to whome the King was made sure. But for that in the midst of all these shewes of loue, the King was at no more liberty then before, but more carefully garded: who would not haue E held this accord to be full of discord, this alliance without loue: and the most part of the articles extorted by force, would bring forth the fruits of their ancient ieaiousies? A lesson for Princes that be victors, to containe themselves within the limits of reason, for whatsoeuer is forced by violence, is not durable.

Some dayes were spent in these actions: then the King was conducted to Fonsarbie, where exchange was made of his Maiestie, with his two sonnes, being yet very young. At Bayonne the Ambassadors of Charles demanded the ratification of the treaty which the King should giue at his entrie into the realme: but he could not alienate the Bourguignons without their consent: and therefore he answers, That he will shortly assemble the Estates of the countie, to know their mindes. Let vs see then what followed, and begin somewhat higher.

After they had transported the King into Castile, Francis Sforce fearing least the Emperour should retaine the Duchie of Milan to himselfe, together with the excessive sum of ruiue

A hundred thousand Ducats, which he demanded for the expences he had made in the conquest, and defence of the said estate: considering also, that part of the Spaniards were gone into Spain with the Viceroy, part were with the Duke of Bourbon: many laden with spoile, were retired into diuers places. And the Marquisse of Pesquara, was in bad termes with the Viceroy: he perswaded himselfe, that the rest of the troups might bee easily overcome, if the Marquis would giue his consent. Sforce therefore, by the aduice of Jerome Moron his Chancellor, did found the Marquisse his mind: hee propounded vnto him, to cut in peeces those companies which remained within the estate of Milan, and to make him King of Naples, if the Pope and the Venetians would agree. A sufficient spur to prick forward an ambitious man. B The Pope did not dislike it: the Venetians shewed themselves most affectionate: all vnto do malice the greatnesse of Charles. The Marquis at the first gaue eare vnto them, but hauing discouered the whole practise to the Emperour, and growing suspect vnto the rest, accepting the Lieutenantie of Lombardie, of the Emperour, hee publicly put in execution what hee had in charge: to prevent these imminent dangers, as he should thinke fit. And first he seized vpon Moron, whom he made to confesse all the conspiracie, charging Duke Sforce, as culpable and consenting to all that had passed, he made him to resigne vnto him Cremona, Tresse, Leecie, and Pisqueton, the Keyes of the Duchie of Milan: he forced the Milanais to take the Oath of fealtie C vnto the Emperour, and Sforce to shutte himselfe into the Castle of Milan. But when the Marquisse had reduced him to all extremities, death takes him away before hee could enioy the fruites of his malice. The Duke of Bourbon did succeed after him.

The Marquis of Pesquara dyes.

There was great likelihood, that the Emperour being in quiet possession of the estate of Milan, all the rest, especially the Popes (lying betwixt Lombardie, and the realme of Naples) would remaine in prey. To prevent Charles his attempts (who made shew to inuest the Duke of Bourbon in the Duchie of Milan, if Sforce were found guiltye of the crime, whereof they accused them) a League was made at Cognac, betwixt the Pope, the Kings of France, and England, the Venetians, Flarentines and Suisses, for the common libertie of Italy, and the restoring of Francis Sforce to the Duchie of Milan, being besieged, as we haue said. A League against the Emperour.

This League was signified by the King, to the Viceroy of Naples, to the Duke of Trinette, and to Alarson, whom the Emperour had sent, to bee fully satisfied of the Kings intent: who excusing himselfe, that hee could not performe his promise for the alienation of Bourgonne, as very preiudiciall to the Crowne, hee offered to accomplish all the rest, and for the ranfome of his children, to pay two Millions of crownes. According to this treatie, the Pope sends into field eight hundred men at armes, seven hundred light horse, and eight thousand foote, vnder the charge of Guy Earle of Ranson, and John de Medicis Colonell of the Italian foote. The Venetians sent eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and eight thousand foote, commanded by Francis Maria Duke of Vrbino. Lsude was the first obiect of their armes, the which by the intelligence of Lodowick Vistarin, a Gentleman of that Towne, they surprised from fiftene hundred Neapolitaines, whome the Marquisse of Gualf, and Anthoine de Leue, had placed there, vnder the charge and command of Fabrizio Maramao.

These happy beginnings, should haue made the heads of the League to haue proceeded in their course speedily and valiantly. By the taking of Lsude, the way was open euen to the gates of Milan: the enemy had no more meanes to succour Cremona, and if they had speedily aduanced towards Milan, they had found them in great perplexitie and confusion: the Citizens oppressed by the tyrannicall vsage of the Spaniards, dreamed of nothing but rebellion: but the Duke of Vrbino, terrified with the very name of the Spaniards, marching slowly like an Abbot, and staying a whole day in euery lodging, to attend the Suisses, without the which hee thought it dangerous to approach neere Milan, by his slowe and faint proceeding, hee caused an 1526. irreparable losse and shame to his owne reputation, and to his maisters. For hauing by his long delayes, giuen the Duke of Bourbon leasure to enter into Milan, with eight hundred Spaniards, before the armie of the League could approche: the Souldiers of Milan returned courage, charged the Artillerie in the night, and so terrified the Duke, as he presently retired his armie, desiring rather, sayd he, to repaire the forepassed error, then to persist in it, seeing they had approached so neere Milan, contrary to his opinion, where expecting no resistance, he knew that a longer abode would wholly raine the League. He trembled for feare, at the report of the Spanish forces, and yet would make shew as though he had to deale with men made of snowe, who without striking stroake, would suffer him to reape the fruites of his pretended victorie. So the Duke retired to Margran, being resolute, not to dislodge, until he were fortified with twelue thousand Swisses: without doubt, a hundred thousand men cannot assure a fearfull minde. It was a foule error, at the beginning of a long and dangerous voyage.

The Imperials fled from this armie, repaired the Rampars and Bulwarkes of the Suburbs, disarmed the people, thrust forth such as were suspect, and lodged the Souldiers in the Citizens houses: Who insulting ouer their hostes, as in a Towne of conquest, forced them to furnish victuals, clothes, and money: abused their wives and daughters, compelled seruants to discover their maisters wealth being hidden: to conclude, they practised all actes of inhumanitie, which licentiousnes doth commonly breed in this nation being a Conquerour.

Being thus oppressed, they repaire to the Duke of Bourbon, being newly arrived, and with pittifull complaints, teares, and lamentations, they beseech him to ease their miseries. The Duke, after he had imputed the causes of these insolencies, to the want of pay for the armie, promised to lodge them else where, so as they would prouide thirtiethousand crownes for the maintenance of one moneth: and the better to countenance his promise, he wished, In case that euer any extortion were committed, that he might be staine with a Hargueluse, at the first enterprise he should be at. A prayer which we shall soone see take effect. The money was gathered, but the people finding no fruits of his promise, the pittifull estate of the multitude being spoiled, nothing mollifying the cruell insolencie of these barbarous souldiers many not knowing to whom to haue recourse, cast themselves headlong from the toppes of their houses, many hangd themselves, many ended both their liues and miseries, by other horrible and strange manners of voluntarie torments.

Francis Sforce was at this instant ready to yeeld vp the Castle, when as the confederates, fortified with five thousand Swisses, newly arrived, drew the Duke of Vrbina a second time before Milan: but this was to make a second discouerie of his indiscretion and cowardise: for being still ready to number his Souldiers, possessed with a strange feare, and seeking rather meanes to flie then to fight, Sforce prest by famine, and want of courage in the Duke of Vrbina, yeelded vp the Castle of Milan, to the Duke of Bourbon, the 24. of Iuly, and retired himselfe to the confederates, who put Laude to his hands. Then the Kings armie arrived, lead by Michell Antonie Marquis of Saluces, consisting of foure hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse: and foure thousand Gascous, and within fewe dayes after, the twelue thousand Swisses, leuied in the Kings name, encouraged the Duke of Vrbina to returne towards Milan, where leauing part of his men at Armes, the Popes troups, and the fore sayd Swisses, hee went with the Venetian foote to fortifie Malateste Edillon, who with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and eight thousand foote, besieged Cremona, and so prest it, as they yeelded by composition, the which was likewise deliuered vnto Sforce.

Every one hath his turne, saith the Prouerbe: The Pope had beene the principall Author of the Kings sending the Duke of Albanie into the estate of Naples, and now hee sollicit his confederates againe to inuade the realme, supposing things could not succed happily, if the Emperour were no where else encountered, but in the Duchie of Milan. But whilest hee seeks to fire or burne his neighbours house,

As it falls vpon his owne head. Ill counsell is commonly dangerous to the giuer. All these warres had bene plotted in the Councell at Rome: was it not reason he should reape what he had sowne? The Pope vrged his confederates to send a part of their forces into the Realme of Naples: which consisted of foure Gallions, and sixteene Gallies for the King, thirteene Gallies for the Venetians, and eleuen for the Pope, ouer all the which Peter of Nauarre was appointed Generall at the Kings instance, notwithstanding the Popes pursute in fauour of Andrew Dory, who he had entertained. The Colonnes vnabie to resist such forces, did cunningly strike saile, and to butie the Pope until the Viceroy returne from Spainne with the armie at sea, they did capitulate with them the 22. of August: To retire their troups to Naples, with the which they did molest the territories of the Church, and on the other side the Pope should remit all offences past, and reuoke the monitory which he had published against Cardinall Colonne. This reconciliation, made the Pope in a manner to dismisse all the horse and foote, which he maintained vpon the territories of the Church against the Colonnes, and to disperse the rest into Townes about Rome: growing cold in his desseine to inuade Naples.

The Colonnes cared not to wrong the Pope with the preiudice of their honour, but hauing no meanes to make open warre against him, they straine all their wittes to circumuent him by fraud. Payning therefore to suppress Agnane, defended by two hundred men in the Popes name, they flie with all speed to Rome the twentieth of September, with eight hundred horse and three thousand foot, they teize vpon three gates, iacke the Popes pallace, and the ornaments of S. Peters Church. There were present in person Ascanius Colonne, Don Hugues de Moncade, Vespasian son to Prosper Colonne, (the mediator of the accord, and who had plighted his faith, for himselfe and the rest) Cardinall Pompee Colonne, so farre transported (saith the Originall) with ambition and fury, as hauing conspired to put the Pope cruelly to death, he had resolved to force the Cardinals to make choise of himselfe, and to install him in the seat being vacant. The Pope in the beginning grewe resolute, like vnto Boniface the 8. when hee was surprisid by Sarre Colonne: but in the ende coniuired by the Cardinals that were about him, he retired himselfe into the Castle of S. Angelo, where Don Hugues hauing received the Popes oath, and the Cardinals, Cibo and Rodolphe his cousins, for hostages of his faith: capitulating with him in tearmes of a Conqueror, he forced the Pope to promise, To retire the army of the League, out off the Estate of Milan, and not to giue any succours to the Confederats for foure moneths.

Times for punishments, are noted in the Counsell of Gods diuine prouidence, who ment to giue two notable stroakes with one stone, as we shall shortly see. This truce was wonderfully commodious for the Emperours affaires. Milan had beene vanquished at length: Genes oppressed by the Confederates armie at Sea: cryed out for bread, and the small store of victuals which came by land, did but keepe them in breath for some few dayes. But behold two great effects diuerred by the coming of George Fronsperg, who knowing the extremity of Gaspar his sonne, Collonell of the Lansquenets, which were within Milan, hauing stirred the Germaines, with hope to enrich themselves with the spoile of Italy: he led a good number of horse, and foureteen thousand Lansquenets, who receiving euery man a crowne, followed him to the succour of Milan. The Marquis of Salusses, and the Duke of Vrbina aduertised of these succours, abandon the sege of Milan, with an intent to cut off their victuals, and to charge them at the passage of some riuer. But the Dukes accustomed delayes had giue Fronsperg leasure to assure himselfe of the field, so as the league could no way annoy him, but by light skirmishes: in one of the which John de Medeis hauing his thigh broken with a faucon shot, he retired to Mantoue, and there died, within fewe daies. This death was an absolute victory to the aduerse party: for he was yong, wise, and a valiant Captaine. Laude and Cremone, did cut off the victuals from Milan: & the Duke of Bourbon being freed frō the sege, hauing no more meanes to mainteine his army, after he had by strapadoes & other tortures, wrested some money frō the Cittizens to pay his 1526. Spaniards, he left Antonio de Lenc in the Cittie, & entred the territories of the Church, with an intent to possesse Plaisance. To prevent him, the Marquis of Saluzzes, leaving the Duke of Urbino in field put him selfe into it: so as the Duke of Bourbon (seeing the Towne well manned, and the Venetian armie to follow him,) left Plaisance, and by the Duke of Ferrares aduice (whom the Emperour had w^{rote} vnto him) being ioyned with Fronspreg, he marched directly towards Rome.

The warre
of Naples.

The Pope (to be reuenged of the outrage receiued by the Colonnas) called the Earle of Vaudemont, brother to the Duke of Lorraine, issued from the house of Anjou, whose greatly desired by the ancient partisans thereof, to the realme of Naples. The Earle accompanied with Rance de Cere, about ten thousand foote, and some horse, entring into the Realme, had taken Aquile, Salerne, and many other places, chased Don Hugues de Moncade, and raised the siege of Freselon, which the Imperials had besieged: whereas the Viceroy of Naples required of the Pope in the Emperours name a surceasse from armes.

The Pope had no money to maintaine so long and so heauie a burthen of the warre: there were greater difficulties in the enterprise of Naples then he expected, the King did not seeme willing to make warre out of Italie as he had promised, in the articles of their Capitulation, neither did he furnish, besides his part of fortie thousand Crownes a moneth for the common warre, the twentie thousand, which hee ought euery moneth for the expedition of Naples: the French gallies were so ill furnished, both with men and munition, as they remayned fruitles at Sauonne, not attempting any thing, the succors of the King of England were farre off, and vncertaine, the tedious, and variable proceeding of the Duke of Urbino did vex him: the approach and threats of the Imperiall armie at the gates of Rome, did amaze him: All these considerations made him conclude a truce with the Viceroy for eight moneths, whereby either partie called backe his men speedily, deliuered vp the places taken, and caused the armie at sea to retire. This was an other meanes to lull the Pope a sleepe a little before his ruine.

For, three score thousand Ducats which Pope Clement had given in regard of this truce, were not sufficient to satisfie two pays due to the Duke of Bourbons Laniquenets: the Cermains and Spaniards gaped greedely after the sacke of Rome, which had bene long promised them. The truce did nothing stay them, from shewing all acts of hospitalitie. they spoyled the Countries of Eologna and Romagnia, and then camped before Rome: the next day, the Duke of Bourbon causing a furious assault to be giuen, marching in the head of his troupes, with a ladder in his hand, he was slaine with a harguebus. Philibert of Chalon, Prince of Orenge (who marched besids him, to conceale it from the souldiars) caused his bodie to be covered with a cloke, and following the charge hotly, he forced the suburbs and the Cittie.

The Duke of Bourbon slaine

The victors entring, put about foure thousand men to the sword. (It is to be supposed, the slaughter had been greater, if the death of their generall had been knowne. they spoyle friend and so indifferently, Prelats, Temples, Monasteries, and reliques. They ranfome both secular, and religious men. They sacke the Cardinals Pallaces (except such as had redeemed their goods, and such as were fled into their houses) with exceeding summes of money. And which is worse, many being spoyled by the Spaniards, were fleeced againe by the Laniquenets, being seasoned for the most part with Luthers doctrine, and by consequence passionate enemies to the sea of Rome. To conclude, Rome is subiect to all the insolencies of a conquered Towne which they meane to ruine.

Rome sacked.

A hard capitulation for the Pope.

The Pope besieged in his Castle of S. Angelo, sent for the Viceroy of Naples, hoping that hee would make him some better composition. But comming to Rome, hee found the Imperials nothing pleased with his gouernment, who had chosen the Prince of Auranges for their generall, with whome the Pope (voyde of all hope of succors) agreed the 6. of Iune: To pay vnto the army foure hundred thousand ducats,

A fourth part presently, the rest at sundrie termes: to remaine prisoner with thirteene Cardis. 1527. Cardinals that did accompanie him, vntill the first hundred and fiftie thousand were payed, and then to go to Naples, or to Caiete, to attend how the Emperour would dispose of them. To giue in hostage for assurance of the money, the Archebishops of Siponte and Pisa: the Bishoppes of Pisoye and Verona, James Saluati, Simon Ricatoli, and Laurence brother to the Cardinal Rodolphe: To deliuer into the Emperours hands (to hold so long as he pleased) the Castles of Saint Ange, the forts of Ostia, Cuirauecchia and Cuira Castellana, with the Citties of Plaisance, Parma and Modena. The accord being made, Alarson entred the Castrell with three companies of Spaniards, and three of Laniquenets, lodging the Pope vnder straightly and with small libertie.

This insolent and hard proceeding against the Pope, to the scandale of all Christendome, caused the Kings of France and England to make warre in Italie, at their common charge, to free the Pope, and his Cardinals being besieged both with warre and pestilence, and to restore him to the possessions of the Church: the King of England contributing for his part three score thousand angelis a moneth: and to confirme the League betwixt the King and the Venetians, they promised to entertayne ten thousand Swisses in common, the King furnishing the first pay, and they the second, and so consequently. The Duke of Milan with the Venetians should likewise entertayne ten thousand Italians. Odel of Foix Earle of Lautrec was made generall of the whole army, and passed the Alpes with a leaue of sixe thousand horse, sixe thousand Laniquenets, ten thousand French and Gascons, and ten thousand Swisses. Then Andrew Dorie was entertained by the King with eight gallies, giuing him thirty thousand Crownes pay euery moneth.

A new league
against the Emperour.

Before they came to open warre, the two Kings sent ioyntly to the Emperour, to demand the Popes enlargement; the restitution of the children of France, with an offer of two millions of gold for their ransom: the preservation of the estates & gouernments of Italie, and finally a generall peace: which the Emperour accepting, the Duke of Orleans should marrie with the daughter of England, but hauing refused these articles they did sweare and solemnly proclaime their League the 8. of August. The expectation of Lautrecs forces was great, and the confusions of the Imperiall army great, being disperfed by the plague about Rome, and so diminished as there scarce remayned ten thousand men of all the Emperours forces. Lautrec had no sooner set footing in the marches of Lombardie, but hauing intelligence that the Earle of Lodron had sent two thousand Laniquenets to Besio, in the territories of Alexandria, he beleagured the, battered it day and night, and the tenth day of the siege forced them to yeeld, at his discretion, who keeping the Captains prisoners, dismissed the soldiars; but vpon condition that the Spaniards should returne into Spaine, through France, and the Laniquenets into Germanie, through Switzerland: but these were afterwards receiued into the Kings fetuice, vnder the Earle of Vaudemont Colonel of the Laniquenets.

This small victorie was the fore-runner of another, of greater importance. Andrew Dorie generall of the Kings gallies, made hot warres against the Genouois, so as no ship durst go to sea along the riuier of Genes, and Ceser Fregose aduertised by his friends that were within Genes, of the great scarcetie of victuals which did presse the Inhabitants, being sent by Latrece, with two thousand men by land, hee kept them so short, as in fewe dayes there was neyther come nor cattle, for the Inhabitants. The bellie is an importune solicitor, especially when many mouthes trie for meate.

Moltus

The Genouois had no more hope of helpe, but in hazarding some gallies to sea. They came some, and send them out by hazard to seeke victuals: foure laden with corne were taken by the French gallies, foure retured fraught with corne, and one with other marchandise: and nine were gone forth of Genes to west them, when as hauing newes of Fregoses approach, they abandon their galleies to go to charge him. In the meantime Andrew Dorie arrives, hee compasseth in these galleies in the port of Genes, burnes one & takes al the rest, whilest the Genouois (hauing ouerthrowen 1527. the first they encountred,) chased them so farre, as the way being cut off by the French A betwixt the Towne and them, they were all defeated, and Gabriel Earle of Marignan their generall taken prisoner. This misfortune with sundrie other crosses and losses of money and diuers shippes, the famyne hauing brought them to the last extremity, reduced the Towne to the Kings obedience, where of Lautree made Theodore Triumlee Gouvernor.

Genes yielded to the King.

Alexandria taken.

The losse of the Lansquenets had wonderfully daunted them of Alexandria: so as although Alberie of Bel-iouense had somewhat reuiued them with a supply of a thousand men, yet the rough and continuall battery of Lautree, forced the Earle of Leiron to enter into composition, whereby the Lansquenets departed with their baggage, taking an oath not to carry armes against the King, nor his allies for six monethes. The taking hereof brought Vigue, with all the Countrey of Lomeline and Biagras to the Kings obedience. Anthony de Leue had not within Milan aboute a hundred and fiftie horie and fife thousand Lansquenets and Spaniards, being readie to abandon the Towne, (douting to be vnable to defend it, with so fewe men and so manye difficulties) and to retire to Paue. But Paue was ill victualed: and moreouer his army could not liue there vpon extortion and spoile, as it had done at Milan. He therefore sends Lodowike of Bel-iouense to Paue, with two thousand fife hundred men, and resolues himselfe to defend Milan. Lautree followes him, and beseegeth it on the Castle side, & the Venetians on the other part, hee makes a breach, and takes the Towne at the second assault, he leaues it eight dayes in spoile to the soldiars, & leads away Bel-iouense C (who lately for a quarrel with Frederic of Bossole had forsaken the King) prisoner at Genes. All which places according to the treaty were restored to Francis Sforce.

Genes taken.

Milan wauered, the Confederats did sollicit the taking thereof. But it was thought good to leaue this thorne in the Venetians feet and Sforces, for being both freed from feare of the Emperour, who (hauing this passage stoppt, should drawe no succors out off Germaine) would haue bene lesse affected to fauour the King in his enterprise of Naples. Moreouer it was a meanes for the King to make a more easie treaty of peace with the Emperour, of whome (leauiug the estate of Milan), he might with more ease obtaine the liberty of his children, according to the treaty with the Emperour, by the Ambassadors of France, England and Venice. But the King desyring that Sforce should still stand in neede of helpe, gaue the Emperour more meanes to speake bigge. Hee was of a great spirit, and neuer daunted in aduersitie. He protests, that neyther loue nor force, shal make him to alter any of the conditions before propounded: & his proud demands make proofe that hee had no inclynation to peace. As the Venetians and Sforce labored to stay the French forces in Lombardie: so the Pope pressed them to driue the Imperiall army out of the territories of the Church. Hee therefore passeth the riuer of Po the 18. of October, with an intent to attend the rest of the Lansquenets commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, which were not yet arriued, to be in the Suisse place being for the most part retired.

Lautree had no sooner turned his backe, but Anthony de Leue came and recovered E Biagras the 18. of the sayd moneth, and prepared to passe into Lomeline to take Vigue and Nauare: but Lautree aduertised of this attempt, sends backe Peter of Nauarre with six thousand French foote, and some men at armes, who chased the Spaniards into Milan, & settled Sforce in Biagras. The Lansquenets being arriued, Lautree tooke the way to Plaisance, where the Duke of Ferrare (it may be) well pleased to see the Pope against whom he had bene long incensed, receiue some disgrace leauiug the Imperialls, joined in League with the King: and there was concluded the marriage of Hercules his eldest sonne with Renée the yongest daughter to King Lewis the 12. The Marguis of Mantoue a friend to the strongest, did likewise ioyne with the confederats.

The Pope deliuered.

The Emperour then foreseeing, that the inuasion of the realme of Naples by Lautree, would force him to call backe his forces, which hee had in the territories of the Church, he sent his Comission to set the Pope at liberty, which done, after many treaties he agreed the last of October, To attempt nothing against the Emperour, neither for the estate of Milan, nor the Realme of Naples. To pay three hundred and fiftie thousand ducats, that is three score thousand presently, to the Lansquenets, and thirtie five thousand to the Spaniards: the like summe within fifteen dayes, and the rest three moneths after. The Pope to free himselfe from prison, fled to those remedies, which hee had before his relinquit neglected, hee made Cardinals for money, the most of them (saith the historie) being vnworthy of so great an honour. Necessary it was, that the Court of Rome should thus be disgraced, that they might lesse me lide in worldly affaires, & looke to their spirituall duties. The 10. of December was come, when as the Spaniards should conduct the Pope to a place of safetie, but knowing he had affection of the Spaniards, especially of Don Hugues de Moncade, Viceroy of Naples, by the death of Launoy, and fearing a worse condition, or some other change, hee deceiued his gardes, & the night before, disguised like a marchant (he went secretly out of the Castle, & saued himselfe in Oruete: but his hostages payed his ranfome. A rare example to bee noted in the Church, since the time it came to that greatness: To see a Pope issued from one of the greatest families in Italie, fallen from so great a dignitie, to loose Rome, to be a prisoner, and to haue all his estate possessed by the violence of Christian armes: then in few monthes, to be restored to his seat, and by the meanes of the eldest son of the Church to recover his estate, greatness & authoritie. Without doubt the Emperour, suffering himselfe to bee so much prest, for the Popes deliuerie, shewed, that the Countsell of Spain was more gouerned by ambition, then deuotion.

C The Pope being at libertie, he exhorted the Confederats to draw their Companies out of the territories of the Church, that by their example the Imperials might make their retreat according to promise, as in deed they did: he gaue thanks to Lautree in particular, for that he had assisted him in his deliuerance, adding, that he was as much bound vnto the King, and him, as if hee had bene freed by his forces. But the Moore changeth not his hewe. He held (saith the historie) his accustomed disposition, hauing not (by his imprisonment) left his craft, and couerousnesse. As the Kings of France and England, required him to reioyne his armes, and means with them and their allies, sometimes hee fed them with hope, that he would imploy himselfe for a general peace, and the good of all Christendome, sometimes with excuses, that wanting D men, money, and authoritie, his coniunction with them would be fruitles, and giue the Imperials occasion to wrong him in many respects. Lautree stayed at Bologne, attending directions from the King, eyther of a full resolution of peace, or to proceed in his course of armes. The Emperour offered to settle Sforce in his estate, and to compound with the Venetians, Florentines, & other confederats. But the Emperour and the King stood vpon the point of honour, which should trust other. A point which plainly discovered the bitterness of their spleene. The King would not be bound to draw his armes out of Italie, before he had recovered his children: yet hee offered to put hostages to the King of Englands hands, for performance of whatsoeuer hee should be bound vnto, if vpon the deliury of his children, hee did not presently withdrawe his armes.

E The Emperour was obstinate, and saying that hee could not trust him, who had once deceiued him. The Ambassadors of France and England tooke their leaues of the Emperour, and according to their maiesties Commission proclaimed war against him. The Emperour accepts it cheerefully: but to stay the Ambassadors, presently to send them fiftene leagues from Bourges, (where then the Court of Spain remayned,) to giue them a gard of shot, & halberds, and not to suffer them to conferre, or to write in any sort. Was not this to violate the Law of Nations? The fire is now kindled, they dreame of nothing but warre. Lautree proceeds in his course, he takes the way to Rimini, Antenne and Reanate, chaceth the Imperials before him into the realme of Naples, where we shall soone see the exploits of his armes.

F The King aduertised of the detention of the Bishop of Tarbe, his Ambassador, who was afterwards made Cardinal of Grandmont: he committed Nicholas Perienot Lord of Granuelle, the Emperours Ambassador, to the Chastelet at Paris, & staied al marchants, subjects to the Emperour. But this was not all. The Emperour had before time at Granado, when as they treated of a peace betwixt them, sayed: That he would willingly

The King of France and England proclaimed war against the Emperour.

1528. end all controuersies with the King, by a single combat of his person against the Kings: he now deliuer the same words vnto the Herald that denounceth warre vnto him, adding: That the King had basely, and treacherously broken his faith with him. The King would not haue refused it, but his Ambassador did then wrong him, in concealing this speech. It may be the Emperour had such an intent. He was a most valiant Prince: but our Francis did yeeld nothing vnto him in courage. Hee had no looser intelligence of his challenge, but calling together, the twentie eight of March, all the Princes, all Ambassadors, with the whole Court, into the great hall of the Pallace at Paris, sitting in his royall seate, he caused John Robertet, one of his Secretaries of Estate, with a loud voyce, to reade a Cartell signed with his owne hand: That the Emperour, accusing the King to haue falsified his faith, had spoken vnto him, and as often as he did speake it, he did lie. To the end therefore he should not deferre the deciding of their controuersies, he wished him to appoint the field, & he would bring the armes, the King protesting, that if hereafter the Emperour shall write, or speake any thing preiudiciall to his honour, the shame of the delay should redound vpon himselfe, seeing that the combat is the end of all writing. Without doubt, this proceeding had bene more seemely for Knights, then for such Princes: and no enterprises are commendable, but so farre forth as they agree with the dignitie of their persons, and States.

And for that Granuelle refused to take vpon him this charge, the King desirving him, did accompany him with an Herald, to present this writing vnto the Emperour. Within few dayes after, Henry King of England, sent him the like desie, and did put away Catherine his wife, daughter to Ferdinand and Elizabeth Kings of Spain, whom he had married being widow to Arthur his elder brother. A diuorce which Pope Clement granted, vpon promise that Henry should, for his safetie, maintaine him agard of foure thousand foote.

In the meane time Lautrecs forces preuailed in the Realme of Naples, with such applause of the people, as, whether for affection of the French, or hatred of the Spaniards, almost all the Townes, sent to offer their keyes, and gates. Peter of Nauarre had chased the Prince of Melphe out of Aquile, and reduced all Abruzz to the Kings obedience: the whole estate of Naples was readie to set vp the banners of France, when as the Prince of Orange hauing assembled within Troye, and thereabouts, fiftethousand Germanes, fiftethousand Spaniards, and fiftene hundred Italians, he made Lautrec to vnite his forces, which were disperfed, and to turne head to the enemye, with an intent to fight with him. He wanted the shewes of warre, the Kings assignations failed, so as he could not long maintaine the burthen of the warre: The aduantage of men, victuals, and the field, did inuite him: hee must therefore attempt some great matter. He goes to field with three thousand French, whereof the Lord of Burie was Colonell, foure thousand Gasccons, vnder the command of Peter of Nauarre, and the Lord of Candale, eight thousand Germanes commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, threethousand Suisses vnder the charge of the Earle of Tende, with ten thousand Italians, and approached neere the enemye: but there was no meanes to draw him out of his fort. Many dayes were spent in skirmishes, and courtes: In one of them, three hundred hories coming out of their battailons, which marched after the artillerie, were charged by Morice and Pomperant (it is that faithfull Achates to the Duke of Bourbon, whom the King had drawn to his seruice, and honoured with a company of fiftie men at armes, for the good seruice he had done him at his taking of Paia, hauing freed him from some souldiars, that had inuironed him in, and not knowne him were wholly defeated, and their enfeignes, and guidons carried away.

Lautrec offered bataille, yet well pleased not to fight in the absence of Horatio Baillon, who brought thirteene enfeignes of foote, whome John de Medeis had long before trayned in the exercise of armes. But behold, a heauie signe of a fatall deaister, the winds were so violent, and the skie so troubled, as all the tents in the French campe were ouerthrowne, & many men slaine. Baillon arriues, the enemye packs vp the baggage, 1528. A gale, stops the bells of his moyles, and marcheth through the woods directly to Naples, without sound of drumme or trumpet.

It had bene a goodly thing to pursue these runawaies. The French Captaines fiewe after them in their hearts, but Lautrec sayd: I will haue them at my mercie, and without losse of my men. But the spirit of man is ignorant of future destinies. Don Hugues de Monca- The enemy retyres.
and other chiefe seruants to the Emperour, did so hate the Prince of Orange, as without doubt, they had shut the gates of Naples against him, the which had giue the French a great aduantage. But the soueraigne Lodge of armes had otherwise decreed. The Prince of Orange being dislodged, Lautrec sent some troupes of French horie and foote with the blacke bands (which were those of Baillon) to go before Melfe, which might be one of the victuals from the army lying before Naples: the Prince thereof defended it with three thousand men, who by their continuall sallies had much indamaged our troupes. They made a small breach with two Cannons, and the Gasccons burning with heat offer themselves to the assault: the blacke bands follow them, without any commandement or direction from their Captaines. A volley of shot makes them retire, kills many Gasccons, and some threecore of the black bands. At night they reneue the batterie, and make a second attempt: but with like successe, yet at length they carry it.

The next day they haue a supplie of artillerie, wherewith they make two great batteries. The peasants (which were in great numbers within Melphe) mutine for feare, they are in deed more fit to amaze, then to serue at neede. The soldiars terrified with this tumult, abandon the defenses and recouer the Castell, they enter the Towne, spoile and kill of soldiars and Inhabitants six or seauen thousand: they take the Castell by composition, and the Prince with his wife and children prisoners. Barleta, Trani, Venosa, Asoli with all the places thereabouts, except Manfredonia, yeeld to the victors fortune, who prepared a great masse of victuals for the sege of Naples, the Venetians troupes hauing fortified the armie with about two thousand men. Capoua, Acerre, Noli, Auerse and all places thereabouts, hauing voluntarilie opened their gates, made the way easie for Lautrec, who camps before the walles of Naples: in the end of April the Imperialls were resolved, onely to defend Naples and Caiette. It was a great matter to haue chased the enemye out of the field, and to keepe them coopt vp, within the capitall Cittie. But alas what shall become of so great a multitude of men: our French must learne once more, to their cost, that all their strange enterprises attempted farre off, haue bene mournfull graues vnto them. The issues of death belong to the eternall God.

Lautrec imploies all his witts, in the sege of Naples, but who can hope for any hap-pinesse. The Cittie was full of men of defence, and the meane to furnish it verie vncertaine: for the galleies of Phillipin, Nephew to Andrew Dorie, being vnable to stoppe the port, some shippes fraught with meale stole in: those of Venise came not: the enemies light horse (which were many) cut off the victuals from our men: the ordinarie grossefesse of the aire, the continuall rayne, the discomodities of the soldiars, who for the most part lay open, filled the campe full of diseases: the Kings store prouision, and the negligence of the Treasurers were the cause that no money could passe the mountaynes: the Venetians, of two and twentie thousand ducats which they should contribute euery moneth, did owe threecore thousand, and that little which Lautrec did gather of the custome of the Cattell of Apulia, was employed for the detraying of his ordinarie expences. The number of the defendants was great, their experience in deeds of armes well tryed, beeing nine or ten thousand of soldiars.

It was therefore better to beseege, then to assault Naples, and to provide that they might not bee releued with victuals neyther by land nor sea, Phillippin Dorie kept the gulf of Salerne, and the Imperialls relying vpon the valour and strength of their men, conceiue a hope to overcome him. This resolution was necessary for the Spaniards, they make choise of a thousand Spanish shot, and diuide them

1528. them into six Gallies, four Foists, and two Brigantines. Don Hugues the Viceroy, Gobbe an olde sea Captaine, and almost all men of command, will be partakers: and to amaze Dorie a farre off, by a shew of a greater number of shippes, they make a long traine of Fisher-boates, and send two galleys before, giuing them charge to retire at the enemies approach, that they might draw them into the open sea. Dorie advertised of the Imperials counsell by faithfull spies, makes three of his galleys to disperse themselves, as if they fled, to the end that turning, they might (through fauour of the wind) charge them in flanke and in poupe: and followed with five galleys, he marches towards the enemy. The greatest stratagems consist in expedition: the first blow is worth two. The Spaniards presumed, that compassing in Dorie, with the smoke of their Canon to take from him his sight and marke. Dorie prevents them, and for the first check, he carries away with one Canon shotte, fortie men out of the Admiral, amongst the which was the Captaine and many officers: the other peeces fely discharged, do likewise disorder them. On the other side, the galley of Don Hugues discharging her Canon, kills the Captaine of Dories galley, and hurts the maister, with some others. The approaches are made, and a furious charge is giuen with their shotte and other armes. These two fight with great courage. three other Imperials presse two Genouises, and seemed to haue the better, after the death of many men of either side, when as the other three which made shew to flee (hauing gotten into the open Sea,) they turne the prow against the enemy, beate in peeces the Admiral, and another called Gobbe, take their foists, sinke some, burne others, kill their men, brake their armes, and fighting hand to hand, and foote to foote, in the end they get both the aduantage of the combate, and the honour of the victorie.

A victorie at sea gotten by Philippus Dorie.

The successe thereof.

Distresses in the French service.

Don Hugues de Moncade Viceroy of Naples, Fieramosque, with many other Gentlemen and Captaines, and aboue a thousand men, were slaine and remained as a prey for the Fish. Two Spanish foists fore battered, recouered Naples with great difficulty: the Prince of Orange caused the maister of one of them to be hanged, the other was and yeelded to Philippin Dorie. The Marquis of Gualt, Ascanius, and Camille Colonne, the Prince of Salerno, Saint Croix, le Kiz, Gobbe, Serenon, with a great number of chiefe men, were taken prisoners. These are goodly beginnings in so famous a siege, which fill the French with great hopes of a happy successe, and the Imperials with a strange amazement. They see the flower of their men buried in the waues, they haue lost the command of the Sea, and are blockt vp so neere at land, as they haue no meanes to be releued with victuals: they haue no meale but by their hand mills, no money for their souldiars, the plague did daily diminish their numbers: Stabie, Saint Germaine, Fondy, and all the countrie about, yeelds to the conquerour: the Prince of Melfe joynes to that partie: the people of Calabria seeme very willing to come vnder their command. But the point of a totall victorie consisted either in the conquest or the defence of Naples. Our men were much annoyed for fresh water, diseases encreased, the which did greatly waste the armie: the enemy being stronger in light horse, did cut off their provisions by their daily sallies.

Lautrec without doubt a great Captaine, but absolute in his opinions, left most of his horsemen dispersed at Capoua, Auersa and Nola, so as the black bands hauing no horse to second them, came often with disaduantage from their skirmishes. The report was, that they prepared an armie at sea at Marseilles: but it was onely in imagination. The Venetians more carefull of their private interest, then of the generall good, fitted themselves of those places which should be their portion of the conquest. The Pope had no other dessein, but to recover the authoritie which his house was wont to enjoy at Florence. Thus there appeared many difficulties on either side, yet such as there was an expectation of victorie for the French: for in the end there arriues two and twenty Venetian galleys in the gulphe of Naples, the tenth of Iune, which deprued the besieged of all commodities at sea, and threatned them with a generall famine. But see what caused the totall ruine of our French. The Emperour in the midst of a notable losse, makes a great gain. We do commonly sinke vnder our owne burthens, and are the

A cause & motives of our owne miseries. The infidelitie of the Genouois is herein detestable: but we may obserue a goodly lesson for Princes, To endure much of a rude servant, when he is profitable vnto them, and that they must neuer hope to recouer him, when he is chased away or lost. Lautrec advertised of the foresaid victorie, commanded they should send the prisoners into France, Philippin puts them into two galleys, with that intent. But the bootie was too good, and might easily draw a Genouois soule to disservice with his faith. As they passed by Genes, Andrew Dorie stayed them, concealing his secret dessein with this pretext. That the King had not satisfied him for the ranome of the Prince of Orange, and other prisoners, which hee had taken at Porte-fin during the siege of Paue (the which had beene set at libertie, a peace being concluded at Madrid with the Emperour) neither yet for the entertainment of his galleys, without the which he could no longer maintaine them. That if it pleased his Maestie to do him right, & yeeld vnto the Genouois their accustomed commands ouer Sauone, (the King thinking to keepe Genes in awe, had transported the traffike of merchandise, and the custome of salt to Sauonne) with their ancient liberties, and priuileges, he would deale with the people, that for assurance of his faith, hee should furnish the King with twelue galleys entertayned, in the which he might place such Captaines, and souldiars, as hee should thinke good, reseruing onely two galleys, for the gard of the port.

A strange and insolent course for the servant, to prescribe a law to his master. But the losse of such a servant was the losse of Genes, of the Realme of Naples, and of the armie which besieged it. But these demands of Dorie, being found vnreasonable by the Counsell, especially by the Chancellor du Prat, a sower man, and of great authority, the King sent Anthony de la Rochefoucault Lord of Barbezicux, with the office of Admirall into the East-seas, and a Comission to seize as well on his Maesties galleys, as of those of Andrew Dorie: yea and of his person, if hee might find the meanes. Andrew advertised of this charge, retyred himselfe to his galleys, deliuered vp the Kings, left his pay, and practised by his Spanish prisoners, hee tooke part with the Emperour with the libertie of Genes, vnder the Emperours protection, the subiection of Sauonne to the Genouois, a pardon for himselfe, who had beene so great a persecutor of the Spanish name, entertainment with the Emperour, of twelue galleys, and threecore thousand ducats yeerely pay, with many other honourable conditions: during which tyme, his nephew Philippin, not onely kept ill gard, but also priuilege releued the besieged with victuals, and in the end, retired himselfe from Naples, with all his galleys. This departure of Philippin, caused the Venetians (who wrought from the sea shore) until they met with the trench, which Lautrec had made betwixt the Towne and Mount Saint Martin, which the enemies had fortified) to leaue their worke, and looke to ward the sea. This was the first effect of Dories retreat, to preiudice the French armie. Behold the second, whence followed the ouerthrow of their enterprises, and the losse of their infinit charges.

Reuolt of Andrew Dorie

Of Philippin his nephew.

The great constancie of Lautrec.

The fifteenth of Iuly, the Venetian galleys returne into Calabria, to provide biscuit. So the port remayning open, the besieged receiued a great refreshing at such time as necessitie had brought them to Lautrecs deuotion, (who notwithstanding the plague) resolving rather to die, then to retire one foot backe from the place, hee solicited the King, to supplie him with money, and men in their roomes that had died of the infection.

The King sent the Prince of Nauarre, brother to Henry King of Nauarre, but with so small a troupe, (whereof the greatest part were voluntarie yong gentlemen, who marched onely for pleasure, and to win honour) as hee was forced to send some out of the armie, to conduct him safely from Nola to the Campe, and to receiue some money which he brought. This charge was giuen to Candalles, nephew to the Marquis of Salusses, who passing in his returne before Naples, was charged by the Imperials, who issued forth in great troups, being hurt, (his men put to rout, himselfe taken prisoner) to Naples: and then redeemed by exchange of one of theirs that was taken in the fight, 1528. hee died of his wounds. Hugh Earle of Pepoli was likewise exchanged for an other, and their troupes were diminished, by about two hundred, that were slaine and taken. A hard forerunner of a fatal checke, which within few dayes shall wait our warriors.

Now behold a pittifull Catastrophe of these two armies. The Imperials, by their dayly sallies, provided them things necessary, and doe often cut off the victuals from the French armie, take their baggage, and forrage, euen at their forts, and their horties at the watering, their hopes increase with their aduantages: their Laniquenets mutine no more: euery one esteems it a glory to haue suffered: contrariwise, the others decay both in force and courage: the horse disband, some to refresh themselves, others to auoid the plague: the footmen faint, hauing no horse to second them: the plague began to cease at Naples, and increased amongst our men. The Earle of Vandemont, Gruffy with many other Capitaines, were already layed in their graues: the Prince of Nauarre, Camille Triunlee, and almost all the men of command were sicke: and that which did most import, Lautrec stricken with sicknes, could not redresse those things, which did hourly tend to ruine. Rene de Cere, whom he had sent towards Abruzzo, to make a leuie of foure thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse, found the Treasurers, who payd him with their ordinarie answere. I haue not a farthing. The King hath no money in his coffers. The enemies did so belay the wayes, as they could not go to Capoue: euery man almost was sicke in the armie, the footmen were almost wasted. Simon Romain, a braue Knight, and of the French partie, had bene defeated in Calabria. Somme had bene sackt with the slaughter of a troupe of men at armes, and light horse. Most commonly there were no victuals in the campe: they wanted water, all the Cesterns being drie: and to heape vp their miseries, Lautrec dying the 15. of August, interred with him all his braue desseins. Without doubt the death of a valiant commander, and of great reputation, is the ruine of an armie.

The head failing, all the members tremble, and soone fade away. Moreover, wee obserue in this Nobleman, that no man, (how wise and valiant soeuer) is alwaies happy: for vertue and fortune, haue alwayes bene at hatred and mortall waite. The King did honour his funerals, at our Ladies Church in Paris, with a mourning dumpe, fit for one of his children. The Marquis of Silussis, tooke vpon him the gouernment of the armie. A man of courage, beloued and well followed by men of war: but it decreased, and disorders encreased daily.

The Earle of Sarni, with a thousand Spaniards, chased three hundred foote from Sarni which were in garrison there: and followed with a greater troupe, hee tooke Nola from Valerius Priser, who being rettyred into the Castle, attended two thousand men which the Marquis sent him: the which being charged in the plaines of Naples, were put to rout. Fabrizio Maramao issued out of Naples, with foure hundred men, and finding Capoue in a manner forsaken, he straightway entred into it. So the French abandoning Pozzuolo, put the garrison into Auerse, a place of great importance for the

But Capoue and Nola being lost, they could hardly recover any victuals. So as the armie being no longer able to subsist, did rise in the night, to recover Auerse. The Imperials discover their departure. they pursue them, defeat the battaile vpon the way, being led by Peter of Nauarre, and the reereward commanded by Pomperant, Negrepelisse, and Paul Camille Triunlee. They take the Nauarra is with many other commanders, and men of qualitie, and beseege the Marquis in Auerse: who hauing no meanes to defend him selfe, sent Guy of Rangon, to parle with the Prince of Auranges, and did capitulate with him, as followeth: That hee should leaue Auerse, with the Castle, artillerie, and munition. That as Lieutenant Generall to the King, hee should remaine a prisoner: That hee should imploy his authoritie to cause both French and Venetians to yeeld vnto the Emperour all the Realme of Naples: That the men of warre should yeeld and deliuer vnto their Things hauing thus passed, the Marquis was carried sicke in a Litter to Naples, where within fewe daies after hee died. During the sege, and after, there died the Earles of Lautrec and Vaudemont, Charles Prince of Nauarre, Candilles, the Barons of Grandmont, Buzanfois, de Conty, the Lord of Tournon and his brother, Claude of Belpays Lord of la Ferte Nabert, Charbonneres, la Vall a D. alpherois, Cruffy, Moriae, de Pomperant, Montdragon, Louppé, Cornillon, Grutture, Mauourier, the elder Larnac, Boniuet, Hughe Earle of Pepoli, Cont Wolfe, with so great a number of others, as of so many men at armes there remained not a hundred, and of so many thousand of foote, there hardly escaped foure thousand: but let vs see the successe of our forces in the estate of Milan.

The Duke of Brunswike, hauing passed the riuer of Adice the x. of May, with ten thousand Laniquenets, and sixe hundred horse well armed, hee marched to the succour of Naples. And the King, to crosse his desseins, opposed the Earle of Saint Paul, brother to the Duke of Vendosme, with five hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, under the commande of Boissy: six thousand foote led by Lorges, and three thousand Laniquenets, by Monticau. The Earle had commandement from the King, to followe this Germaine Duke at the heeles, if hee directed his course to Naples, and to engage him betwixt the two armies: but necessarie prouisions for his troupes causing the Earle to make a fruitlesse stay at Ast, gaue the Duke libertie to take by composition Pescara, Rinolte, Lunete and almost all the other places vpon the Lake of Gard. This little successe drew him to the sege of Lande: but in vaine, the valour of the besegged, the plague among the beseggers, the policie of Anthoine de Leue (who would haue no companions of the bootie, nor so great forces as might prescribe him a lawe in his gouernment) tooke from them all hope to recouer any money, considering the pouertie of Milan, and the difficultie of victuals, whereof there was great want in Lombardie: the Laniquenets mutyning returned home in disorder, the 13. of July.

The Earle being thus freed from this thorne, and ioyned with the Dukes of Fribin and Milan, recovered what the Imperials had seized on, and all that they held betwixt the Po and the riuer of Tessin vnto Pavia, which then obeyed the Emperour: for after the passage of Lautrec to Naples, Anthoine de Leue, aduertised that it was carelessly kept by Peter of Lungene, with foure hundred horse, and a thousand Venetian foote, and by Hannibal Pissinard a Cremonois with three hundred foote, hee scaled it in the night and surprisid it by assault. Biogras and Arone were by the same meanes brought vnder his obedience.

The confederats meaning was to assaile Milan hotlie: but a continuall raine, breakes their way to the Port of Vercell, by the which they should enter: so as they change aduise and went to campe before Pavia. They battred it with twentie Cannons, and made a reasonable breach, where they disputed who should haue the point of the assault, the French and the Venetians affecting this honour equally. The lot fell to the Venetians, who gaue it: but skitmiſhing coldly and farre off, Lorges moued with choller and impatience to see them so faintly pursue the aduantage, which fortune had giuen them, thrusts himselfe betwixt them and the breach, and takes it by force, before the Venetians could approach. Florimond of Chailly and Gransay (who did second Lorges on eyther side if neede should bee) were there slaine, and the ensigne which marched before them, Peter of Birague died being shot in the thigh. There were slaine within about seauen hundred, almost all Laniquenets. The towne being taken, the Castell yeilded by composition.

But this victorie is crossed with a notable losse. The plague was great at Genes, and for this reason the Towne was almost desolate. Andrew Doria embraced this occasion: hee approacheth neere the Towne with some gallies, enters it with small resistance, ruins the Chafselet speditie, and in the end receiues it by a composition made with Theodore Triuulce, being vnfurnished of money and men.

The Genouois being restored to their liberty, raze the Chafselet, establish a new forme of government, name a Councell of foure hundred Cittizens, by whom all the officers and dignities of the Cittie should be chosen: they abrogate the Lawe, whereby all gentlemen were excluded (a good expedient to bannish all partialities) they reserve in their important affaires, the preheminance which Andrew Doria had deserued in recompence of the libertie which hee had purchased for them, whos neyther meddling with the election of their Duke, nor any other magnanimitie, neyther yet with the government of the treasor) made his authoritie lesse full, and this newe policie more pleasing. Afterwards they tooke Sauonne: and the better to hold it in subiection, they ruined the fort, and filled vp the haueu with stones.

The Earle of Saint Paul, relying on the word of some Cittizens, who promised to giue him meanes to surpris the Towne, parted with speed out of the Duchie of Milan, with three thousand foote and some horse to second them: but hauing no profit of victuals, but for foure and twentie houres, and no artillery with him, all turned to smoake, and he retired into Alexandria, to winter the rest of his troups, his Landsquenets being alreadie retired, and the French halfe diminished of their numbers, for want of pay.

The spring being come, the Earle of Saint Paul goes to field with those small troups he could gather together: he takes Mortare, a strong towne well flanked & with double ditches, full of water: Nauare abandoned by Conte Philippin Tormiel, Vigne and almost all other places on this side the riuer of Tessin, yet all this was nothing, seeing the Towne and Castell of Milan, with other chiefe places were in the Emperours power. The Dukes of Vrbis and Milan aduertised, that the French army kept the field, came and ioyned with them at Marignan: yet all these armies vnited were not sufficient to assault Milan, the Venetians hauing not the moitie of twelue thousand men, which they should entertaine by the articles of the League. Moreover Anthony de Leue was newly releued with three thousand Spaniards, which came from Naples. The resolute therefore, that (to cut off the victuals, from the Imperialls,) the French should marche to Biagras, the Venetians to Cassin, and Sforce to Pauia: but the Earle of Saint Paul did wonderfully affect the enterprise of Genes. Andrew Doria was departed the eight of Iune with his gallies, to gard the Emperour who passed into Italie. This absence put the Earle in good hope, that Cesar Fregese (to whom the King had promised the government of Genes) would make the Towne revolt, with some fewe foote.

This was to take a nightie wolfe by the eares, which will bite them freely: they had behind them too vigilant an enemy. According to this desseine, the Earle in steede of Biagras arrives at Landriane, the twentieth of Iune: but in the night a great raine doth to swell the riuer, as hee had no meanes to passe his artillery. Anthony de Leue aduertised of the Earles staie, parts from Milan, overtakes the Earle (who was busie in pulling downe an old house, to haue some peeces of Timber, to put vnder the carriage of a peece, that was all durty and myted) and chargeth him before hee had, in a manner, discovered him.

At the first the Earle forceth the Spanish shot to retire into the battallion of their Germains; and the French Landsquenets had repulst those that had passed a little riuer, which diuided the two armies: but pursuing and following them to the banke, they were greatly annoyed by them that were opposite on the other side. Guy Earle of Rangon, had in the morning taken the way to Pauia with the upon Genes.

Aforeward, so as hee had no notice of the fight, vntill it was past time to succour them. John Thomas of Galere and the Castellan of Laude, Colonells of Italian foote were alreadie well advanced: and leauing them engaged that were desirous to fight, they retire on the one side and saue themselves likewise in Pauia. John Ierosme of Castillon and Claude of Rangon, Commanders ouer two thousand Italians, performed wonders. But the Imperial horsemen, hauing passed the riuer with a great battallion of Germains, our Italians turne their backs, our Landsquenets yeeld to their Countrymen: the Earle and Annebault with those fewe horsemen which remayned, made the retreat, alwayes turning their faces to the enemy, vntill they were stayed by a brooke, which the Earle was not able to passe, through the weakenesse of his horse: where as hee and almost all that followed him were put to the sword, or prisoners, except Annebault and some fewe Lances, which leaped ouer the ditch: the footemen were all defeated, the artillery lost, and the baggage taken.

After all these stormes, and confusions: after so many fatall swears caused by the weight of their armes: was it not nowe time to take breath? The Alpes and high pointed Pyrene mountaines, bee they not sufficient barres to restrain vs within our bounds, content to enioy and defend that which belongs vnto vs? was not so much blood spilt sufficient to make all Italie dronke? Such pittifull spectacles of French mens boanes, where-with the plaines of the estates of Milan and Naples were made white, had they not force, and vertue, to take from vs all future desire to beare armes in such mortal conquests? Without doubt they had reason to make this complaint, with the ancient Church: All our remains haue opened their mouthes vpon vs, they haue hissed, gnashed their teeth and sayd: we haue confounded them, this is the day which we expected: we haue found it, wee haue seene it. And with the like repentance to crie: Remember O Lord what hath chanced vnto vs, behold and see our reproches. Turne vs vnto thee O Lord, & we shall be turned. Behold now the pittifull relikes of our Frenchmen, hatefull to strangers, scorned of all the world, beaten on all sides, returning home with their shirts tied vpon their shoulders, who hauing scarce breathed foure yeares, wee shall so againe fall to armes.

This vnfortunate successe of our men, hauing caused armes to cease, in a manner throughout all Italie, the Emperour and Pope, both being bare of money, treated of some articles of peace. The Emperour had no inclination therevnto: yet hee could not graunt it in a season more beneficiall for himselfe. The King sought it: two notable afflictions drew him therevnto, the imprisonment of his children, and the ruine of so many armies, with the wasting of his treasor. But one especiall consideration did moue him.

If the confederats had discovered his intent, they would haue prevented him, and by their agreement with the Emperour excluded him from League with any of them: and by consequence haue brought him to that point, as hee should haue bene forced to accept farre lesse tollerable conditions of peace. Louyse the Kings mother, & Marquerite, Aunty vnto the Emperour by the Fathers side, did treat it at Cambray, furnished with authoritie and Councell from both their maiesties, and finally they concluded: That the King should paie two millions of gold, for the freedome of his Children: that is, twelue hundred thousand crownes, when as the sayd Children should bee in France and at liberty: hee should deliuer the lands which Marie of Luxembourg, mother to the Duke of Vendresine had in Flanders, Arthois, Brabant and Hainault, and those which the Duke of Montpensier, cousin germaine to the sayd Duke did possesse in the sayd Countreies, for foure hundred thousand crownes, to bee redeemed within a certaine time: And for the other foure hundred thousand remayning, hee should acquite the Emperour of so much to the King of England, which hee had lent vnto him, and fiftie thousand more which the Emperour did owe vnto the English, for the indemnitie of the marriage, betwixt the Emperour and Marie Daughter to the sayd King of England, whome hee had left, to marry with the Daughter of Portugall. Moreover hee should vngage the Count de Lis of gold, inriched with pretious stones, and a peece of the crosse which Philip the Emperours

Cambray be-

French King.

1529. Father had ingaged to the King of Englandes Father, for fiftie thousand Crownes. That the King should renounce the Soueraintie of Flanders and Arthois. That he should marrie with Eleonor the Emperours sister: and if they had a sonne, he should haue the Duchy of Bourgogne. That he should restore whatsoeuer hee possessed in the Duchie of Milan, and the Realme of Naples. That he should disanull the Duke of Bourbons proces, restore him to his honour, and his Childre to their inheritance, and generally to all others that had bene spoiled by reason of the warres. These articles thus coloured, were read and published in the great Church of Cambray, the 5. day of August. But could the King renounce such pretensions, seeing they were inheritances, purchased to the infants of France by the succession of Claude their mother, daughter to Lewis the 12. Duke of Orleans, of whome depended the sayd succession of Milan.

This treatie did greatly moue the confederats, for that they were not acquainted with it, especially the King of England: notwithstanding his secret desseins, made him to temper his choller. He ment to put away Catherine his wife, Aunte to the Emperour, and daughter to Ferdinand King of Spaine, saying, as it was true, that she had bene before married to his eldest brother, wherewith the Pope could not dispence, belonging to the Lawe of God: which conclusion hee obteyned by the means of the Lord of Langcy, in the vniuersities of Paris, Padua, Bologna and others. The Emperour and his ministers, cross him in this desire. This quarrell had neede of a strong support. To make vse of the Kings fauour at neede, hee lent him the sayd summe of foure hundred thousand Crownes, to bee paid in five yeares: hee lent him fiftie thousand Crownes, and gaue the flower de Lis to his good sonne Henry Duke of Orleans.

The tenth of May was come, when as the deputies should meete at Bayonne, for the exchange of the Infants of France, with the paiement of their ranfome. Montmorency, Lord Steward and Marshall of France, came for the King; for the Emperour came Felasque Constable of Castille: the Crownes are told and put to the proofe: but being found somewhat altered by the aduice of the Chancellor du Prat, who thought to make it a benefite to the King, fortie thousand Crownes more payed the interest of the whole summe.

The Kings children and their ranfome payed.

There were about foure monethes spent in the trial of these Crownes: and in the beginning of Iulie, the Dauphin of France and the Duke of Orleans, came to the river which runnes by the walls of Fontenay, and diuides France from Biscaye. A great boate was fastened in the midst of the streame, with anchors and cables, that the sea, which flowes twice a day, rayfing the boate to the height of the water, might serue as a bridge: and ouerthwart this great boate, they made a barre, to the ende that the boate which carried the Infants of France, and that which brought the money for their ranfome, being fastened on eyther side the great boate, the French men should passe into that, where the Infants were, and the Spaniards where the ranfome was. Thus it was performed, and they came accompanied with Queene Eleonor, to meete the King their Father betwixt Roquefort of Marsan, and Capricieux, in a little Abbie of Nunnes, where the King and Queene were espoused, an houre before day. Then taking their way by Bourdeaux, Cognac, Amboise and Blois, they came to Saint Germain in Laye, attending the preparatiues for the Queenes coronation at Saint Denis, and her entrie into Paris.

The Emperour beeing thus assured of the King, who aboue all others might crosse his desseins, he is nowe resolved to bee crowned. To this effect, hee must winne the Pope (for he must receiue the Crowne from him): and the Pope who desired some notable reuenge of the Florentines, for the iniurie they had done him during his captiuitie vnder the Imperials (they had spoyled all the goods belonging to the Medeis, and chased them and their adherents out of the estate of Florence) was easily drawne to the Emperours will; yea with such extraordinarie priuileges, as the Emperour fitting himselfe to the Popes passions, settled the foundation of

of that admirable greatnesse, which his house doth at this present inioy in Italie. The Pope hauing graunted the Crowne to the Emperour, which hee could neuer obtaine of his Predecessor Iulius: vpon condition, that for recompence thereof, he should succour him with an armie, to restore them of his name, to their ancient authoritie within Florence, he imbarques at Barcellone, lands at Genes, passeth to Plaisance, and at the Popes request, restores Francis Sforce to the Duchie of Milan: but he reserves in his owne power, the Castles of Milan and Cremona: hee marrieth the sayd Sforce with his Neece, Daughter to the King of Denmarke, a prisoner, and dispossessed of his realme: and on Saint Mathias day (so famous for his Natinitie, and the taking of the King before Pavia) hee receiued the ornaments of the Imperiall dignitie from the Pope.

One scruple withheld the Emperour from resolving against the Florentines. The Turke besieged Vienna in Austria, with two hundred and fiftie Scwerentie thousand fighting men: but the valour of Philip Count Palatin, the Earles of Salme and Rokendolf, and the succours brought by Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, and King of Hongarie, hauing forced the Infidels to take their way to Constantinople, with shame and losse: the Emperour gaue the charge of this warre to the Prince of Anranches, who ioyning with Don Ferdinand of Gonzague, and the Marquis of Guast, takes from the Florentines, Cortone, Arezzo, Laffre, Pistoia, Prato, Volterra, Empoli, campos before Florence, and reduceth the Citizens to extremitie: but as he marched to encounter some forces that came to succour the besieged, meaning to winne the horse, or to loose the saddle: he was slaine in the charge being in the head of his troups, performing (saith the Originall) rather the office of a man at armes, then of a Captaine.

The Prince of Anranches slaine.

The succours notwithstanding overcome, the Florentines after a long and painfull siege of eleuen moneths, fell in the end into the popes power: who by many and hardly punishments of death and banishment, did so weaken the Cittie, as in the end (the power of the Medeis being more free,) they haue settled the Soueraignie in either family. The Duke of Ferrara had in time purchased fauour with the Emperour: and happy was hee, for without it they would haue clipt his wings shorter. Wherewith the pope was so greatly moued, as hee would not ratifie the sentence, by the which the Emperour had condemned the Ferrarois in a hundred thousand Crownes to the Pope: neither would hee accept the money, nor the rent, which according to the ancient custome, the sayd Duke caused to bee offered vnto him, at the feast of Saint Peter following: and euen then began to studie how hee might secretly oppresse or greeue the Duke by ambush, or finde some matter or occasion to wrong him openly, with the ayde of great princes. But hee did not foresee, that death would soone cut off the thred of his life, and interre with him the issue of his desseins.

The present estate of things, promised in shew a generall peace betwixt these two great princes, but their mindes were possessed: That of our Francis, with a wonderful desire to bee reneged, for the rigorous conditions of the treatie of Cambray, being forced to renounce the Soueraignies of Flanders and Arthois, ancient members of the Crowne of France, and to quitte his rights to the estates of Milan and Naples, the which had wonderfully discontented him. That of Charles, who feared least the King or his successors, should draw those prouinces within the bounds of the realme, and by the recouerie of the Duchie of Milan, molest him continually in the possession of Naples and Sicile. To exclude the King from all hope, the Emperour thought it best to restore Sforce to the estate of Milan, that hee might rule him at his will and pleasure: and for a time, giue good contentment to the Potentates and Commonalties of Italy, to sequester them from the allyance of France, and make them enter into a defensive League for the sayd Sforce: the first motiue or occasion, which within fewe yeares shall transport our Armes beyond the mountaynes. There were diuers others which toucht as neere. Sauege lyes vpon the way or passage from France to Lombardie. Therefore, for to laye a strong barre before the King, if he should reuue his ancient quarrels, and pretensions: the Emperor sold to Charles Duke of Sauoy, the Countie of Ast, with the appertenance, being the ancient patrimonie of the house of Orleans, to tie him to his command, & to draw him to this league, as having now a priuat interest in the warres of Lombardie. Moreover he employed the mediation of the said Duke, to withdraw the Suisses, and Crisons, from the Kings friendship, to his. These were new motives, of new troubles: and at one enemy, he had two: they all had priuie persuaders, who desirous of new broyles, anchored the hope of their priuate affaires, vpon the generall troubles of Christendome.

Causes of the Kings discontent.

A scarre scratched too hard, breakes forth easily: a noble courage wronged, doth with like facilitie feele an outrage. Here wee obserue a publike prejudice done to the Crowne, and a priuat contempt to the Kings person. A notable wrong, cutting it from the soueraintie, two rich neighbour Prouinces. A contempt, for that wee see Sforce issued from a meane stocke, and the sonne of a bastard, (often times termed by the Emperours owne mouth, a traitor, and periured) preferred before the King, brother in law to the said Emperour, and his Maiesties children, whom no iustitie, but only force of armes could exclude. Let vs adde hereunto a third sting, sufficient to animate any generous mind: vnder a colour pretended, that they sought to flatter the Infants of France secretly, out of prison, the Emperour had put most of their officers into the galleies: and although he had bene often summoned by the King, by vertue of the treatie of Cambray, yet would hee neuer enlarge them. Let the Iudicious reader Iudge, which of these two did first infringe the articles of the sayd treatie.

Cunning practises.

But the vicers of precedent warres, being not yet well cured, and the King calling to mind the calamities to come, they dissuaded him from taking armes. It was better to trie a friendly course, and seeke to recouer his owne by money, rather than by force. With this dessein hee sends Rabodenges to the Emperour. The Regent and Queene, assist and labour for an enteruue, betwixt the Emperour, and the King. The Emperour aduertiseth the Pope, and doth assure him, that whatsoeuer hee treats with the King, he will conclude nothing with him, to bring him into ialousie. The Pope dares not belie vpon this promise: hee complains of the King, that without his priuie such practises are managed. The King excuseth himselfe, alleaging, that they were not so farre forward, as it deserued to be lightly imparted to his holynes: notwithstanding, hee surceaseth the sayd practises, and the death of Louise the Kings mother and Regent, chancing the 22. of September, did quite dissolve them.

The Regent of France died

There are other matters, which shall hereafter import. The Emperour sought to force the Princes, and other estates of the Empire, to receiue Ferdinand his brother for King of the Romaines, making them to allow of the election made of him, to the preiudice of the golden Bull, and contrary to the ancient orders of the said Empire. A leuie, which shall cause the ciuill warres, that hereafter shall afflict Germany. Moreover, these Princes pretended, that the Emperour failed in the performance of many things promised by him, touching the rights, priuileges, and liberties of the Empire. So as John, Elector and Duke of Saxony, John Frederise his sonne, William and Lewis Dukes of Bauerie, Philip Landgrau of Hessen, with many other Princes, make a generall league, for the foresaid causes.

A league of the Princes of Germany against the Emperour.

And now seeing the King discontented, that the Emperour had newly discovered vnto the Pope the treatie of their enteruue, mediated by the Ladies, & that the King had many & lawfull occasions, to giue eare to the perswasions which were made often vnto him, that the Emperour did but seeke to lull him a sleepe, while that he did fortifie himselfe, with men, money, and alliances: they incited the King, to enter into their association, by vertue of an ancient league, obserued long before, betwixt the Empire, and the Crowne of France: they send him an authentick copie of their treatie, that he might know, their intention was not to make any inuasion, but for the defence of the Empire; the which they did foresee, that Charles the first did seeke to subuert; and to make it hereditarie to his house, to the great preiudice of the neighbour Princes

Princes greatly troubled with the Emperours exceeding ambition, and inuious outrages 1532.

The King to giue two stroaks with one stone, imparts this matter to the King of England, his perpetuall Alier: asketh his aduice, and counsell, how they two together might enter into this League, without breach of the treaties they had with the Emperour: and in the end, by Pommeraye his Ambassador, he doth capitulate: That the King of England, being assailed by the Emperour, he should succour him with twelve shippes, well appointed, and victualled, with five hundred men at armes, French, and three thousand foot. And in like case, if the King were inuaded within his Realme, the King of England was bound to furnish him the like proportion of shipping, and with sixe thousand English men, both the one and the other to be entertained at his charge that was assailed. That either of them being assailed, should stay all marchants, that were subiect to him that did assaile, that should be found within the territories of their obedience, and deliuer them to him that was assailed, to redeeme such as had bene seized on by the aggressor, in the beginning of the war. That neither the one, nor the other Prince, should hereafter treat or make alliance with any other Prince, Potentate, or Comonaltie, without the consent, and association of either of them.

A League.

And they treated likewise, of the meanes how they might best vndertake to resist the Turke (if hee did persist to inuade Christendome): wherevpon their Maiesties concluded an enteruue at Bologne: the 28. of October, they made a new treatie: That to giue more perfect prooue of their zeale, and desire to enlarge Christendome, and to summon other Princes by their example, considering that the Turke, notwithstanding his great power, had left a good part of his forces in Hongarie, they should assemble together, by their own forces, an armie of four score thousand men, whereof there should be tenne thousand horse, with artillerie requisite for the said Campe.

Enteruue of the two kings

And besides this treatie, these two Kings had many causes of discontent: Our King found himselfe grieuouly wronged, for that the Pope, and the Emperour with their partisans, had newly made a League for the defence of Italie, whereof they had declared Anthony de Lene to be generall. The King of England had no lesse cause to complaine of the wrong, he sayd the Court of Rome did him, touching the matter of his divorce, seeking to force him, either to go to prison to Rome, for to send thence, with expresse deputation, men of great account that should stand to the Popes Iudgement.

An insolent proceeding in like cases, chanced among soueraine Princes: seeing that such a businesse of that importance, and touching the conscience so neere, did well deserue, that according to the vsuall custome, they should send Iudges to the place: it being reasonable, that the persons should speake personally, and not by their Attorneys: and very vnreasonable, that a Soueraine Prince, leauing the internal government of his estates, should goe and plead his cause at Rome. Moreover hee did complaine vnto the King, of the exactions of the Romaine Church, vpon the clergie, and people of England, and did instantly require, that they two should send their Ambassadors ioynly together to the Pope, to summon him to appeare at the next Councell, for to heare the extortions hee did vnto Princes, and Christian people.

The King propounded like abuses. The Pope had dissembled with him touching certaine tithes which hee had graunted him to leuie vpon the Clergie: and the French Church complained of him, of the vniuersall and new exactions, which vnder colour of pietie they made at Rome, for the expedition of Bulls, by means whereof all the treator was daily carried out of his Realme, to the preiudice of the Clergie, which grew poore: the Churches were not restored, nor the poore clothed nor fedd: their yeerely rents were excessive, no equalitie in them, many offices newly created, which were payd vpon the dispatch and expedition of Bulls,ouer and aboue the iust price which they were wont in former time to pay: the offices which fell voyd, were sold to the great benefit and profit of Saint Peter, entertayning 1532. excommunicating many gromes, Chamberlaines, Protonotaries their seruants, Gardners and others: and for the repairing of Saint Peters Church, a great summe of money was leuied, the which they did afterwards employ, to make warre against the King. Yet the King would neither wholly allow, nor disallow of the King of Englands complaints: but for that the Pope had sent him a promise, by the Cardinall of Grandmont, of an interview at Nice or Auignon, after the Emperours returne into Spaine, he requested the King of England to attend the issue of their parole.

The Duchie of Brittany incorporate to the Crowne.

These griefes of the French Church, had bene presented vnto the King in the assembly of the Estates of the Countrey and Duchie of Brittaine, with many other things, farre from that charitie which ought to be in the Church. In the said Estates it was concluded: That Francis the Kings eldest sonne, Daulphin of Viennois, should be acknowledged Duke of Brittaine: that the eldest sonne of France, should hereafter carrie the titles of Daulphin of Viennois, and Duke of Brittanie: and the said Duchie should for ever be incorporate to the Crowne. So the treatie made by the marriage betwixt King Charles the 8. and Anne Duchesse of Brittanie, and others following, were disannulled in regarde of the said Duchie.

A treatie betwixt the King and the Princes of Germany.

As these things passed in England, William of Bellay, Lord of Lancey, promised the Germane Princes in the Kings name, That for the affection he bare to the preservation of the priuileges, rights, and customes of the Empire: if the Emperour whom he desired to obserue inuolably the alliances and treaties he had with him, would in that case employ his forces to their oppression, he would succour them with all his power: so as neither his men nor money, should not be employed to the offence of any of his confederates, namely of the Emperour, but onely to defend the rights & priuileges of the Empire. A great desseine is alwayes shadowed with goodly shewes.

The Kings of France and England complained of the Pope.

Hereupon the Emperour came to Bologne, to conferre againe with the Pope. The Kings of France and England, well informed of the Emperours bad disposition, and especially the English, of the Popes to him, by reason of his pretended diuorce: they sent the Cardinals of Tournon & Grandmont, the Popes seruants, that vnder colour to accompanie him at this interview, they might employ their authorities, that nothing might be done to the preiudice of their Maesties: or at the least they should giue intelligence of their conclusions. And the sayd Cardinals had commission to lay open vnto the Pope, the griefes and complaints of the two Kings: and to summon him to make reparation: if not, they would take order for it. So as his Holynesie might well perceiue, that they two together were not to be contented: and to with him to consider wisely, of the support and profit he might draw from these two Kings, and what disgrace otherwise in discontenting them, especially the King of England, whose cause the King did no lesse affect then his owne. For (sayd these two Princes) if we come to demand a generall counsell, and his Holynesie doth not grant it, or delays it, we shall take his delay for a deniall, and calling it without him, we will easily iustifie the fact with other Princes, who producing the like, or greater complaints, would in the end, forbid their subiects to send or carrie any money to Rome. If his Holynesie (for so did our Francis protest) will proceed by censures against me and my realme, and that I be forced to go to Rome for an absolution, I will passe the Alpes, so well accompanied, as his Holynesie shall be glad to grant it me. The scandales of Rome haue already withdrawn most part of Germanie, and the Cantons, from the obedience of the Romaine Church. It is to be feared, that if these two mightie Kings seuer themselves for want of iustice, they shall finde many adherents, and these two, together with their open and secret allyes, may make such an attempt, as it will be hard to resist. That if the holy father be disposed to moderate things (especially towards the King of England) there is hope, that at the first interview, all may be ordered by mildnesse, before they should proceed to greater bitterness, by a generall summons from both the Kings.

Thus the King spake vnto those Cardinals whom he sent to Rome. But we haue elsewhere obserued, that men of the Church do commonly prefer the Popes respect, before 1533. A before the seruice of such as employ them. These flea the Ecce by the tale, and in freed of following their instructions from point to point, beginning with rigour, and ending with mildnesse: they take a contrary courle. They feared (sayd they in their justification) that his Holynesie holding the Wolfe by the eares, pressed on the one side, sometimes with promises, sometimes with threats by the Emperour: and on the other side, in a maner despairing euer to finde grace or fauour with the King, should in the end cast himselfe into the Emperours armes, and runne the same fortune with him. To draw him therefore to the French party, they offer the Pope in the Kings name: To make him Iudge and Arbitrator, of such controuersies and quarrels, as hee had with the Genouois, the which his Maestie pretended were not contained in his renunciation. And the better to draw him, they renewed (without any speciall commission,) the proposition first made by Pope Leo, and after requied by Clement, of the marriage of Henry Duke of Orleanse, with Katherine Daughter to the Duke of Urbain. This did greatly please Clement, who then began to hold vp his head, and resolved to like whilst the Yron was hote. This match was wonderfull honourable and beneficiall for his Holynesie, and helpt much for the ratifying and support of his house, the which he had in singular regard.

The Cardinals meanes to win the Pope.

The Emperour did presently discover, that vpon the comming of these Cardinals, the Popes affection to him was greatly altered. And vpon the first discouerie of this treatie of marriage, hee employes the Lordes of Cannes and Granuelle, to breake in fauour of Francis Sforce, with the sayd Duchesse of Urbain, and to perswade the Pope that his practises was artificially brought in by the King, to entertaine him onely, but not with any intent to conclude it, considering the great disparitie of their degrees and qualities: and seeing the two Cardinals (said he) had no sufficient authority touching this allyance, it was an euident prooue of the fraude. But by meanes of this marriage, the King thought to strengthen his house, and to get new footing in Italie: and the Pope did thereby free himselfe from the feare of a Councell, where-with he was threatened from France, Germanie and England. While the Cardinals attended a Commission from his Maestie, to conclude this marriage, the Emperour continued his pursuite, for the assurance and declaration of his league, comprehending the estate of Genes. And the better to vnite it, he required his confederates, to make a tax among them, for the pay of such Souldiars as should be fitte to entertaine in Italie, for the peace and quiet thereof: that the first payment should bee presently assigned into the hands of a Banker of Genes, and that the Emperour should not be tied to any contribution, in regard of his great charge to resist the Turkes inuasion, and to prevent the attempts of such as would trouble the common quiet of Italy, whereof there was now great likelihood.

By the force of his perswasions, the matter was in a maner concluded. But through the liuely reasons of the French Cardinals, and the Lord of Velly, Ambassador for the King, shewing, That the Emperour had no other desseine, but to entertaine his armie E vpon the frontiers of Italie, at other mens charges, being ready to assaile the King vpon all occasions, without any charge to himselfe: and that without doubt the Kings, (hauing reason to looke to his affaires,) would incounter him with another armie, on the frontiers of Italy, in the Marquisate of Salusse, or in Daulphiné, which would breed no quiet, but troubles and combustions throughout all Italy (for two armies being nere, they willingly fall to blowes,) they concluded, not to make any confignation, but that euery one of the confederates, should taxe himselfe for his portion (any warre chancing in Italy) and should giue a caution for his part, the which did amount to a hundred or sixe score thousand Crownes a moneth. So the Emperour sent three thousand men out of his Armie into Spaine, as many likewise to Naples, and the rest he dismissed.

Then came authority from the King, to the Cardinals & his Ambassador, with an expresse clause for the confirmation of the marriage. And the Emperour seeing himselfe frustrate of his intent (to make the Pope declare himselfe openly against the King, 1533. King,) he imbarke the 8. of Aprill at Genes, and sailed towards Spain. the Pope, etc. towards Rome, whether the aboue named Cardinals did accompanie him, alwaye assisting by the Kings importunitie, that the troubles of England might be pacified, before the fall of that great storme which threatned the Churches.

But the King of England, wearied with the Popes dissembling and delays (whom he then called but Bishop of Rome) vpon the matter of his diuorice, he caused it to be decided by the English Church. The Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Primate of England, being president: where, by sentence of the said Church, his marriage was declared void, and the dispensation void, as giuen in a case that was not dispensable, and which is not in the Popes power, nor in the Churches. According to this sentence, he left his first marriage, and tooke to wife Anne Bullen, and in her name did publish an ample Treatie, against the authoritie and preheminiences of the Church of Rome, resolute to sequester himselfe wholly, if the Court of Rome did him not iustice. These newes being published, the Emperour growes in choller, threatens to raise all the world against England: takes his Aunts cause in hand, summons the Pope to administer the like iustice to her that was put away, as her cause required: if hee doth not, he protests with an oath to be reuenged. The Colledge of Cardinals stonies, they enuiron the Pope, and all with one voyce, demand iustice against the attempt of the King of England, and the Archbishops, hauing taken knowledge of a cause, the deciding whereof belonged to Iudges deputed by his Holiness.

His Holynesse desired to temporise, and to make a more quiet end. He did foresee, that proceeding to condemnation, and hauing no meanes to execute it really, were a fruitlesse enterprize, and would make his Apostolick authoritie contemptible, having no meanes to put it in execution without the Emperours assistance: besides, they had a great let, which was the strict alliance of the most Christian King with the Emperour, who joining their mutuall forces, offensive and defensive, might ingage all Christendome in more mortall warres then euer. Notwithstanding, in the end (as well to gratifie the Emperour as his Cardinals,) he pronounced his censures against the King of England, if within a certaine time he made not reparation of the sayd attempts. Then he prepared for his interview with the King, notwithstanding all the crosses which the Imperials gaue him, transforming themselves into as many shapes as Protes, to draw him from this resolution: all which are to be read in the Originalls.

Nice had bene appointed for this effect: the Duke of Savoie had freely offered it at the Popes request, holding himselfe happy (sayd he) that so holy a worke should be treated off in his countrie. And in truth it was his best course. The Pope did wish this place, that he might by this meanes reconcile the Duke vnto the King, whose many respects (as we shall note hereafter) was discontented with him. But the Emperour, forgetting nothing which he thought might serue to breake off this interview, gaue him such goodly reasons, as afterwards he let men vnderstand, that this assembly was nothing pleasing vnto him. Marsilles supplied the defect of Nice. Patience being moued (saith the Prouerbe) turnes into furie. If the King to this time had manie motives of discontent, now is he prickt to the quick, which will soone draw him to reuenge. The vniuall death of the Seigneur of Merueilles, who was a Gentleman of Milanois, bred vp in Court, since King Lewis the 12. one of the Quirries: and now Ambassadour for the King with Sforce Duke of Milan, yet secretly, hauing besides his instructions and letters of credit, a priuate letter directed to the Duke, in recommendation of some businesse for the sayd Merueilles: to the end, that if the Emperour should grow ialous of the Duke, he might by meanes of the sayd letters, iustifie his being there, not in qualitie of an Ambassadour, but onely for his owne priuate affaires. It chanced, the first of Iuly, that Merueilles accompanying the Duke through the City, a Gentleman Milanois of the house of Castiglione, (hauing eyther by chance, or of purpose, pickt a quarrell) demanded of one of Merueilles seruants, to whom he belonged, he answered: I serue the Lord of Merueilles of France, who is there. Nay replied Castiglione, Merueilles of the gallows: which was a very ignominious word. Another follow-

Following his Lord, takes hold of this speech, and in the end, reprocheed the Milanois, saying spoken ill against such a personage: the Milanois denies it: the lie is giuen on either side, and the French man offers to maintayne it with his sword. Castiglione happily displaying a man of baser qualitie then himselfe, retires two of his seruants draw their swords, but they are parted. Afterwards Castiglione gathers together ten or twelue men, with largiebuzes and pertuisans: he passeth and repasseth often before Merueilles lodging, once enuening he meetes five or six of his seruants, offers them violence: but they retire, Merueilles complains to the Capitaine of the Iustice, and intreats him to take order, beeing loath to seeke reuenge of their wrongs, or that they should come to wrong them.

The Capitaine makes no account thereof. Castiglione continues his course, and sets upon Merueilles seruants: but the first feare had made them wise, they defend themselves, kill him, and put his followers to flight. The next day being the 4. of Iuly, the Capitaine goes in the morning, to take an Inuentarie of Merueilles goods, puts him in prison, & all his seruants he could find: giues the strapadoe to one about foure score years old being deafe for very age, to wrest some confession from him against his master: hee suffers not any of his friends to speake with him, or to see him: teares in tears, disdayning to reade the iustifications (which according to the custome of Milanois one of his friends had presented him in writing) and the Sunday following, after midnight, first informed of the Dukes pleasure, hee cuts off his head in prison, and commands body to be cast vpon the marchants meeting place. A horrible and insolent proceeding against so notable a person, being publike, sacred & inuolable! If it shalbe lawful to violate the lawes of nations, what safetie shall Ambassadors finde with them whom they are sent?

The King demands satisfaction of this wrong of the Duke: he writes to the Emperour to all Princes and Potentats of Christendome, as having all a priuate interest in this publike iniurie. The Duke excuseth himselfe by Francis Tauerne his Councillor, Nephewe to the sayd Merueilles, who alledgeth, that the Duke his master did neuer acknowledge Merueilles to haue the place, nor to hold the place of an Ambassadour: but as a priuate man, his vassall and subiect, hee had suffered iustice to be done, for the murder committed on the person of one of the chief gentlemen of his house. That Merueilles was a man of a vicious conversation, seditious, scandalous, a concealer of murderers and conspirators against the life of the Duke his master, who for these causes had often let him vnderstand that his stay at Milan was not pleasing vnto him.

A yong Nephew (hee was sonne to Merueilles sister) and a bad Aduocate for the cause. Had not Sforce belied himselfe in a letter of his owne, dated the twentieth of december 1532. whereof the King had the Originall, where hee giue him to vnderstand, that his comming from the most Christian King, to whom hee was, and desired to be a most humble seruant) was very pleasing to him, and that for many respects, he should alwayes haue been welcome to him.

A yong Tauerne bee ignorant of Merueilles qualitie, seeing that hee himselfe had procured this charge for his Vncle, being at Fontainebleau, and propounded this kind of priuate recommendation to the Duke, to serue as a shadowe against the Dukes ialousies? Moreouer hee knewe his Vncle had letters of credit to the Duke, and his instructions signed with the Kings hand. But the haste proceeding from Monday to Sunday, following the execution done by night and without the peoples priuie (who perchance would tumultuously haue opposed, fearing to incite the reuenge, which without doubt the King would take) do they not plainly discover that the fact was not excusable, nor to be iustified?

The Emperour made answer to the Ambassadour de Velly, that Merueilles had well deserved death, not beeing acknowledged for an Ambassadour, but for a priuate gentleman

Thinking him selfe more assured of Sforce, hee sent into Flanders for his neece, the daughter of Christierne King of Denmarke, according to the promise which had been made him at Plaisance.

A new interview between the PoPe & King.

About this time the Pope made his entrie at Marseilles in great pompe, where a young Assie: he was carried in a high chaire, vpon two mens shoulders, follow'd by his Cardinals, and the Duchesse of Vrbain apart, accompanied with a great number of Ladies and Gentlemen. There was nothing ready for a counsell, which the Prince of Germanie did solicit with great vehemencie: neither was there any intent of reformation. But expecting the oportunitie of this generall conuocation, a Bull was sent forth to stay the course of religion, which passing from Germanie into Switzerland, and from thence into France, did greatly multiply. Then the marriage betwixt the Duke of Orleans, and Katherine de Medicis Duchesse of Vrbain, was consummated by Clement the 7. her Vncle: who in the end of their parlee, at the Kings request, created foure Cardinals, the Cardinall of Veneur, Bishop of Lisieux, and chiefe Almoner to the King, one borne of those three notable houses, Chastillon, Chambre and Guise. This done, the Pope imbarke for Rome, the 20. of Nouember, and the King to his way to Auignon.

Here the King resolued in his priuie Counsell vpon a request made vnto him, as well by Christopher, sonne to the Duke of Wirtemberg, both in his owne name, and his fathers, spoiled of their estates seuenteen yeares since, by the Emperour Charles, and Ferdinand his brother: as also by Lewis and William Dukes of Bauier his Vncles. The mother of Christopher, was Daughter of a sister to Maximilian, Grand-father to the sayd Emperour, and King of Romaines, and the consummation of the marriage of Eleonor their sister, with his Maiestie, gaue the Father and the sonne hope, that the King in fauour of this alliance, interposing his authoritie for them that were spoiled, should eether procure restitution of Ferdinand for these Dukes, or refusing lustice, to purchase him the hatred of all Germanie, which in the end might by open force dispossesse him of the Duchie of Wirtemberg, and of the name of King of the Romans.

The King did greatly desire to see these Dukes restored to their estates, and that end would willingly haue opened his purse, to weaken the Emperours and his brothers forces, and by the same meanes, to confirme the amities which he had purchased in Germanie, and to procure new, requiting the Emperour, who sought by all meanes to take from the King his ancient alliances. But hee sought to collect the protection of these afflicted Princes in such sort, as no man might iustly chafe at him to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. Hee therefore sent the Lord of Langey, with commission to do for these Dukes whatsoever were in his power, not directly contradicting the conuentions: and to conclude, the confiscation of a hundred thousand Crownes, into the hands of the Dukes of Bauier, with a sufficient bond to his Maiestie, reseruing notwithstanding this clause: That his money should not be applied to the inuasion of any one, but onely for the defence of the ancient customes and priuileges of the Empire. The publike and private perswasions of Langey, were of such efficacy, that ancient and great League of Suene (which had continued three score and ten yeares, to the benefit of the house of Austria) was dissanulled. But for that the integration of these Dukes, could not bee made but by armes, they couered it with this expedient. That the Duke of Wirtemberg should sell the Countie of Montbelliard (whereof he was Lord) vnto the King, for six score thousand Crownes, vpon condition that he might redeeme it: which money he might employ to his use, either in peace or war, without any reach on the Kings part, to the articles of Cambray. So the Landgraue of Hessen, chiefe of this present League, and the Dukes of Bauier and Wirtemberg, with their allies, went suddenly to field with an armie, before the Emperour or his brother could crosse their attempts, restoring

A restoring them that were spoiled, to the possession of their Duchie: and soone after they repayed the Kings money, within thirtie or fortie thousand Crownes, for the which the Dukes of Bauier were answerable: and the Countie of Montbelliard was restored vnto them. Let vs now see what catastrophe the Popes rashe sentence giuen against Henry King of England, shall cause.

Henry was wonderfully incensed against the Apostolick See, by reason of the iniustice (he said) was done him, in that they had refused to send him commissioners to take knowledge of his cause, and of the contempt done to his authoritie, in that they would disdainfully force him to abandon his realme, and appeare personally at Rome. Notwithstanding, by the perswasions of Iohn du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, (whom the King had sent vnto him, presently after his interview with the Pope) hee granted, that in case the Pope would surcease from the sayd sentence, vntill he had sent Iudges to be heard, that he would likewise surcease from his intention, to withdraw himselfe wholly from the obedience of Rome. The Bishop offers himselfe to go to Rome, to that end. Henry increases him, and assures him, that hauing obtained his demand, he will giue him authoritie presently, to confirme what he had yielded vnto. The matter was not yet desperate, but the Consistorie of Rome gaue it about a time to haue an answer from the King of England, as the Poste came short two dayes at his returne. The terme expired, they proceed hastily to the confirmation of the curies and censures, notwithstanding the Bishops instance, to obtaine six dayes delay, seeing the King of England had waiered six yeares before he fell.

Estate of England.

Troubles
through the Popes rash &
hasty proceeding.

Two dayes were scarce past, after the prefixed time, but the poste arriuing, with authoritie and declarations from England, did greatly amaze those hastie Cardinals, who afterwards could finde no meanes to amend that which they had marred. The matter (saith the Originall) was so hastied, as that which could not bee finished in three consistories, was done in one. This indignitie done to the King of England, and the small respect they had to his Maiestie, caused both him and his realme, to shake off the yoke of the Romaine obedience, declaring himselfe immediately vnder God, supreme head of the Church of England.

In the meane time, the King not able to get by Iustice, a reparation of the vnworthy death of his Ambassador at Milan, hee studied to haue his reuenge by armes. To this end, following the example of the Romaines, he erected in euery Prouince of his realme, a Legion of sixe thousand foote, vnder the command of six Gentlemen, who for euery thousand should haue two Lieutenants, and vnder euery Ensigne sixe hundred men, who in time of peace, should once a yeare make a generall muster: and the Captaines should know their names and surnames, with the dwellings of euery one, to haue them ready at all commands. Then he sent William Earle of Fustemberg, into Germanie, to make a leaue of twentie Ensignes of Lansquenets, and demanded passage of the Duke of Sauoy, through his Countrie, to bee reuenged of the wrong done him by the Duke of Milan. The Sauoisien refused it: which causeth our Francis to demand the portion of Louyse of Sauoy his mother, sister to the sayd Duke, children to Philip Duke of Sauoy. Philip had to his first wife a daughter of Bourbon, by whom he had Philibert Duke of Sauoy, and Louyse the Kings mother. Then he had to his second wife, a Daughter of Ponthieure, by whom hee had Charles, who is now in question, and the Earle of Geneua, afterwards Duke of Nemours. Philibert was dead without children, and therefore the King challenged a good portion in the succession of Sauoy, his mother comming of the first venter, and sole heire to the sayd Philibert. But the Kings deputies not able to drawe any reason from Charles, Vncle to his Maiestie, he must seeke that by force, which he could not get by a friendly and amiable composition.

New troubles of waite in Sauoy.

The Kings first stratagem, was to bring a part of Renée de Ceres company into Geneua, to succour them against Charles, who besieged it. The second was to stirre vp the Bernois, allies and neighbours to Geneua: who taking the Towne into their protection, went to field with tenne or twelue thousand men, made the Duke 1535. Duke retire, spoiled him of a good part of the lands that were vnder his obedience, chased away the Bishop of Lanzanna, and ioyning it to their Iurisdiction, they remaine still in possession thereof.

The Emperour returned then from his victorie of Tunis against Barberousse, and seeming desirous to make a more stricter League with the King, hee offered him a pension of a hundred thousand Crownes a yeare, out of the Duchie of Milan, for any one of his Children, whome hee should name: hee treated the marriages of the Dauphin with the Infant of Portugall, Daughter to Queene Eleonor: and of the Duke of Angoulême, with such a one as the King should well like of (it seemed that he ment the Infant of Spainne) to the end that by these newe bonds of coniunction, tying their friendshipes more firmly, they might ioynly participate (sayd hee) in the honour and profit of the mightie conquests, which they should make vpon Greece.

The Emperours dissimulation.

The death of Francis Sforce.

All this was but cunning. The Emperour was tired, and his forces were wasted by the toyles of warre, and the great heat they had endured. And the King being readie with a fresh and mighty armie, threatened the Duchies of Sauoy and Milan: he must therefore busie him with some baite, and at the least stay the exploits of his forces. The death of Francis Sforce, presents a newe occasion. By this death the Emperour pretends to bee freed of that blood, and that he might dispose of this Duchie at his pleasure. The capitaines promise to hold their places of the Emperour. The Emperour giues hope, not onely to dispose of the sayd Duchie to the Kings liking, but also to conclude of a generall warre, against the Turke: in the which he offered to impart with the King, the good or euill that should growe thereby, and of the faithfull reunion of the Church, namely for the reducing of Germanie and England, to the generall beleefe of Christians, and of a generall peace in Christendome. In the meane time he prepared for warre: hee caused Cont Nassau to make a great Leue in Germanie, and called backe Ferdinand Gonzague into Italie, with his Spaniards which remained in Sicilie.

Thus all the negotiations and practises of these two great Princes, gaue sufficient signes of open warre: there wanted nothing but a lawfull occasion for either of them to blame his companion, and to lay vpon him the causes of the first inuasion. The Emperour required moreover, that for the quiet of Italie, the King should desist from the action of Genes. That excluding the Duke of Orleans, from the estate and Duchie of Milan (the which the King demanded for his second sonne, according to the treatie made with the Pope at Asseffilles) the Duke of Angoulême, for that hee was fittest from the Crowne, should be inuested.

That the King should send him the sayd Duke of Orleans, to assist him at the conquest of Alger which he pretended. The King desired greatly to maintayne true friendship with him, and to vnitie it by as strong alliances as the Emperour offered, that the greatnesse of the one might not breed any ialousie in the other. As for the action of Genes, hee was content to surcease that controuersie, vntill it might bee decided by good and lawefull meanes: to renounce for euer his pretensions to Naples, and to cause the sayd Duke of Orleans to yeeld vp his quarrell to Florence and Vrbis, with such security as the Emperour should require: so as his second sonne might be inuested in Milan. He promised the Pope (which was Alexander Farnese, vnder the name of Paul the 3. successor of Clement. 7.) summoning all Princes to that ende, to imploy his forces, to make Germanie and England obey the sentence & decree of the Church, and to imploy himselfe in fauour of the sayd Emperour, to the states and Princes of the Empire, that they should ioynly receiue his brother Ferdinand, for the true and lawfull King of the Romains. Hee offered to succour the Emperour in his holy warre with a certaine number of galleys, and men entertayned, promising to accompanie him the next yeare following, in the voyage of Constantinople, with all his forces.

But to exclude the Duke of Orleans from the enheritance of his Ancestors, which his eldest brother did willingly yeeld vnto him, in fauour of his marriage, to install his youngest sonne: was it not to sowe dissention and cause of warre, betwixt them whom he desired to breed vp in peace and brotherly loue? And to what end did the Emperour demand the Duke of Orleans, but rather to hold him in manner of an hostage, then to make any shew of loue or trust? On the other side, to giue hope, that hee would compound with the King touching Milan, and to vrge this claime vehemently, That all should bee managed without the Popes priuatie, who no doubt would seeke all meanes to crosse it (sayd the Emperour), if he should vnderstand they had treated without imparting it vnto him, and notwithstanding to giue intelligence to the Court of Rome, by Andrew Dorie, and to assure him, that although hee gaue eare to the Kings ministers, yet would he not conclude any thing without the aduise and consent of his Holinesse: was not this a corrupt proceeding, seeking to breed a ialousie and distrust betwixt the Pope and his Maiestie?

The King (weariied with these long dissimulations and delayes, without effect, sent the Lord of Beaunais vnto Venice, to make a new League with the Senate: and the King of England lent the Bishop of Winchester to the same effect. The Emperour had some intelligence thereof: and to crosse the Kings desseins, he sent Du Prat, a Gentleman of his house, to make a new leuie of Lusignets: and Andrew Dorie to Genes, to prepare his armie by sea, but vnder colour of his enterprise of Alger. Who would not then iudge, but in steed of a confirmation of peace and loue, all things tended to open warre? Nothing could detain these inuincible warriors, but that the Emperour, after so great a dissipation of his forces, could not so sodenly repaire his armie, and the King making a scruple to be the first assailant, would not incur the blame, to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. But without breach thereof, many motives of discontent, had long incensed him against the Duke of Sauoy. The Jewels which the Duke had engaged, to borrow money for the Duke of Bourbon, and to fauour his rebellion against the King: the letters of congratulation he had written for his taking at Pania: his puerse to withdraw the Suisses from the alliance of France: the purchase of the Countie of Ass, his refusal to lend Nice, for the interview of Pope Clement and his Maiestie, and to giue him passage against Sforce, the detention of his Mothers inheritance, which the King could not by any amiable meanes drawe his Vnder to restore.

Causes of the Kings dislike with the duke of Sauoy.

This must be tryed by the sword. The King therefore sent Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Paul, who before the Duke could oppose his forces, conquered all Sauoy, except Montmelian, where Francis of Charamont a Neapolitane commanded, who wanting victuals, and without hope of succours, in the end yeelded vp the place, to depart with baggage: and afterwards contemned by the Duke, he followed the victors fortune, & in the end did good seruice to the Crowne. Then the Emperor granted (by the Lord of Cannes and Grannelle) the Duchie of Milan to the Duke of Orleans. But when it came to demand the securitie and conditions of his instalment, they made answer to the Ambassador de Velly, That it was sufficient for that time to haue granted the principall, the rest should be treated of with Philip Chabot Earle of Busançois, Admiral of France, who should presently arriue, (they supposed he should first make a voyage without any forces) and that they must keepe this conclusion secret from the knowledge of his Holynesse. All this discovered plainely, that it was a trick of their ordinary craft and dissembling, to lull the King asleepe in the beginning of his course.

At the same instant, the King hath newes, sufficient to giue him a certaine impressi- on of the Emperours desseins, That the Pope had bene duely aduertised by the Emperours ministers, of all these practises, which hee would haue secretly managed: That the Penetians, at the vrgent request of the Emperour, were entred into a defensiu League for the Duchie of Milan, in fauour of any one hee should choose: That he offered great matters to the King of England, to drawe him to his deuotion: That Du Prat passing by Milan, had deliuered speeches quite contra-

The Emperours practises vnder hand.

1536. rie to the hopes and promises which the Emperour had given: and that in Flanders A he had made great preparation for warre. That the Emperour tooke vpon him the protection of the Duke of Sauoy. And for the sixt point, the preparations made by Andrew Doria. It was therefore resolved, to proceed in Sauoy and farther, without breaking off (on his part) this negotiation with the Emperour.

To this end, the King sent (for his Lieutenant generall) the Earle of Bassano Admirall of France, with eight hundred Launces: whereof the feuerall Captaines were James Galeat, maister of the horse, and maister of the Ordinance of France; Robert Steward Marshall of France; René of Montican, Francis Marquiffe of Salsaffes, Claude of Annabault, Antonie Lord of Montpesat, John d'Effouteville, Lord of Val-lebon Prouost of Paris, Gabriel d'Aligre, Charles Tiercelin Lord of Roche du Maine, B and John Paul de Cere. A thousand light horse, vnder the command of the Lords of Esse, Terme, Aussun, & Verets of Sauoy. Twelve thousand of his Legionarie men, that is a thousand Picards, commanded by Michel of Brabantin, Lord of Cany, and Antonie of Mailly Lord of Auchy. Two thousand Normans, vnder their Captaines La Sale, and Saint Aubin the Hermit. Two thousand Champanois, lead by John d'Anglere Lord of Jour, and by the Lord of Quincy. A thousand of Languedocs, vnder the Knight d' Ambres. Four thousand out of Dauphiné, vnder the Lord of Brejeux, and others. And a thousand vnder the Lord of Forges, the Kings ordinarie Cap- bearer: of all which bands René of Montican was Colonell: sixe thousand Laun- quenets, lead by William Earle of Furtemberg: Two thousand French, not Legio- C naries, lead by their Captaines Lartigue-Dieu, Blanche, Anguar and Warin a Nauarrois. Two thousand Italians, vnder the command of Marc Antoine of Cusan, a Gentleman Milmois, and a thousand vnder Captaine Christopher Gano: eight hundred Pioners, sixe hundred and foure score horse for Artillerie, and the charge thereof appointed to be vnder the government of Claude of Couët Lord of Burie.

Count Philip Torniel, and John Iaques of Medicis Marquis of Marignan, marched before, to stoppe the passage of Suze: but Annabault aduancing with the troupes of Dauphiné, preuented them with speed, chased them before him, from lodging to lodging, and at the first summons, put into the Kings handes the townes D of Turin and Chinus. Don Laurence Emanuel, John Iaques de Medicis, and John Baptista Castaldo, camped vpon the river of Doire. The French and Launquenets, impatient to attend the making of a bridge, waded through the water euen vnto the breasts, repulse the Imperialls, and make them retire towards Verceil. A gallant Legionarie (to whom the Historie ought his name) swimming through the river, brought away a Boate in despite of the enemies shotte, for the building of a Bridge. The Admirall, to encourage the rest according to the Kings command, caused a gold ring to be giuen him, in view of the whole armie.

The Emperour was vpon termes of his departure from Naples, to make his entrie into Rome, when as these happy beginnings made him to renew the treaties of an accord: but with such slow proceeding, as a man might easily iudge, that his onely intent was, to staye the King in his course, labouring to entertaine him with doubts, hopes, and delays. In the meane time, hee sollicited the Pope to declare himselfe on his partie: hee assured the Duke of Sauoy, to cause all hee had lost to be soone restored to him againe: hee hastened the leue of his Launquenets: causeth his horsemen to aduance: drawes Artillerie and Munition out of Imperiall Townes: makes them to march towards Italy: protests againe to the Pope, that he would neuer yeeld Milan to the King, nor suffer him to possesse one foote of land in Italy: hee sollicited the Court of Rome, the Senate of Venice, and all other Potentates of Italy, to oppose against the inuesting of any stranger in the Duchie of Milan. There were F vehement presumptions, to shewe, that the Emperour meant not to treat but armed: which caused the King to commaund his Admirall to proceed in his first course, (he

A (he had temporised by his Mueities commaundement, attending the issue of this new 1536. parle and to march against Verceil: and if hee encountred his enemies with equalitye, to fight with them. There were three thousand men, to defend Verceil, and foure miles of the Leue, Antonie de Leue camped with about six hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot, not as Lieutenant to the Emperour, but as Captaine generall for the League of Italy, cutting off the passage to Cagnin, and Mannibail Gonsague, Guy Earle of Rugon, and some other pensioners to the King, who had brought for his seruice, sixe hundred light horse, choise men, bred vp in the former warres, and sixe thousand foot. The Admirall therefore, to bee assured of Antonie de Leue, demaunds free passage for the foresaid pensioners. I will (answered Leue) giue them assurance, so as they come for the 2 League of Italy. A sufficient answer to begin the warre, whereof the King would by no means be the first author.

During this time, the Emperour made his entrie into Rome. An entrie, which by the ruine (amongst other buildings) of that ancient temple of Peace, gave the most C onspicuous occasion to iudge that his entrie was not with an intent to confirme a peace, into Rome, as hee gaue hope by his speeches, but contrariwise, to deface all memorie thereof. His actions did afterwards confirme many in this opinion, for after Charles his first parle with the Pope, the Bishop of Mascon and Velly Ambassadors for Rome, the one to the Pope, the other to the Emperour, learned from the Popes mouth (who said he would remaine a Neuter, as a common father to maintaine C justice, and yet oppose against the obstinacie of him that would not yeeld to reason,) that the Emperour would neuer condescend, to giue Milan to the Duke of Orleans.

This was the chiefe point: and either partie growing obstinate, vpon the effect of this clause, what accord could bee expected? This holy father was little affected to the house of Medicis, and therefore would hardly haue bene pleased, to see a daughter of that house Duchesse of Milan. To conclude, the Emperour did submit his instalement, to the Popes liking: and the Pope did promise verbally, to yeeld vnto it, if the Emperour would content: yet did hee freely shew, that the Emperour enterrayned this practise of purpose, to abuse the King, which D that hee should fortifie himselfe with alliances, men, and money, and, yet as a were, giuing scope to both parties: I thinke (sayd the Pope to the French Ambassadors, replying that this condition sayling, the King their master would neuer come to any conclusion) that things cannot passe, without a breach. for that the Emperour rather will, nor can giue Milan, without the consent of some, who in my opinion will neuer yeeld.

These were the Venetians, whome the Emperour did coldly intreate, to like of this clause: but in effect to contradict it: and all in generally, would haue no Duke of Orleans, who might at any time, vnite this goodly estate to the Crowne of France. for (said they,) the Duke of Angoulesme being inuested in the Duchie of Milan, although E he depends on the King his father: yet marrying one of the Emperours Neeces, hee offered him the widow of Sforce his wife would be of the Emperours faction, and so matters should remaine in suspence; whereas the Duke of Orleans, besides many other obstacles, must bee onely at the King his fathers deuotion: and as husband to the Neece of Pope Leo, and of Clement, would not cease to pretend an interest in the estates of Florence and Vrbis: and consequently, by new, and pretended quarrels, trouble the quiet of Italy.

In the end, the Emperour in a speech made to the Pope, in the presence of all Cardinals, and many Ambassadors, as well to shew (said hee) his good meaning, and how much hee desired the peace of Christendome, as to hee cleared hereafter, before God and men, hee offered againe three conditions to the King. The first to giue the Duchie of Milan to one of his children, so as thereby hee might confirme a good and durable peace, mainrayning notwithstanding that it could not be, so long as F the 1529. the King continued obstinate in fauour of the Duke, of Orleans. The second was, to A fight with the King, hand to hand with like armes, and hostages, in an Island vpon a bridge or boate, or any other place of safetie, to auoide greater effusion of blood, being reasonable that they, by whome such great combustions did growe, should decide their quarrels in person.

A Spanish
bragge.

But vpon condition, that the victor should giue his forces to the holie Father, to maintayne the celebration of a Councell, to reduce them that were rebelled and sequestred from the Church, and to the suppression of Infidels: and that the vanquished should assist the victor with all his power. Requiring moreover, that this combat chancing, the King should pawne the Duchie of Bourgogne, and the Emperour that of Milan, both to be adiudged to the victor. The third was, a protestation neuer to take B armes, but forced, foreseeing that the war would be so cruell, as the victorie would be of small profit to the victor, and should but open a passage to the common enemy of our faith. And to conclude, hee added, that what hee had propounded touching a peace, proceeded not from any feare, hauing neuer sought peace in losse, but could well giue it to them that were vanquished. But contrariwise, three good and iust reasons gaue him an assured hope of victorie. That he was not the beginner of this war. That the King had begun it in a season of great aduantage for the Emperour. That he found his subiects, Captaines, and soldiars so well disposed, as if the Kings were like vnto them, he would craue mercie with his hands and feete bound.

The second article of the three, and the last, being but bragges, were by the Ambassadors, (as shalbe noted hereafter) concealed from the King. The Pope requested them, that without preiudice to the King, they should suppress what might increase his maiestie, adding therewith the explication, which the Emperour himselfe did afterwards make of his words, at the request of the French Ambassadors (desirous to knowe if the Emperour had any meaning thereby, to charge the King to haue done any thing preiudiciall to his honour, or if his intention were to challenge him,) hee publicly declared: That what he had spoken, was but by way of aduice and proposition, as being more fit, and of lesse inconuenience, then to expose the liues of so many thousands, fighting for their quarrells, to the mercie of armes, to decide it betwixt them two, with the perill of their owne bloods: not meaning in any sort to tax the King, whom he knewe to bee a great Prince both in courage and person, much lesse to defie him, and in the presence of his holinesse, without whose permission he would not attempt such an action. So as the King answering onely to those articles whereof hee was aduertised, sayled in these.

The Empe-
rours pro-testation.

The Emperour hauing thus published his protestation, tooke his leaue of the Pope, who displeased in shew of the neere breach of peace, resolved to be a Neuter, not assisting eyther partie with counsell or fauour concerning the warre. In the meane time the Admirall (hauing expresse commandement from the King, and afterward reiterated by John Cardinall of Lorraine (sent by his maiestie to the Emperour,) not to attempt any thing whereby the Imperials might frame any iust complaint) had E retired his army towards Saint Germaine, with an intent to assure himselfe of the towne of Yuree, and of all the valley towards the Suisses, to receiue men for the Kings seruice, if they should come to open warre, and to succour Turin when neede should require.

But hauing intelligence of the Emperours care, to increase his forces, and that Anthony de Lene was resolved to passe into Astisun, to cut off his victualls behind, hee sent Montesat with two hundred men at armes, foure thousand French foote, and eight hundred Italians, to seize vpon Fossan, Vignon, Sauillan, Cony, Mont-deuis and other townes thereabouts: And to prouide for the fortification of Turin, he sent Stephen Colonne with a hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foote.

From words in the end they fall to blowes. The Emperour hether to fed vs with good words, now he discouers himselfe: and to make an open declaration of warre, he

A he makes three armies to assaile at one instant, the Prouinces of Picardie, Provence and Champagne. To crosse him, the King disperseth fourteene, or fifteene thousand of those men which he had in Piedmont, to fortifie those places, which hee held beyond the Alpes: and calls back his Admirall, to the end he might lay all the blame of this inuasion vpon the Emperour. Considering moreover, that the Admirall hauing placed his garrisons, had beene too weake in field, hee sent Commissions with great summes of money to Charles of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme, Gouverneur of Picardie, Grandfather to our most Christian and victorious King, and to Claude of Lorraine, Duke of Guis, Gouverneur of Champagne, brother in law to the said Duke, to leuie sixteene thousand Aduenturers, to diuide them into frontier Townes, and to prouide for the B victualing, and fortifications thereof. At Marseilles hee placed Antonie of Roche-foucault, Lord of Barbezieu. In Dauphiné, John Lord of Humieres. In Guienne, Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, for his Lieutenants, and gouernours in the said Prouinces. And himselfe (resolute to oppose against the enemy, some fortified places vpon the frontier, to make him to consume time, men, munition, victuals, and money, in the seige and batterie thereof,) assembled the rest of his forces neere to his owne person.

preparation for the warre.

The Admirall retrying out of Piedmont, left Claude Lord of Annebaule, to command within Turin, as the Kings Lieutenant, with a hundred men at armes, and three hundred light horse, led by the Lords of Aussun, Termes and Essa: foure thousand five hundred foot, vnder the ensignes of the Lords of Auchy, Cany, Salé, Quincy, Lanigue-Dieu, Blanche and Anguar, and two thousand Italians, vnder the charge of Marie Antonie of Cusan: of all which footmen, Charles of Coucis, Lord of Burie, was head and Colonell generall: and the rest of the armie Francis Marquis of Salusf- ses commanded.

This was to giue the purse to keepe to the veriest thiefe: but his trecherie was yet covered with a great shew of hypocrisie. He had long determined to reuolt Feate, and hope moued him thereunto, feare to loose his estate, hope, to bee fauored by the Emperour, in the cause hee pretended to the Marquisat of Montferrat. Moreover hee was a man curious to know what was to come, and did superstitiously beleene South- D uyers, who had foretold him, that the Emperour should this yeare dispossesse the King of his Realme. The first act of his treason appeared in this, that the enemy being neere, and strong, he sayd he had neither order nor means to fortifie any place in time, or to make it tenable, but that of Turin: and that to put in more men then role that were, were to loose them wilfully. The second was, when as the Lords of Montesat, Roche du Maine, Villebon, the Knight of Ambres, Saint Aubin, the Earle of Pontreme and other Captaines were resolved to attend the enemy in some place of importance, before he came to Turin, and was concluded to put themselves into Fossan, after they had receiued commandement to hold Fossan or Cony onely for fifteene E cays, to keepe the Imperials occupied; hee discovered this dessein to Anthony de Lene, aduising him to come thither with speed, promising to deliuer into his hands, both the Towne and men that were in it: and in steed of sending to Fossan the meale, a culuerie, three Canons, powder and bullets, which he had drawne out of Cony, he con- uided thither, but one Canon, a Culuerin, five barrels of powder and some bullets, but of another sorte he put all the rest into his house at Ranel, & retired the night following.

Trecherie of the Marquis of Salu-

A horrible treason. He had beene brought vp with the King, from his infancie, well maintained during the life of the Marquis Michel Antonie his brother, and honoured with the order of Saint Michel. And which is more, his Marquisate hauing beene ad- judged vnto the King for the treason, & rebellion of John Lewis, the eldest of the house, after the decease of Michel, the King had not onely inuested him, but also giuen him freely out of the conquest of Sauoie, to the number of seuentene Townes, the flower of Piedmont, amounting to more in reuenue, then the Marquisate, amongst the which Sauillan, Cony, Fossan, Cauallimont, Mont-deuis, and others, which he pretended to bee ancient appertinances of the said Marquisate.

According to the aduice of Francis of Salusses, Anthony de Leue, leauing at Turin (which he had beleaged) tenne thousand men, to continue the seage, came and camped before Fossan the twelfth of Iune: makes his approaches, begins his trenches: many of the assaillants loose their liues; few of the beleaged. The third day, the Canon playes, but slowly. The Marquis assured them, that shewing themselves before one gate: the beleaged would go forth at another: they go forth indeed, but not like men that fled. The Baron of Castelpers Lieutenant to Montpesat, led the horse, Warris the foot. The Imperiall Laniquenets were lodged somewhat farre from blowes, and therefore their gards were but weake. Warris doth charge them, and at the first giues them a great checke. Castelpers arrives, and reenforceth the Alarum. Anthony de Leue sends a good number of Spaniards, to cut off our men in their retreat: and they whome he had appointed to gard the trenches, seeing euery one runne to the alarum, would likewise haue their share in it. Saint Petre Corse appointed with Villebon to gard the Bastian newly begon, within the Towne, perceiuing the trenches vnurnished, issues forth with some Champanois and Normans, kils fise and twentie, or thirtie men, and puts the rest to flight. Anthony de Leue sends the rest of his men which remained, to second them, and himseife being old, and full of the gout, is carried forth of his lodging to saue himselfe: they follow him: but those which carried him, fer him in the ceme, where the heig'it of the eares couered him, from such as sought him.

It is a rashnesse, yea in the greatest Capitaines, to contemne an enimie. Anthony de Leue building vpon the hope which the Marquis had giuen them, left the beleaged a gate free, thin king they would retire to Cony. But this was a refreshing vnto them, for of seuen wels which they had in the Towne, fise were dried vp in two dayes. Anthony de Leue therefore perswaded, that the beleaged attended some more honest excuse, and colour for their retreat, hee plants foure Cannons in battery, and makes a breach for twentie men in front. Fossan had no ditches, so as the Imperials might more easily as- saile, then the French could defend the walls. But Anthony would reserve his Spaniards for some better enterprise: they were old souldiars, and the whole hope of his armie. The Italians would not march, vnlesse they were payed: and the Germanes who held themselves of no lesse reputation, then the Spaniards would not hazard themselves alone. So the breach continues twelue dayes in this sort, giuing them leaue to repair it, and to make a trench within, and a rampar well flanked.

The time the King had appointed, was now passed: they had no wine, nor meale, but some Corne, and no milles, and the Marquis had maliciously sent away the workmen they had to make any. Moreouer, the King commaunded them, not to hold it so long, as very necessitie should force them to accept a shamefull condition. But it was a point of honour, for the one to demand, and for the others to giue a composition. In the end, the griefe which Anthony de Leue conceiued, to spend the time before a paltrie hens roult, which might haue bin better employed: and the great desire thoe within the Towne had, to doe the King good seruice, in the affaires of better importance, made them to enter into capitulation: whereby at the end of the moneth, they departed with their armes, and ensignes displayed, leauing nothing in the Towne but the artillerie, munition, & their great horses, which were about 16. handfuls & foure fingers high, except twelue, at the choise of the Capitaines: and came to refresh, and to horse themselves anew at Marseilles, honoured by the King, with three moneths pay, besides that which was due. But the enimie had small profit by their horses, for they had filled them before with new corne, so as when they came to water them, most of them burst with drinking.

Let vs here obserue some other Spanish brags, but boldly incountred by a French libertie of speech. Eight dayes after the Capitulation was signed, the Emperour came to visit Anthony de Leue's Campe, accompanied with the Dukes of Sauoy, Albe, Baviera, and Brunswicke, the Princes of Salerno and Bisignan, the Marquis of Guaft, and many others: he cau'd his armie to be put in battaile, and finds it goodly, and pleasing to his mind: he calls Roche du Maine, la Palisse (the onely sonne of the Marshall of Chaban- nes deceased) and Asster (the onely sonne of the maister of the Kings houle) who remained for hostages of the Composition: he embraceth la Roche curteously, whom he had heard reputed to be a gallant Gentleman, cauteh him to couer his head, by reason of the heat of the sunne: and saies, that to do him a pleasure, he will shew him his armie: My Lord (answered la Roche) to shew me your armie goodly, as you esteeme it, were contrary to all content. I should be better pleased to see it poore, and ruined: vnlesse the King my maister and you would agree together, and not bring two such goodly armies to fight, as yours, and that which the King will shortly oppose against you, to the preiudice of all Christendome. If you were both well aduised, you would agree and hold, both the Turke and all others in subiection. But to thinke to ouerthrow one another, were a meere folly. And if the first armie the King shall oppose against you, should chance to be vanquished (which God forbid) he will within fiftene dayes raise another: yea and at neede, would shew you as many Gentlemen on foote, as you haue men here of all sorts. Wherevpon the Emperour said: I am not ignorant of the Kings forces, so are mine well knowne vnto him. As for an accord, I will neuer shewe mine eares against that motion: so as it might be made as it ought. This beeing spoken, he commaunded the Marquis of Guaft, to conduct them about the army, and to dine with the Princes of Germany: that after dinner he would see them againe. After dinner the Emperour said: How thinke you of mine armie? I finde it very faire, answered la Roche, it is pittie you employe it not in some other desseine. The Emperour replied, where thinke you I will employ it? la Roche answered, Into Prouence. The Emperour said, C The Prouencalls are my subiects (he did commonly peruse the mappe of Prouence, and had already deuoured this Prouince in imagination, but he shall find the situation stronger then in his mappe, and men of a firmer mettal then paper) la Roche answered: You shall finde very rebellious, and disobedient subiects. The Emperour replied: How many daies iourney is it from hence to Paris? la Roche answered, If you meane battells, at the least a dozen, if the Inuader (meaning the Emperour) haue not his head broken at the first. The Emperour smiled, admiring his wit: and some one of the assistants (who knew Tei celin well) said, I told you before my Leage, he could speake well if he list. Then the Emperour taking the word, gaue him assurance that hee would giue eare to any proposition of peace, so as it might be worthily treated of.

And in trueth he doth reuiue it: but this was to haue speedier meanes to send newes to the Earle of Nassau, and to receiue intelligence from him: that both his armie, and that which the Earle led vpon the marches of Picardie, might at one instant inuade the frontiers of the Realme. Moreouer, attending the yeelding vp of Fossan, he made at Sauillan, Montdenis, Cony, and Tende, great prouision of biscuit, and beasts of burthen to followe the Campe with this biscuit, and other victuals to supply the waste which hee did foresec. Some, and the greatest number, counselled him to pursue the recovery of the countrie, which the King had won from the Duke of Sauoy, by meanes whereof hee might plant a strong barre against the French forces: and first to settle a sure peace beyond the Alpes, before hee came to make warre in France. Other men clawed him where it did itch, and by a more pleasing then holtsome Councell perswaded him to take on his way to Prouence.

The Earle dome pleased him greatly, gaping wonderfully after it, for the commodity of his passage vpon the Mediterranean sea, hoping that, as Italy should take breath, and new courage after the ruines and desolations where with it hath bene continually shaken these thirtie yeares, the curses, spoyles, sword, and fire, which hee should drawe after him, chasing, destroying, amazing and making desolate the people of France, Paris in the ende, and the Crowne of France should bee the prise and recompence of his victories. But hee reckened without his host, Marseille instead of making his entry into the Realme, shall shamefully make him retire into Casille.

Manye inticements drew him into France. Wee haue had (said hee) almost for these 1536. these twenty yeares, a continuall victory against the enemy. The Duchie of Milan which we now possesse, is a certain testimony of our triumphs: we haue reason to retaine the same resolution in this warre, and the same hope which conquerors ought to haue: and leaue vnto the French, terror and dispaire, which commonly doth accompany the vanquished. We are superiors in number, men of better constitution, more practised in the art of warre: and leauing some part of our forces on this side the mountaynes, we haue sufficient remaining to incounter the enemies power. But that which will giue vs the victory, we march against one that hath broken his faith. The iudicious reader may consider which of these two Princes had most right, whether the Emperour, taking vpon him the protection of the Duke of Sauoye: or the King seeking his right by force of armes, which he could not obtaine by reason from his Vncle)

Doubt not but we haue God for vs, he is a iust Iudge, and a rigorous reuenger of the breach of faith. Moreouer let vs not feare, that the king of France can fortifie himselfe on this side the Alpes: he will prepare all his forces against this armie: but I haue an other, ready to inuade Picardy: and besides, the Emperesse prepares one in my kingdomes of Spaine, which shall come by Largueto, to ioyne with mee. I leue another to assaile Champagne and Bourgoigne, in the hottest of these warres, the which shall performe as much for my seruice as the rest. Having to great preparatiues, and in many places, and the king so surprised as he cannot in time assemble sufficient forces to encounter so many armies: it is impossible but on some one side, we should make a passage by force, euen into the heart of his Realme. Wee haue good intelligences and manage great practises. This spake the Emperour. But, Doest thou know the deues of heauen (saith the Eternal reprehending man) and wilt thou dispose of the government thereof upon earth? What were these great practises and secret intelligences, which the Emperour vaunted to haue in France? A politike Commaunder doth commonly vse this kinde of speech, to giue courage to his men, and breed ielousie and distrust in his enemye against his subjects. Hee had some secret practiser vpon the Towne of Langres, (but the Inhabitants were too faithfull to their King, and since in these latter dayes, haue giuen sufficient testimony of their obedience to the Crowne) Some held that the Marquis of Saluzes had partakers of his D treachery: and William Duke of Fianiere said openly, that many in France, holding the same party, would discouer themselves at need.

The death of Francis the Dauphin por-tioned.

But whatsoeuer it were, that which gaue a more liuely impression: Francis Dauphin of Viennois, the Kings eldest sonne, whom his maiesty (going from Lions, to see his army which he ment to oppose against the Emperour) had left sick at Tournon, dies the fourth day of his sicknesse, being about twenty yeares old: bred vp by his father in singular expectation of all the world, to proue in time, a great and most excellent Prince. And Sebastian Earle of Monticucullo, found guilty of poison, and for that cause was drawne in peeces with foure hortes within Lions, had by his confession declared, that the Emperour had once enquired: If he knew the order and manner of the kings eating and drinking. An attempt so wicked, as it is scarce credible, that so wretched and damnable a treason should enter into the heart of so generous a Prince. Notwithstanding when Don Ferdinand of Gonzague presented the sayd Sebastian to the Emperour: saying, that he was ready to execute that which hee had promised vnto him, and to Anthony de Leue: if the dessein extended vpon any places of the French obedience, why did he informe himselfe of the Kings eating and drinking? Besides, during these practises, why did Don Lopes of Sora, Ambassador for the Emperour at Venice, inquire who should reigne in France, and against whome the Emperour should pursue the wars, in case the King and his children should die: If he had not bin acquainted with some fatall practise against the said Princes.

Thus the Emperour, resolute to passe, against the opinion of the clearest sighted (as he afterwards confessed vnto the King with his owne mouth: who hauing till then seemed to follow Councell, did now rashly follow his owne head) and now by diuers and

A and many expeditions, of diuision of places, offices, Capitainehippes, governments, gifts of Townes and Castells, deuouring (by presumption) the goods of the Kings subjects and seruants, hee left ten thousand men to continue the siege of Turin: and for the affaires of Piedmont, hee diuided his armie into three bands, for the greater commoditie of the passage, and appointed their Rendezuons at Nice, and there abouts. In the first were the men at armes, with the Lansquenets of the Lord of Thamiſe, conducting the artillerie and the baggage, who tooke their way by the riuer of Genes. In the second Don Ferdinand of Gonzague, generall of the light horse and with them some Neapolitane men at armes, the Lords of Iseltſheim, Dietric, Spech, Wolſe, Dietric of Kuttinghem Colonells of the Reistres, then the Marquis of Guast with the Spaniards and B the Emperours household, and at their tayle Anthony de Leue, with the Lansquenets of Marc Ebenſtſheim: after whome marched the Emperour, in the midst of a troupe of Spaniards, followed by the Lansquenets of Gaspar of Fronſberg, taking the direct way fro Fossan to Nice. In the third, were the Italians, which tooke their way by Cony. On the other side the King made his necessarie prouisions at Lions, and prouiding for all parts wherethe enemy might land, hee sent Claude of Sauoye Earle of Tende, and the Lord of Bonneuall his Lieutenants generall in that army, to ioyne with William Earle of Furstemberg Colonell of his Lansquenets, & other Capitaines placed towards Cisteron, vpon the passages of Roqueſparuiere, Terreneuue, and other approches, to spoile the come, eyther standing, or in the barne: to draue all that might be into strong places: C to beate downe all ouens and milles, which might any way helpe the enemy, to burne the horſemeat: to beate out the heads of their wine vessells, if they did not speedily retire them, and to cast come into their wells to corrupt the waters. All the people, both great and small, were so wonderfully affected to the publike good, as euery man forgets the greefe of his priuat losse.

The Empe-
 rors passage into France.

The Kings
 order against the Empe-
 rour.

The Lords of Mas, Cals, Carſes and many others, pricke them forward by their example, themselves setting fire on their come, barnes, and mulls, and causing good fellowes to drinke their wine. And for that the King had not yet all his forces vnited, to present himselfe with honour and reason in person before the Imperials, his maiesty appointed the Lord of Montmorency, at that time Lord Steward & Marshall of France, D his Lieutenant generall as well on this side as beyond the Alpes, to seize vpon Auignon. But for that the King would consult with him, more at large of these great affaires, he sent Robert Steward Lord of Aubigny Marshall of France, to that ende, with eight thousand Swiſſes, who kept the enemy from the sayd towne. Montmorency hauing in Auignon imparted to the Marshall d' Aubigny and other Commanders, the meanes which seemed most conuenient for the managing of this warre: hee came to Aix, vewed the situation of the place, and finding it hard to fortifie, by reason of certaine little hills neere at hand, which looking into the Towne, might serue as a Cavalier or Mount for the enemy to plant his ordinance on, hee caused all that might be, to be transported, razed the portalls and such defences as it had, and abandoned it, leauing it E empty and vnprofitable for the enemy.

Aix abandoned.

The Emperour was now in the plaine of Cannes, and the next day Don Fernand Gonzague, who led the foreward, should aduance with eighreene hundred horse and six thousand Lansquenets, (whereof the master of the Campe marched sometimes three or foure Leagues before the whole army) Montiean, a hardie and aduenturous Knight, seeking opportunity in the beginning of this warre to do the King some notable seruice, resolved to see if hee could surprise this Master of the Campe. Boiſy no lesse couetous of glorie, would bee his Companion in this enterpriſe, they part with about eight score horse, and three hundred foote, and encounter Don Fernand with his horſemen, who came to take lodging for the forward in the Towne F of Luc, on this side the riuer of Argente, and gaue him an alarme: but vnable to fight with so great a troupe, they found the retreat, and all tired come about the shutting of the euening to Brignoles.

Don Fernand, aduertised by them that went and came, of the small number of 1536. our men, takes a number of choise men, marcheth speedily after them, and sent all the rest of his forces to follow: hee passeth on the one side of Brigoles, and layeth a great ambush where our men should passe the next day, and doth compell them in betwixt his troupe and the ambush: at the breake of day hee chargeth into the village, some Barricadoes which the Captaines had made stay them, whilst the arme and goe to horse backe, they kill some at the first, and loose about forty. Montrean and Bossy take the field, they place Captaine Blaris with his footmen at the wings of their horsemen, marching close covered with their shute to get to Aix, maintaining still the shock of the enemies, they kill and hurt many in narrow wayes, whereas the enemy could not stretch forth his troupes. But thus in the open champaign, assailed by their whole force, charged by the a. upon one of their flanks, the Lanquenets approaching, this present supply giveth courage to the enemy, and the perill without hope of succour makes the French faint: they all give way, all are overthrowne: and of all this troupe but three men at armes escaped, but were slaine or taken. Montrean, Bossy, the other Captaine, and many Gentlemen which had followed them, (desirous to make proofe of their persons,) are taken prisoners. There were slaine of the enemies (besides the wounded, sixe score men,) and two hundred horse: but the number praised a-boue valour.
 Vvv our

The defeat
taking of Montrean & Bossy.

The Emperour hearing of this victory, did not forget to make a triumph, publishing it throughout all the world, as if he had defeated all the Kings Foreward. A. without doubt this lightnesse allowed by Montmorency, at the importunate request of the undertaker, purchased to the enemy, those which were doubtful and uncertain what part they should take, confirmed his adherents, and strack seale into them that were contrarie. This first encounter might give courage to the Imperial to take the Constable in Auignon, yet he sees no reason to hazard a battaile in open field, before hee had sufficient forces to encounter so great a power. To push himselfe into Auignon, were to hazard himselfe in a Towne not defensible, and hardly to be fortified so speedily as necessarie required.

Marfeilles was the onely frontier Towne, sufficientlie furnished with all things necessary to endure an Imperiall siege: but to leave all the rest of the way open to the enemy, had bene to give him meanes to fortifie on eyther side of the river of Rosne, at his pleasure, and to draw vpon him (without resistance) a flourishing and great armie. It was therefore better to let the Emperour know, that for an unfortunate encounter they had neyther lost courage, nor hope: with this, desirous Montmorency lodgeth his men in field, and chooseth the place for his Campe, betwixt the rivers of Rosne and Durance, the one did furnish his armie with victuals and other commodities: the other served as a Rampar and barre against the enemies approach. And to cutte off all meanes and libertie to runne to forrage, to learnenewes of the French Campe, and to found the passage of the river at his pleasure, without contradiction, hee placed garrisons in all Townes and places, to bee held on the other side of the water.

The King on the other side was at Valence, where like the Maister of a ship commanding from the Helme to the prow, hee sent dayly new forces to the Constable, fortified the Towne, and assembled such a power, as if any mischance had ruined this it armie, the Emperour had had the King presently ready to give him a second battaile. Lervs now change our Climate, and make an escape into Picardie. Henry Earle of Nassau, and Adrian of Croy, Earle of Reux, Lord Steward of the Emperours house, being entred into Picardie, did at the same instant, spoile all places in their passage which were of weaker resistance: but besides the taking of Bray vpon Somme, they did more great exploits, but being repulsd from before Saint Riquier, they lost some of their Artillerie, and a great number of their men for a sleight enterprife.

The Earle of Nassau in Picardie.

Charles

A Charles Duke of Vendosme, with three hundred men at armes, and six thousand foot, 1536 having forced them to repasse the water, reuenged the wrong they had done vpon the frontier. hee tooke and spoiled some small Townes, Castles, and Villages vpon their Marches. But seeing the enemy fortified with two thousand men, the which he hoped to surpris at Marolles an open Towne, hee repassed the water, not to hazard his forces rashly, attending the coming of Claude Duke of Guise his brother in lawe. Among other places vpon the frontier not defensible, hee had appointed to abandon Guise.

The Earle aduertised by his spies, of the hast they made to carry away their moueables and victuals, and to drine away their cattell: and that the garrison of the B. Castell, carefull to free the Towne, and to beat downe the defences which might any way accommodate the enemy, did negligently garde the approaches, he marcheth thither with speed, surpriseth them in disorder, and kills some before they could recover any place of safetie: he summons the Castle: some preferring life before honour, cast themselves ouer the walls into the Ditch: the rest amazed, yeeld the place at the enemies discretion. A basenesse vnworthy of Nobilitie: so as those which were found to be Gentlemen, were degraded, and both they and their posteritie, declared peasants, and subiect to taxes.

Guise being sackt, and all the Countrie about burnt, the Earle carrying away a bootie of men, Cattell, and goods, marched against S. Quintin. But being aduertised of the good order the Duke had set for the good and defence of the Towne, hee turned soeily, and tooke the way of Peronne. It is strong by nature and situation, but at that time not well fortified, nor sufficiently manned to withstand so great a power. He therefore passeth the river of Somme about Aplincourt, abandoned as not defensible, and spoiling, burning and making the whole countrie desolate, hee camps before Peronne about the middest of August. The Lord of Seren, Captaine generall of the Legion of Picardie, puts himselfe into it with a thousand men, and the Marshall of La Marke with a hundred men at armes. Misfortune is good for some thing. The darkness of the smoake which the fire of the Fermes and Villages burnt by the enemy, had caused, covered the passages of our men, even at the Imperials noses. In the D. meane time, the Dukes of Vendosme and Guise, leue new bands in Picardie and Champagne, to ioyne with the Larsequenets, which Nicholas of Rusticis did bring. Let vs leave the Count Nassau assailing, and the defendants valiantly encountering his attempts, vntill that the Emperour after his first disgrace receiued before Marfeilles, shall be blemished with a second at Peronne, in the persons of the Earles of Nassau and Reux: and let vs see what happened in Piedmont, after the yeelding of Fossan.

Guise taken.

Peronne besieged.

Warre in Piedmont.

The troupes which Guy Earle of Rangon, Cesar Fregose his brother in lawe, Caguin Confague, and other Italian Captaines, pensioners to the King, had leuied, were broken, by reason of the last hope and practise of peace, cunningly giuen out by the Emperour. Now they renew them by a new Commission from the King, so to cross the E. Imperials in Italie, as hee might thereby diuert the great forces they had in France. Rangon Lieutenant for the King in this armie, leuied two thousand men, Caguin as many, Cesar Fregose the like number, and two hundred light horse: the Lords of Paluissima Vicount of Milan, Peter Strofi a Florentine, Balthazar called the Cheualier d'Azsal a Ferrarois, eyther of them a thousand men. Beringer of Caldore, a Neapolitane, Earle of Monte de Rife, and John of Turin a Florentine, euery one five hundred, Auerol of Bressan foure hundred, Bandin of Tuscane foure hundred, and two hundred light horse; and the Lord of Tais (a Frenchman borne, but sent into Italy, to receiue the Earle of Mirandole into his Maiesties seruice) two hundred light horse. An armie of great hope, whose exploits we shall soone see.

F. Annebant and Buric, being straightly besieged in Turin, performed the parts of good and vigilant Captaines, & well practised in matters of warre, preuenting both the enemy, and the Citizens newly reduced to the Kings obedience, from daring to attempt any thing against them, and by their daily sallies, bringing prisoners, and store of cattell, 1536. returned victors within the circuit of their walls. Maramba had gathered together in Ciria all the corne & victuals he could get thereabouts. Annebault aduertised of by his espials, sent Esse with seuentie horse, and Auchy, and Cany, leading either of them five hundred foote. who parting towards the euening, came to the walls side before they were discovered: they plant their ladders, surpriſe the Towne, put all to the sword that made resistance, loade their beasts of burthen with victuals, and bootie, and retire to Turin without any encounter. This happie victorie brought vnto the beleeged the conquests of Riuolles, Veillane, and S. Ambrois.

A braue and happie exploit

Enterprise vp-on Sauillan.

The Imper-
ials defeated.

The garrison thus reuiued, aspires to greater enterprises. The Emperour had left in Sauillan, sixteene peeces of artillerie, with all their prouision of bullets, powder, and other necessaries, and a good prouision of armes. The garrison which he had placed there, foraging without feare in the villages about, gaue them hope to defeat them, and to surpriſe the Towne. Marc Anthonie of Cusan Capitaine of two thousand Italians, demanded the execution of this stratageme, with his troupes: they giue him for Companion Chambray Lieutenant of Annebaults company, with three score choise horse. But they looſe an oxe, to take an egge: vpon the way they are aduertised by their ſcowts that certaine freebooters of the enemies, laden with a great spoyle, were presently retrayed into a Castle adioyning. They turne head, and take the Castle by assault, and sacke it, it may be more greedily then wisely. For whilst they are busie at the spoyle, the alarm is giuen in the Countrey, and some troupes enter speedily into Sauillan, draw the bridges, ramper vp the gates, and man the walls, and the defences. The Towne being furnished, the suburbs remaine in spoyle, they beate in peeces two great Canons, they carrie away all the armes, and make bootie of all they finde good. In the meane time James of Scalenghe approached, with about foure thousand men, as well of his owne troupes, as of the peasants gathered together. Our men making a vertue of necessity, gather together, and go closely to field, charge the enemy running hastily to surpriſe them, dispersed in the streets, and busie at the spoyle: they make them turne their backs, kill about three hundred, hurt many more, and of nine enſeigns winne seuen: the horsemen flying, pulled away the other two, from them that carried them, to saue them. In the end, John Iagues of Medicis, Marquis of Marignan, came to succour them, with two thousand Lansquenets, being called by Sid-length: our men hauing their bodies wearied with trauell, and their armes tyred with striking, resolute to retire, and send to Annebault for succours. Aligre an aduenturous and wise Capitaine, brings them two hundred horse, who arriuing when as our men were in danger to be defeated, entering among the enemies, killing, and chasing, gaue their companies halfe tyred leasure to take breath: and through the fauour of twelue hundred foot, which followed Aligres troupe, do retire with their bootie, & baggage safely into Turin. A shot which Cusan receiued in the head, caused him to remaine at Pignerol, where soone after hee died: leauing a happie memory of his valour, and a great griefe to his friends for the losse of his person.

The Emperour approached now to Aix, hauing receiued some losse by the way, not so great as troublesome, in regard of the qualitie of the persons. The peasants, and mountainers, lying in ambush, in the straights, and narrow passages along the Alpes, and disſuing forth sodainly, sometimes vpon the ſcowts, sometimes vpon the reerward, stayed them euery two hundred paces, to defend themselves: hauing no meanes to offend this swarme of men, who being charged, vanished by crooked and vnknowne wayes. Fiftie men of the Countrey, resolute for all euents, had shutt themselves in a fort, called our Ladies Tower: with an intent to shoote at the Emperour in the passage, and all of them at one instant to discharge their harguebuses. But they take Martha, for Marie: they kill a Nobleman with a rich coat of armes, and followed by a troupe of men, which did him great honour.

The Emp. brings the canon, batters the Tower, & forceth them to yeeld at his pleasure: & to purge the offence they had made, sends them all to be hanged. Moreover, being aduertised that a great number of peasants, women, children, & cattel were hidden in the ground in a wood on the side of a mountaine, he caused the wood to be fired in many places about the wind, so as all were miserably burnt or slaine. A stratageme which did so incense the people against the Emperour, as neuer any of his men fell into their hands, but he made tryall of a most tragicke and cruell death. These first fruits might induce the Emperour, to draw a consequence from the lesse to the greater, in comparison of these people vnacquainted with armes, with those whome nature and exercise had instructed, and to make him knowe, that it was no small enterprize to attaine a King of France at his doore.

But this troubled his minde. Hee thought in the beginning of this warre to haue disgraced the King with the Germaines and Suisses, as he should drawe no men from them. Notwithstanding, aduertised that besides the eight thousand Suisses leuied by Lewis of Anguerrand, Lord of Boisrigault, Stephen d' Aigne Lord of Beauuais and William Lord of Sernay gentlemen of the Kings house, had made a leuie of the like number, all which had in a manner ioyned with the Marshall of Montmorency, who had nowe about thirty thousand men in his campe: he is nowe much greened in his heart, that hauing in the former warres wonne so many happy victories vnder the command of his Capitaines, now marching in person with so strong and mightie an army, after he had published his triumphes throughout the world, he should performe no honorable exploit of war. Therefore the 15. of August he makes choise of three thousand Spaniards, foure thousand Italians, and five thousand Lansquenets, and takes in his company the Duke of Alba, a Spaniard, Alphonse d' Aualos, the Marquis of Guaſt and Don Fernand Gonſagne Italians, and the Cont Horne a Germaine, followed with all the flower of his horsemen, and aduanceth neere to Marseilles: hee goes himſelfe in person, to viewe the Towne, being couered with the ruines of a house lately beat down, and forsooth the Marquis, to make a conuenient place for the planting of his artillerie against the weakest place of the Towne.

This resolution had bene good, when as the Kings forces were not yet united, and his people terrified by the sodaine and vnexpected landing of so mightie an enemy. The watch vpon the rampars discovered the Marquis: they send forth men to compasse him in behinde, if there were no more then those which appeared with him. Hee retires towards the place from whence hee parted, and by his retreat they discover a greater number of men, behind that ruined house. They set vpon them that issued forth, and some Cannon shot scatter the stoanes, kill some and hurt others.

This first amazement carried the Emperour to his Campe, after hee had appointed the Duke of Alba and the Cont Horne, to stay about Marseilles: and the Marquis of Guaſt, with twelue hundred horse, and six enſeigns of foote, to go and viewe Arles: that if they found it not able to bee taken by assault, he would come thither with all his forces. In the meane time, least the first that sallied forth, should fall into some ambush, they send other fresh men in fregats and boats armed, who going along the shoare, get about the place, where they had seene the harnes shine: and landing take a compasse among the mirtells and other bushes which grow in that Countrey. The Duke discovers them, and to busie them, sends certaine horses, to drawe the whole troupe which followed vpon them. Our men had the like desſeine: and when as the enemies whole strength appeeres, they seeme amazed, retire without order, and drawe them that pursued towards an open plaine, commanded by the Cannon, and turning their backs saue themselves among the bushes.

The Cannon plaies, and passing through the Imperials, makes heads, legges, and armes, to flie into the aire so pittifully mangled, as the cries of them that died, the terror of them that fled, and the amazement of them that were found, turnes them all into a hastie flight, & the soldiars hidden in the bushes, makes a furious fall vpon them that fled: the Duke gathereth againe his men far from the shoare into a valley couered with rocks and hills, and hauing viewed them, hee found his number greatly diminished, amongst others those of the Cont Horne, and of an other Germaine Capitaine his nere kinsman.

1536. The Marquis of Gnaff had already discovered, that they had abated a little hill, which did outlooke the Towne of Ayles, vpon the which, a few peeces of artillery being planted, would haue held the Towne in great subiection. Ayles is seated vpon Rosne, at the point where it parts in two, and runs with two mouths into the sea: making an Iland, which they call Camarole. John Carraciola Neapolitane, Prince of Alphe, commanded there, as the Kings Lieutenant, with a thousand foot, Gascos, of the troups of John of Foix Earle of Cermaine: a thousand Champenois vnder the command of John Anglure Lord of Tour, two thousand others vnder the enfeigns of the Lords of Marien of Dauphiné, la Goute a Fourbois, du Palais, of the Countie of Toix, and the Baron of Fixen of Languedoc, to euery one five hundred, and Bonnacal about a hundred and thirtie men at armes. As the Marquis lying in ambush, behind certaine windmills, viewed the weakest parts of the Towne, being discovered, Anthony of Antenne Lord of Filliers, Commisarie of the artillery, plants two peeces of artillery, so well against these mills, as if the Marquis seeing them giue fire, had not slipped aside, he had there ended his dayes. So as the Marquis (frustrate of his hope, either to surpris or to force the Towne of Ayles,) took his way to Marseilles.

Marseilles was beseege by the Duke of Alba, more in shew then with any hope, to force it, and onely with an expectation to draw the beseege to some rash sallie, or to haue the Kings armie, to come to succour them, and then to fight with them with an aduantage. With this dessein, the Emperour lay so neere, as at the first dislodging of the French Campe, he might easily prevent them, and ioine with his forces. But those within the Towne had good and wise commanders, who suffered not their men to issue forth, but to good purpose, and alwaies to the enemies losse. As for removing of the Campe, Montmorency would not hazard the estate, nor the forces of the King his master: he lopes by the rout of his enemies armie, to preserve his owne: and according to the aduicements he had, of the Imperiall desseins, he refrayned, or gaue libertie for the execution of his Counsels, and commandements. The surpris of Brignoles had made him more warie: yet not to daunt the courage of his men, he continually studi- ed of reuenge, vexing the Imperials with daily alarms, incounters, and charges, and all without any losse, or preiudice.

The King being aduerted of the approaches which the Emperour had made to Marseilles, Henry the new Dauphin and Duke of Brittaine desirous to make prooue of his person, in so iust and honourable a war, and against so worthie an enemy, obtained by his instant prayers, and the intercession of such as might preuaile much with his Maiestie, leave to go to the Campe: Not to command presently (sayd the King) but to learne to command hereafter, and vnder the Lord Steward, (as an other Palantes vnder Lions) who passeth his apprenticeship in the art of warre. His coming made the youth to rise for battaile, whensoever they went to consult, whether it were more expedient to approach neere their enemy, or to prolong the warre, by temporising, and delays: and many which till now had followed the last opinion, were carried away to the contrary. Many considerations moued them, the Kings forces able to encounter the Emperours, the presence of a yong Prince, burning with desire to trie himselfe in the warre, the dishonour (as they sayd) in suffering the Towne of Marseilles to be beseege, the meanes they had to defeat their enemies, before the Emperour could bring all his forces to succour them, who for want of victuals were constrained to be disperced.

But the Lord Steward, and the wisest heads, found it farre more safe to win the victorie without striking stroke, cutting off the enemies victuals, as they had done before. Marseilles was well fortified, furnished with all necessarie munition, manned with valiant Captaines, and men of resolution. Contrariwise, famine, and pestilence, which did much afflict, and daily increase in the Emperours campe, would soone rume his power. It was now neere at hand: The peasants had lately carried away, slaine, and hurt, all the beasts which carried the biscuit that was made at Toulon, and continuing to molest them by these affronts, they brought the imperiall

A speciall armie into wonderful wants and necessitie. Moreouer the dayly checks which the French men at armes gaue vnto the enemy, made the Emperour thinke of his retreat. It was therefore a wise constancie and resolution of the Lord Steward, not to submit the importance of this warre, to the discretion of a doubtfull hazard. There is no lesse honour to vanquish an enemy by counsell and gouernment, then by battaile: and not to hazard himselfe to the chance of armes without necessitie, it is an abusing of the blood and liues of men.

Here vpon newes comes to the King, that his armie beyond the Alpes had brought most part of Piedmont vnder his obedience, and all the Marquisate of Saluzzes, except some Castels. His Maiestie (vsing his rights) might haue annexed this Marquisate vnto Dauphiné, whereon it depends, as confiscate, by the rebellion & treachery of the Marquis Francis. But let vs heare an act of his naturall clemencie and bountie. John Loris, brother to the sayd Francis, was prisoner at Paris for the like rebellion. The King set him at liberty, he did inuest him in the Marquisate, takes his oath of fealtie to him, and against all other men: he causeth money to be giuen him, to furnish him and his raine, and then sends him to take possession. Francis within few weekes after, came to Carmagnole: John Lewis receiues him into the Castell, and suffers himselfe to be so carried away with sweet words, as he sweares by nothing, but by the confidence he had in his brother Francis. Francis was farre more malicious and cunning. John Lewis, against the aduice of Saint Julian (a Gentleman Gascos bred vp in the house of Saluz), whom the King had sent with John Lewis to obserue the actions, and the going and coming of this new Marquis, being a simple and dull man) he suffers himselfe to be drawne out of Carmagnole, and to be lead to the Castle of Valseniere, where Francis detained him prisoner, & then seekes to recouer the places of the Marquisate. S. Julian foreseeing the issue of this subtill stratagem, practised Saluador d'Agueres by his persuasions, and receiued of him in the Kings name, the strongest Castle of Vrezen, a beame in Francis his eye, which kept him from being absolute Marquis.

Andrew Dorie coming then from Spain, brought victuals and money to the Emperour, vpon whose arriual he made a Proclamation throughout the Campe: That all men bearing armes, should be ready to muster (without doubt the great decay of his armie, the which from fiftie thousand men that hee had parting from Nice, hee found decreased to 25. or 30. at the most, did touch him to the quick) to receiue money, and prepare to depart vpon the day assigned, euery man to be furnished with eight or ten dayes victuals. This proclamation made the King suspect, that he meant to come and assaile his campe, or to marche after the Duke of Alba, to the siege of Marseilles. And seeing the Emperour was there in person, the King did hope to haue meanes in the midst of these great armies, to effect the contents of the challenge he had before sent to the Emperour by an Herald, as we haue heard. But his Maiestie was no sooner come from Valence to his campe neere Auignon, as he was giuing order to prepare to receiue or fight battaile, newes comes vnto him, that the Emperour with all his Campe, is dislodged from Aix, leauing behind him (besides the dead bodies, which were infinit, are being corrupted round about) a great multitude of sick men, which could not follow the armie, neither on horseback nor on foote: and taking the route of Spain, spoiled with all the desolations which warre could bring forth, except fire, from which the Emperour did preserve it. Onely the pallace, and especially the Chamber of accounts were abandoned to the fire, at the instance of the Duke of Sauoy, who would assist in person at the burning thereof, hoping (it may be) to abolish the memorie of the titles, whereby it appeares, that Piedmont belongs to the Earldome of Prouence. But the Lord Steward had foreseeen this inconuenience, sending them to a strong place of his, named Baux. The King gaue money to repaire the losses. Amongst his chiefe champions, the Emperour loit Anthony de Leue, Marc Bussheim, another Captaine of Languedoc his kinsman, the Count Horne, Baptista Castalde, and many other men of account. Let vs apply here that holy Oracle, speaking of Senacherib King of the Assyrians. Thy bragging hath come vnto mine eares, I will put my ring into thy nostrils, and my Eternall touching the King of the Asirians: he shall not enter into this Cattie, neither shall he shoot an arrow therein, he shall not present himselfe before it with shield, nor cast etc.

Behold the Earle of Prouence in imagination, who had lately threatened the Prouinces of this Realme, with fire and sword, and swallowed vp the Crowne thereof by presumption, afhamed, and confounded in his retreat, hauing lost halfe of his troupes, turmoyled by the pesants, who vsing the armes of his sicke men, and of those that were dead, seize vpon the passages and straights, beat downe the bridges vpon the riuers, which were then very violent, charge them in front, in flanke and behind, and the light horsemen led by the Earle of Tende, Bonneau, Langey, and John Paul de Cere follow them so close, as they had no meanes to forrage, leauing the waies from Aix to Fretus, couered with dead carcases, and men languishing, harnes, lances, pikes, harguebuses, and all other armes pelmel on a heape.

Of the Earle
 of Nassau.

The King refused to march after them, and where so euer he should ouertake them to giue them battale, and so passe into Italie, where at that instant he had a mightie armie in field. But he is diuerted from his dessein, by letters from the Marshall of La Marke. Hee had no more meanes to hold Peronne long, the walls were beaten downe in many places, famine pressed the beseege, they wanted harguebusiers and powder.
 So the King caused some part of his men at armes, to march speedily, and tenne thousand French foote, resolute to follow after by great marches, to raise the siege, or to recouer the Towne before the enemy should fortifie it, and furnish it with victuals. C God would preserve him from this toyle, and giue him leisure to take breath. The Imperials being alwayes repulsed, with losse of many, and sundry assaults, the myne wherein they had long labored, prouing fruitlesse, (besides the death of Phillip of Bou- inalliers, Earle of Dammartin, ouerwhelmed in the mines thereof, in a counter mine he made to blow vp the enemies myne (whose death was reuenged, with the slaughter of three hundred Lansquenets, and twentie of their men at armes, at the last assault giuen by the Tower, that was vndermyned,) and the Towne being releued with fiftie hundred shot, euery one carrying ten pounds of powder, entring by meanes of a General alarm, giuen by the Duke of Guise, with two hundred horse, and all the trumpets
 he could recouer, they dislodged in the night, about the middelt of September, conti- D nuing their burning as they had begun.

France (by the grace of God) is now free from enemies. But nothing is now perfectly happie. There are crosse newes which trouble the Court. The English Ambassadors that were neere the King, ill affected to his Maiestie, and without doubt, no faithfull seruants to their master, giue him intelligence. That the Emperour seeing, that hee could neither by spoyle, or any other meanes, prouoke the King to battaile, made shew of a retreat, to draw him to pursue him, and so to fight, or else retyre to take a greater leape, and to invade Prouence suddenly, when as the French forces should bee farthest off: That the Emperour himselfe (the better to colour his departure) gaue out, that famine and mortalitie had diminished his forces of one third part, and the E rest had runne the like danger, if he did not retired. yet notwithstanding he had no such want of victuals, as was supposed, and since his comming out of Italie, had not lost about two thousand men. That since the taking of Monticau, and Boisy, no man durst giue any alarme to the Emperours Campe, nor yet follow it at their dislodging.

These impostures, and false impressions had wrought such effects with the King of England, as Pomeray being sent from the King, to three ends: To satisfie him of the truth, touching the enterprise of Prouence: To procure his liking of the marriage of Magdaleine a daughter of France, with the King of Scots, and to learne the King of Eng- lands intention, vpon the motion before made, touching the marriage of the Duke F of Orleans with Marie of England daughter to the said King: hee had much ado to alter him any thing from the opinion hee had conceived. But the marriage of Scotland did so incenle the King of England, as hauing layed open vnto Pomeray his

 without any conclusion, being loath to haue his neighbour so highly allyed. There The cause of comes an other matter of greater importance: the Country of Tarentaise in Sauoy had warre be-lately shaken off the French yoke. To reduce it to his obedience, the King sent the twice England the Earle of Saint Paul, Duke of Esclouteville by his wife, with French troupes of and France.
 horse and foote, and the Earle of Furstemberg with his companie of Lansquenets, to whome, for the purging of their offence the Country was abandoned to the spoile, with the Towne of Conflans. Being thus punished, they afterwards performed the dutie of subiects, and the Duke returned into France with much honour and glory.

B Let vs now discharge our promise, and conclude the yeare with the exploits of the assembly made at Mirandole by the Italian Captaines, pensioners to the King. Their first dessein was vpon Genes: and to this effect they came speedily and closely, hoping either by surprise, or by the partisans of Casur Fregose, to become masters of the Towne: but a Luquois of the troupes of Cont Guy, stealing away in the night, had discouered the enterprise to the Citizens. So the Earle retyring his campe halfe a League from Genes, betwixt two mountaynes, hee suddenly caused many ladders to bee made, which prouing too short, made the successe fruitlesse. These Captaines had no Cannon to make any batterrie: moreover Turin being beseege, required their prefence.

C They therefore turne head. The Imperials aduertised of the Earles approach, abandon the siege, and leaue the field at the deuotion of this newe army. The Lord of Annebault, seeing the Campe dislodged, fallies out after them, and in passing takes the Tower vpon the bridge of Pau by composition (the taking whereof the Emperour had so highly commended) and the Lord of Burie tooke Groillan: the come and wine that was found there, serued to refresh Turin. The Towne of Quirs was taxed by the Imperials at five and twentie thousand Crownes: but whilst the soldiars were busie to force the Inhabitants to pay this summe, Annebault sent certaine Captaines, who surprised the Towne from foure hundred soldiars, which kept it in the Emperours name.

D Montcallier sent presently to offer obedience: and the Castell of Carignan yeelding, did furnish Turin with about three thousand sackes of meale, packt vp readie to send to the Campe. Salusses, Queras and many other places of the Marquisate and of Piedmont did homage vnto the victors. The King sent to refresh Annebault and his troupes, both with horse and foote: hee drew them out of Turin, sending two thousand French foote vnder the Command of Captaine René, and la Godiniere: and two thousand others, vnder the Cheualier Birague: and for gouernour he sent Burie, to whome he gaue the company of men at armes, which Francis of Sal- usses being reuolted, did command.

E But behold an act as remarkable, as it is rare, proceeding from a singular affection:
 and what will not a braue Knight do for his mistres? Vpon the first newes of the Emperours descent into Prouence, the King of Scotland did arme sixteene thousand men, to come and succour the King, without his request or priuie, (saies the Original) and nothing stayed him from comming in time vpon the generall hope of a battaile, but a contrary winde, which had put him backe twife. The King had assured him selfe of his newe conquests, and hauing giuen order to the frontiers of his realme, returned into France.

The King of Scotland came to meete him at la Chapelle, betwixt Tarare and Saint Saphorin in Lionois: and there he demanded one of his daughters in marriage.
 The ancient alliance of the realme of France and Scotland, was considerable. The Father of this King had bene slaine in battaile against the English, for the partie of King Lewis the twelfth, and should his kind affection bee denied? So the marriage betwixt him, and Magdaleine of France, was concluded in Blois, and solemnized the first day of the yeare following.

Vnto the King

 Scotland.

Great

1536. Great prosperities are oftentimes accompanied with toine croiles, else the many of our senses, would easily transport vs; and we would attribute that to our owne valour, which belongs to the great Judge, and moderator of battells: behold pittu- fruits, in the gouernement of the Lord of Bury at Turin. Oiten times hee is taken, that thinks to take. The Emperour had adiudged Monferrat to the Marquis of Montenapoli, against the Duke of Sauoy, and Francis of Saluffes who pretended it. and those of Casal, would not accept of him. Bury during these garboiles, praistefeth Damian Captaine in the garrison at Casal, for the Emperour. Damian, promifeth to deuote him a gate. Bury leads thither Christopher Gouast, with twelue hundred Italians, whereof he was Colloanel, and some number of horfe, vnder the Lord of Tais: and at the first becomes maister of the towne.

Bury, taken prisoner.

But the matrocks, shouels, and other instruments for Pyoners, which William Earle of Biendras should haue prouided with the money hee had receiued to that ende, to make a trench sodainly betwixt the Towne and the Castle, whilst that Cont Guy should come to succour them, with the artillery to batter the Castle, were yet to buy. Whilst they seeke for others, to make trenches, the Marquis of Gouast had leysure to assemble his forces within Ast, and to enter into the Castle, by the field-gate, and so into the towne. Twelue hundred men were not able to withstand the force of this vnexpected storme. He mainteins the shock, and enters fight: but in the end, being forced by the enemy, he is taken prisoner. Tais, Gouast, and all the rest were slaine, or taken, Biendras, Damian and other marchants saue themselves. We finde the fault when it is done. It is good to obserue it, to make vs wise. He should haue imparted this enterprise to Cont Guy, who should haue drawne his armie neere vnto Ast. The Marquis fealing to loose the one, and not to saue the other, had coneyned himselfe within his walls. Guy Guiffroy Lord of Boutieres was appointed gouernor by the King in Bury place.

Pursute against the Em-perour in sultice.

The snow, yce, and slipperines of the winter, stayed the courses of the garrisons, in Picardy. And whilst the season kept them from doing any memorable exploits, the King laying open in his Court of Parliament at Paris (in the presence of the Peeres of France, and Princes of the bloud, forty and thirty Bishops, many officers of the Crowne, and other great personages of all Estates) the lawfull armes of a Lord against his val- fall that hath committed a trespass: he sent to summon the Emperour, vpon the tilters by a Herald, to come and plead what he should thinke good, against the demands of his maiesties Aduocate and Proffor generall. concluding, that in regard of the rebellions & treacheries of the said Emperour against the King, his naturall Prince, and Soueraigne Lord, by reason of the Eddedomes of Flanders, Arthois, Charolois, and other places, holding of the crowne of France, they should be adiudged confiscate and vnto the Crowne. And no man appearing for the Emperour, the demand of the Kings Council was registred according to the forme & tenure vsual in those cases.

For the execution of this sentence, the Lords of Annebault, Tais, Termes, Ausson, Frenchmen: More of Nouate, Francis Bernardin of Vimercat, Italians: George Capasse- ment, and Theode Manes, Albanois, cyther of them commanding two hundred light horse, de Ries Seneschall, and Gouernour of Boullen, and De Crequi, Gouernor of Monfruel, Captaines of fifty men at armes: hauing victualled Therouenne in viewe of the Earle of Reux, who issued forth of S. Omer with six hundred horse to preuent this Stragem, the King parting from Amiens, (whereas Charles Duke of Vendosme, then died, much lamented of the King and Realme, a braue Prince, and well deseruing of this Crowne, for his many & notable seruices) the king in the end of March, sends William Earle of Furjslemberg to field with eight thousand Lansjueuers, the Lords of Seru and Auchi who were slaine at the first approches at Hedin Heilly, S. Seual, Picards, Baque- uille, la Salle, & S. Albin. Normands, Quincy a Champanois, Harancourt a Lorraine, either of them leading a thousand men: and many other bandes of Germaines and French, amounting all to fife and twenty thousand men, whereof Montmorency (Lord Steward) was Lieutenant generall for his maiesty.

Hedin

A Haris of conuencence to the King, for the preferuation of his other places in Picardy and being in his power did wonderfully annoy the enemy. The towne abandoned by the garrison, they rayre into the Castell, the which was taken without resistance, but the Earle of Reux had well furnished the Castell for the defence of a place of importance. Captaine Samson an old Knight of Namurs, a great soldiar commanded there with fiftene hundred men, vnder the ensieignes of Boutiers and Vandeuille. They make their approches, & many Captaines perswaded that the thicknes of the wall, maintainted with a great rampar, would neuer admit any breach: they come to vndermine. The Prince of Stephe, the Lords of Barbejeux, Burje Villiers Cornilles vndertake the worke, and cast downe halfe a Tower passing from the Towne to the Castell, but that part which layned to the Castell standing firme, the place was not much weakened. The King then resolves to attempt it by batterie, and hee himselfe shewes the place, where to plant the Cannon. At the approches Lafaches and Pont-briant, well experienced Comissaries of the artillery, with many Canoniers and others loose their liues. The Cannon planted vpon the brink of the trench plaies two daies together, and the third they make a breach of thirtie fadomes. The Kings presence, being the rewarder of vertue, sets many yong gentlemen on fire, being desirous of reputation, and before that order be giuen for the assault, carries them to the toppe of the breach. But they find the like valour in receiuing them: some arsaue vpon the place, others retorne fort wounded. Charles of Beaulieu among others, Earle of Sancerre, a yong Noble man, who followed the steps of his Ancestors vertue, Aubigny Lieutenant to Seren: and Damiete ensieigne banner of the flyd Company, testified by their deaths the hope of their youth, if the chance of armes had lent them a longer life. Harancourt a Lorraine and his brother his Lieutenant, sons to the Lord of Paroy Lieutenant to the Duke of Calise, in the gouernement of Champagne and of his companie of men at armes, Fleueres, sonne to Mardieque and many others returned backe lame. Yet this attempt amazed the besieged, and helpt the generall. For when as they see the order the King had giuen to assault them in the morning, a great number of men at armes on foote, with fife or six hundred light horsemen, all therest on horse-backe, the whole army readie to be put in bataille if the enemy approached, some appoynted to march first, others to second them, and some to receiue them that went to the assault, the resolution and courage of the night past made them enter into composition, whereby they departed with their baggage, leauing the artillery, munition & victuals. The King committed it to the gard of Seru, giuing him a company of fifty men at armes and a thousand foote.

The Castell
of Hedin taken.

Saint Paul neere vnto Hedin might much annoy him, and reduced to the Kings obedience, crosse the garrisons of Betune, Arras, Lillers, and other places thereabouts. Annebault did this exploit, and Antonie of Casell an Italian Ingeniour vnderooke the fortification of the Towne and Castell. Lillers abandoned, by Lienin Captaine of the Towne, was by the Lord Steward and Duke of Guise visiting the Country, added to the former Conquests, and left vnder the commande of Martin du Bellay Captaine of two hundred light horse, ioyning vnto him la Lande with a thousand foote, to keepe them of Saint Venant, and Maruille, from annoying the forragers & victuallers of the French Army.

Saint Paul and Lillers
taken.

The Bourguignons had fortified an Island, at Saint Venant vpon the riuer of Lis. The Lord Steward vndertakes to force it, and takes with him the Earle of Furjslemberg, with eight thousand French and Germaines. At the first the besieged repulse the Lansjueuers, kill some, and wound many. And now the day began to faile, when as Charles Marcel Lord of Baqueuille, & la Lande discovering one part of the trench worse manned then the rest, they crosse it with their Normands and Picards, and come to handie bowes, they loose some men, and kill many of the enemies, force the trench, the rampar and the bastion, they compell them to abandon and leaue their defence, and make way for the rest of their companies and troupes to enter, who chasing the enemies, make a great slaughter of men, to reuenge the death of their companions.

1537. companions. They presently set vpon the second fort, the bridge whereof was creit A with great long peeces of wood, ioyned one to another, and betwixt, manned with good shott, defended with a mill of stone well perced, and furnished with harguebules of Crocke, and other shor. But nothing is difficult to a resolute mind, and the first flying to the second fort, strooke terror into them: they force them, and put them all to the sword: The number of the dead, was esteemed twelue or fifteene hundred on both sides, the place spoyled, the bootie carried away, and the houses burnt.

There passed no day without an enterprize of one side or other, courses, and recourses, prizes, and reprises: of men, victuals, and places ill garded, or not gardable. The King seeing the Emperour had no armie readie, able to crosse his new conquest, content for that yeare to haue taken Hedin, and fortified Saint Paul, he caused Liliers to bee burnt, (referring the Abby of Nunnes, and the Churches) and the walls to bee beate B downe, that the enemy lodging there, should not annoy Therouenne, and Saint Paul. he gaue the gouernment of S. Paul to Iohn d'Esouteuille Lord of Villebon, Prouost of Paris, with his copany of men at armes: that of Moyencourt named de Hangeft, to Martin du Bellay, with his two hundred light horse, and two thousand foot, commanded by the Captaines la Sale and Saint Aubin Normans, Blerencourt and Yuille Picards, euery one five hundred, and in the Castle a thousand men, vnder the charge of René de Pallestiere. He left the Earle of Furstemberg in garrison at Dourlans, with his Lansquenets, and a hundred men at armes, vnder the guidons of the Lords of Esfree and la Roche du Maine. But these bands were so ill complect, as they made not halfe their numbers, C then hauing in like sort, prouided for other places, hee brake vp his campe, and dismissed his troupes, to giue order for the affaires of Piedmont, where the enemy grew strong.

The King thus disarming, the Earle of Bures armes fower and twentie thousand Lansquenets, six thousand Walons, and eight thousand horse, and resolues to charge the Lansquenets, lodged neere to Dourlans, to make the siege of Saint Paul more easie, which he ment to attempt. By the surprize of some letters, he learned that the fortifications of the place required yet 20. dayes time, to make it able to repulse the enemy. He changeth his opinion, and turning head to Saint Paul, makes his approaches the tenth of Iune, notwithstanding the many sallies, and skirmishes of the beleegged: hee reco- D uers (by meanes of a great hollow way, which the sodaine arriuall of the Imperials would not suffer them to make euen) the point of a great Bulwarke vpon the way to Mouchy. they vndermine day & night, shoot sixteene or eightene hundred canon shot, make a breach of three or foure paces, and by the furie of seuen or eight peeces of at- tillerie, force Martin de Bellay, Blerencourt and Yuille to abandon the breach which lookes towards Dourlans, their cheefe, and almost only defence: hee giues an assault with five or sixe hundred men, onely to vew the breach: and by the thunder of their Canons, which battered all along the breach, and into the Towne, they kill, or at the least hurt, about a third part of the defendants: those which were set to defend the breach, being forced to lie flat vpon their bellies. They discouer the breach, draw E seuen or eight ensignes more into the ditch, which diuided the great bastion from the Towne, (they had had no leysure but to make two Courtins of pipes full of earth, to defend the way, which went from the bottome of the Trench into the Towne: they set fire to the props which supported the point of the Bastion that was vndermined: it sinks downe, and presently ouerthrows all them that defended this point, into their trenches: they giue the assault by that place, and are valiantly receiued by la Sale, and Saint Aubin. But during the assault, those which the enemy thrust into the trench, winne the curtine made of Pipes, force five and twentie, or thirtie shot that kept it, and enter the Towne pell mell with them: come behind them, (who performing as much, as valour and nature could doe, that defended the bastion, and cut in peeces all they encounter. F

Those which defended the breach, ignorant what passed on the other side, had alreadie endured a furious assault, when as behold, those which were entred by the port of the great bastion, come and charge them behind, and the greatest number surmount- ing

Atting the lesse, at the first charge they kill Moyencourt, and his brother d'Yue, they mas- taken in the furie of the fight, leauen score of the company of Du Bellay, and the most part of that of Villebon: Villebon and Yuille weretaken prisoners by Tonnoire a Spanish Captaine, Du Bellay and Blerencourt were saued by Pose, a Germaine Captaine. La Pal- liere forced in the Castell by the bulwarke which was not yet in defence, remayned prisoner: but the contention of some (euerie one maintayning that hee had giuen his faith vnto him) was the cause of his death. Finally sparing neyther men nor child: en, wifes nor maides, religious nor Nunnes, about foure thousand five hundred persons, they the pittifull chance of a horrible and cruell victorie, wherevnto they are commonly subiect, who against the Lawes of armes vndertake the defence of a place not defensible, or that is not readie to withstand the violent attempts of a mightie armie.

Saint Paul being burnt, the Castell and all the defences razed to the ground, the Imperials come before Montreuil. Montreuil was ill furnished: Canaples gouernout of the Towne, entred but three or foure dayes before, with a thousand foote and some two hundred horse of the bands of Normandie: but the Towne not being retrenched, it required at the least sixe thousand foote, and three hundred men at armes. So the Earle of Bures placeth a part of his Campe at the port of Hedin, one part at the Celestines, vpon the way of Therouenne, and a part at the gate of the great market towards Abbeville: hee plants his artillery in three places. makes a breach a- long a great courtin from the gate towards Hedin to the port of the great market, and then prepares for the assault. The breach was reasonable, but the trenches full of water made the access difficult. On the other side, the defendants were troubled with many disadvantages. Two batteries of the enemies kept them from comming to the breach: and being at their defence, they lay open vpon both the flanks, and had no meanes to couer themselves. besides their number was not sufficient to keepe the one halfe of the base Towne, so as the enemy comming to the assault, had the rest of the Towne at his discretion, the which is of a great circuit.

These considerations made Canaples demand Composition, and the Earle intending the conquest of Therouenne, to preuent the next victualing, which he did foresee, D he graunts the men of war to depart, in armes with bagge and baggage, and to the Inhabitants to carrie what goods they could about them. This done, the want of men, and powder, which he knowes to be in Therouenne, inuities him to this enterprize. Francis of Montmorency Lord of Rochepot, then Lieutenant generall for the King in Picardie, knowing the importance of Therouenne and the enemies desseine, besides three score men at armes, a hundred foote and some hundred dead paies which kept it, hee sent the Lord of Cany, Lieutenant to the Companie of the yong Duke of Vendosme (whom we shall see King of Nauarre, and father to our most Christian King nowe reigning) Foudras, Lieutenant to Cany, the sonne of Dampierre guidon to the Daulphin, leading foure score men at armes, and Saint Brise foure hundred foote. He comes before it, E makes his approaches, plants his Cannon in batterie, forceth our men to abandon the Castell, which had but two towers (the English Talbot, hauing taken the Towne in the year 1513. had razed the Castell) and makes a breach in the Towne wall, about two hundred paces long, but hardly to be forced: our Frenchmen retyring, had made a trench behinde them, and made the rampar in such fort, as the enemy winning, it should fall into a trench well flanked.

When as the Imperial army began to march, against Saint Paul, the King sought to redresse his army, hoping (according to the promises of the fortificators) it would hold out vntill that succors should come. Nowe the Daulphin accompanied with Montmorency Lord Steward, Commander of the army vnder the Daulphin, giues the rendezvous towards Abbeville, to the Earle of Furstemberg, and to Nicholas of Ruffis, newly arriued with foure thousand lowe Germaines, warlike, men and in good order. Whilest the Daulphin attends the rest of his troupes, the beleegged giue him notice that they had great neede of shot and powder, for the furnishing whereof, they choose 1537. Annebault, generall of the light horse. With this desſeine, Annebault followed with an hundred men at armes, and ſixteene hundred light horse, made choiſe of ſix hundred harguebuziers, vnder the charge of Bierdras, euery one carrying a ſacke of lether bound about him, full of powder: many voluntary gentlemen deſirous of honour, (a braue ambition if we could temper the heat of youth) augment this troupe, reſolute to bee either taken, or defeated, rather then to faile of their enterpriſe.

The Imperials hauing intelligence of this deſſeine, go to horse, to prevent the execution: And the French light horsemen, prickt forward by these yong Nebienens, desirous to trie their valour, giue them an alarm. Mischaunce is good for something. It was night, and the darknes hindring the enemies forward from showing their battaile, which came from an other side, to ioyne with them, they charge, and kill one another, whilst that our shot enter into Therouenne, without discouerie: being entered, they make a ſigne, whereby Annebault should make his retreat, and might haue done it without danger. Notwithstanding, aduertised that his light horse were in skirmish, he fought to retyre them. The enemy prevents him, and cuts off his way at the passage of a bridge.

Here begins the combat, and so violent, as the greatest checke falls vpon the Imperials. But in the end, all the horsemen arriue. Annebault is ouerthrowne, taken prisoner, and reere vnto him the Earle of Villars, the Lords of Piennes, d'O, and Sansac, Captaine George Capussement, Francis Bernardin, and almost all, but some which had before passed the bridge. Those (amongst the which was Auffun) retyre to Hedin, change their horses, post to the place of combat: find the Imperials in disorder, dreeming no more of any enemy: they charge them, defeat them, take a great number, and recouer many of their companies that were prisoners: and so cut off a great part of the glory, which they did challenge for such a victory. In the meane time, the Daulphin, and the Lord Steward, had gathered together about sixteene hundred men at armes, two thousand light horse, tenne thousand Germanes, and twelue thousand French, with the which they pretended to succour the beleegged, or to force the Imperials to fight with disadvantage: when as the treatie, which Mary Queene of Hongarie, sister to the Emperour, had made by the meanes of the Duke of Asay, for the procuring of a peace, or truce, caused a suspension of armes, for three monethes, betwixt the King, and the Emperours countries of the Netherlanders, vntill that matters being pacified, there might be a general peace concluded betwixt these two great Princes, and their allies. Let this truce now carrie vs beyond the Alpes, to see the estate of the forces in Italie.

The ordinary jealousies, diuisions, and partialities of Captaines, which thinke themselves equall in authoritie, and reputation, & of like vse for seruice, is commonly of dangerous consequence. The composition which Caguin of Conſigne made with the Imperials at Carignan, without the prauitie of Guy Earle of Rangon, Lieutenant generall for the King, on that side the Alps, had discontented the Earle, and on the other side, Caguin complained, that they had cassied some of his footmen, & in case Cont Guy should die, or leaue the place, the King had substituted Cesar Fregeſe his brother in law, without any respect of the ancient seruice of his house, and his breeding in the Kings seruice, from whom he had not fallen, as the Earle had done: although he had bene sought vnto, with many profitable conditions. These quarrels did so increase, that after many complaints, and reproches vpon the point of honour, Guy and Cesar banded ioyntly against Caguin, framed a challenge vpon some writings published to the disgrace of the said Cesar, vnder the name of Aretin, whereof they held Caguin to be the chief author. William of Bellay Lord of Langey, sent by the King to heare the griefs of either partie, hauing giuen Cont Guy, and Cesar Fregeſe, to vnderstand what preiudice their quarrell with Caguin, would be vnto his Maieſties seruice, and that by the articles of the Kings order, the Knights may not without the leaue of their superiour (which is the King) send nor accept of any challenge one against an other, Caguin offered not to wrong the Kings seruice, and to deferre the combat, vntill the seruice were ended, so as after the answer hee had made vnto the the challenge, Cesar had not written or sayd any thing that should come vnto his knowledge, wherevnto he should be bound in honour to answer: and vnder colour to go to the bathe for his health, he obtrayned a passport to retire himselfe to his house, with promise that if it pleased the King to giue him an honorable charge, hee would returne with a troupe fit to do him seruice: And that howsoeuer, hee would neuer weare a read croſſe.

During these contentions the Imperiall army fortified daylie, and the Kings decreed, so as the Lord of Humieres sent by the King, for the affaires of Piedmont, could not be master of the field, without a bodie of foure or ſixe thousand Lanſquenets or Suisse, and some supply of men at armes. To this end the King causeth his light horsemen to march into Piedmont, after the conquests of Hedin and Saint Paul, and sent to Chriſtopher Duke of Wirtemberg, who brought ten thousand Lanſquenets to passe the Alpes, and to ioyne with Humieres. But vpon the coming of the Imperials before Saint Paul, the King being forced (as wee haue seene) to countermand his light horse, he sent the Baron of Curton, la Fayette, Brissac and others, leading three or foure hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horse, Laſigny and Allegre, either of them commanding a thousand foote.

The Marquis of Guaſt, had at that time deliuered into the Marquis Francis hands, all the Marquisate of Saluſſes, except the Castells of Verculo & Carmagnole. Two hundred Italians held it for Cont Guy: the Marquis of Guaſt doth summon it, & vpon their refusal approach the artillery. Francis Marquis of Saluſſes (knowing the place) brings two Cannons on the right hand, going from the Towne to the Castell, breakes two houses to couer himselfe, in steed of gabions: himselfe plaies the gunner, & shoots two volles. A ſoldiar of the Castell discouers him (but knowes him not) and shoots him through the body starked dead with a musket. The Marquis of Guaſt, causeth him to be couered with a cloake, and then againe sends to summon the beleegged, promising them an honorable composition: they depart with bagge and baggage, and the Marquis seeing them passe, commended their good endeouours. But when hee came to demand what he was that had shot so well from one of the windowes ouer the port, the ſoldiar both ignorant of the Marquis intention, and of the effect of his shot, presents himselfe vnto the Marquis, who against the Capitulation caused him to be hanged at the same window. The King hauing afterwards reduced the Marquisate to his obedience, did inueſt Gabriell Bishop of Aire in Gasconie, who married the daughter of the Admirall of Annebault, and dying without heires left the sayd Marquisate to the Crowne. The coming of Humieres and the Lanſquenets had shut the Marquis of Guaſt with his troupes into Aſt and Vercueil, who by his retreat left Pignerol, Chiuas, Montallier and other places abandoned to these newe Conquerors. But at the first, want of the chiefe ſinewes of warre, makes the Italian bands to mutine, whereby our men loose ten or twelue dayes, during the which the Marquis had leſſe to hasten his Lanſquenets, leuiued by the elder brother of William Duke of Furſtemburg.

Humieres had no ſooner pacified the Italians, with a portion of their pay, but hee frames an enterpriſe vpon Aſt, where the Marquis had left his brother in lawe Don Antonie of Arragon Lieutenant for the Emperour, with two thousand foote and two hundred horse. The Lanſquenets require the charge to make the approaches, and take it from Iohn Paul de Cere, who had a meaning to discharge it well. About midnight Humieres comes speedily to see their lodging, and finds nothing done. Some exclaiming first would haue made their cause good. Others storme (their pay being nowe out) and protest, that if it bee not satisfied, they will wrappe vp their enſignes, and found a retreat. They had reason: it is an ordinary course, when as the chiefe for-
F of an army consists in a mercenary nation. Humieres searcheth all the purses in the campe, makes for euery Companie ſixe hundred Crownes, and with this boane did somewhat ſatiſſie their greedineſſe. But in the meane time the beleegged, giuing the alarme to the Campe, they bring in ſeauen companies of

Thus the small likely hood to force the Towne, and lesse to famish it, seeing that for want of pay the strangers were no men of resolution, Humieres leaues the Towne of Ast, to surprize that of Alba. About eight hundred Spaniards, were parted from Alexandria to enter into it. Iohn Paul de Cere, meetes them, chargeth and defeats them, so as at the arrivall of the French, the Citizens of Alba vnfurnished of soldiars, yelding to the yoeke of obedience, gave occasion to them of Quiers to follow their example.

Alba and Quiers taken.

A dangerous attempt against Turin.

The Imperialls repulse at Turin.

This absence of the army made Cesar of Naples, gouernour of Vulpien, a man aduice and Vigilant, but vnfortunate in his enterprises, to attempt Turin. Turin had in it but two companies of foote vnder de Wartis and d'Angart, weake forces for a place of such importance, yet the Inhabitants were well affected to this Crowne. Cesar in-bornes a Corporal, a Gasco, to deliuer him the next day of his gard, a bulwake of the Towne right against our Ladies Church. Such base people should neuer knowe the day nor houre of their watch). The night being come, he brings ten ensignes of foote and some three hundred horse: the soldiars giues him notice by a signe, of the most convenient place to plant his ladders, he settes them vp, & before the alarme was in the Towne, he puts fise ensignes into the bulwake: two or three base soldiars whom the traytor had of purpose drawne in with him, faued themselves by flight. Boutieres gouernour of Turin hearing the alarme, goes into the streete, followed onely with the Suisses of his gard, and some gentlemen: hee finds the Townsmen armed, and resolute to do their duties, he marcheth directly into the bastion with no armes but a halberd, C shuts the gate by which they came from the sayd bastion into the Towne, (the darkness of night had hindred the enemy from seeing it open, the which preserved the Towne, for whilest that Cesar made fit his ladders to enter into the Towne, the alarme grew hot) Wartis arriues with two hundred shot, and forceth the enemy to abandon the bulwake, hauing lost seauen or eightscore men, at whose departure the soldiars payed for his offence with his life.

This attempt, the bad inclýnation of the forren forces, the quarrels betwixt Cesar Fregese, who led the forward, and Iohn Paul de Cere, Colonnell of the Italian foote: the controuerfies of Brissac with Anniball of Gonsague, Earle Laniulolare: six thousand Spaniards and twelue hundred horse, being entred into Montcallier and threatenng Turin D but weakly furnished with men: made Humieres to leaue Julio Frsini in Alba, with a thousand foote vnder his charge, and a thousand more vnder Artigue-Dieu and Peter Strossy: in Quieras, Cesar Fregese with the like number of men, such as he would chiole, & with the rest of the army, turnes head towards the enemy, to surprize him at Montcallier. The Marquis of Guaft aduertised of this descience, puts the rest of his troupe in to the sayd place. This enterprise prouing fruitlesse, and Humieres not able any longer to hold his strangers without pay, he sent Francis Earle of Pontreme with sufficient forces, to make good Pignerol against the Marquis, who threatned to surprize it, to take it of the French all meanes of retreat & succours in keeping the passage of Suze. Then hee supplied Turin with two thousand French foote, commanded by Allegre and Lafigny: E Quiers with a thousand men of the bands of Aramont, besides eight hundred which the Knight Affall gouernour of the place had: Sauilian, with a thousand Italians vnder the command of Iohn of Turin, leading the Lansquenets and the rest of the troupe in to the Marquitate of Saluffes, to attend newes and money from the King for their pay, for want whereof this army serued to small vse.

The Marquis of Guaft seeing Humieres retired into Pignerol, whether the violence of the Lansquenets had driuen him, there to attend their pay, he sent thirteene ensignes of foote, to Siria a small Towne vpon the mountaine, to keepe the valley of Suze in subiection, and by the taking of the Castells of Riuole and Villane, to take from them of Turin all meanes to heare newes out of France. So the way by the valley of Suze being cut off, and that of Pignerol by the meanes of Montcallier, Carignan, and Carmagnole F which the enemy enioyed: Humieres being ill obeyed by the Lansquenets (whome they forced to pay vpon their olde rowle, although their number of ten thousand were 1537. A were halfe decreased) and those of Turin prest with want of victuals, and money, which they could not endure after Saint Andrews day, the King was in danger to loose all Piedmont. Piedmont in danger to be lost, for want of money.

The Marquis hauing taken the Towne of Quiers, by assault, with Albe and Quieras by composition, was become master of the field, and held Pignerol, a great and vast Towne, so straightly begirt, as no victuals might enter, when as the King by a supply of fise and twentie thousand Crownes, which he sent to Boutieres, made an entrie for the Countymen to bring victuals to Turin, which before was shut vp, for want of payment for their wares: then he caused the the bands of the Earle of Furslemberg, and of Nicholas de Rustis to march to Lions, vnder the commaund of the Daulphin his son and of the Lord Steward, with ten thousand French foot, commaunded by Mont-ican, followed by fourteene hundred men at armes, and light horse, attending a leuie of fourteene, or fifteene thousand Suisses, which the Earle of Tende made for his Maiesties seruice: resolute to march after him'selfe in person. And not to leaue his realme vnfurnished, he left the gouernment of Paris, and the Lie of France, Picardie, Normandie, and other Countries about, to the Duke of Orleans his yonger sonne. hee sent backe the Duke of Guise, into Bourgogne, and Champagne: Henry King of Nauarre his brother in law, into Guienne, and Languedoc, and the Lord of Chasteaubriant, into Brittanie.

The Daulphin accompanied with Anthonie Duke of Vendosme, parts from Lions about the tenth of October, gathers together in Daulphiné some three thousand Legionaries, and the remainders of Humieres armie, which were come out of Albe, and Quiers: he forceth the passage of Suze against Cesar of Naples, who kept it with ten thousand men, chafeth them two miles, wins all their baggage, makes the Marquis to retire all his forces to Riuole and Montcallier, leauing Pignerol at libertie, opens a way by the taking of Villane from two hundred Spaniards which were cut in peeces, addes to his conquests Riuole, abandoned by the Marquis, turnes head to the enemy, incamped on this side the riuier of Po, right against Montcallier: but hauing the bridge to fauour him; to retire when he pleased, he begins the skirmish, with his light horsemen against theirs, kills many, takes some, and loofeth few, he chafeth all their troups beyond the bridge, who breaks it after them, but with the hazard of their liues, that remayned behind. Those of Montcallier, come with a great shew of affection, and repaire it: and then receiue into their Towne all the souldiars which the Daulphin had left to guard the riuier, whilest the armie passed at Carignan. The Marquis dislodging still, left in Quiers Don Anthonie of Arragon his brother in law, with foure thousand men and him'selfe recovered the Countrie of Ast.

Thus our men being at libertie on all sides, become masters of Poirien, Riue de Quiers, Villencusue & Ast, Montafé, Antignan, and of all other forts, vnto the gates of Ast, of Quieras, Albe and Fossan, whether they retired all the Corne of the Country, which did serue for the victualing of the Campe, and places of conquest. About thirte thousand sacks of corne, which the Marquis had gathered together, but had not leysure to bring from Montcallier, and much other munition found in diuers places, supplied Turin for a yeare. During these actions, the King comes accompanied with the Earle of Saint Paul, the Cardinal of Lorraine, and many other great personages. And as his Maiestie tooke counsell at Carignan, with the Daulphin, and the Lord Steward: newes comes vnto him, that the garrison of Vulpien kept the valley of Suze, and forthat Riuole nor Villane had any horsemen, to stay their incursions, they did wonderfully annoy those that followed the Campe. Hee presently sent away Martin du Bellay, and very happily. They had newly seized vpon six moyles laden with money for the payment of the armie, driuing the moyles, and the treasurers in the midst of them. Du Bellay passeth the riuier of Douaire, intercepts their way, and ouertakes them three miles from Vulpien, he makes them to leaue the moyles, and only with the losse of the Treasurers, which they carried away, brings them safe to Riuole.

The King comes into Piedmont.

The conclusion of this Councell was, to beseege Quiers, where the King would employ employ the first fruits of his last forces. But the great commander of battailes, meet him a more fauorable issue. The truce of Picardie had given libertie to the Queene of Hongarie, and likewise to the King, to send some gentlemen into Spain, to mediate a peace, or a generall truce: and the deputies had so well performed their charge, as a suspension of armes was concluded on either side, from the eighth and twentieth of Nouember vntill the two and twentieth of February following, whereby every one enioying that whereof hee should bee found seized at the time of the publication, the garrisons of Turin, Verlin, Sauillan, Montdenis, and other frontier places, were not slacke to enlarge their limits, as farre as they could, nor to put men in the Kings name into all the small places, and castles there about.

Three dayes after the truce was proclaymed, the Marquis of Guast, came to lifte the Kings hand, whome he received very graciously: and the king making the Lord of Saint Montian gouernour of Piedmont, he left William of Bellay his Lieutenant generall in Turin: Francis Earle of Pontreme at Pignerol, the Baron of Castell per Sauillan: Charles of Dros a Piedmontois at Montdenis (hee had surprised, and kept the place from the Imperials, when they were the strongest in field) Lodowike of Angue, at Verlin, and Nicholas of Rustici at Carmagnole: he dismissed his Suisses, and taking his way to France, he sent the Cardinall of Lorraine from Lions, with Montmorency the Lord Steward to Locate, where the Emperours deputies should meet, concerning a peace betwixt their Maiesties. The confusions had bin great, & their spleene not easily to bee pacified, which made them to prolong the truce for fixe months more. After all these toyles, and painfull endeuours, the loyall seruice of the most worthy deserued reward, which make the King being at Molins, to aduance Anne of Montmorency to bee Constable of France, the place being void by the reuok of the Duke of Bourbon: he gaue his place of Marshall to Montian: and that of the Marshall la Marke deceased, to Claude of Annebaul. It was now time to suppress the infernall furies, which had so long troubled the quiet of Christendome with such fatall combustions, and that the Pope (doing the office of a common father) should therein employ his authoritie. Hee procured an enteruew of these two great Princes at Nice, and himselfe assists, being about threelcore, and fiftene yeares of age, in the beginning of Iune. Their mutuall hatreds had taken too deepe roots in their hearts, and that fatall and bloudie checke, which his brother Ferdinand King of Hongarie had lately received from the Turke, had nothing mollified the Emperour. Time doth pacifie discontents. Ten yeares were sufficient, or neuer, to dispose both the one and the other to a generall peace. The Pope therefore seeing that by the full deciding of their quarrels, he could not confirme a finall peace, he propounded a truce for tenne yeares, the which they concluded betwixt their Countries, and subiects, and thenceuery one returned home. But Charles was borne to bee a perpetuall scourge to this realme, and many yeares shall not passe before he put vs in alarum with an vnworthy and base motiue of new confusions.

The Empe-
rours policy.

Let vs now see how he worketh like a foxe, to produce effects for his owne benefit. The Gantois being oppressed with many extraordinary tributes, had spoiled the Emperours officers: who growing desperate, and seeking to fortifie themselves against the reuenging wrath of Charles: they secretly offer obedience to the King, as to their Soueraine Lord. The King performing the dutie of a good brother, and faithfull friend, giues the Emperour intelligence thereof. The Emperour deuiseeth by some notable examples, to suppress the Gantois insolencies. But the passages thither were not very certaine. By Germanie, the protestants might somewhat hinder him. By sea, a storme might as well cast him vpon the coast of England, as vpon Flanders: the diuisions he had with the King of England, by reason of the diuorce of Queene Katherine his Aunt, would not suffer him to take any assurance from him: France was very comodious for him: to this end, he demaunds the Kings word for his safetie, & among other toyes, he promisseth, In case he giues him an assured passage, to inuest him, or one of his children, in the Duchie of Milan. But (oh notable policie): he desires not

A not to be profit to signe these promises, To the end (saith he) it may not be spoken, that I haue done them by constraint to obtaine a passage, and requires the King to take his word for assurance. This was to build a Castle vpon a quick sand.

Notwithstanding the King judgeth another mans heart and intentions by his owne: he grants his brother in lawe such assurance as he demands. Being sick, he parts from Compigne, to go to meet with him, sending his two sons to Bayonne, to receive him, and to accompany him to the place where the King and his might meete, of which was at Chastelerand giues him authoritie to make entrie, and to deliuer prisoners, in many Townes of the realme, as if he had bene in his owne countrie: feasts him in all places, causeth him to be conducted by his sayd children vnto Valenciennes, this first place of his owne territories, where hee is moued to confirme that which he had promised before his departure from Spain, but it was to no effect. The Emperour defers the matter, vntill he had conferred with his Counsell of the Lowe Countries. It may be hee would haue kept his promise, if hee had found the Gantois so desperately affected, as hee must needs haue vsed the ayde of France, to force them to obedience. But seeing themselves abandoned by the King, they sought and found mercy, vpon certaine conditions which hee prescribed them. And the Constable, who (relying vpon the word of such a Prince as the Emperour,) had giuen the King assurance, was for this cause in disgrace with his Maiestie, and retyred himselfe from Court to his house: from whence wee shall see him called and restored to his dignities.

Let vs obserue the craft and subtiltie of the Spaniard, to bring the King into dislike with his friends and allies. The Venetians were ill satisfied of the League they had made with the Emperour against the great Turkes: their treasure was wasted, and their estates (after that great and famous victorie in Hongarie,) were in danger. They were (for their owne safety) ready to enter into a treatie of peace, or of a long truce with the Turke. To breake this, the Emperour sollicites the King to enter into this common League, and the King perswaded thereto, sends (by his instigation) the Marshall of Annebaul (Lieutenant generall for his Maiestie in Piedmont, by the death of Montian, lately deceased,) to go in company with the Marquis of Guast to Venice, and the Lord of Gré to the Pope, as sollemne Ambassadors, and to giue them hope: That the King of France ioyning his forces to theirs, all ioynly together, would make an armie both by Sea and land, to extirpate the race of the Ottomans out of Europe.

The Emperour strooke three stroakes with one stone: he dissuaded the Venetians from all accord with the Turke. Hee bred a hatred and dislike betwixt the King and the Turke. And put the King of England in ielousie: who could not well like of this great alliance and fraternitie, which the Emperour did cunningly make shew to haue with the King. So as the English was perswaded, that the King had withdrawne his loue, grew strange, and began to assure himselfe of the Emperour. And which is more, all the Kings other confederates, seeing that honourable and respectiue entertainment giuen to the Emperour, and the Ambassadors of both their Maiesties, ioynly sent into Italie, they conceived many causes of distrust, blaming the King in leauing them at neede to the Emperours mercie: from whom they could not expect (if hee did vanquish them in warre) any better vsage then that of the Gantois.

This yeare William Bude Maister of Requests, dyed at Paris, a man of singular learning and godlinesse, to whom all men that loue learning are much bound, hauing by his learned and laborious writings, eased them of much paine: whose credit with the King, and the Cardinall Du Bellays, caused honest pensions, according to that age, to be giuen to those whom wee call the Kings readers, and professors, a fountain from whence are sprung so many great riuers, that in the end they are spread ouer all Europe. The extreame heate, and great drouths, did likewise make this season the more memorabile, by the name which it carries yet, of the yeare of Rashed Vines.

1541. The Emperour hauing by his dissembling disappointed the King of his hopes, it was now needfull to satisfie his friends and Allyes, touching the truth of things past: for (to incense all the Potentates of Christendome against our King) the Emperour had vnder hand giuen them to vnderstand, that the King treated with him of matters to their preiudice.

1541. To this end he sent Cesar Fregose to the Senate of Venice, and Anthonie Rinson a Gentleman of his chamber to the great Turke. The Marquis of Guaft hath some notice thereof, and to surpriſe these Ambassadors with their instructions and letters of credit (which notwithstanding were not found about them, the Lord of Langey, who could not dissuade them from the passage of Po, had so preuailed with them, as they sent their instructions vnto him, to conuey them vnto Venice an other way:) hee lets watches vpon all the passages, especially vpon the Po, knowing well that Rinson, a big fatte man, would rather passe by water then by land) and causeth them to be murdered in their barke, passing at Cantalone, three miles aboue the mouth of Tesin, putting all the Water-men into the dungeon of the Castle of Pauia, as well those which carried the Spaniards, that were the murderers, as the French: they were Souldiers of the garrison of Milan, and of the sayd Castle. An odious and reprochfull act. Some Packets coming from Venice to the King, and from the King to Venice, were surpris'd, and the carriers wounded by men attired after the Marquises deuise.

But see the notable pollicie of Langey, to discover the truth of a fact which the Marquis thought to haue managed so secretly, as it should neuer haue cometo light. Gifts (sayes an ancient) pacifie both Gods and men. Langey findes a means, by money, to file aunder the grates of the prison towards the Castle ditch, with secret Files: draws forth the Marriners, winnes some of the faction to the Kings seruice, learns from them the number, the names, and the nation of the murderers, the order, the manner, and the houre of the murder, and all other auailable circumstances, to incounter the dissembling of the Marquis, who making a good shew of a bad cause, seemed to enquire carefully of the crime, by the Captaine of the Iustice at Milan. The Emperour was then at the Diet at Ratisbone, where he granted an Interim to the Protestants, that is to say, vntill a Councell were held to determine all controuersies of religion, every one should peaceably enioy the beleefe and ceremonies whereof he then made profession: and in doing this, the restoring of the Duke of Sauoy to all his estates, was granted at the Germanys charge.

Soone after, William of Roquendolfe Lieutenant generall for Ferdinand King of Hongarie, was defeated before Bude, with the losse of twenty thousand Germains. It was a great shame for the Emperour, being neere to so mournfull and fatall a check, if hee should not employ his forces in his brothers fauour. He vndertakes againe the voyage of Algier in Afrique, with an intent (that if passing through Italie, he should finde the Kings affaires disordred, and his forces disperſed) to attempt some thing against him, making accompt that the King would not faile to be reuenged of the violence and wrong done vnto him, in the persons of his Ambassadors. But the good prouision which the King had made in Prouence, and in Piedmont, by Langey his Lieutenant generall, caused him to passe on without attempting any thing. Being at Luques, hee had conference with the Pope and the King, sent his Ambassador vnto them, to demand satisfaction for the crime: but he was put off with shifts. The enterprise of Algier was vnfürunate, the violence of the windes, the continuall raine, the stormes and haile, with all the iniuries of the ayre, had coniuired against him: breaking some of his shippes, hee was beaten backe with great danger of his person, and losse of his men.

Hetherto the Marquis had as couertly as he could, disguised the matter: but finding now that all men had discovered his deuises, that notwithstanding the death of the Ambassadors, he could not decipher the Kings desseine: that the King demanded as well from the Emperour, as from the Estates of the Empire, satisfaction for this foule fact: Now to make his cause seeme good, hee writes to the Estates which were assembled 1541. assembled againe at Ratisbone, for their common defence against the Turke, whereby he maintaines, that he committed no act that might touch him for breach of the truce, and in shew to iustifie himselfe of the crime wherewith he was charged: There are (saith he neither denying nor aduowing the fact) two wayes of iustification, the one ciuill, the other Knightly. I offer to maintaine ciuilly, that there is no breach of truce growne by me, and to deliuer into our holy fathers hands (the protector of the truce,) both my selfe, and all these the King shall thinke culpable of this act, to the end the truth might be knowne: and if any Knight my equall will charge me with any such fact, and proue his saying by armes, I will maintaine that he hath spoken falsely, and as often as he shall charge me with the like, so often shall he speake falsely. Wee do often shadow a lye with such good words, as it giues it a colour of trueth. But did he thinke by this brauado, to proue his innocencie? the retreat of those murderers to him, bringing them all prisoners that were left aliue within the boates, to the end there should be no meanes to discover this infamous murder: the detention hee made of the Water-men, whom hee afterwards transported into other prisons vnder his command: the penall Edicts hee did publish in places where the fact might be knowne, against them that should be found discourſing of this action: the ill vsage of them that had spoken of it: the fauours, honours, and aduancements, giuen to them that had bene the actors: the depositions of prisoners freed by Langey, were not all these sufficient witnessies, to crie vengeance against the Marquis: Langey answering to the pretended iustifications of the Marquis, was the Knight to make triall thereof, by the one or the other way. But the Marquis had no such meaning.

Wee haue heard how the King demanded of the Emperour (being in conference with the Pope at Luques) satisfaction of the murder, audaciously and against all diuine, naturall, and humane lawes, committed vpon the persons of two of his especial seruants, men of estate, and of reputation by their birthes, hauing by their merites deserved, the one an honourable degree amongst his chiefe Gentlemen: the other an especial place amongst the greatest Noblemen. They would haue satisfied him with friuolous reasons and excuses, perswading him to leaue the abolition of their blood, to the forgetfulness of time, which might haue bene an imputation to his Maiestie, eyther of want of witte and iudgement, or of valour or courage.

Profit vrged the King, honour prickt him forward, and necessitie constrained him, to vsethose meanes which the law of Nations did allow to him which doth acknowledge no other superiour: and three chiefe reasons did vrge him thereto. Vnder this colour of peace, the Emperour had a thousand practises vpon the frontiers of his realme: and the King had no sooner cut off one of this Hydras heads, but presently there riseth vp an other or many mo. Moreouer, this truce allowed the trafficke and conference of cythers subiects, by meanes whereof so many treasons were practised. Neyther could hee drawe his subiects from the commerce of the Lowe Countries, belonging to the Emperour, without expresse prohibitions, the which by consequence would argue hostilitie. But that which did most moue a noble and generous spirit: hee had good and certaine intelligence, that the Emperour (seeing warre proclaimed, in case hee did not within a certaine time make satisfaction for the aboue named murders) made his accompt, that vnder colour of zeale to the Common-weale of Christendome, (filling the eares of the whole world with a goodly and great enterprise, against the enemies of the faith): hee would raise great forces, and prouide great preparation, at the cost and charge of his most credulous subiects, lying most open and neere vnto the Turkes inuasion: and coniuire the most Christian King to assist him eyther with men or money.

It then the fumes of an Affricane or Turkish voyage, had bene proclaimed through the world, before that warre were denounced betwixt these two Princes, those

Let vs adde, that howsoeuer, he maintaineth men both in Italie, and vpon the frontiers of Languedoc and Prouence, for that both a truce, and warre were of equall charge vnto him.

There were two meanes to beginne the warre: The one profitable and lesse honest. Many thrust him on, some with discontent, others with reuenge, some with couetousnes, some with desire of innouation, or some other priuate passions, offering to seize vpon diuers places for his Maiestie, the conquest whereof, might be a worthie reward for a long and doubtfull warre. The other was more honest, but of lesse profit, iust and not couetous. The Duchie of Luxembourg, and the Countie of Roussillon were worthy motiues in generall, besides the priuate interest of inuasion, which

The causes of a new warre. the King had against his enemy. The Emperour did possesse them both, without any lawfull title. Luxembourg, by the succession of Charles and Philippe Dukes of Bourgoigne, his great grandfather, and his father, who had by force dispossessed the true and lawfull Lords of the said house, who had substituted our Francis, by a new grant into their rights and actions, besides the ancient rights, which the Kings of France haue euer pretended thereunto: and especially, since the purchase which Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the sixth made. Besides that the Lords of la Marke had of late transported their pretensions vnto him, of the said Duchie. Roussillon by the two scrupulous restitution of Charles the eighth: being abused, and deceived (saith the origginal) by friar Oliuer Maillard, his confessor, a man in shew holy, but in effect an Hypocrite, and corrupted with money by the King of Arragon, to sell and deceive his maister. King Charles hauing no power to make this alienation, in prejudice of the Crowne, neither the King of Arragon, nor his successors, accomplishing the conditions annexed to the Contract, Charles now Emperour, was but an usurper, and a violent possessor.

The situation of Luxembourg was commodious to receiue the Germaines that came vnto the King: but more, by this approach, to fauour the Duke of Cleues, whome the Emperour did threaten to make the poorest man in Christendome. So the King sent Charles Duke of Orleans, his yongest sonne, accompanied with six hundred men at armes, six thousand French, and tenne thousand Lansquenets, and Claude Duke of Guise commanding the armie vnder him: Francis of Bourbon Duke of Anguien, brother to Anthony Duke of Vendosme, the Earle of Aumale, eldest sonne to the Duke of Guise, the Lords of Sedan, Jamets, Roche du Maine, la Guiche and many others, men of resolution, valour, and experience. And for the enterprise of Roussillon, Henry his eldest sonne Dauphin of Viennois, assisted by the Marshall of Annebault, for the chief conduct of the warre: and for an assistant in those militarie toyles, the Lord of Montpensat, Lieutenant for his Maiestie in Languedoc. Parpignan is the chiefe Citie of this Countie: the onely barre, and bulwarke of Spaine towards the South: the Conquest whereof drew after it not onely the losse of that which the Emperour possessed on this side the mountaines, but laied open all the Prouince beyond it: and the King conceiued, that assailing it, (being vnturnished of many necessaries, for the maintayning of a great seerge,) either honour, or feare of losse, would draw the Emperour to fight, and with this hope, he prepared the rest of his forces to march in person. But this was but a great shew, without any effects.

The Duke of Orleans hauing assembled his troupes, betwixt Verdon and Danle Chasseau, he beleeged, battered, and tooke Danuilier, a place of Luxembourg: where there came to ioyne with him the Baron of Hedeq sometimes Lieutenant to the Earle of Furslemberg, the Earles of Manssfeld, and Piquelin, and the Colonel Reichbroe, with their regiments of Lansquenets, making about ten thousand men. Then came Comte Reingrane to the Kings seruice, a yong Nobleman, and well resolved, who promised in his person, many good parts, as we shall hereafter see. Danuilier being burnt, as not defensible, had opened the way to Luxembourg: but news comes, that a part of the wall was false at Turye: the Duke turns the head of his armie thither, makes his approaches,

A approaches, plants three Cannons and a halfe vpon the brinke of the trench, but vndirectly, without gabions, without trenches (this was to contemne the enemy too much) and without any couering for them that garded the artillery. The garrison sallies forth in the open day, in vewe of the army, and tie roopes vnto the ordinance, but the weight of them was the let they could not drawe them into the trenches, wherevpon they burnt their carriages and dismount them. They make trenches, and batter it towards Ardenes: they make a reasonable breach, but it was not assailed. In the midst of the breach, the beleeged had a Casemate in the bottome of their trench, the which could not bee taken from them without great slaughter of them that should attempt it.

B They drawe from Sedan, Mouzon and other neere Townes a supplie of artillery and munition: and make a newe battery, the beleeged (being amazed) demand a parle. The bastard of Sombret, the Lord of Noyelles, Hannuyer, Capitaine Famas, Gyles de Leuant and others vnto the number of two thousand men, defended the place, the which could not be assaulted without hazard and losse of men. So it was concluded, they should depart with their baggage, and to carrie with them six faucons with munition to discharge them sixe times a peece. Then William Duke of Cleues fortified the Kings armie with ten thousand Lansquenets, and sixteene hundred horse, led by Martin de Rossan Marshall of Guelares. William had lately espoused (but without any consummation of marriage, by reason of the Infants base age) Ioan Daughter to Henry of Albret and of Marquise the Kings sister, whome hereafter we may see by the nullitie of this contract, to marrie with Anthony of Bourbon Duke of Vendosme, and of their mariage was borne Henry the fourth King of France and of Nauarre, nowely iuing and reigning vnder the fauour of heauen, for the happie presentation of this monarchie. Luxy, (which men held the strongest place in the Countie, & best furnished with men artillery and munition) by their yeelding, caused Arlon to open her gates at the first summons. Luxembourg seemed of a harder issue. It was kept by three thousand foote and foure hundred horse. But the trenches, the approaches and a breach made, although not reasonable to giue an assault (considering the trench was very deepe cut out of the rocke) did so amaze the beleeged, as they yeilded to depart with their baggage. The Earles of Manssfeld and Piquelin promised to defend it against all men: but wee shall shortly see how they will discharge their duties.

Montmedy a small place situate vpon a mountaine, so as they could not approach but on the one side, mooued with this happie successe, yeilded at the first vewe of the Cannon. To conclude, such was the successe in this expedition, that onely Tionuille remained in the Emperours hands of all the Duchie of Luxembourg. But the great fire the Duke of Orleans had to bee at the battell, which, in shewe, was to bee giuen before Parpignan, drew him to Montpellier, where the King remayned attending the progresse of the sayd seerge of Parpignan, to be readie to receiue the Emperour, if hee came to succour it.

E The Duke had no sooner dismissed his army, and turned his backe to Luxembourg, leauing the Duke of Guise as Lieutenant generall for the King, but the Imperialls presented themselves before the Towne, and receiued it very easily of the Earles of Manssfeld and Piquelin: and by the recouerie of Montmedy did wonderfully endamage all the French troupes at Stenay, and along the Meuse, if the Duke (assembling what hee could of those companies, hee had dismissed) had not chased them from Montmedy, before they had any time to bethinke them selues. A stratageme which did pacifie the Kings wrath, for the dismissing of so gallant and braue an army, in the heate of their most honourable and happie successe.

It is commonly sayd, That youth can do what age doth knowe but cannot do. What did this youthfull escape of the Duke of Orleans benefit, preferring a desire of vaine glorie, before the fruits of an assured Conquest? No increase of his reputation: small assistance vnto the Kings troupes, if hee had bene vpon the pointe 1542. point of battaile, and a great prejudice to his Maiesties affaires. for this voyage of Roussillon, being wonderfull sumptuous, and of no profit, he might with great honour haue continued his victories, the which he had so happily begun.

Attempt of Roussillon
frustrate.

Let vs now obserue the successe of this enterprile. Annebault hauing brought vnto the Daulphin, being at Auignon, eight thousand Swisses, six thousand French foote, of the old bands, whereof Charles of Cofé, Lord of Brissac was Colonel: six thousand Italians, foure hundred men at armes, and sixteene hundred light horse, whereof the Lord of Termes was generall; and Montpesat hauing ioyned with him at Narbonne, with his legion of Languedoc, and part of that of Guienne, sixe thousand Lansquenets, and a great number of Swisses, newly leuied, who being ioyned with their Countrymen, made about fouretee thousand, so as the whole armie was esteemed fortie thousand men of all nations, two thousand men at armes, and two thousand light horse. The rough entertainment the Imperials gaue them at the Castle of Sausles, with their Canon and Culuerin, made them to coniecture, that the intelligences which Montpesat the first fire-brand of this attempt, pretended to haue, were vncertaine.

And what successe could Parpignan promise them, finding it very well fortified with platformes, well manned, and well furnished with Artillerie, and munition? what assurance could the assailants haue in a plaine field, behind gabions which they could not fill but with sand. The long time which was spent in assembling so many sundrie nations, and the fruitlesse stay of Annebault, six or seuen weekes in Piedmont, had giuen the defendants time to preuent their enemies desseins. Moreover winter approached, and the Emperour might well keepe the place without hazarding of his person or trying the chance of battaile, wherevnto the King sought by all meanes to drawe him. This was the meanes to take cold, and to consume himselfe in vaine. Vpon the first raine there had bene no meanes to retire this armie, by reason of the floods which runne on all sides from the mountaines, the which the neerenesse of the Sea makes to ouerflow the champion Countrie that lyes neere it, so as being shutt vpon betwixt two Seas, and the mountaine, the enemy would easily haue preuailed. The King foreseeing these dangers, retyred the Daulphin and his armie, knowing but too late, that he had bene ill serued. These flourishing troupes, fresh and resolute, might haue bene most profitably employed in the estate of Milan. But the assurance they gaue the King, to take Parpignan at the first, of two parties made him chose the worst. Moreover, in an armie there is alwayes some one of those that are of the Conncell, (being iealous, and enuying that any other should doe better,) loue rather to crosse and frustrate desseins, then to aduance them.

In Picardie.

In the meane time, Anthony Duke of Vendosme, Gouvernour and Lieutenant for the King in Picardie, suffered not his armes to rust: The enemy lurkt in diuers places, which did greatly annoy Ardres, and the countrie about Bologne: namely Monture and Tournehan, the first being strong of situation, vpon a little hill, at the entrie of the Countie of Oye, discouering all that come out of Ardres. The other vpon the edge of the Countie of Eologne, going from Ardres to S. Omers, belonging to the Countie of Fures, one of the strongest places of the countrie. The taking and razing of these two, was the destruction of many others which held for them, and yet the enemy being the stronger in men, made some shew to trie his forces.

In Piedmont.

But on the other side, the countrie of Piedmont, was left in prey to the enemy, by reason that Annebault had carryed away the troupes for the enterprile of Parpignan. The Marquis of Guast embracing this occasion, assembled his forces at the bridge of Essars, a fit place to haue the riuers at commandement, and where soeuer he pleased, on this or the other side of Po, to assaile Piedmont. Langey Lieutenant for the King in Piedmont, to crosse the Marquis, drawes a company of foote out of euery Towne, makes an enterprile vpon Cony, Quieras, and Albe, being ill furnished with Souldiers. The undertakers for Cony and Albe, wander in the night, and the daye approaching, made their voyage fruitlesse. Aussun Gouvernour of Sauslan, and Centall of Riez, appointed for Quieras, planted their Ladders, notwithstanding the day breaking had giuen the 1542. A the alarm in the Loyat: they forced it, and the Castle hauing but one horse, and two Jacks of meale in it, yeelded, after they had fasted 36. houres. Centall being made gouernour, manned it with two thousand Souldiers, which he leuied, as well vpon his owne hands, as elsewhere.

The Marquis posted to succour them, but the distance of the places required three dayes iourney. He tooke his reuenge vpon Villeneuve of Aix, Pizings, & Emilian, (small places not fortified, & sutable to, passe the Po, and to campe at Maldinham, to take from the French all the plaine countrie, and to furnish Turin and Pignerol, with the other places, which they held on this side, & to take from them all commodities of the Marquillate of Salusses. Thus thousand foote, with some few men at armes, and light horse men, which Langey might oppose against the Marquis, who lead fiftie thousand foote, and two thousand five hundred horse, were not sufficient to stoppe his passage. But the industrie of a well aduised commander, doth often that which force cannot effect.

A gallant stratagem of Langey.

Hee comes first to lodge at Carignan, fortifies himselfe speedily, and with continuall skirmishes, keeps the Marquis from forcing of the passage. The waters were lowe (it was in the moneth of May.) they might easily wade through both aboue and beneath Carignan: these two armies had already camped fiftie dayes one against another, and the weakest in number was almost tyred. Langey himselfe with his exceeding toile, was growne lame, yet hauing his tongue and his spirits free, he winnes from the Imperiall armie, sixe thousand Italians: so as weakening his enemy, hee fortifies himselfe. The Marquis amazed, and fearing lest these should suborne the rest of his troupes, retires to Villedeskelon and Quiers. It was a goodly thing to pursue them, and the Swisses had accepted of this proposition: but instead of passing the Po, being mutined by the persuasions of some, they turne their Ensignes directly to Pignerol, and Boutieres with them. Langey seeing himselfe abandoned, diuides his last come Italians into Caselles and Sirja, betwixt Turin and Vulpian, leaues about fiftie Souldiers in the Castle of Carignan, and causeth himselfe to bee carryed to Turin.

The Marquis hearing of this sodaine departure, sends to summon the place, and threatens the Souldiers with death, if they attend the Canon. They yeeld at the summon. It was likely the Marquis would finish the Forte which Langey had begunne. Hee therefore sends his Brother Martin du Bellay, Gouvernour of Turin thither. Du Bellay sends before him Captaine Maruille, and the Earle Maxime, Anthony de Sesse, his two Lieutenants, with about fiftie horse, to obserue the enemies countenance. The Earle leaues his companion in garde, and by a Trumpet, demands to speake with the Captaine of Carignan. This Captaine goes forth vnder his assurance, (the Earle knew him well: hee had sometimes serued him:) the Earle tels him, they are sent to inuest him, attending the troupes, and the Artillerie, and assures him, that if hee makes any delay, it will not bee in his power to saue his life. So the Captaine terrified by this Stragem, deliues the Castle to the Gouvernour of Turin, who tooke order, the like inconuenience should not happen.

Then the Marquis, after two assaults giuen in vaine to Chinas, and repulsed by Terosme of Drague, hee stayed at Cazal: and Cesar of Naples, to open the way from Vulpian to Turin, hoping to recouer againe the Italians, late fallen from him, came to assaile Cazelles. Langey discouering this desseine, appointed the Cheualier Villaignon to command them, who sent backe his enemy with the losse of about foure score men, leauing his Ladders in the trenches, for a pawne of his vaine enterprile. Barges stoppt the passage from Pignerol to Ranel, and did then greatly annoy the places which obeyed the French, being in the midst of them. The Marquis retired from Cazal could not succour it in many dayes. And therefore not to suffer the Swisses to growe dull, for want of exercise, Boutieres by the commandement of Langey, parts from Pignerol with sixe Canons, findes a Conuent fortified, ioyning to the

1542. the Castle, without the taking whereof the Castle might not be attempted: he makes a breach, takes it by assault in foure and twenty houres, and puts three hundred Spaniards which had the garde thereof, to the sword. Then hee approcheth the Castle, makes a breach, and compounds with the besieged, That if within six dayes the Marquis, or some for him, came not strong enough to raise the siege, they should depart with their lives. The Marquis aduertised of this composition, posts to succour them; and Boutteret being too weake to attend so great a power, retires to Pignerol.

In recompence whereof, Langey takes from him the Castle of Montauban and some other places in Monferrat, being hard to be recovered in winter. And to pull forth some a shorne out of his foote, he causeth Vassé, gouverneur of Pignerol, to practise Paul Monnet Capitaine of Barges, and then with some bands newly come from France, hee marcheth with speed to the sayd place, plants foure Canons in batterie, and by meanes of a hole which hee made in the Tower, although not reasonable for a breach, he receiues both the place and Capitaine to the Kings seruice. The time fixed well for the warre, and the King being loth to loose the opportunitie, and to imploy some part of the forces that were retired from Rarpignan, sent the Lord of Annebault, with the regiment of Reichroc, into Piedmont, with the old Italian bands, and the French, all the light horse, and foure hundred men at armes. This new armie, might in shew (whilest the Marquis of Guaft was at Carmagnole, doubtfull wheate they would make their first attempt) haue surprised Casal, and other places where Langey had intelligence. With this desseigne, he secretly kept boates vpon the riner of Po within foure and twentie houres they might go downe by water: and the Marquis could not come to succour them in lesse then foure dayes marche. Moreouer, a friend (whom he entertained neere vnto the Marquis,) assured him to deliner ouer vnto the French three thousand Lansquenets, and a thousand Spaniards, the which he himselfe should lead, and cause them to be surprised at a passage neere to Villedeslon, where they had no meanes to escape: so as passing the Po by night, they had sent some foure hundred horse, betwixt Carmagnole, and Villedeslon, and opposed the armie betwixt Villedeslon and Quiers. Without doubt Langey being lame of his limmes, employed all his wittes, to discover the Imperials purposes, and still to gette from the enemy. But Enuie hath alwayes sworne the ruine of Vertue. Some enuious persons breake off these two desseignes, and dissuaded Annebault from these great enterprises.

Langey seeing his proiect crost by his enemies, he parted from Turin with the Kings good leaue, to acquaint him with many things touching his Maiesties seruice, which hee could not commit to any mans report: but death preuented him at Saint Sapharin, vpon the Mountaine of Tarare. The Marquis dislodging from Carmagnole, had left so few men in Cony, as a sodaine assault had carryed it at the first. To this ende Annebault parts with foure Canons, and causeth Riuoles to come with the Regiment of Reichroc. The bridges of Carignan and Montcallier were broken, so as the Lansquenets must passe at Turin. Du Bellay Gouverneur of the Towne, and Lieutenant for the King on this side Po, prepares their lodging, to imploy them as they passe. The Tower of Saint Bony, Chastillon, Saint Raphael, and other small places, vpon the Mountaine of Monferrat, did wonderfully annoy Turin: They could not go to the places of Monferrat, whence the victuals (especially Wine) came in great abundance, without being discovered.

He mounts foure Canons, departs with some troupes of horse, three Ensignes of French men of his garrison, and the said Germanes, plants his artillery before S. Bony, makes a hole: the Lansquenets giue the assault, force it, and put all they finde armed to the sword, except the Capitaine, who was hanged by the lawe of armes, for that he had endured the Canon in so weake a place. Chastillon could not be battered but from an other mountaine opposite, and the horses could not draw vp the artillery. The Lansquenets sleight with the prey of Saint Bony, force it vp by maine strength: and

A and the besieged, being foure hundred good men of warre, terrified with the vfrage of Saint Bony, yeeld to depart with their baggage. Those of Saint Raphael, and some other places, send to demand a composition, & retreat. Only Chastillon was defensible, and commodious for the gard of the passage, all the rest were razed.

The Lansquenets hauing ioyned with Annebault, he beseegeth Cony, ouerthrowes a peece of the wall, and giues an assault, but it was the place which was best fortified: a great rampar behind the breach, stayes our men: the which after an howres fight they are forced to abandon, with the losse of many men of seruice: and the night following, two hundred horse, and eight hundred foot being entred, made the Admirall to found the retreat: eight Canons diuided into two batteries, had so troubled the defendants, as not able to answere the diuers assaults, the Towne in shew had beene wonne. But errours are knowne after they are committed. Vpon the retreat, the Earle Maxime Anthoine Maruille, and Theode Bedaine an Albanois, encounter two hundred Imperiall horses, neere to Bra, they charge them, defeate, and take the most part of them, and the enemy hauing abandoned many small peeces, the Admirall reduceth to the Kings obedience Villeneufue of Ast, Poring, Cambian, and Rue de Quers.

Winter did cut off all meanes of more happie success. So dismissing his armie, and sending the Lansquenets of Colonnel Reichroc into France, he took his way to Mont-Cenis: Mont-Cenis is subiect to tempests, as well as the sea. The way is straight, C restrained by two mountaines: when any storme ariseth, the gusts of wind do gather together balls of snow, vpon the tops of the hills, which growing great as they roule downe, ouerthrow all they meet, and they to whome the straight is knowne, (for oft times, the guides are lost) runne many times into caues full of snow. Annebault was in this danger: most part of them that did accompanie him, found their graues vnder the snow: some loose their eyes, other die with cold: some returne benumbed of their feet, others of their armes, and hands, and few of this whole troupe inioyed his perfect health: himselfe was neere vnto a fatall end, if some men attending the end of the storme, in little caues, had not preserued him from the iniurie thereof.

D At that time, the King determined a reuenge against the inhabitants of Rochelle, & the neighbour Ilands which were mutined against the Kings officers, for the custome of salt. Being arriued at Rochell, they assembled all in the gardein, where his Majesty did lie, confessed their rebellion publicly, and most humbly craued pardon for their offence. The furie of a King (saith the wise man) is the messenger of death: but a wise man will pacifie it. And the cheerefull countenance of a King is life, his fauour is like vnto a cloud, bringing raine in due season. The King mooued with the pittifull noyle of this people, crying for mercy, with their hands lift vppe, kneeling on the ground, and teares in their eyes: did graciously remit their offence, freed the prisoners for this offence, deliuered their armes, and the keyes of the Towne, commanded the garrisons both of foot and horse, to retyre: receiued them into grace, and restored their liberties, and priuileges: without doubt, A King maintains his throne by clemencie. In the meane time, many practises, and enterprises, are made against Turin.

The Marquis of Guaft, did at sundry times send vnto the Iudge of Turin, being borne at Quiers, a number of carts laden with wine: and within the vessels which were as long as the carts, many armes, harguebutes, pertuisans, and corselets, to arme fourescore men, the which he should receiue into his house, disguised like cottimen, bringing victuals to the market: who at the first tumult they should heare at the Towne gate, should issue forth armed, and seise vpon the Court of gard, in the market place, whilest that other souldiars armed with Iacks, and shirts of maile, morians, swords, daggers, and targets, brought in fiue carts of haye, sixe in euery one, (the haye being so cunningly layed, as cutting a cord within the bundels, would fall downe,) should fight with the gard at the port, and fauour the entrie of eight hundred horse, and five thousand foote, which should be ready at the alarm. But the enterprise being discovered, made the Judge to loose his head.

The enemy notwithstanding, lets not to proceed to the execution of his carts of haye, in the absence of Bellay, whome his priuat affayres had called into France, after the death of his brother: and the twelfth of February, Boutieres, Lieutenant for the King at Turin, was well aduertised of some carts which were preparing at Lignis, (an imperiall Towne nere vnto Vulpian) but not of the maner of the former enterprise. They hazard their haye. Raimont commanding at the gate, causeth Perichon his Lieutenant to thrust a pike through the first cart: he drawes it out all bloudie: the souldiers leape forth, and the first thrusts Raymonet through the bodie, with his sword. Raimonet takes him by the throat, and stabs him: his companions likewise come forth, force the gard, seife vpon the armes that hang vp, and become maisters of the port. Valiantly without doubt, but somewhat too soone for them, their succours were a mile or more from the first bridge.

Captaine Saluadeur d'Aguerre (who deserues to be named, hauing a great share in the preservation of the Towne) who had then the gard of the place, hearing the alarme at the gate, and crying Sauoye, turnes head with his troupe, repulseth the five that were slipt out off the first cart, and goes directly to the gate. A well aduised Smith, who dwelt nere the gate, goes vp, and with a great hammer breakes the chaine, and lets downe the Portcullis, so as the Imperials could not enter. Boutieres and Moreins arriue, they shut the gates, kill some of the souldiers that were betwixt the gate and the Portcullis, the rest creepe vnder the Portcullis being too thort: and Cesar of Naples (who not many dayes before, had left three of his souldiers hanged at Turin, being executed for an other conspiracie, against the Towne) seeing his enterprise made frustrate, retyred without the losse of any, but of his Lieutenant, who was slaine with the Canon.

On the other side, the Duke of Cleues made warre in Erabant, and had wonne some places from the Emperour. So as the Bourguignons turning all their forces against him, giue the Duke of Vendosme meanes to victuall. Therouenne, to take it. liers by composition, being a strong place, betwixt Aire and Betune, at the entrie of the marsh: to burne the Towne, beat downe the gates, and to make it and many other places about Therouenne, Saint Omer, Aire, Betune, altogether vnprofitable for the enemy. And to the Earle of Aumale eldest son to the Duke of Guise, accompanied with the Lords of Laul, Saint Andre, Escar, Dampiere, Chastaigneray, Esguilly, and a great number of other yong gentlemens occasion, to quicken the enemy with continuall skirmishes, and assaults, most commonly carrying away the advantage.

The happie successe, and the fauorable season, inuited the King, in the beginning of Iune, to go to field with all his forces, with an intent to assaile Auennes, being vnfurnished of men. To this end he sends the admiral of Annebault, newly aduanced to that office, by the death of the Admirall of Brion, that attending his commaund, he should inuest the Towne: and sent to the Duke of Vendosme, to come to him to Cateau Cambresis, which was the rendezvous for all the armie. So the King had the Admirals armie, as a foreward on his right hand, that of the Duke on his left, and his Maiestie in the midst. Longueual and Langey, with their companies of men at armes, and la Lande with a thousand foot, go before by the Admirals commaundement, they take the fort by assault, which the enemies had built vpon the bridge of the riuer of Estruel: and before the Towne had any knowledge thereof, they put to the sword three hundred men, that had the gard thereof. In this annoyment, if they had furiously assailed the Towne, in shew, it had bene foreseeable. Notwithstanding Landrecy, the Castle of Emery, and some other places taken & fortified, gaue entrie into the Country of Hainault. Landrecy is situat vpon Sembre, a small riuer, but deepe and strong vpon the banks, which issuing out of Oise, in the Duchie of Guise, Auaise, runs by Chastillon, Landrecy, Marolles, Emery, and Mauberge: then it runnes into the Meuse nere to Namur. Beyond Sambre, is the Forrest of Mormant, Langey foreseeing that the garrison might vie the same stratageme, they had done in the yeare 1521. had placed a hundred horse betwixt the Forrest and the Towne: that being fortified by the Admiralls comming, they might cut off the retreat to them that were assailed.

But as we haue said else where: Enuy doth gladly crosse braue desseines. The Admirall in steed of fauouring the enterprise, calls back them that were on the other side of the riuer, being ready to performe a worthy exploit. And the enemy seeing the way open, retires into the Forrest, and at their dislodging, consumes the whole towne to ashes: and not able to saue anything but the Church, they burne withall, their victualls and munition, which was sufficient to feede the Garrison of the Towne a whole yeare. To repaire and make it defensible, the King gaue the gouernement thereof to La Lande, who by a counter trench couered it from a mountaine on the Forrest side, which lookes into the towne: he made three great bulwarkes, and filled the castle with earth to make a platforme, seruing as a flanke to the bulwarkes.

Let vs make an other fault, no lesse remarkeable. The Duke of Vendosme, marching by the high countrie of Artois to the Rendezvous, had suddenly reduced Bapaume to his obedience. Auchmont, with the souldiers and Citizens of all sexes, being retired into the Castle, had but one well, which dried vp in twodayes, would haue brought them to the Dukes mercie, when as he receiues a second charge from the King. That vpon paine of disobedience, and to incurre his disgrace, hee should come the same day to him to Cateau Cambresis: so as he left the beleeged at liberty.

The King hauing his forces vnited, he found the number to be about eighteene hundred men at armes, whereof the commaunders were, the Daulphin, the Dukes of Orleans, Vendosme, and Guise, the Earles of S. Paul, Aumale, and Brissac, the Marshall of Bretagne, the Admirall Dampiere, Maugeron, Boissy, Longueual, Ronneual, and many others whose names should be tedious: eighteene hundred light horse vnder Brissac their Colouel: twelue thousand Legionaries, Picards, Normands, and Champinois, and twelue thousand low Germaines.

The Castle of Emery might be fortified, and serue to second Landrecy. To that end the King sent the Daulphin, with part of the army, and some artillery. The Lord of the place, was at the warres in Guelldres, and they which kept it, yielded vpon the first approaches. Langey with his company of men at armes, and an ensieigne of the legion of Picardie, was left for the defence and fortification of the place. The taking of Barlemont, an other castle vpon the same riuer opened the passage vnto Bains, and to the gates of Monts in Hainault. Mauberge was the enemies storehouse, when as he made any attempt against this Realme: and the Towne being vnfurnished of men, able to attend the Canon, the inhabitants yielded to the Daulphin: who (leauing Heyley Captaine of a thousand men, of the legion of Picardie, and S. Yve with five hundred) he retyred to the enemy.

The armie camped ten leagues from Bains: and Bains was the ordinary retreat of the Imperials returning from the warre in Guellderland, who for the distance of the French campe, did lodge confidently in the suburbes and villages about: considering that there were no horsemen at Mauberge, Langey giues intelligence to Maugeron, that they had meanes to do a braue exploit with honour and proffit. He comes with his company of men at armes, and fourescore of the Admiralls: and parting by night, they take (in passage by S. Yve) sitie Harguebuziers on horsebacke, of the Garrison of Mauberge: they lay an Ambush half a league on this side Bains, within a wood, and send La Motte Goudrin Lieutenant to Maugeron who remained sicke at Mauberge, to enter the suburbes of Monts, and by the firing of some howses to take from them of the Towne the knowledge of the enterprise of Bains: and then to retire themselves into the ambush, in case they were charged: and they send Mauville Lieutenant to Langey (who commaunded the ambush) the Vidame of Chartres, la Rocheguyon, and the 1543. the Harguebuziers on horsebacke, to surpris the Imperials in their suburbs, A at the breake of day. Euery thing was executed accordingly. About fixe score horse, arriving the night before, slept at their ease: they awake them somewhat rudely, and carry them away prisoners, spoile the Villages about, and returne to divide their rich booty at Maubeuge. At the same time the Earle of Aumale tormented the garrisons of Auennes with continually skirmishes: but still with the decrease of their men, and no lesse of his.

The prisoners of Bains had assured the King, that the towne was unfurnished of men of defence. He therefore sends the Dauphin and the Admirall to subdue it to his obedience. But at the first approach they found themselves abused. The Imperials had the next day after the alarm, put fifteene hundred Lansquenets into B the towne. Moreover, for want of well viewing the fort, they had indiscreetly planted the Cannon against the strongest part: the battery did small harme: many died there, and many returned wounded. Alegre among others, a young man, who for his age had made good prooffe of his person, lost his life. Gaspard of Coligny Lord of Chailillon (he shall hereafter play many parts vpon the Theater of this history,) for one of the first exploits of his armes, had a shot in the throat. So the great number of Germanes which entered into Bains, the want of munition and victuals (the Dau- phin having brought but for two dayes) the enemies which assembled at Monts, and at Quefnoy le Comte, the daunger the King did foresee, in keeping his troupes divided, the feare that going in person to ioyne with his sonne (with whom were his chiefe C forces, he should be constrained to leaue the fortifications of Landrecy imperfect: his Majesty draws the Dauphin vnto him, he causeth him to beate downe the defences of Maubeuge in his passage: and (for that the Emperour was wont to assemble his forces there that came out off Germany and the Low Countries) to fire the Towne.

Trelon and Glavon, places betwixt Auennes and Simay, did greatly annoy the frontiers of Tierasse and Champagne, Bonneuall, and Stenay, Lieutenant to the Duke of An- gouen (who was in Prouence, as we shall shortly see) had commission to prevent it. Bee-ing come to Trelon, with two thousand French, and foure thousand Lansquenets, stoode within at the first sight of the Cannon yielded to haue their liues saued. Glavon alterwards submitted with the like facility. Both being burnt, but their fortifications not ruined, shall serue againe to lodge the Imperials.

Emery remained still whole, but it might not be made fit to endure the attempts of a mighty army in twelue dayes. Moreover it must bee furnished with victuals. Two rivers not to be waded through, betwixt Landrecy, and Emery, made the victualing difficult. Auennes did cut it off, and the Commissaries of the victuals reported, that to put victuals into Emery, were in time to famish the armie: & to take away the means to victual Landrecy, for the want of carriage, which was greatly hindered by a continuall raine, three weekes together. And that which did most import, newes comes to that the Emperour arriues, and approached neere the countries of the Duke of Cleues, E whom he might not abandon to the pawes of a roaring Lion, who had long time vowed his ruine. So the Towers of the Dungeon of Emery, and the portall of the walls flying into the ayre by myne, and other meanes, serued to fill vp the trenches.

Hitherto we haue made warre with small resistance: hereafter wee shall haue a stronger party, and by consequence more glory to crosse the Emperours attempts, whilest that the famine, and the winter drives him from before Landrecy. In the end of Iuly, Landrecy was in such estate, as without any support of an army, the fortifications might well be continued, leauing some troupes at Guise, and the Duke of Cleues, against whom the Empe: our banded all his power, appealed to the King for succours.
The King therefore to diuert the Emperours forces, to draw him to battell, and to trye if he were accompanied with the like happinesse, leading his forces, in person, as hee had beene by his officers, or at the least by the taking of Luxem- bourg, to make the way easie to succour his ally: he sent the Duke of Vendosme to encounter the enemies attempts, vpon the frontiers of base Picardy, and to fauour the necessary

A necessary victualing of Landrecy: and for the execution of his enterprize, he appointed the Duke of Orleans, vnder the conduct of the Admirall of Annebault. The Prince of Melphes, whom the King had left in Guise, with three hundred men at armes, and Brissac, Collonell of fifteene hundred light horse, assembled to go and ioyne with him about Rheims. And the Earles of Reux and Roquendolfe, with the forces of the Lowe Country, came from a skirmish at Landrecy, which they did hope to surpris, being va-furnished of victuals.

As they trouped together, with a dessein to attempt the Castle of Bohain, newes comes, that La Hunaudaye and Theaude Bedaigne an Albanois, (either of them, being Capitaine of two hundred horse) were lodged neere vnto the Castle of Bouhourie, making account to dislodge so earely, as they might come in time, to part with the Generall. To surprisethem, the Lord of Liques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Ascots compa-nie, drawes eight hundred choise Bourguignon horses, out of the Imperial troupes, two hundred Englishmen, (the King of England being then fauoured by the Emperour, pretended to invade vs, as we shall see hereafter) and foure enseignes of footemen.
But least he should come too late, he leaues them behind him, and marcheth before with his horsemen. At the first, they charge Bedaignes lodging, who whilest the enemy was breaking open the gate, had leysure to put on his Cuirasse: he goes to horsebacke with his launce in his hand, forceth furiously through them, ouerthrowes them, he meetes, and ioynes his troupe with La Hunaudaye, who was likewise on horseback.
C Ache, and Bertrand of Foissy, Lord of Crené, Capitaines of two hundred harguebuziers on horsebacke, being lodged at the same Abby, post to their succours: they force the bridge, which the Imperials kept, and ioyntly with the light horsemen repulse the enemy.

The alarm is giuen at Guise. Theaude Manes, arriues with his two hundred light horse, to second his companions: and Brissac, borrowing about threescore horse of the Prince of Melphes (his troupes had already taken the way to Marle) goes to their aide: he is aduertised by Bedaigne, that the enemy (feareing to haue the whole armie vp-on them) began to wauer: all the troupes ioyne, and charge them sodainly: they ouerthrowe their horsemen vpon their foote, which aduanced, put them to rout: they pursue them speedily, leaue three hundred dead vpon the place, carry away six hundred prisoners, and winne foure Enseignes on foote, and two Cornets on horse. The rest of the Imperiall armie, going to assaile Bohain, hearing of this defeat, and doubting they should be forced to fight with the whole army, grew amazed, & retired to Quefnoy le Comte. The Duke of Orleans, hauing already by the taking of S. Mary (for Montmedy & Tuzy, were vnder the Kings obedience, since the first conquest made by the said Duke) Launulliers, Vireton, Ailen, and other places, made his approches to Luxembourg: hee erect with two batteries at a corner of the high towne, towards France, the one crof-sing the other: the one was committed to the Duke of Aumale, the other to Peter Strossy
a Florentine, kinsman to Pope Clement deceased: who (being lately come out off Italy)
E had brought three hundred Tuscan souldiers, all men of note, and commandement:
two parts armed with Pikes, the third with Harguebuziers, all with gilt coiflets. The Towne was defended by foure hundred horse well appointed, & three thousand five hundred foote well armed, vnder the command of Giles de Leuant, a man well esteemed by the Imperials, and Iohn de Heu one of the Lords of Metz. Yet at the fift or six volle of the Canon, hauing demanded coposition, they departed with their baggage.

Longueuil entered as gouernor, with his company of men at armes. Anglure with a thousand of the Legion of Champagne: Hurancourt a Lorraine, and the Vicomte of Riure, commanding either of them five hundred men: and Ierom Marin a Boule- nois fixe score Italians. The King hauing passed the feast of Saint Michell there, and performed the ceremonies of the order, he disposed of the fortifications of the towne:
then he prepared himselfe to succour Landrecy, which the Imperials besieged, leauing the legionaries of Champagne, & the Normandy vnder the Comte Burienné, to fauour the victualing of his new conquest, the which he had committed to the Prince of Melphes, being

1543. being assisted with the companies of men at armes of the Lords of Sedan, Jamez, br. A enne, Langey, Eslauges, la Mailleray: two thousand Lansquenets, led by Fresnay, and ten thousand Legionaries.

The munition was prepared at Stenay and Mouzon: and for want of carriages, which they had purposely stayed on at sides, the campe was so oppressed with lamene, as the Captaines themselves had no bread to eate. So the souldiers becing impatient and ill affected: disdainning moreouer to see themselves disappointed of the sacke and spoile of Luxembourg, whereof they were in hope, they mutine and returne home to their houses: so as of ten thousand about three hundred remained vnder their ensignes and Captaine Taurinier (whom the Duke of Orleans had left in Arlon) hauing spoiled the Towne, tooke the same way with his companye. Without doubt these poore townsmen newly conquered, shewed themselves more faithfull then this wretch, who was appointed to defend them. They giue notice, that they had shut their gates against the Imperials, that were come to seaze on their towne: and that hauing taken their oath of fidelity vnto the King, they were resolu'd to keepe their faith, so as they might be releued. Ten or twelue thousand Lansquenets were assembled vpon Mozell to hinder this victualing. Notwithstanding through the helpe of the men at armes, and the Lansquenets of Fresnay, Luxembourg was victualled for three months, in despite of the enemy, and Arlon supplied with six hundred men, and such a quantity of munition as the time would permit. The taking of Luxembourg had giuen the King meane, to send the Admirall with foure hundred men at armes, and ten thousand foote, to succour the Duke of Cleues, in whose fauour this warre was chiefly attempted. But the Duke, after the taking of the towne of Dure, hauing no meane to auoide the storme which threatened him with apparant iune, nor long to withstand so great a power, made his peace with the Emperour, yeelded vnto him the Duchie of Geldris, the Countie of Rutphen, and the torts of Heusberg and Sittart, to dispose thereof at his pleasure.

At the same time Don Fernand of Conzague, Lieutenant generall for the Emperour, beseege'd Cuse: but being aduertised of the Kings arrivall at Coney, who marched with great speed to encounter the Emperour, he resolu'd to make his retreat to Landrecy.
 To arrive at their dislodging Brissie with a number of men at armes, and haugb-uiers on horseback, lies in ambushe in a wood, and sends Theau de Bedaigne with his band, to enter skirmish with the Imperiall light horsemen, and to draw them (if it were possible) into the ambushe. But Bedaigne not able by skirmish to make them abandon the body of their army, which marched towards Landrecy, Brissie puts forth five hundred horse, to giue a furious charge, and he followes with his whole troupe to second them.
 Our men making a gallant charge, ouerthrow all they encounter: they kill and take prisoners, amongst others Don Francis of Esle, brother to the Duke of Ferrara, Captaine Generall of all the Imperiall horsemen: and they presse on the rest so hotly, as Conzague gathering together all his battalions, is forced to turne head to saue therest. So Brissie suffered himselfe to go on his pretended way, to ioyne with the Earle of Reux, who had long time before possessed the Fort of Landrecy.

Now are all the Imperiall forces before Landrecy, eightene thousand Germans, ten thousand Spaniards of the old band, six thousand Walons, ten thousand Englishe, thirteene thousand horse, of the ordinarie of the Lowe Countie, Cleues and high Germans. The Campe being lodged, and the artillery planted, the Emperour makes three batteries of five and forty peeces, against the Bulwarke of Orleans, against the Castle, and against the Bulwarke of Vendosme: and to keepe the defendants from making of any rampar, or comming to the defences, the bulwarkes and Curtins being not yett ha'e finished, they plant a long Couluerin vpon a little hill towards the Forrest of Normault. This peece did wonderfully annoy them, and they had no meane to charge the Lansquenets, which did gard it on the one side. Thereafter that passed by the trench of the base Towne, which they had abandoned,

A ranne betwixt them. Ricartulle with fortie horse, and Saint Simon with thirtie foote and some prisoners, vnder take to seize vpon this peece. They passe the water, surpriseth the Lansquenets, put them to route, draw the Couluerin by maine strength to the bulwarke of Orleans, turne the mouth of it against the enemy, & hit the rampar kill many Bour-guignons with their small shot, being come to the trench to rescue it. The King set forward: but the Emperour (to do some notable exploit before his arrivall) onerthrowe a great part of the wall, making it very easie to assaile and to take from the beseege'd all meane to defend this breach, he put men into a portale of the base Towne which was abandoned: and about it he plants certaine field peeces, which commanded the breach.

The soldiars were nowe brought to halfe a loose of progiant bread a day, and to drinke faire water. So whilest they were well affected, and had some courage (for men ill fedde, and tyred with continuall labour faint soone) they must take this lodging from the Imperials. Thre hundred men appointed by la Lande and Esse, assaile them one morning at the breake of day, and before they could come from the Campe to succour them, they dislodge them. The breach invites them to the assault: but the Emperour considering the valour of the defendants, foreseeing that he should hardly take it by force, without the losse of many of his men, he makes his accompt that famine, and the continuall toyle of warre would in the end vanquish them.

The want of victualies, the weakenesse of the place, and the insupportable trauell which they must necessarily endure day and night, made the beseege'd to hazard Yulea Normand, Captaine of five hundred men in Landrecy, to aduertise the King, that extreame necessitie would soone constraime them to yeeld, but no force whilest they had a man lyuing. The King assembles his campe at la Fere vpon Oise: and knowing the resolution of these braue men, he went to lodge at Cusean Cambresys, holding it more honorable to turne head to the enemy, then by delays to make them thinke he would not fight: hee gaue charge to Langey to gather together all the fat Cattell, all the meale, and all the horses of labour he could, that whilest the King should feede the Emperour with the hope of a bataille, they might refresh the beseege'd. The 29. of October hee had drawn into Capelle, twelue hundred sheepe, nine score cattell, six hundred sacks of meale, with so many horses and men, euery one carrying a sacke vpon his horse. The enemy roade vp and downe with a thousand or twelue hundred horse. Notwithstanding Langey hauing ioynd with Sansacs troupe, being resolute to passe on, or to sell their lues deere, he causeth his peasants to march in bartaile, like to men of warre, to the end the enemy discovering them a far off, should hold them to be men of an other quality. Thus they brought their victuals safely to Landrecy, and then retyring a contrary way, to that where the Imperials attend them, they returned safely to la Capelle. Our men are now victualled for fiftene daies, but they haue neede of rest, and the place to be refreshed with men.

The Emperour finding the King to approach, retyred on this side the water, gathering together all his forces, which were before diuided: and his maiesty embracing this occasion, sends the Earle of Saint Paul and the Admirall of Annebault, to retire them out of Landrecy, who had suffered much for his seruice, & to supplie the place with fresh soldiers. They left the Lord of Veruein for the Kings Lieutenant, commanding a thousand men of the Legion of Picardie, and Rochebaron five hundred. la Lande and la Chapelle Ranquin, in recompence of their good seruices, were made stewards of the Kings house: and Esse a gentleman of his chamber. The Dukes of Neuers and Amale, the two brothers of Rochebrouault, the Lords of Andelot, Bresle, Creuecoeur, Bonniuet his brother, S. Laurent of Brittany, Mouy, S. Phale and many other yong gentlemen, (who, to winne honor by some worthy exploits, had voluntarily entred into it,) were rewarded according to their qualities. The soldiars were made gentlemen during their lues, and such as had offended the Lawe pardoned. The King had nowe put in execution one of his chiefe desseins, in vewe of a great Emperour. Winter was com-ming, the continuall raine had made frustrat all their attemptes of warre: and the 1543. long aboard of the armies, had broken the wayes six leagues about. The Emperour camped high with aduantage, hauing a valey and a small brooke not easie to be passed betwixt both the armies. There was no reason to passe the water, and mounting to fight with the enemy. The Emperour likewise would not passe, to give the first charge. So his Maiestie giuing the enemy hope by fires and great noise, that he would fight, made his retreat towards Guisse. The Emperour aduertised in the morning that the armie was dislodged, he commanded Fernand of Gonfagne to follow, (who the better to discouer them) intended to put some men into a wood, where they must passe, but it was too late: the wood was full of French Harguebuziers, who receiued these aduenturers so gallantly, as few escaped to carry newes vnto their companions, of the manner of their retreat.

A braue retreat made by the French.

The Emperour followed with the rest of his forces, whilest the skirmish was maintained in the wood. Gonfagne seeing himselfe seconded by his chiefe Commander, drew forth a thousand or twelue hundred horse, with a good number of thotte, and English light horsemen, on the right hand towards Bohain. But all in vaine, the Canon and baggage (hauing passed the wood) followed the King in safety, who marched before, and the Dauphin holding the middle, with eight hundred men at armes, and foureteene thousand Suisses, hauing left Brissac with his light horsemen, and three hundred men at armes to second him: moreouer the Suisses were behinde in battaile, and himselfe on the wing to support them, with an intent to fight with the Emperour if hee passed the wood: but hee forced the enemy to retire, not daring any more to appeare: many of his men were slaine, many taken, and fewe of ours.

The season was not fitt to Campe. So the King, to refresh his armie, sent the Marshall of Biez to Saint Quentin, with foure hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foote, to oppose against the Emperours desseins vpon that frontier. The Lansquenets to Crecy, vnder Cere, the Suisses to Affy: and hee lodged the rest of his armie along the riuer of Oise. And the Emperour seeing that hee had lost his labour before Landrecy: and that hee had with losse and dishonour followed the French armie retreated to Cambray, winning much more with the Foxes skinne, then hee had done with the Lions: for by meanes of their Bishop, who was of the house of Croy, perswading the light beleaguering Citizens, that the King meant to seize vpon their Towne, to spoile them of that ancient right of neutralitie, and to incorporate them to the Crowne, he made them yeeld to the building of a Cittadell, by the which of free men, they are now become slaues, & this Cittadell shall hereafter serue as a buckler against Landrecy. We haue heere omitted, to describe the exploits of the Duke of Anguien in Prouence. The King had sent him to receiue the armie by sea, which Barberousse brought to his succour. Being at Marseilles, Grignan gouernour of the Towne, did acquaint him with an intelligence which hee had with three souldiars of the garrison of the Castle of Nice, who promised to deliuer him the sayd Castle. The Duke well informed of the Kings pleasure, being loth to commit himselfe rashly to the discretion of traitors, who might as well sell the stranger, as their owne countrie, armed foure Gallies, and sent them before, vnder the command of Captaine Magdelon, brother to the Baron of Saprenquart, himselfe with eleuen other Gallies, tooke the Sea, and the aduantage of the winde, either to second his men, or to retire at need. When as Magdelon approached to Nice, six Gallies issue forth to meet him, and fiftene more lead by Ianetins force, chase him vnto the port of Antibe. Magdelon hurt with a Canon thotte, dyed there after: the Gallies being abandoned, were a prey for Ianetins: and the Duke observing by Moone-light, that Ianetins came to surprize him, retired speedily to Toulon without any losse.

Herevpon Barberousse arriues at Marseilles, with a hundred and ten Gallies. The King F pretends Nice to be his, and heretofore engaged by the Earles of Prouence, to the Duke of Suoy, for a summe of money. They assaile it, and within few dayes bring it to composition. But without the Castle, this victory was fruitlesse: the Castle seated vpon a high

A high and hard rocke is hard to batter, and more difficult to vndermine. So Barberousse seeing the time spent in vaine, and winter approaching, retyred his Gallies to Toulon, and the Duke vpon hope of a battaile, came to the King to Cambray.

The taking of Nice, drew the Marquis of Guast to the Castle: but aduertised of their libertie, hee employed his forces elsewhere. Montdenis was the first place of the Kings obediencie in Piedmont, opposed in his retorne vnder Boutieres, hauing few French foot to man it, he was forced to put in Suisses. The Suisses are more fit for the field, yet are they comended to haue done their duetie. But after many assautes, and toyles, want of victuals, and the sparce of succours, made them enter into capitulation, on the which was all obferued by the Spaniards, who they were dript, and many put to the sword. A wound which shall proue bloudie to the Spaniards, at the battaile of Serrisoles.

Montdenis yielded.

The Capitulation broken

This victory caused the Marquis to passe the Ro, and so take from our men the commoditie of all the plaine of Piedmont, on this side the water, (for that which they held on the other side, as Sauillan, Beine, Roque de Bau and Cental, were without hope of succour) hee turnes head towards Carignan, whether the Lord of Assan, and Francis Bernardin of Fimarcat (hauing no forces to make head against eighteen thousand men, and to take from the enemy all meanes to make use thereof) they raised the fortifications, which were made the year before, by Langcy. But they had no meanes to furnish their enterprise, nor leyure to recouer Moncallier, for the enemy meeting them, at the passage of a riuer, slew many, and tooke the greatest part of them prisoners.

This losse was readie to bee seconded by that of Luxembourg, which the Earle of Luxembourg Furstemberg (a man variable in his parties) beleeged in the Emperours name, with twelue thousand Lansquenets, and a good number of horse. The beleeged wanted victuals, and the winter had not beene so violent in twentie yeares. They diuided the prouant wine with hatchets, and it was sold by waight, and then the souldiars carried it way in baskets. The King being loth to loose any part of his conquests, sent the Prince of Melphe, with about foure hundred men at armes, Brissac Colonnell of the light horse, and some foot. The Earle seeing, that the extreame frosts did kinde the courage of the commanders, and souldiars, who marched with an intent to fight with him, rayled his Campe, and tooke his way to Germanie. The Prince retyred, Langueval, and his troupes, hauing beene long kept in, to inioy the libertie of the fields, leauing the Vicot of Eufsauges, surnamed Anglure, with his company of men at armes, & fiftene hundred foot in it: then he disperited his armie into Garrisons in Champagne & Picardie, to make head against the enemy, the rest of the winter, and to preserve the last conquests. On the other side, his Maiestie knowing, that the Imperials armie was master of the field, he supplied Boutieres his Lieutenant in Piedmont, with foure thousand French foot, leuiued by the Lord of Tais, in Prouence, Dauphiné, and therabouts, and five thousand Gruyers (to ioyne with the five thousand Suisses, entertayned in Piedmont) with some three hundred men at armes. With this supply hee recovered the field which he had long before lost, tooke many small places betwixt Vercell and Yurce, forced Saint Germain (a Towne vpon the way from Chinas to Vercell, where the counterscarpe of the trenches is as high as the wal, so as the Canon cannon bear at the foot thereof) to plant the ensignes of France, and then hee marched before Turce, and beleeged it on all parts. But hee had small credit with the souldiars: and the King was discontent with him, for that hee had so lightly suffred the souldiars to fortifie at Carignan, and to victual it without any resistance. Hee therefore sends Francis of Bourbon, Duke of Anguien in Boutieres place, to bee Lieutenant generall in Piedmont.

The Kings armie in Piedmont.

The Duke of Anguien made Liaute name in Piedmont.

The Duke hauing taking charge of the army, he marched down the Po, & at the first subdued Palexol, Crescentin, Defanne, & other places thereabouts, to make the way easie to Carignan, the which kept all the plaine of Piedmont in subiection: and the King desired infinitely to haue it in his power. But the meanes to force it? It is a place in a plaine plaine Country, it was fortified with five goodly bastions of earth, courtaynes, and a great trench, defended by foure thousand, the best soldiars of all the Imperiall army, so as their onely hope to recover it, was to famish them. To this end hee burnt the bridge they had upon the Po, whereby they might dayly haue refreshment from Quiers, Asl and other places vnder their commandes: and to cut off the victualles they had on this side the Po, hee went to campe at Vimenz, two miles beneath Carignan. They receiued also many commodities from Pauillier vpon the river: this fort built vpon the sayd way a quarter of a mile from Carignan, cuts off Asl: and to enioy the river of Po freely, hee builds a bridge of boats two miles beneath Carignan, with a fort at either end, manned with foure ensignes of Italians. Then passing the water, hee went to campe at Villedeselon betwixt Carignan and Quiers.

Hee seeks to famish Carig-
nan.

The Marquis made haft to assemble his forces to succor the besieged, and came to lodge at Carmagnole. Holding his lodging he might fortifie himselfe, and suffering our mento die for hunger in a Country already wasted on that side Po, he found the Marquisate of Salusses full of all commodities; wherewith he might without danger refresh Carignan. The Duke preuented him, and lodging at Carmagnole, driues the besieged to that extremity; as within fewe weekes they were drawne to the Kings obedience. Carignan was the chiefe trophie of the Marquis victories: he was loath to loose it without some blowes, and the Duke as loath to loose a prey which was readie to fall into his hands.

So the Court filled with the hope of an approaching battaile, that gallant Nobility which had alwayes so willingly gone to horse-back at the first brunt of a battaile, would now haue bene loath to haue lost the sport. All post thither, some with leaue, others without. Gaspar Lord of Chastillon, Francis of Vendosme Vidame of Chartres: the Lords of Saint André, Dampierre of the house of Clermont, in Dauphiné Larnac, the three brothers of Bonnivet, Bourdillon, Escars, the two bretheren of Genly, Astier master of the ordinance, la Hurauday the onely sonne of the Admirall Annebauld, Richafort, Lusarche, Vartis, Lafigny: to conclude the Court was left in a manner naked, namely of those, which as the Sunne rising, followed the Dauphin, and hee was not held an honest man that would not haue his part therein.

A happie arrivall: they were all men of account, they had by this voyage emptied their owne or their Fathers cofers, and the Dukes treasor was so wasted, as both hee, his treasurers and all the rest of the campe had emptied their purses, and for want of money the soldiars would haue bene lesse couragious in this occasion that was offered. But what would not these braue Noblemen do, for the Kings seruice, and the authority of so gallant a Prince that commanded? With their voluntary lendings, the Duke contents his troupes, attending fortie thousand Crowns which Langey brought. This was the forth part of that, which was owing to the strangers: but they must seeke it else where. The Emperour leuied a mightie army in Germanie, to invade the frontiers: moreover a great storme threatned vs from beyond the seas, which soone after fell vpon Boulen and Montrueil.

They had no meanes to content the soldiars, if they had not presently found out the want of their numbers: they therefore resolute on Easter euen the seauenth of April, to make a priuat muster of euery companie apart, and giue them hope to receiue money the next day. But they did foresee, that Easter day would not passe (the armies being so neere without some blowes), and by consequence the enemies presence and the necessity of fighting would easily make them deferre the soldiars pay. And so it proued. The Marquis set forward, with an intent to passe on this side the river of Po, to keepe our men on that side the water, without victuals and without money, and to recouer the Marquisate of Salusses: being assured to finde Corne and meale there to victuall his Campe and the Towne besieged, forcing the French army in the ende to seeke their retreat. Without doubt this had bene their ruine, for the soldiars being vn timerly, what meanes was there to keepe the field? and retyring into Townes the Marquis would haue spoiled Piedmont, burnt the Country, driuen away their cattell and and ruined the Contryman. This was his dessein, and to receiue ten thousand men at Yuree, which the Earle of Challan brought, and with this supply to passe by the valley of Acoust, into Sauoye and Bresse, whilst the Emperour should make some great attempt vpon the frontiers of Champagne.

But he reckoned without his host. The Duke takes counsell, and resolues to fight with him on the way before he should recouer a Country of strength, and to that end giues the forward to Boutieres, who vpon the newes of this battaile was returned from his house: takes the battaile to himselfe, and commits the reuerward to Dampierre. On Easter day euery man is vnder his enseigne, they discover the Imperialls marching from Serifolles to Sammerue, and the Duke to diuert them, sends forth Aussan with his troupe and some shot vnto a high ground of aduantage, who placing his harguebuziers in a litle groue, seeks to drawe the enemy by skirmishes into the ambush. But the Marquis dares not charge home: he feares some disorder before he had discovered his aduersarie. The Duke marcheth with about three hundred horse, and the rest of his shot, and going to the hill, puts all his horse in battaile vpon the side, and in the midst plants three mynyons, which shooting against a battayllon of the enemies, standing in the valley, kills some men, and giues a shew of battaile. So the Marquis fearing to be fought withall as he lodged, retired to Serifolles from whence he parted. Night approached, and the Duke seeing the Marquis returne to Serifolles, retired to Carmagnole, leauing two hundred horse to obserue the enemies countenance in the night, then an houre after midnight he goes to field.

prepare to fight.

The Marquis seeing this retreat, perswaded himselfe, the French would passe on the other side of Po, and leaue him the passage: so as changing his dessein, hee parts an houre before day, to ouertake him before hee should passe the river. To returne to the fort which they had left, had bene (by some signe of flight) to daunt our men, and to giue courage to the enemy, necessity therefore presseth both the one and the other to fight.

The Imperialls had ten thousand men more, and the aduantage of the place: they had recouered that high ground, from whence our men were parted the night before: they should haue kept it, seeing their meaning was to returne. On the right hand of our men marcht the Prince of Salerno, with ten thousand Italians, seconded by eight hundred horse sent by the Duke of Ferrare, to succor the Imperialls. In the midst Ailspand of Madruce with many other German Colonells and Captaines, who commanded ten thousand Lansquenets, all in white armour: and on the left, right against our Gruyens, Don Raimond of Cardone with a battalion of six thousand menold soldiars, halfe Spaniards, the rest German: betwixt these two nations the Marquis of Guast with the like number of horse: on the other side of the Spaniards the Prince of Sulmone, sonne to the deceased Don Charles de Lannoy Viceroy of Naples, Colonell of all the horse, with the like number of horse: ten peeces of Cannons by the *German*s, and as many by the Spaniards, placed with such aduantage as our French could not march against them, but they shot into the midst of their battalions.

The forme of two armies.

Thus they marched in forme of three great battalions of foote, eyther hauing a wing of horsemen. Their order being vewed, the Duke rangeth his armie in the like fort: on the right hand a battalion of the old French bands, being about three thousand besides the shot, led by the Lord of Tais their generall, hauing on the right hand the light horse men vnder the Lord of Termes: on the left hand Boutieres with foure score men at armes: then on his left hand a battalion of Swisses, of about three thousand men, supported on their left hand by the Duke of Anguien with a great troupe of horse: and on the Dukes left hand foure thousand Italians, and Gruyens hauing on their left Dampierre, with all the Gaidons and archers of the men at armes.

The troupes thus disposed and ordred, hee sent forth before the battalies about eight hundred shotte, for a forelorne hope, led by Capitaine Montluc: eight peeces

The bat-
tall of Servilles.

At the sunne rising the two armies stand, one against an other: the skirmish begins, and whilest that either army seekes to get the flanke of his enemy, they continue vntill eleuen of the clocke. In the ende, the enemy finding himself too strong by a diuid part, he comes to the charge. Tais, aduanceth to fight with the Prince of Salerno, but he was commanded by the Marquis, not to stirre before he gaue him charge. So Tais seeing the Prince make no shewe to march, & that our Suisses being weake in number could not withstand the shoocke of the Imperiall Lanquenets, which came to charge them: hee turns the head of his battaillon, and comes neere to the Suisses, boutieres being betwixt both. The Imperialls likewise change their destine, and of their great Squadron make two, one against the Suisses, the other against the French.

At the same instant the horsemen of Ferrare approched, to charge the French battaillon in flanke when as the armies should ioyne. Termes with his light horsemen being loath to attend this hazard, chargeth them furiously, breakes and overthrowes them vpon the Prince of Salerno: and thinking to be well followed chargeth into the midst of the Princes battaillon: but his horle was slaine and himselfe taken. A happie charge, for without it, it was likely the Prince of Salerno had marched vpon the flanks of the French battaillon, and whilest that hee was couered with the Ferrarois that were driuen vpon him, the French and Suisses had leysure to deale with their C Lanquenets: Who falling vpon the Suisses and French, fought long with like armes and a doubtfull euent, till that by the aide of the Frenchmen at armes, led by Boutieres, all the Imperiall Germanes were broken. The Marquis seeing his Germanes in route, vpon whome hee had ankored his chiefe hope: retires apart without striking stroake, and by this means makes the victorie easie for Dampierre vpon the enemies horsemen who supported the Spaniards. But this olde battaillon of Spaniards and Germanes, incounter our Italians and Gruyens with great aduantage: at the first charge they are surprised with feare, and all but the Captaines which fought in the foremost ranks flee.

Without doubt it was wisely aduised of the Duke, to leaue the Suisses, whome D he promised to assist, to second these poore amazed foules, for without him not one had escaped. He suddenly chargeth these olde soldiars, and taking one corner of their battaillon, forceth through them, and leaues not any enseigne of the whole battaillon standing. Yet not without great slaughter of his men. The Lord of Assier, the Baron of Oym Lieutenant to the Earle of Montruel, Montsaillais enseigne to the Baron of Chrysell, de Glaine, gouernour of Cahors Courruille and the Dukes two Squiers ended their dayes there. Saint Amand (otherwise called Rochechaart) and Fernaques were found among the dead carcases languishing of their wounds: yet they were afterwards cured: many others were slaine or hurt, whereof foureteeen or fiftene were Captaines or men of account, but hee that feares the leates must not go into the wood.

But this is not all, for the front of the Spaniards (who, by the voluntarie route of our men that ranne away, had no footemen to incounter them) come furiously and charge the Duke, who hauing no footemen to second him, looeth more at this second charge then at the first: and to increase the danger (which had beene sufficient to daunt a minde inclining to feare) hee had no newes of his Frenchmen, nor Suisses: a little hill kept them from the knowledge one of an other. But hee had rather die then retire.

The Duke of Anguén in great danger.

Hee chargeth and rechargeth, and still a number of the enemies shot pelwell with him, and a battaillon of their pikes followe him without breaking their ranks, and his troupe being greatly wasted, was not now about a hundred men: an vnequal force to fight with foure thousand men.

We

A We may truly say, he is well kept whome God keeps. The Duke was readie to be swallowed vp, when as retiring on the right hand, to free himselfe from the Imperialls shot, which compassed him in on all sides, the Spaniards had newes of the defeat of the rest of their men. They see at the same instant some troupes rallie themselves vnder the Cornet of their enemies generall. So their first heat grewe reasonable colde, and they begin their retreat, but they had no time to finish it. The Duke appoints Aussun with about fiftie horse to charge them vpon the flank, and himselfe with those that came vnto him, followed them in the tayle. All giue way, all flee, every man seekes to saue himselfe, some in the wood, some in cottages: they beate downe and kill, all are taken or slaine, fewe escape.

He wins the bataille.

B The French pursuyng the victory a mile, and especially the Suisses, incensed with the foule warre the Imperialls had made at Montdeuis, and crying in reuenge of that day Montdeuis, put all they incountred to the sword, without mercie. In the meane time the Prince of Salerno, seeing the whole defeat of the Germanes and of their horsemen, made his retreat without any great losse. And the Marquis of Guaft posted away to Ast: but at his departure hee had sayd vnto the Cittizens: That if hee returned not a Conquerour, they should shut their gates against him.

C They take him nowe at his worde. Without the cowardise of the Gruyens, the battaillon of Spaniards had in shewe bene defeated at the first charge: the Duke of Anguén had not receiued so fatall a checke in his troupe, the retreat of the Prince of Salerno had not bene so easie: and pursuing the Marquis, they might haue overtaken him, before hee had recouered Milan or any place of safetie. But the necessitie this braue Duke had to bee succored at neede, made this happie victorie vpperfet in that respect. There were slaine of the enemies, about fiftene thousand, of all nations, in lesse then a quarter of an houre.

Number of the dead and prisoners.

D Of Germane prysoners there were two thousand, five hundred and twenty: Alisprand of Madruce their Colonnell, was found among the dead bodies mayned in many parts of his bodie: Spaniards, sixe hundred and thirtie, amongst them: Don Raymond of Cardone and Mendosa, with seauen or eight other Spanish Captaines. Don Charles of Gonsague and many other Italians. The spoile was great and rich, a hundred thousand Crownes in money and plate, fiftene peeces of artillery, all the bridges they had brought to passe the Po, much munition, meale, and other victualles wherewith they presumed to releue Carignan, about eight thousand corselets of Milan, and mouables of diuers sorts of great value. Of the French, two hundred slaine and of men of name, besides the aboue mentioned the enseigne bearer to Aussun and his Nephewe: Charles of Dros gouernour of Montdeuis, Desero of the Countie of Nice, Colonnell of sixe enseignes of Italians, the Colonnell of the Gruyens, a Daulphinois, in the absence of their Earle: la Molle a Prouençal, Captaine, Panassin a Daulphinois: Barberan and Montault Gascous, and fewe others: of the Suisses, the Baron of Saxe was hurt in the throat with a pike and none else of account.

E If the Duke of Anguén arriual had bene pleasing to the army, far greater had bin the reputation hee had gotten by this famous victorie with all the nations of Europe, and the credit hee purchased with men of warre, commending his wisdom in so young yeares, admiring his valour, and louing his courtesie and bountie, vertues worthe of a great Prince and generall of an armie. This bloudie victorie had terrified the whole Country, and amazed Milan.

The Marquis of Guaft strooke vp the drumme: and twentie dayes were spent before that any man came to his colours. Moreouer the King had made a newe leue of sixe thousand Grisons: the Duke of Somme, the Earles of Petillane, Mirandola, Martinengue, Peter Stroffs, Valere Vrsin, Robert Malateste and many others leuiued an army to ioyne with the Duke of Anguén.

There

There was some likelihood after so furious a battaile, to deprive the Emperour of the Estate of Milan. But he armed upon the Rhin, his troupes were readie to invade the frontier. The English were at sea, and the King had rather neede to drawe forces out of Italie, then to supplie them. The Duke therefore to drawe them speedily to the Kings deuotion, sends the Lord of Tais with the French bands, two hundred men at armes fixe great Cannons with some other peeces, to force some places vnder the Emperours obedience.

Effects following the victory.

Saint Damian a place of Montferrat, had not planted the French nor the Spanish Ensignes: notwithstanding beeing without hope of succors, they yelded to the Yoake, vpon condition that they should haue none but a French garrison. Montcallier followed, being a strong place: Vigon, Pont d'Esture, Saint Saluador, Fresenet of Paw: to conclude all Montferrat, except Casal, Trin and Albe yelded their neckes to the French obedience. And the Duke going to campe at Carignan, did by many forts forrestraine the sallies of the besegged, and the entrie of victualls, as extreame necessitie hauing forced them to demand composition, they departed with their armes, onely without ensignes or drums, taking an oath not to carrie armes of fixe monethes against the King nor his allies. This done, the Duke sent vnto the King, fixe thousand French soldiers of the olde bands, and sixethousand Italians to oppose against the Emperours inuasions.

Carignan yielded.

On the other side the Duke of Somme, with the other of the French faction, hauing leuied ten thousand foote, but fewe or no horse, came to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien. and the Princes of Salerne, and Sulmona, attended with a number of horse and foote, to fight with them at the passage of a riuer. They send to the Lord of Tais, to demand a Conuoie of horse. Hee promiseth, but performs nothing. And they (not able to retire without shame) charge the foote which were farre from their horsemen, and put them in route: But they consider not, that leuieing a place of strength, they giue the enemy the aduantage they had of them. The horsemen come and charge them in flanke, as they had broken their ranks, thinking to haue gotten the victorie, and put them to flight, they take many prisoners of qualitie: kill fewe, and no man of marke except Valerius Vrsine, the rest saued themselves at Quieras and Carignan. Wee commonly say, that a small ayde doth a great good. The footemen being overcome, a hundred men at armes had made the victorie absolute.

The Italians of the French partie defeated.

This checke doth not daunt them. The Duke of Somme beeing newly deliuered from prison, (the Prince of Salerne his Kinsman had freed him, fearing least the Emperour should do him some disgrace) and Peter Strossy, gathering together fixe thousand men of this shipwracke at Miaandole, meaning to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien at what price soeuer, hee being vnfurnished of forces, for besides the twelue thousand men hee had sent vnto the King, all his Suisses, (except two thousand) had bene for want of pay dismissed. They giue ouer the playne, and passe out of Parmisan with much toyle, by the mountaines of Genes.

The Marquis aduertised of this newe assembly, gathers together what forces he could of horse and foote, drawes forth his garrisons, and to stoppe to their passage attends them at the foore of the mountaines. They aduertise the Duke. Who hauing no men, but for the gard of his places, resolves notwithstanding to effect two things at once, and both to surprise Alba where they had left no men but for the gards of the gates, and to succour Strossy, and finding meanes to aduertise him, that hee should march towards Alba, whereof the enemy was left in doubt. The Duke comes thither on the one side, and Strossy on the other: hee makes a hoale in the gate towards the mountaine, on the other side of the water, about ten foote long: prepares to giue an assault, and Strossy the scalado, which the besegged seeing, they growe so amazed, as they yeld the place, and depart without carrying away of any thing.

Alba taken.

A The Marquis makes hast to succour them, but knowing the Towne to be lost, frustrate of his hope, he retired, and the Duke hauing taken many places about, returned to Carmagnole. Within fewe daies after the Marquis practised a suspension of armes, which beeing confirmed by their two maiesties, there followed a truce for three monethes. Let vs now see the enemies attempt inuading the realme. The Emperour had no sooner found the King of Englands discontent, (whereof the marriage of the King of Scotland had bene the chiefe motiue) but forgetting, or rather dissembling the injuries he had receiued, he winnes him to his deuotion, although he had assured the Pope neuer to treat any alliance with him, vntill he had repayed the offence done vnto the sea of Rome, intitling himselfe supreme head vnder God of the Church of England, and punishing them which maintayned the authority of the Pope and the Church of Rome.

Truce in Piedmont.

Thus two grey-hounds tearing one another in peeces, lay aside their choller to name after the wolfe their common enemy. And for that, during the warre of the Dukes of Wirtemberg, by the bond of the Princes of Germanie with the King, the Emperours desseins had bene greatly crost, nowe perswading them (and aboue all the Protestants) that he hath done more then his dutie to the King of France, for the calling of a Councell, to call backe them that were strayed from the vnion of the Church, and to reforme the Pope and his ministers: but the King only had hndred this assembly, to giue him prouision of men and money, and ioyntly to bande with him to the destruction of this realme.

So hee sends the Earle of Furstemberg with an army before Luxemburg, which hauing mayntained the feege to the extremity, for want of victualls, the Viconte of Estu- Picardie. ges was forced to capitulate, and to depart with baggage. Commercy was the second triumphe of his victories. Ligny in Barrois the third, beeing the way for victualls which came to him from Metz & Lorraine. The Castell is commanded by two or three mountaines, and the besegged not able to stand to their defences, came to parle, when as the Imperials entering behind, compassed them in that were come to the breach, attending the assault: and take them prisoners with small slaughter. Without doubt the place was not to withstand the force of an Emperour, beeing in person: neyther was it so contemptible, but it deserued an honest composition. But the Earle of Brienne, Lord of the place, and Rouffy his brother, Eschenais & Gonzolles, who commanded about a hundred men at armes, and fiftene hundred foote, wonne small reputation. Doubtlesse the Earle of Sancerre wil winne farre more honor in the defence of Saint Disser, a place ill flanked, ill rampared, and vnworthy to oppose against an Imperiall army. Whilest the King assembled his forces, being ten thousand Suisses, six thousand Grisons, sixe thousand Lanquenets (whereof the Duke of Neuers was generall) and the twelue thousand men which came out of Piedmont, hee sent the Earle of Sancerre, to Saint Disser (whether the Emperour turned the head of his victorious army, without con- tradition) with the Duke of Orleans companie of a hundred men at armes, whereof he was Lieutenant, and some other troupes of horse: la Lande and the Viconte of Riniere eyther of them with a thousand foote. The Emperour being come before the towne, hastens his approches and trenches, makes two batteries, and plants fixe great culuerines towards the Castell, to beate into the Towne and to hinder their ordinarie sallies: he turned the water out of the ditch, and brought them to the vse of three wells onely, which hardly could furnish the soldiers: and by a continuall battery, doth exercise their care to repaire it. La Lande was tired with this toyle, & retrying at night to his lodging to refresh himselfe, a Cannon shot passing by the breach through the Towne, takes of his head, whose losse was much lamented being a valiant gentleman, and a good soldiier. In exchange, about the same time the Prince of Orange going to visit the Emperour in the trenches, a Culuerin shot into a heape of stonnes, hurt him in such sort as hee died, to the great greefe of the Emperour and his whole army.

The death of the Prince of Orange.

The breach was reasonable, and they come to the assault. Eightene enseignes of 1544. of Spaniards goe to it, and fight hand to hand, with them which were beseegeed, for an houres space.

A furious assault at Saint Disier.

The Emperour causeth nine or tenne thousand Germaines, to aduance speedily to succour them: but if the assault was fierce, the defence was no lesse valiant. Our men ouerthrew the Spaniards, from the breach into the ditch, by maine force. The Emperour sends about night, a hundred men with velvet cassocks, bourgunnets on their heads: they turne them likewise downe. Eight ensieigns of Germaines renew the assault with many smal barrells of powder, lances, & artificial fires. They are likewise repulged, with such shame and losse, as all their engins and deuises remaine in the ditches at the defendants discreuion: (and very happily, for they wanted powder) and seuen or eight hundred slayne in three assaults, gaue a certaine testimonie of the valour of the beseegeed. A Canon shot did miraculously take away the Earles sword which hee held in his hand, without hurting him, but lightly in the face.

This braue defence made the Emperour thinke, that the beseegeed would accept of an honorable composition. He sends a trompet to trie their minds. But he had no audience. So the Emperour ceaseth his batterie, to come to the vndermine. The beseegeed discouer it, and in the night send forth Linieres, a Norman Captaine, who force the Spaniards, to abandon the trenches, which they had brought to the bulwarke of victorie: they bring some pioners into the Towne to tell newes, and cuts the rest in peeces. Moreouer, the Duke of Aumale being at Stenay vpon Meuze, did greatly annoy the Imperials campe, and cut off their victuals from Bar-le-Duke. They must therefore seeke to winne by pollicie, what they could not get by force.

The Lord of Grannelle had surpris'd a pacquet, wherein he found the Alphabet of the Ciphre, whereby the Duke of Guise did communicate with the Earle of Sancerre. By this meanes, hee counterfeits a letter in the Dukes name, and makes an vknowne man to giue it secretly to a French dromme, returning from the enemies armie, for some prisoners, that hee should deliuer it to the Earle. The contents were: that the King knowing, in what want of victuals and powder they were readie to fall, commaunded them to make so fauourable a composition, as their men might be saued, hauing yet no meanes to succour them. They had indured fixe weekes secege, their victuals, and munition grew short, and their powder was not sufficient, to indure another assault. So they obteyne twelue dayes truce, during the which, they should vnderstand from the King, if he had meanes to succour them: or if he would be pleased, that for want of succours within the time, the horsemen should depart with their armes, & horses, their Cornets displayed, and casques on their heads: the footmen with their armes marching in battaile, ensieigns displayed, & drums sounding, carrying with them all their iewels, and foure peeces of artillerie, furnished at the choise of the beseegeed. This treatie pleased the King, and they departed according to the Capitulation. As honorable a Composition as euer was read off, for men beseegeed by so great an Emperour, with all the forces of the westerne Empire, in a bad place which had no better effect, then a Countie Towne.

Saint Disier yielded.

But what was the motiue of this easie accord? The Emperour was not ignorant of the small hope they had of succours, and that within few dayes famine would bring them to his subiection. But hee would take from the King of England, (who camped before Boulen and Montrueil) all colour of excuse, and to let him know that the fault was not in him, if the treatie were not fulfilled, according to the which, without any stay elsewhere, they should ioyn their forces nere vnto Paris, (the which vnited together, would haue made threescore and tenne, or foure score thousand foote, and eightene or twentie thousand horse) and to force the King to fight with disadvantage, or to suffer his countie and subiects to bee ruined before his face. Moreouer, hee did foresee, that the Dauphin camping vpon the riuer of Marne, with the bands come out of Piedmont in good order, and well armed, would make him consume his armie, whilest the King made a body of fortie thousand men, the which confronting him, being fresh, iustie, and

A and resolute, might cause him more losse and shame, then hee had receiued in Trouence. 1544.

And therefore the Emperour, to proceed in his conquests and desseignes, which he had with Henry King of England, came to lodge at Vitry in Parthois. Here hee learns that the King of England is not resolute to passe on, before hee had reduced Boulen and Montrueil to his obedience: the first dislike which shall soone draw the Emperour to Bruxelles. Hee considers, that the trauels past at Saint Disier, and want, had great leuasted his Souldiars: that to proceede, were to ingage both his men and his person, in a Laborinth, from whence hee should not easily free himselfe with honour: that hauing in front a mightie armie, still prospering, hungar, besides the Kings power, was sufficient to force him to make a shamfull retreat: that if the English take Doulen and Montrueil, he will impart nothing to him of his conquests, that being strong on this side the Sea, hee will bee more obstinate when there shall be any question to treat with him. So as hee begins to taste of some proposition of peace, moued before Saint Disier, by the Lord of Grannelle and his Confessor, a Spanish Monke, of the order of Saint Dominike, and of the house of Gusmans. A day is appointed for the meeting of the Deputies at La Chaussee, betwixt Challons and Vitry. For the King there came the Admirall of Annebault, and Chemans, Keeper of the Scale of France: for the Emperour, Fernand of Gonzague: and to know if the King of England would enter into it, they sent the Cardinall of Bellay, Raymond chiefe President of Roman, and Cadepine Secreterie of the State, and Treasurer.

The Emperour it understood of his retreat.

A treatie of peace.

As the Emperour camped towards the riuer of Marne, a league beneath Challons, and within two leagues of the French armie, a riuer being betwixt both, William Earle of Fursenberg, parted about midnight with a guide onely, to view a foard which hee had in former times passed, when as he came into France for the Kings seruice. Being come to the foard, he leaues his guide vpon a banke: sounds it, findes it easie, and passeth the riuer. But hee discouered not some Gentlemen of the Kings house, and part of the Admiralls company, who had the gard that night, who without giuing any alarm, but themselves betwixt the riuer & him, take him without resistance, lead him to the Campe, know him, and send him to the Bastille at Paris, from whence he shall not depart, vntill he hath payed thirtie thousand Crownes for his ransome. In the meane time the Emperour sees his armie ready to breake for hungar: they cutt off his victuals behinde, and on either side. And if that goodly Captaine whom the Dauphin had sent to draw into Espernay the victuals thereabouts, to breake the bridge vpon the riuer, and to spoile the Corne, Wine, and other prouisions, which could not be saued, had carefully executed his commission: the Emperour (disappointed of the munition and victuals which hee found in Espernay, and hauing no meanes to passe the riuer) had not in the end enioyed those commodities, which hee found in Chasteau Thierry, another Storehouse of the French campe, whereby his troupes languishing for hungar, recovered some strength.

In the end the Dauphin being come to campe at La Ferté vpon Touarne, and hauing sent a good number of men to Meaux, to hinder the Emperours passage, who deuising to make his retreat by Soissons, he takes his way by Villiers-coste-Retz, & vnder hand resumes the proposition of peace with the King. The King knowing that a battaile could not be giuen in the heart of his realme, so nere vnto his capitall Citie, without a veltie doubtful and dangerous consequence, and the losse of men, and in case he should vanquish the King of England, and the Earle of Bures would encounter him with as mightie an armie, as his owne: that by the losse of one, and perchance two battailes, his realme were in danger: that winning them, hee should get little, especially vpon England being an Island. Moreouer the Marshall of Biez, was almost forced to yeeld vnto Montrueil, to the English, for want of victuals and succours: the sufficiencie of the Lord of Percein gouernour of Boyllan, as we shall shortly see, was not without cause suspected: and without a conclusion with the Emperour, hardly could these two important Townes be recovered.

The King therefore sent the Admirall of Annebault againe to the Emperour, being in the Abbie of S. Iohn des Vignes, in the suburges of Soissons, where in the end was concluded: That Charles Duke of Orleans, should within two yeares after, marry with the Emperours daughter, or his neece, daughter to Ferdinand King of Romaines, and at the consummation of the said marriage, the Emperour should inuest the said Duke of Orleans in the Duchie of Milan, or in the Earldome of Flanders, as the Low Countries, at the choice of the said Emperour. And in exchange, this done, the King promised to renounce all his rights pretended to the said Duchie, and the Kingdome of Naples, and to restore the Duke of Savoy to the possession of his Countries, when as the Duke his sonne should deny the said Duchie of Milan or the Earldome of Flanders: and all things during the terme of two yeares, as well on this, as the other side the Alpes, should remaine in the same estate, as they were at the truce made at Nice. So the Emperour deliuered vnto the King on this side the mountaines, Saint Desier, Ugray, Commercy: and the King Tuoy, Montmedy and Landrecy. Strasbourg was deliuered into the Duke of Lorraines hands, and the fortifications razed. On the other side the Alpes, the Emperour had nothing to yeeld but Montdenis: and the King, Alba, Quieras, Antignan, Saint Damian, Palezol, Cresentin, Verrue, Montcal, Barges, Pont d'Esure, Lans, Vigon, Saint Saluador, Saint Germaine, and many other places which he possessed.

These treaties thus concluded, and proclaimed beyond the Alpes, the Duke of Anguien returned into France, with as great glory and honour, as a wife and valiant Prince could enioy. and the Emperour retired his armie (which the Earles of Reux & Bures lead ioyntly with that of England): he dismissed his owne, and parting from Soissons, tooke his way to Bruxelles, accompanied beyond the frontiers by the Duke of Orleans, the Cardinals of Lorraine and Mendon, the Earle of Laval, la Humauday & others. The Emperour is now out of the realme: let vs also seeke to send the King of England beyond the seas. Henry the 8. King of England, according to the League he had with the Emperour, landing at Calais, with an armie of thirty thousand men, fortified with ten thousand Lansquenets, and three thousand Reislres, which the Earle of Bures lead, and the troupes of the Earle of Reux, chiefe of the army of the Low countries for the Emperour, he found Picardie very much vnfurnished of men: the King had withdrawne his forces towards Champagne, to oppose them against the Emperour: and the Duke of Vendosme being weake in men, had fiew places of importance to furnish, Arde, Boullen, Therouenne, Montrueil, Hedin, all equally opposed to the inuasion of the Engliss.

The King of England besiegeth Boullen & Montrueil.

Henry therefore seeing no armie to withstand him, making his account to carrie a legge or an arme of the body of this realme, sent the Duke of Norfolke and the Earles of Reux and Bures to besiege Montrueil: and himselfe went and camped before Boullen. The Marshall of Biez was gouernour. But when hee saw the enemy tume the point of his armie towards Montrueil, he left the Lord of Veruein his sonne in law, to command in Boullen: from which he was dissuaded by some, to whom his sufficiencye was well knowne) assisted by Philip Corse a Captaine very well experienced in armes, the Lords of Lignon and Aix, otherwise called Renty, young, and without experience, with their regiments, and halfe the company of a hundred men at armes, of the sayd Marshall: and he put himselfe into Montrueil, with the Constables companie of a hundred men at armes, lead by la Guiche his Lieutenant (a man of great experience in the Arte of warre:) Genly, Captaine of foure Ensignes of French foote, the Earle Berenger and Francis of Chiaramont, Neapolitans, eyther commanding a thousand men.

At the beginning of the siege of Montrueil, the Duke of Vendosme aduertised of a Conuoy of victuals, which came from Aire and S. Omer to the enemies campe, guarded by eight hundred horse, and twelue hundred Lansquenets, with foure meane Culuerins, to fortifie themselves, if they were charged: he sent the Lords of Villebon, Espre, and Eguilly, with their companies of men at armes, to busie the enemy, vntill that hee might come with his company of a hundred men at armes. Chastaigneray, with fifty of the

A Daulphins, and Senerpont with the like charge, who arming in troupe, charged the enemy, brake them, put them in rout, and besides the dead, carrie eight hundred prisoners to Therouenne, win two Culuerines, (the other two remayning, for that their carriages were broken) and foure enseignes of Lansquenets.

On the other side, the Kings presence before Boullen, kindled the courage of the besiegers, and daunted Veruein, the head of the defendants, a man of no worth. The first approch of the Cannon killed his heart: and amazed with the furious batterie of the enemy, after hee had endured a kind of an assault, (but whilst that Philippe Corse stood by him, who being slaine with a Canon shot) hee sends presently to sound the intent of the King of England, and yeelds him the Towne by composition: That the men of warre, and Citizens, should depart with their baggage: deliuered him the place, with all the artillerie, munition, and victuals, whereof there was great store. The inhabitants refuse this bad composition: the Maior offers, with the Townsmen, and those that were well affected, to keepe the Towne. A shew of loue very commendable in this people, but in such an action he should haue proceeded farther, and haue lodged the Captaine, where he might haue yeilded a good account to the King, and by the effect, haue performed what was offered. Without doubt, his Maiestie would haue allowed the enterprife, as done for the good of his seruice. for the Capitulation was no sooner concluded, and hostages not yet giuen, but a horrible tempest of wind and raine, ouerthrowes all the enemies tents, and leaues not one standing, and the soyle being fatt and slipperie, they had no meanes to mount to the assault. An vndoubted signe of the present assistance, of heauen. Moreover the Daulphin marched with speed to succour them: who by his approch, had made the King of England to change his dessein. But, sayd Veruein, I will not breake my word with the King of England. A foolish, and impertinent scruple, to continue constant in a treacherous promise to the enemy, and to make no conscience to breake his faith to his naturall and Soueraigne Prince. A scruple which shall soone make him iustly to loose his head on a scaffold at Paris.

This peace with the Emperour, had greatly impayred the King of Englands forces: Seege of Montrueil. To surprise their campe before Montrueil, and to take Boullen from them, before they had fortified it, the King causeth his armie to march with speed. But the Duke of Norfolke, fearing least the French armie would come betwixt Boullen and him, and cut off his retreat, he rayled his campe, and went to ioyne with the King of England: who knowing his forces, being diuided from the Emperours, would be vnable to encounter the Kings armie, he imbarcad a part of his great artillerie for England, and leauing the Duke of Somerfet for the gard of his new Conquest, hee retyred to Calais.

The haste he had to dislodge, caused him to leaue part of his artillerie, victuals, and munition, in base Boullen, being fortified only with some small trenches: for the surprising whereof, the Daulphin sent in the night, two troupes, led by Fouquessolles, and Tais, and to second them, he leaues six thousand Grifons in a valley. Fouquessolles and Tais enter the place, cut all in peeces they meet, winne both the artillerie, and munition, and thinke to haue gotten an absolute victorie: but for want of making a stand, oftne or twelue enseignes betwixt base Boullen, and the high Towne, to hinder their sallies, and to leaue some troupe in battaile in the market place of the base Towne: fiew or six enseignes issue forth from the high Towne, and finding souldiars in disorder, busied at the spoyle, they put them in rout. Fouquessolles was slaine, Tais hurt, and no persuasions of the Capitaines could euer stay the rest, but they cast themselves confused, yamong the Grifons, to saue their liues: yet were they (saith the Original) as good souldiars, as any were that day in Europe: but in matter of enterprises, if all accidents bee not foreseene, it is too late to repaire them, when the disorder is happened.

The Day being come, and the rayne falling in such abundance, as the most part of our shot had no fire: the victuals by reason of the bad way could not followe, all the Countrie of Boullenois was wasted, spoyled, and burnt, euen vnto Montrueil, and 1545. and from Montrueil to Abbeville, (which were seenteene Leagues) no grasse, nor forage for their horses. So the Daulphin hauing receiued newes from the King, dismissed his Suisses and Grisons, leauing the Marshal of Biez in Montrueil, with the French and Italian bands, come out of Piedmont, and retyred to the King his father, at Saint Germain in Laye.

Then dyed James King of Scotland, leauing by his death, his realme in prey to his neereſt neighbour. To ſaue it from oppreſſion, and keepe the people in the obedience of the Queene Dowager, (he had taken to his ſecond wiſe the daughter of the Duke of Guise) the King ſent (with a good number of men, and money,) the Earle of Lenox of the houſe of Steward, Nephew to the deceaſed Marshal of Aubigny. The Earle being yong, and ill aduiſed, hauing in his vaine and riotous expences implored the Kings money,, and fearing to be accuſed of theſt, retyred to the King of England, who deſiring to vie his ſeruiſe, and to tie him by ſome notable bond, cauſed him to marry a Neece of his, daughter to his ſiſter, mother to the deceaſed King of Scots. The King aduertified of this reuolt, ſent la Broche, a gentleman of Bourbonnois, wiſe and well aduiſed, to giue counſell and comfort to the widowe, and ſoone after, the Lord of Lorges Earle of Montgomery, to croſſe the King of Englands attempts againſt the Scots.

King.

But in caring for the affaires of another, ſhould hee neglect his owne? Boullen poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, was too great a beame in his eye: it was an open port for the enemy to take footing daily, and to fortiſie himſelfe within the realme. They therefore make great preparations by ſea and land, to diſlodge them. By ſea hee ſends Cap- taine Paulin (hereafter Baron of the Garde) into Prouence, to bring ſiue and twentie gal- lies out off the Eaſt ſeas, into the Ocean, by the ſtraight of Gibraltar, and eight, or tenne Carracks of Genoa: but they came ſo late, as they ſerued to no uſe: moſt part of them periſhed at the mouth of Seine, for want of expert Pilots. By land hee raiſed a mightie armie, vnder the commaund of the Maſhal of Biez, to campe before Boul- len, the riuier betwixt both, attending his armie by ſea, and there building a good fort vpon the point of the Tower of Ordre, to keepe the enemy within their wall's with the Canon, and to cut off all meanes for the ſhipps to enter into the hauen, to ſuccour the Towne: making account to goe afterwards in perſon, to beſeege Guines, & there to fortiſie: to keepe Calais, and the land of Oye in ſubiection, and by that meanes to ſa- uer the Boullen. But man purpoſeth, and God diſpoſeth: wee ſhall ſee both Boullen and Calais, by other meanes, and at diuers ſeaſons, reduced to the obedience of this Crowne.

The King of France his ſeruice, giueth
England.

According to theſe deſſeines, the King ſent Cont Reingrand, the Colonells Re- chro and Lodowike to fill vp their regiments of Lanſquenets, to the number of foure or ſiue thouſand a peece, and to ioine with tenne thouſand men, which he leued in Gasconie and Languedoc. This done, his Maieſtie tooke his way to Normandie, to em- baik his armie at Newhauen, and being at Touques about Midſomer, he diſcouered his armie out of the Leuant ſeas: then vpon the aſſurance which the Maſhal of Biez (hauing receiued the Lanſquenets, and ſixe or ſeuene thouſand pioners) gaue him, that by the miſdeed of Auguſt the fort of Boullen would bee in defence, he cauſed his Na- uie to ſet ſayle, wherein the Admirall of Annebault commaunded. But beheld a pit- tiful beginning. As they come to weigh anchor in the Carragon (which was the good- lieſt ſhip of the weſterne ſea, and the beſt ſayler being of eight hundred tunns bur- then, in the which the Admirall ſhould fight) fire takes the gunners roome, and con- ſumes it to aſhes. Many, to auoyd the fury of the fire, leaped into the ſea: the galleies ſaued many, and many were caſt away: the fire takes the artillery, (there were a hun- dred great peecees of braſſe) which ſinking all that was before them, behind on the ſide, forced the other ſhips to giue roome. A hundred and ſiftie great ſhips, three- ſcore baiks, and ſiue and twentie galleyes ſet ſayle, the 6. of Iuly, and bore their courſe towards the Ile of Wight, and the hauen of Portsmouth in England, where the Engliſh had threeſcore ſhips, well appointed for warre.

A The Admirall reſolued to fight with them, made choiſe of thirtie ſhips, to accom- panie that wherein he would fight: Boutieres coaſting this Squadron on the right wing, with thirtie ſixe ſhippes, and the baron of Curton on the left, with the like number: The aduantage of the place where the enemy lay, defended on the one ſide by ſome ſores, and on the other with rocks, banks and ſands couered with water, which lie in the miſdeed of the way: and make a narrowe and crooked entrie, diſſwaded him.

To draw them to ſea, the gallies aduance, ſkirmiſhing with their Canon, and fight- ing, they retyre toward's their ſquadrons. The calmnes of the ſea, without any wind, or great current, ſhewed it ſelfe fauourable to our men, for the ſpace of a whole houre in the morning, hauing meanes to gouerne their gallies at pleaſure, and annoy the ene- mie, who for want of winde lay open to the French artillery. So the Mary-roſe one of the beſt ſhips of their fleet, was ſonke with the Canon, and of ſiue or ſix hundred men, onely ſiue and thirtie eſcaped: the great Henry which carried their Admirall had made the like end, if the neere ſhips had not ſuccoured it. And greater loſſes threatned them, when as the wind changed, and became good for them, preſerued them from perill, and ſerued them to charge our ſhips with full ſayles: which change was ſo for- dane, as the Engliſh ſhips purſuing our gallies, were readie to ouerturne them, if by a great aſſurance of the Commanders, and experience of the ſaylers, and rowers, hauing no Canon in their poupe, they had not ſpeedily turned their prowes, who being without the reach of the Canon, ſlacke their courſe, ſeeking to draw the enemy out of the rocks and bankes, as they had bene directed.

Some Engliſh pinaces (theſe be ſhippes more long in forme then round, more narrow then our gallies, ſwift, and eaſie to gouerne, and which better command the currants in that ſea) followed with an incredible ſwiftneſs, and with their artillery, did wonder- fully annoy our gallies: when as the Prior of Capua, brother to Peter Stroſſy, impatient of this brauadoe, turnes his gallie againſt a Pinace, which ſurpaſſeth his companions, was readie to grapple with one of our gallies in poupe, and forceth him to retire to the bodie of their battaile. And our Admirall hauing now put his ſhips in order, and readie to giue the ſigne of battaile, he ſees the enemy retire from the chaſe, and returne to their hold. In this conſiſt, they looſe ſome ſlaues, few ſouldiars, and no men of account.

They muſt now prepare an other baite. The King of England was at Portſmoth, and the Admirall (burning his Countrie, and killing his men in his ſight) imagined that the indignation of this wrong, the compaſſion of his ſubiects blood ſpilt, the ſacke and burning of his Countrie, would force him to ſend forth his ſhips, to ſuccour them, (being not about two Canon ſhot off,) or elſe the ſubiects wrongs, being no way re- leued by the preſence of their Prince, would breed ſome ſedition, and mutinie in the Countrie. He therefore makes three ſundrie landings, to diuide the enemies forces. The one by Stroſſay, vpon a little fort, furniſhed with artillery, which did beat our gal- lies in ſtanke, and manned by the Countymen, who ſeeing the reſolution of our men, a- bandon their fort, and ſlie to a wood neere by, ſome behind were ſlaine, and the hou- ſes about it burnt. The Lord of Tais, and the Baron of la Garde both Generals, the fiſt of the foot: the other of the gallies, land in another place: they encounter ſome ſqua- dons of foot, who by covert wayes in the woods, were gathered together, to fight at their aduantage: they make head againſt our men, and hurt ſome, but the reſt of the troups marching in battaile, make them abandon the place, and ſlie to recouer their ſtraights, where they could not follow but in diſorder.

Maſſy and Pierrebou Captaines of galleis, were hurt in their landing, at an incur- ter of the Engliſh, but to draw them in groſſe to fight, it was not poſſible, and leſſe meanes to charge them on their owne ground. Neither Captaines nor ſouldiars wan- ted will: but the danger was too apparent. They muſt ſlip downe a narrow chan- nell, where but foure ſhips could go in front, and the like number of the enemies ſhips might eaſily defend it. They could not enter, but with the tide and wind, and the foure fiſt ſhips repulſed, had fallen backe vpon the reſt of the fleet, and diſordred them.

They

They must of necessitie fight neere vnto their land: and fauoured by their Fortes and Canon, had they not meanes to hinder the approach, to the great preiudice of our fleet: and our ships bording and grappling, the force of the current had driuen them on ground one vpon another. There was as litle reason to fight at anchor, the Cable might be cutt: and this inconuenience auoided, the danger was not lesse, for the nature of the current is to turne the prow; so as our ships in steed of the prow or the broad side, must haue presented their poupe to the enemy. Moreouer, their anchors not able to stay the ships sodenly, by reason of the violent turning of the streame, eyther the Anchor or Cable might breake, and by consequence cast the ships on ground.

The French
consult to take the Ile of Wight &
to fortifie it.

They therefore propound two things in counsell, either to saile into Picardie, to fortifie the Kings armie, and to cut off all succours from Boullen, or to fortifie the Ile of Wight. Many reasons perswaded the most part to the last opinion: for hauing the Ile at their deuotion, they might easily become Lords of Portsmouth, one of the goodliest ports of England: and forcing the enemy to maintaine a continuall armie both by land and sea, to crosse the Conquerours desseins, it would consume them in exceeding expences. Moreouer, they kept the passage of Spaine and Flanders: and might in time till the Island, and make it yeeld victuals sufficient to maintaine men for the garde thereof.

Without doubt this was an oportunitie which hath not since happened, to oppose a strong barre betwixt both the realmes. But let vs say, that he which holds both land and Sea, within the palme of his hand, would leaue this Island in the power of her ancient and lawfull Lord. But howsoeuer, the Admirall might easily haue left foure thousand men, and foure thousand Pioners, for the defence of the Island, as he did to fortifie the Kings armie before Boullen, after the ouerthrow of the Cheualier d' Aux, a Prouensall and Captaine of the Gallies of Normandie, leauing his Fleet well manned. As the Admirall lay at Anchor before Boullen, a Westerne winde ariseth, and makes him to seeke harbour vpon the coast of England. Being at the Perris, and there kept by force of winde, and a swolne sea, the English fleet thinking to haue the aduantage, imbarke speedily, being a hundred good ships, and come with full sailes against our men, hauing the winde in powpe. The violence of the windes, & the greatnesse of the seas, which might haue taken from our men the vse and seruice of their gallies, D gaue them hope of victorie. On the other side, the Admirall feared that the tempest would driue him to shoare, or force him to weigh Anchor in disorder (for that the bad wether would not suffer them to keepe together) and with great danger to passe the strait at Calais, or else to take his course towards Flanders, and so they might stop his passage in his returne: moreouer soule wether might stay him so long, as he should want victuals, and in the meane time, the enemy (who to attend him at the passage, would come to Boullen,) would disturbe the Kings Fortes that hee pretended to make, the which he desired by all meanes to preuent.

And therefore following the aduice of his Captaines, hee attends at Anchor the change of the tide. The next day the winde and tide fauours him, so as he desired to E encounter the enemy. The night passeth, and at the breake of day, the English armie appeares. Hee follows them, but was so becalmed, as he could not aduance but with the tide. Eyther seeke to gette the winde, and coasting neere, salute one another with the Canon. Some ships are sunke, and some men perish in the sea. In the end, the enemy seeing our men to haue gotte the winde, set saile, and take their course to the Ile of Wight, hauing both winde and tide, which carried them without disorder to their Port, and the night approaching ended the combat. The enemy hauing recovered a safe Port, the Admirall tooke his course towards New-hauen, to refresh his Armie, and to land many sicke men languishing in the shippes. This was about the middest of August.

In the middest of August, the King meant to execute his enterprife vpon Guines, whereof we haue spoken. His armie was of twelue thousand French, twelue thousand Lanquenets, sixe thousand Italians, and foure thousand Legionaries, a thousand or F

A hundred men at armes, and seuen or eight hundred light horse. But the fort before Boullen was no more defensible then eight dayes after it was begun: First not built I 5 + 5. vpon the point, as it was appointed, right against the Tower of Ordre, but against base Foullen, so as it could no way stoppe the entrie of the ships into the hauen. The Marshall of Biez excused himselfe, that they had giuen him to vnderstand he should find no water there, and that the soldiars could not lodge, for the violence of the winds. Secondly, hee relyed vpon his Ingeneur, Anthoine Mellon an Italian Captaine, who was held to be a man of experience, and a good souldiar, who being ignorant of his measures, made the worke fruitles for two moneths.

The Marshall notwithstanding assures the King, that within eight dayes, the fort B would be defensible, but it was no more forward, then at the first day. And to couer this defect, he lets the Captaines vnderstand, that he is aduertised, how the enemy assembled at Calis, to come and succour Boullen by land, holding it in danger to be furnished: he was therefore resolved to passe the riuer, and to abandon the fort. And without imparting of any thing to the Lord of Estrue, Marshall of the Campe, who contradicted this desseine, hee leaues three or foure thousand men in the fort, and goes to lodge at Mont-Lambert, within Canon shot of the Towne, to make head against the enemy, and to fight with him, if he came to succour the Towne. But what likelihood was there, that the English being weaker in force and numbers, would hazard a battaile, and by land (seeing that one shippe would carrie more victuals then a C thousand carts) come and victuall a Towne, which daily he might refresh by sea, without danger, in sight of the enemy. But in effect, it was a great honour for the Marshall of Biez, to see so many yong Princes subiect to his command: and if Boullen had bene recovered, he had lost the authoritie to command so goodly, and mightie an armie. The hope of a battaile made all the youth in Court post to Mont Lambert, the Dukes of Anguien, Neuers, Aumale, Thouars Lord of Tremouille: the Earle of Caual and others, who by continuall skirmishes, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse, did trie their valours with the besieged. And the King relying vpon the assurance he had of the Marshall of Biez, aduanced, hoping that the Bulwarks, and the Courtynes of the fort, had bene in such defence, as he might haue employed his armie elsewhere. D But there are two reasons which diuert him: The one priuate, which was the death of the Duke of Orleans his yongest sonne, who supprised with a Quotidian feuer, which they held to be pestilentious, died the eight of September, in the Abby of Forest-mon tier, betwixt Abbeville and Montrueil, being three and twentie yeares old, leauing a second greefe to the father, to haue lost two sonnes at such times as they grew capable to ease his decaying age: and without doubt, the the waywardnes which made this Prince melancholike and difficult, will hasten the course of his life, to bring him to his graue. The other was publike: the Prince of Melphe being sent to visit the fort, hauing considered the time of the foundation, and the terme it required to come to the perfection, reported, that winter would bee well passed, before it should bee made fit E for seruice, without the assistance of an armie.

So the King seeing his hopes lost, and the season spent, for the effecting of his desseins, hee retired towards Amiens, to the Abby of Saint Fuscien. In the meane time the neernes of the Kings Campe at Mont-Lambert, did inuite both nations, daily to make great skirmishes. One day amongst the rest, the Duke of Aumale, seeing our men withstand a charge of the enemies but faintly, and were readie to be ouerthrowne: making a count hee should bee seconded by his troupe, hee fals vpon a company of English, which went to charge our French vpon the flanke, & at the first approach stayes them, but being stroken with a launce, betwixt the nose and the eye, it breaks in peeces, and lest the tronchion halfe a foot within his head: without doubt, we may admire the generositie of this yong Nobleman, who for so rough a charge, lost neither stirops, nor vnderstanding, to free himselfe from those which had compassed him in, and his admirable patience in induring the paine, when they came to draw forth the three square head, as constantly, as if they had pulled but a haire from his head.

Skirmishes
before Boullen

1545. Winter approached, and the King considering that his enterprise vpon Guines was frustrate: aduertised moreover, that the English made a new leaue in Germanie of ten thousand Lanquenets, and foure thousand horse, with this supply to come and raise the siege at Boullen, he fortified all the approches in the countrie of Tierache, and about Aubenton, Verucin and Guise, to stop their passage. He sent the Marshall of Biez to invade, ruine and burne, the land of Oye, (for that Calais, Guines and Hames, which the English held vpon the maine land, had no other reliefe but out of that Countie;) and to dispose of the affaires as occasion should serue, he marched towards la Fere vpon Oise.

Description and lack of the land of Oye.

The land of Oye containes about foure leagues in length, and three in breadth: a marish very fertill in pastures, hauing on the one side the sea, and at the one end towards the sea Calais: at the other end Grauelin, of the land of Flanders: towards the land, and alongst the bankes of the Marish, is the Towne of Guines, and the Caste of Hames, and at the end towards Arthois stands Ardes. For the safetie of this land, the English had made great trenches towards the firme land, the which were commonly full of water, and fortified with Rampars: and to flanke them, fortes and bastions well manned to defend the entrie into the countie. The affection which euery one bare vnto the Kings seruice, made them to passe the channels which flowed into the countie, directly against the fortes. They assaile them, force them, and put all to the sword they finde. Two thousand English come to their succours, the French men at armes, charge and defeate them, and kill the most part: the rest cast themselves into the trenches, where the horsemen could not follow: foure score or a hundred of our horse, with manie men at armes, testified by their deaths or wounds, the furie of this encounter. The English were strong, both in high and base Boullen, and in the Tower of Ordre (this Tower was built by Iulius Caesar, the second time he passed into England, to haue a Lampe vpon the top of it, to direct his ships, if they should be diuided by any storme at Sea, as in his first voyage) and the retiring of our troupes, made them to enterprise vpon our forte, which was made on the other side of the water, right against base Boullen. Scuen or eight thousand choise men, come an houre before day, and mount suddenly to the top of the rampar, where they might easily enter in many places without any ladders. Thibault Rouhault Lord of Rion, Lieutenant for the King within the fort, finding his succours farre off, (saies the originall) watched in the night, and rested the day. If the enemy charged furiously, he repels him with no lesse assurance, kills all them that mounted, ouerthrowes the rest, & puts them in route, so as by this gallant repulse, he was afterwards freed from the attempts of the English.

A leaue of Lanquenets
for the English made inuidele.

We must now plant strong barres against the Lanquenets, which come to succour the King of England. They were lodged at Fleurines, a great village in the countie of Liege, ten leagues from Mezieres. Mezieres was of great importance, if the enemy had surprised it. And the Emperor fearing that this great swarme of men, finding his countie vnsupplied of souldiars, would doe some harme, had hindered their passage through his territories. This refusal might haue made the Germanes to haue sought a passage by force through the realme. So the King to crosse them, sent Langey into Mezieres with a thousand foot, and the horsemen of Bourgongne, and part of Champagne: he sent Longueval his Lieutenant into Champagne, to muster the Legion of the countie, & manned the passages where he thought the enemy would attempt. He sent the Duke of Angien into Guise with three hundred men at armes, and a number of horse. In the end the Lanquenets hauing staid 3. weekes at Fleurines, doubtfull where they should make their passage: the day of their pay being come, and the money yet in England, they turne their enuies, & returne home the same way, leading with them the King of England's Treasurers for assurance of their entertainment. Our Francis is now freed of a great care. By the death of the Duke of Orleans, the chiefe conditions of peace made with the Emperour were void: so (to enter into new treaties, his Maiesie sent from Folambray neere to Couffy, the Admirall Annebault, and the Chanceller Oruer. The Emperour was at Bruges, and determined to send an armie against the Protestants and commonalties of Germanie, who yeelded him no such obedience as he required of his subiects, and with this dessein he went to Antwerp, to receiue money by im-

1546. imposition and borrowing. This voyage is a cloake to delay our Ambassadors. But in effect he ment to know the minds of the of Antwerp, that according to the courtes of affaires, he might be more milde or sharpe in his answers. And the sayd Ambassadors discouraging his ordinarie delaies and dissimulations, in the end tooke their leaue, returning with no other assurance, but if the King began no warre against him, hee was not reioiced to make any.

A word serues to a man of Iudgement. What might the King conceiue of this cold entertainment? but that the Emperour sought an oportunitie to begin a new war with advantage: and if he had forced them to obedience whom hee threatened in Germanie, he would bring al forces, both Catholiks & Protestants, ioyntly against the frontiers of this realme. To auoide a sodaine surpris, hee giues the gouernment of Languedoc to the Duke of Angien: that of Piedmont to the Prince of Melpe, lately created Marshall of France: he sent to fortifie the weak places of Picardie, hee made a fort about Asanbert-Fontaine, seauen leagues from Verucin, and siue from Mezieres, at the going out of the wood, and for that the frontier of Champagne, lay most open to the Germanes, hee fortified Meziers and Mouzon, built a fort vpon Meuze on this side the riuier within the realme, betwixt Stenay and Dunle Chasteau, the which hee called Villefranche. He fortified the Castell of Saint Menchoult, Saint Desier, Chaumont in Bassigny, Couffy, and Ligny: and made Bourg in Bresse able to make head against a mighty army. Thus the King provided for his frontiers and places subiect to the enemies inuasions. But the plague had so diminished the number of soldiars that were in the fort, right against Boullen, as of twentie ensigns not above eight or nine hundred men escaped this mortalitie. The soldiars notwithstanding are commended for their fidelity, constancie and patience in the gard thereof. The raine, snowe, and other iniuries of the aire, the moistnes of their lodgings (being but hoales in the ground, couered with a pentise of strawe, and when a whole househo'd was dead, the ruines serued to bury their carcasses,) had bred these diseases. But the spring time hauing tempered the season, and stayed the plague, the Lords of Esse and Rion, being refreshed and supplied with men, returned to their ordinary skirmishes, to the enemies losse. The fort wanted victualls. Senerpont Lieutenant to the Marshall of Biez, was appointed for this execution. Three hundred English horse come to hinder this victualing. He meetes them the day after Easter day neere to the bridge of bricke, beneath mount S. Stephen: the skirmish begins on eyther side: the Lord of Tais and the Conte Reingraue arise either of them, with fixe or seauen score gentlemen, the alarum comes to Boullen: & the English supplie their men with seauen hundred horse, and foure hundred harguebuziers. Senerpont chargeth the horsemen before they had ioyned with their shot: the Reingraue is hurt at the first charge and ouerthrowen, and on the other side the Marshall of Calais, being chiefe of the enterprise is slaine with a hundred or fixscore English, about two hundred horse on eyther side, and threescore and fiftene English prisoners, all in cassaks of vellet garnished with gold and siluer.

A great plague in the fort before Boullen.

A while after the Marshall of Biez parted from his campe, for the same effect accompanied with fiftie men at armes, the Reingraue with his regiment of foure thousand Lanquenets, and two hundred French shot, he encountered the Earle of Surrey followed by six thousand English men, with an intent to take from our men the meanes to refresh the fort with victualls, and necessarie munition. Here the combate was long and furious: in the ende the English ouerthrowen, retire to a little fort, where they force them. Seauen or eight hundred of their men are slaine. Surrey saues himselfe by flight, and leaues seauen or eight score prisoners.

Boullen was but a Church-yard for the English, & a wastling for their treasor. The King of England considering how obstinate the King was in the recouerie of his Towne, that moreover the Emperour (what league foueuer they had together) had his priuate desires, and regarded nothing but his owne interest: he lettes the King vnderstand, That he is reioiced to haue him for his friend, and to ende all controuersies. So the Deputies for their maisters meete betwixt Ardes and Guynes. For the King came, the Admirall 1546. Annebault, and Raymond, the first President of Rouan: for the English, Dudley, Aernold, A of England, (and afterwards Duke of Northumberland) and finally, after many negotiations, a peace was made with these conditions: That the King within eight daies should pay eight hundred thousand Crownes, to the King of England, as well for the arrerages of his pension, as for many other expences made by the said King in the fortification of Boullen, & of the Countrey: And in regard of the said sum, the King of England should deliver unto the King, Boullen, and all the Countrey belonging unto it, with the ancient places, or newly raised by him, Mont-Lambert, the Tower of Ordre, Ambletuicil, Blacquenay, and others, with all the artillerie, victuals, and munition in the said places.

The death of
the Duke of Anguien.

This year is famous by the death of Anguien. In the moneth of February, the snow was very great, and the Court being at Roche-guion, some yong Noblemen attending the Daulphin, made a challeng, some to defend a house, others to assaile it with snow bals: But this pastime ended soone, with a pittifull, and fatall spectacle. As the Duke came out of this house, a cofer full of linnen, cast out of the window, falls upon his head, and within few houres, sends him to rest in the graue, with his ancestors, leaving a suspicion of some great men, being eniuous, and ielous of his vertue, reputation, and fauour, which he had gotten with the King, the people, and men of warre, of whom he was more then any other of his age esteemed, beloued, and respected.

The death of the King of England.

The beginning is likewise remarkable, by the decease of Henry the eight King of England, leaving for his successor his sonne Edward, eight yeares of age. This death bred a great alteration and change, in the health of our Francis: they were almost of one age, conformable in coplections. And our King taking this for a preface, or foretelling, that his turne should soone follow after, grew then more melancholy, and silemt then before. He fals sicke of a fever, for the auoyding wherof, hauing passed many places fit for the pleasure of hunting, la Muette, S. Germain in Laye, Villepreux, Dampierre, neere vnto Cheureuse, Limours, and Rochefort, he came to lodge at Rambouillet, and as the pleasure he tooke both in hunting, and hauking, stayed him there sometime, his fever increased, and grew to a Quotidian.

The death of
Francis the 1.

So finding his houre come, he disposed of his conscience, and of his house: he greatly recommended his subiects and seruants to the Daulphin his successor: and the last day of March, in the yeare 1547. being sitie and three yeares old, hee changed the painfull, and continuall toyles of this mortall life, with the eternall rest, which the happy inioy for euer. A Prince wonderfully lamented, both of his subiects, and strangers, whose vertues, deserue to bee placed among the most famous, valiant, Courteous, bountifull, iudicious, of a great spirit, and an excellent memorie. A lover of learning, and men of merit, to whom arts and sciences owe the perfections they haue gotten at this day, hauing by his bringing vp of youth, founded Colleges in Paris, in the Hebrew, Greeke, and Latine tongues, assembled from all parts of the world, learned men, and of good life, and by this meane cleered the darknes of Ignorance, wherewith the world had bene so obicured, by the malice of time, and negligence of former ages. A Prince, fauoured with many good, yet crost with as many bad, and sinister fortunes. E Happie notwithstanding, that no aduersitie could euer make him degenerate from a noble and royall mind, nor from the true beleefe of a good and faithfull Christian. Happie and blessed in his end, to haue pacified all forraine confusions, which had so long troubled his estates, and his subiects quiet. But without doubt, hee had bene far more happie, if he could haue left his realme free from those fatall diuisions, which euen in his raigne had so miserably diuided his subiects, and shall cause hereafter strange combustions: the first consideration whereof, makes my haire to stand vpright, and my heart to tremble at that which is to come.

HENRY

HENRY the second, 59. King of France.

Ature, his age, and the good education he had receiued vnder his father, in the gouernment of the Estate, did countenance him in this succession, the which he receiued on the same day that he was borne, and confirmed it in Saint Germain in Laye, by the restitution of the Constable of Montmorencie: by the publication of many goodly ordinances, for the reformation of apparell, ordering of the Treasurie: prouiding for the poore, suppression of new erected offices: gouernment of the riuers and forrests: maintenance of Iustice, and releueing of his subiects: but aboute all that necessarie lawe against blasphemers, as we may see in the Originall. Doubtlesse this was a commendable beginning, and worthy the homage he did owe to the Soueraign Lord, as an acknowledgment of the fee, whereof he tooke possession, if he had not polluted it with the mournfull spectacle of that bloudie and fatall combate, betwixt Jarnac and Chastaigneray, whereof he would be an eye witnesse: and behold the later bloud shed, contrarie to all mens opinion, by Jarnac, being the weaker, and newly recovered from sicknesse. So shall we see in the end of this raigne, that Gods diuine Iustice doth suffer, That the man which did thirst after an others bloud, shall finde some one to drinke his owne.

The restoring of the Constable, disappointed the Cardinall of Tournon, and the Admirall of Annebault, touching the chiefe gouernment of the State: and the Lords of Longueval, Esars, Boncour, Framezelles, Antibe, Grignan, the Baron of la Garde, the General Bayard, and many others, accused some for theft, some for other disorders in their charges, did somewhat trouble the Court. It was an olde saying: That he which eates the Kings Goose, will cast vp the feathers a hundred yeares after: but since they haue turned this saying into a Prouerbe; He that steales a hundred thousand crownes 1548. Francis at the end of his daies, had well foreseene the lenaie, which should breed new combustions with the Emperour. Henry must be heire to his quarel, as well as to his crowne, and knowing that the Pope had a fresh and iust cause of indignation for the murder of Peter Lewis Duke of Parma and Plaisance, his sonne, and for the invasion of Plaisance, by Ferdinand of Gonsague, Lieutenant for the Emperour in Italy, he sent Charles of Lorraine, lately honoured with a Cardinals Hat (this is he that shall minister so much matter to talke of him, vnder the successors of Henry,) to draw the Pope from the Emperours partie, to the Kings alliance: but death shall frustrate the Pope of his intended reuenge. Commonly men fish best in a troubled streame: & many knowing this new King to be of a mild spirit, addicted to the delights of Court, & little practised in affaires, they kindled a desire in his minde to reuenge the wrongs the Emperour had done to France, whereof they vrged for a testimonie the death of Vogelsberg beheaded in Ausbourg, at his returne from the Scottish warres for the Kings seruice. On the other side, the Emperour grew not a little zealous of the progresse the King made into Beurgogne, Bresse, Sauoy, and Piedmont, as if he had carried with him an alarm bell to stirre vp the people to the following warre. And it may be it had then been kindled, but an home-bred murinie staied it for a time. During the Kings voyage, the extortions of the tog-gatherers and farmers of Sale, caused the commons of Guienne, Xaintonge, and Angoumois to rebell. In few weekes forty thousand men go to field armed with all kind of weapons, the Hlanders ioyne with them, and with a common consent fall vpon the tog-gatherers. The people of Gascogne do presently follow this pernicious example. The commons of Bourdeaux rise, & finding la Vergne, Esmonac, Maquanan, and others, (Tribunes fit for their humors) they expell the customers, sack many good houses, vnder colour to seeke for their exactors: the commons enter to the towne, & massacre all that follow not their party. Moneins, lieutenant for the King within Bourdeaux, sends a number of shot out of the Castle of Ila, thinking to terrifie this enraged multitude. But all this increased their popular furie. They forced the Councillors of the Parliament, to lay aside their gowns, to put on Mariners caps, to carry pikes, & to follow their Ensignes, & the masters of Saulx bretheren, the one Capitaine of the towne, the other of Castle Trompet, to be their leaders, to assist at the sacking of many houses, and to see their friends & fellow citizens massacred before their eyes. They spoile the Towne-house, a goodly store-house for armes: & to increase their villanies, they murder Monsieurs most cruelly, being come amongst them, thinking with courteous words to pacifie the fury of these ruanes. Having wrought their wils, and being laden with booty, they disbanded some one way, some another: the parliament fortified with men of honor, and resuming their authority, punish by exemplary iustice la Vergne, one of the chiefe Tribunes of this rebellion, and some other of the most apparent. The King was no lesse ready to reuenge this outrageous and rashe rebellion, then the commons were active in the execution. The Constable had the commission for Guienne. Francis of Lorraine Duke of Aumale (whom we shall afterwards see Duke of Guise, so famous vnder Francis 1548. as the 2. and Charles the 9.) that of Xaintonge with foure thousand Lanquenets & many French horse. This man seeking to win the reputation of a mild & mercifull Prince, pacified the Countrey without punishment of what had passed. The other marched after another manner, for ioyning both armies together, he entered into Bourdeaux, disarmed the people, tooke and burnt all the records, registers, rights & priuileges of the Citizens, & of all the country of Bourdelois: he caused the Court of Parliament to cease: beat downe their bells, forced 7. score of the chiefe to go vnto the Carmes (they had three daies after the mutiny, in the night take vp this poore dismembred carcase, lying filthily vpon the ground, with a gentleman of his named Montclien) to fetch the bodie of Moneins, and to conduct it in mournful sort vnto S. Andrews Church. & by the punishment of the two Sauls, Esmonac (an other Tribune who had seized vpon the Castle Trompet) & many others, he purged their offence. Talemagne and Galissie Colonells of the commons, were afterwards broken vpon the wheele, either of them carrying a Crowne of burning iron for a marke of the foweraignty, which they had vsurped. The end of this year was more comicall. Anthony of Bourbon Duke of Endosme married Isane of Albret daughter to Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, and of Marguerit sister to King Francis the 1. and the Duke of Aumale the daughter of Heracles of Esle Duke of Ferrare & of Esle of France Daughter to King Lewis the 12. And during these sports in Court, that extraordinary chamber, against them who they call Lutherans, was erected, who perswading constantly in the profession of their faith, suffered their bodies to be consumed to ashes. The birth of Lewis the Kings yonger son, the 3. of February, at S. Germain in Laye, his baptisme the 19. of May: the coronation of Queene Katherine at S. Denis, the next day, the stately entry of their Maiesties at Paris the 6. of the same moneth, and the great tourney at the Tournells, made in fauor of the Ladies, continued the sports in Court: which finished, the King sitting in his seat of Iustice the 2. of July, would giue sentence in his Court of Parliament at Paris, according to the ancient custome of his predecessors. The presence of the Prince giues authority to the Magistrate, and the eye of the king (saith the wise man) scatters ill counsells. At that time the nobility of England were at warre with the Commons. The people required restitution of religion. The nobles who by their change of religion enioyed the Clergy lyungs, would not yeeld. So the people rise, & the nobility takes armes. Thomas Semer Admirall of the realme, & Vncle to young King Edward the 6. by the mother, is accused to haue supported their party which followed the Romish church, & by consequence to haue conspired against the king: his vncle brother the Duke of Somerset caused his head to be publicly cut off. Edward ready by those forces, which he had prepared beyond the seas, against our Henry, Clement, Guelbreis, Boutignons and Germanis: a means to reconcile the Nobles with the Commons. During these tumults in England, the King sent Paul Lord of Termes to continue the war in Scotland and begon by Esle, who hauing lately defeated the English before Healington, and taken the Ile of Hortles, resigned his charge to his successor. In the moneth of Iune, James of Coucy Lord of Veruein was beheaded at Paris, & Oudart of Esle Marshall of France degraded, after a long imprisonment, the one for that he had considerably corrupted the gard of Boullen to his son in Law: the other for that he had lightly yeelded vp a strong and well fortified place vnto the enemy. Yet in the year 1575. the heire & son of Veruein, shall restore the memory of his father, & grand-father by the mother side, to their former honor, dignity, and renowne. There falls out another sere: since the year 1540. the Parliament of Prouence, had for matter of religion condemned 17. persons of Merindol to be burnt, the village to be razed, and the trees to be cut downe within 100. hundred paces. The Clergy pursued it: but some gentlemen and others lesse bloodily, staied the execution of this decree, and King Francis the moneth after sent a pardon to these Paudois of Merindol, & other places, vpon condition that within three monethes they should abjure their errors. They appeere in Court, & protest that they haue not maintainyed nor published any erroneous thing, of which they say by the word of God they can shew them any sounder doctrine: they crave execution of their faith in writing, with an answer to the reproches wherewith they were taxed, and require to be allowed, or iudicially heard in their defences.

1549. Foure yeares past away, during the which, being onely threatened with violence, subsist. But the President Chassané being dead, John Menier his successor, a violent man, became a mortall enemy to those of Cabrieres, and Merindol, amongst whom dwelt certain subjects of his of Oppede, whose lands he possessed, to ioinc the same. Through the persuasions of Menier, the Cardinall of Tournon, obtaines letters patent from King Francis, to the Court of Parliament, for the execution of the first sentence, according to the which, Menier terming himselfe Lieutenant of the Lord of Grignan, gouernour of Prouence, accompanied with the Baron of la Garde, and a great troupe of others, in the moneth of April 1545. fired many villages neere vnto Merindol, put many of the Countymen into the gallies, spoyled, razed, and burnt Merindol being vnpeopled, tooke Cabrieres by composition, and against his faith, in cold blood, hee cut in peeces fve and twentie or thirtie men, chosen at his pleasure, rauished viiues, and yong virgins, burnt about fortie in a barne, whereof the most part were with child: put about eight hundred to the sword, and carried away many prisoners to Masfille, Aix, and Auignon.

King Francis touched in conscience.

This did too farre exceed a decree giuen against seuentene persons, abusing the Kings authoritie, with too great violence: who in his latter age, toucht with a remorse of conscience, by reason of this horrible proceeding against his subjects, whom hee had too lightly abandoned to these butchers, grieved that hee could not before his death, punish the authors of these murders exemplarily: lying in the bed of death, he commanded Henry his sonne expressly, not to make his memory hatefull vnto strangers, nor subject to the wrath of God, in not punishing of this guilt. Euen so, that great King Dauid, amongst other dispositions of his last will: Thou knowest (said hee to him that should sit on the throne after him) what Iobab the sonne of Tseruia hath done vnto me, and what he hath done to the two Commanders of the armies of Israel, Abner the son of Ner, and Amasa the son of Iether, whom he hath slaine, hauing shed blood, in time of peace: Thou shalt not suffer his white haire to descend with peace into the graue. But Salomon performed his fathers will more religiously. Yet one at the least must suffer for many: the chance fell vpon one that was least guiltie, named Guerin, an advocate by profession, who was hanged at Paris. The Cardinall of Tournon, Grignan and la Garde were in some trouble, but more feared then hurt. Menier escaped, but hee died after, being tragically possessed with a furie, and a secret fire which consumed his bowels.

Gods iust
iudgements
vpon murder.
The people of Guienne reconciled to the Kings fa-uour.

The yeare ended with the death of two famous personages: Pope Paul, the ninth of Nouember, to whome succeeded Cardinall John Maria Bishop of Mantua: and the vertuous Princeesse Marguerite of Valois, sister to King Francis deceased, and wife to Henry of Albret King of Nawarre, the fourteenth of December. They say commonly, that for all offences there needes but one satisfaction. Seeing then, that by the punishment of the cheefe authors of the sedition in Guienne, the King had pardoned the commons, he was not so inexorable, but for a small satisfaction they were easily admitted to fauour: so as in October past, they of Bordeaux had obteyned a remission, binding themselves perpetually to his Maiestie: To entertaine at sea for ever (as well they as their descendants) two ships furnished for the warre: to vistle the Castle of Trompet, and du Ha, and to renewe the victuals euery yeare. By this meanes, their Parliament was restored in Ianuarie, and all things setled in their former estate. By their example the three estates of Poitou, Xaintonge, Angoumois, Perigort, Limosin and la Marche, in the beginning of this yeare, obteyned abolition of the custome vpon salt in Guienne, paying foure hundred and fiftie thousand franks, and fve and twentie thousand for the satisfaction of the Kings officers of the said custome. Then sprong there many and sundrie fi brands of warre.

But before wee quarrell with the Emperour, the English must yeeld vs Bouillon. The fort which the Lord of Chastillon had built, in the yeere 1548, annoyed them much, and the recovery of the forts of Selaque, Blacomet, and Bonlamberg, and many men defeated by the surprise of them, gaue the Duke of Summerfet and the Earle of Warwick to vnderstand, that there was no thing but blowes to bee gotten in maintayland, called home their troupes. So as for the summe before specified, payable at two termes, a peace was againe concluded with the English, and Bouillon restored to the King, into the which his Maiesty made his entrie, the 5. of May, and did his homage, wherevnto the Kings of France are bound by the institution of Lewis the x. as we haue elsewhere obserued.

Hereafter those small sparkles, which began to appeare, after the murder of Peter Lewis, sonne to Pope Paul Farnese deceased: slaine by his household seruants, by the persuasion of Andrew Doria, and Ferdinand Gonzague, with the priuie and consent of the Emperour, to seize vpon the City of Plaisance, with the more facility, haue kindled to great fires, as we shall see France, Germany, and Italy in combustion. Paul had giuen Parma to Octavian Farnese, sonne to the said Peter Lewis, whereof he had institution of Julio his successor. This Peter Lewis inclined much to the French party. He had giuen viij. galls and ayde to Peter Straffy, when as he came into the Countrie of Plaisance with some forces for the seruice of the most Christian King, and that which more incensed the Imperials, he was suspected to haue assisted the Cont of Nieffue in an enterprise made vpon Genes, for the kings seruice. the yeare 1547. in the which Lancelotto was slaine, and Andrew Doria expelled. This caused the death of Peter Lewis Farnese. Octavian his sonne had married the Emperours bastard daughter. But they say that charity begins by it selfe. The Emperour did labour him much: he would gladly ioyne Parma to Plaisance, & that by lawfull meanes, letting the Pope to vnderstand: That Parma being of the patrimony of the Church, the which was in his protection, he ought to be preferred before Farnese, seeing that Farnese could not keepe it, but with the men and money of his holmes.

The Pope, being of a base mettall, and fearing the touch, tempted with the Emperours practises: sends to Duke Octavian, That he could no more furnish the extraordinary charges, wherewith he had promised to assist him: and Farnese finding, that the Emperour laide this plot, to dispossesse him off his inheritance: he seeks a strong support in France, against his father-in-lawes practises. The king who had not renounced the ancient pretensions of the house of Orleans, to the Duchie of Milan, declares himselfe (but with the Popes good liking) protector of the patrimony of the Church, and of the Farneses. The Emperour is in a rage, who with his violent exclamations so terrifies the Pope, as he abandons his vassall Octavian.

The Pope on the other side, (nothing well affected to the French) grew bitter against the King: he commands him to renounce this protection: and for not obeying, hee threatens to curse both him & his realme. Thus Julio the 2. not able to satisfy his greedy desire, with the keys of S. Peter, he vn sheaths the sword of S. Paul, kindling by his madnesse these deadly diuisions throughout all Christendome, as if the Bishop carried the spirituall sword in his hand, to draw it for vnlawfull things, at the first impression of his fantasie.

To crosse the Pope, the King forbids expressly, to carry or send any gold or siluer to Rome, for any dispatches, Bulles, Annats, Dispensations, or any other thing: commanding the Metropolitaines of the Realme to prouide according to the ancient priuileges and liberties of the French Church. And for that Gonzague beleegged Parma, (to giue both the Emperour, and the Court of Rome a blowe) hee commanded Charles of Coffe, Marshall and Lord of Brissac, his Lieutenant generall in Fredmont by the death of the Prince of Melphe: to fortifye and furnish Mirandol. Brissac sends some Souldiars: Gonzague surpriseth them, and puts them secretly to death, and todaynly doth beleaguer Mirandola. Warre is nowe begunne on all sides, and for light occasions, hee that seeks a quarrell, wants no apparrent shewes to colour it. Both these Princes expected some worthy occasion. But let vs raise vp our thoughts, and say, That GOD had not powred out all his iudgements against Christendome; being full of excesse, and worthy of great punishment.

War in Italy.

The

1551. The King sends newe forces into Piedmont, and commands the Marshall to the Count Parma, and Mirandola. He effects it, and by the taking of Quiers, S. Daman and other places, he forceth Gonzague to abandon the country of Parmesan, to succour Montferrat, and to defend the estate of Milan.

On the other side, Mary Queene of Hungary, and Gouvernesse of the Lowe Countries, for the Emperour: armed in favour of her brother both by sea and land. And vnderstanding that for a greater confirmation of loue, the Marshall S. Andre, came in the Kings name the order of France, to young Edward King of England: she caused certaine ships to lie betwixt Calais and Douer, to seize on him in his passage. But to prevent her policy, the Marshall caused some Flemish ships to be stayed, which lay anchor in the road of Diepe, vntill they were assured of his arrivall in England. And Mary likewise seized vpon all the French ships, that were within her gouernement. Thus here burning grew on all sides, which burst out into open warre: euery one calls home his Ambassadors, and assures the places neere to the enemy: the King especially of Lorraine, hauing some ialousie of Christienne the Dowager, and neere allied to the Emperour: who to free her selfe from that imputation, did put her selfe with her son Charles into the Kings protection: who caused him to be brought vp, with the Dauphin Francis, and afterwards he married one of his Maiesties daughters.

Before we proceed to open acts of hostility, the King excused himselfe vnto the Pope by the Lord of Termes, for that which he did in fauour of Ottavian Farnese, and by the Abbot of Bellofanne, he protested against the decrees of the Assembly which was held at Trent: the which (considering the Popes and the Emperours spleene against France) he could not hold, to be a law full and holy generall Councell: Not that I pretend (said he) to withdraw my selfe from the obedience of the Church but chely, to avoid the surprises of such, as vnder colour of reformation seeke to disgrace both my person and realme. And in trueth he confirmed sufficiently this last clause, by the rigorous ordinances which he published against those which had their cause common with the Protestants of Germany, touching matters of religion, whereby fires were a new kindled against them, in many parts of the Realme: and yet the King treated priuately with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and generally with all the Electors and free Cities of the Empire: Who sawe their liberties and freedoms in a manner ruined, if they did not oppose some mighty aduersary against the Emperour, who by maine force might stay the course of his vnmeasured conetoufnesse.

A league betwixt the King and the Protestants of Germany.

The Emperour (contrary to his oath) detained John Duke of Saxony and Philip Landgrane of Hesse in miserable captivity. He had vanquished most of the other Princes in war, and fearing least the French should in the ende demaund the right vsurped in old time by the Saxons, ouer the heires of Charlemaigne, when the Empire was hereditary: he pretended to transport the Imperiall Crowne into his house for ever: and now he thought to haue a fit opportunity. He had suppressed his enemies in Germany: he had a Pope at his deuotion. he was armed. The most part of the Cardinals who assisted at the Councell, were either naturall Spaniards, or of the Spanish faction: and by consequence, might easily, by a decree of this councell, giue authority to what he intended. With this dessein he had caused his son Prince Philip to come out of Spain, (who died King of Spain in the yeare, 1598.) to haue him declared his successor, or at least his associate in the Empire: oppressing the people of Germany, by insolent and tyrannicall exactions.

The Electors, not accustomed to seruitude, and lesse to the slavery of Spain: notable with their own forces to shake off the yoke, which they see ready to be layd vpon them: they repaire vnto the King, shewe him the wrongs and outrages done vnto them: they pretended the ouerthrow of the holy Empire, and the abolishment of the rights, and priuileges of the Electors, Commonalties, and Lords of the same: they beseech him, that in regard of the ancient league, betwixt the Empire and the crowne of France, he would take their iust cause in hand, and maintaine the common liberty of Germany.

The

A The King resolues to enter into League with them, and grants the succours which they demanded. They giue him this honorable title: Defender of the Germans, protector of the nation, and of the holy Empire. He armes thirtie thousand men, and desires to countenance his forces with his owne presence, he appoints Queene Katherine his wife Regent in France: he makes many goodly Edicts for the gouernment of the state, for the ordering of his men at armes, and for the obseruation of military discipline: hee reformes the abuses of Commanders, suppresseth the insolencie of souldiars, (a commendable institution, in comparison of that which hath bene seene in the reignes of his children) and giues the Rendezuons for his armie at Vitry. Hee was accompanied with Thomas Duke of Barrois, (whom we shall shortly see King of Nauarre, by the decease of Henry of Albrt his father in Lawe) John Duke of Angulen, Lewis Prince of Conde, all bretheren: Lewis Duke of Montpensier, Charles Prince of Roche-sur-yon, all of the royall familie of Bourbon: the Dukes of Neuers, Nemours, Guise, Aumale, Elbeuf, the Lords of Rohan, Rocheaucault, Chastillon, d' Andelot, and others in great numbers, in very good order.

The Kings armie.

The Constable of Montmorencie was made generall of the armie (a house which shal hereafter be made a Duchie, and Peere of France) Claude of Loiraine Duke of Aumale, a younger brother of the house of Guise, was generall of the horse, consisting of fiftene hundred men at armes, euery one hauing two archers, two thousand light horse, and as many argoletiers, besides an infinite number of voluntary French Nobles, marching vnder the fauour of their Prince, and desirous to make their valor apparent, by good and faithfull seruices. Gaspar Lord of Chastillon, afterwards Admirall, was Colonel of the foot, consisting (besides the new, and the ordinary companies, which were twentie ensignes of the old bands of Piedmont, and fine and thirtie ensignes of Gascons and Prouencals (they note the two companies of the Lord of Durais to be compounded for the most part of gentlemen, and old souldiers, worthy of command) of tennethousand Lanquenets in two regiments, commanded by the Reingraue, and Reichroce. To these bands the Protestant Princes ioyned a battallion of horse, vnder the command of the Colonell Chartell. But let vs now see their exploits.

D The Cittie of Thoul at the first abord, puts it selfe into the Kings protection, but this was not the cheefe point of his dessein. The Emperour passing into France, had the passage of Metz at his deuotion, and had victuals and other necessaries out of that Countrey. The King now requires the like from them. They offer victuals for money, and consent to admit his Maiestie in their Cittie, with the Constable, followed with some Princes and Noblemen: but as for any passage of the armie, they excuse themselves, and pretend neutralitie. The Constable departs, and protests, that he will haue free passage, free entrie, and free issue at discretion, without any limitation, and partly by promises, partly by threats, he wins the Inhabitants. The Citizens had not foreseen this storme, and lesse provided any remedie to auoyd it. Thus being forced to bid their libertie adue, they agree with Lord of Bourdillon afterwards Marshall of France: That the Constable accompanied with some Princes and Noblemen, should enter with two companies of foot: the companies were fixe hundred men strong: they increase them with halfe as many more, all chosen men of account, the which being entred, repelled the people, become masters, and draw after them so long a traine, as the Metzians had no meanes to resist.

The Kings armie enters into the countie of Metz.

This was the tenth of Aprill on Palme Sunday nine dayes after the King made his entrie in armes, being followed with all his forces put in battaille: hee received the oath of the Citizens, and sware solemnly to them in the porch of S. Stephens Church. He sent Gonner brother to the Marshall of Brissac for Gouernour, and with him, the company of the Earle of Nantueil, two hundred light horse, two hundred harguebuffiers on horsebacke, and twelue ensignes of foot. Thus the famous Cittie of Metz was brought vnder the obedience of this Crowne: a portion of the ancient patrimonie of the Kings of France, and in former times vsurped by the Emperours.

The

1552. The Constable would gladly haue vsed the like stratageme to Strasbourg, but he found Metz yeelds more assurance and resolution then at Metz. They put a strong garrison into the Citie, and prepared for defence against any that should seeke to make them subiect. So as seeing that neyther reproches, threats nor bitter words, could drawe any thing from the Inhabitants, but victuals and necessities for the Campe, the army tooke the way of Haguenau and Wisbourg.

Here the deputies of the Germane Princes come to beseech the King to passe no farther; to stay the spoile of the Country, to harken to a peace with the Emperour, wherevnto he seemed to be inclined: and not to presse them to any priuie assistance, considering their bond vnto the Empire: and if it pleased him to be comprehended in this treatie, hee should make it knowne with what conditions he ment to compound with the Emperour. The King held good pawns for the charges of his voyage. By his forces he had drawne the Emperour to reason with the Princes his vassalls: this virago of Hongarie had already taken Stenay vpon Meuse: and to crosse the Kings attempts in Germany, with troubles in France: she threatened to enter the realme, burning, spoiling, and making the Countrey in her passage desolate. So the King leaving Germanie, brought backe his armie into France. At whose approach this swarme of enemies was disperfed, like a flying cloud, and leauing the Duchie of Bourgonne vnsurrounded of men, they inuited our French to the conquest of Ros de Mars, or Mont Sainct Jean, Solieu, Danuilliers, Yuo, Montmedy, Lumes, Trelon and Glaion: all which places, might sufficiently speake of our French forces, hauing made prooffe therof. But this last seizure was their ruine, when as the greatest part, through the furie of the warre were reduced into heapes of roanes and ashes.

They could no longer retaine the old bands without some prey. Cymai (a towne and castell belonging to the Duke of Arscot) was surprisid, but this was in a manner the ruine of the army, for some laden with spoiles, others seized on with sicknesse and wearied with continual toyle, began to slippe away in the end of Iuly. The most healthfull which remayned, were by the King put into garrisons, attending the Emperours desseins: hauing also giuen some troupes to the Marshall of la Mark, with the which he recovered the Duchie of Boullen, with the dependances. The Emperour had bene oppressed with a forraigne and domesticall enemy. To turne all this storme vpon France, and to make profit of the Protestants forces and money: he made his peace with them, and got a promise from the Princes and Commonalties, to succor him with men, money and artillerie, for the recovery of Metz, Thoul and Verdun.

Albert Marquis of Brandebourg had in the Kings name, made sharpe warre against the Bishops and Townes in Germanie, with two thousand horse and eight thousand foote: he nowe seekes to be reconciled to the Emperour as well as the rest, but he will insinuate him selfe by some notable seruice. He had written often vnto the King, holding him in hope to continue in his partie: but hauing roded vpon the marches of Luxembourg, Lorraine, and the Country of Mosin, he spoiles the Country after a strange manner: then hauing pressed Metz, for want of victuals, hee carries armes to the Emperour.

The Emperour marcheth against Metz, and sends the Duke of Alua, his Lieutenant generall, and the Marquis of Marignan from Sarbruch, with foureteeen thousand foote, four thousand horse, and sixe field peeces, to vewe the Citie, and to choose a conuenient place to lodge his army, attending his comming with the rest of his forces. The Duke of Guise Lieutenant generall for the King, sends forth some troupes to skirmish, where hee loofeth Marigni a gentlemen of Picardie, two Captaines and fiftie soldiers: and the enemy, about a hundred and fiftie men. But the Marquis of Brandebourg reuengeth this disgrace, vpon the Duke of Aumale, and by a second stratageme, he giues the King an assured testimonie of his defection, and to the Emperour, the effects of the seruice which he had vowed vnto him. The Duke coasted the Marquis his retreat, and cutts the heauiest of his troupes in peeces, when as the Marquis turning head) ouerthrowes a great troupe of seruants mustered together to make a show.

The Duke of Aumale defeated.

A shewe: and chargeth a squadron of light horse: who making but a weake resistance, leaue the place. So all fall vpon the men at armes: they were ill furnished to withstand the shocke of the Reifers pistoles. The Duke seeing his men at armes broken, and seeking to saue themselves, rallies a small troupe, and returnes to the charge. The multitude inuitions him, and doth oppress his best men: some are wounded, and others taken: two hundred Gentlemen, by their death, and the taking of many others, made the Marquis valour famous. The Duke being ouerthrowne, remayned as a pawne of an assured victorie, and shall not bee deliuered vntill the King hath payed fifty thousand Crownes for him. This chanced in the ende of October: but we shall see this losse recompensed with a happy successe against the Emperours attempts.

The Earle of Reux, entred Picardy at the same time, with the desolation thereof, and the burning of Noyon, Nesle, Chauny, Roye, Folembray and aboue eight hundred Villages: a testimony of the Emperours spleene. Then hauing beseeged Hesdin, and filled vp the trench, with the ruines of a wall, which they had vndermined: the Towne was very lightly yeelded, by the Lord of Rasse, who was in daunger to haue bene made a publike spectacle vpon a scaffold, if the Constables fauour had not protected him.

This second bunt, made them to apprehend a third. The Emperour incamped before Metz, and the King desirous to vnderstand in what estate the beseeged were, as the Duke of Guise, John and Lewis of Bourbon, the one was Duke of Anguien, the last was Prince of Cande, brethren to the Duke of Vendosme: Charles of Bourbon, Prince of Roche-sur-jon, Francis and René of Lorraine, the first Grand Prior of France, the last Marquis of Elbus, brethren to the Duke of Guise: the Lords of Roche-foucault, and Rindan brethren: Peter Stro, la Brosse, Brion, Gonnor, Parroy, with an infinite number of others, who had voluntarily thrust themselves within the walles, to eternise the memory of so generous a preservation of their new conquest, against the Imperial forces. They all with one consent & resolution, free the king of this suspence, and the effects second their promises. They toyle the enemy with continual sallies both of horse & foote: they come vp to the canon, ouerthrow their tents, force their quarters, put the whole campe in alarum, and performe more then hath bene heard of in any former siege. The place did well deserue it, and their vertue was the more admirable, for that the time was so vnseasonable both for the one and the other, being in the cold of winter: But the constancie of the beseeged, and the obstinacy of the beseegers, encountered the rigour of raine, snowe, cold, and ice. The 26. of Nouember, they batter the wall, with forty Canons, without any intermission, but to coole them: and the beseeged both Princes, Noblemen, and souldiers, carry earth indifferently to rampar vp the breach, making the Imperials admire their diligence and valour. The King resting assured, leaues the Duke of Neuers, to command his army in Lorraine, and gaue commission to the Lord of Chastillon, then Admiral of France (Annebauld being lately dead at la Fere) to go into Picardy, as Lieutenant to the Duke of Vendosme.

The Duke of Neuers employes all his cares, to cut off the Emperours victuals: and the Admiralls approach chafeth the Earle of Reux from about Hedin, leauing his sonne with a strong garrison in the castle. Hauing made foure thousand and threecore cannon shot, he makes a breach the 16. of December, but yet not resonable: notwithstanding the beseeged being amazed, yeeld it, to haue their liues and goods saued. This blowe troubled the Emperour: the injuries of the ayre, molested his men before Metz: extreame hungar made them weake, the continuall sallies of the beseeged diminished them, his treasure grewe short, his reputation decayed, his mynes were blowne vp, and all his attempts were made fruitlesse: to conclude, all went against the hare. So the Emperour giuing charge to the Duke of Alua, to order the retreat, he left the Empire deprived of the country of Messin, and the Crowne of France assured of this new conquest, by the Constables industry, and happily preserved by the valour of the beseeged.

Metz.

But there followed rough encounters. Hedin and Therouenne had till now bene the instruments of warre. It is better (saith the Prouerbe, to stumble once, then to stagger alwayes: The Emperour, to be reuenged of some part of his losses, sends the Lord of Einecourt with a mightie armie, to beseege Therouenne. The Lord of Esse and Francis of Montmorency defended it. The place is furiously battered, the besieged sustaine a most violent assault of three charges, and many die on either side. The cheefe among the French, were the Lords of Esse, of Vienne, of Beaudisne, of Roche-poly, of Blanc, Capitaine Ferrieres, with many gentlemen, and souldiers. They vndermined, they mine, and with the ruines of the wall, fill vp the trenches, which caused the besieged to be maund a composition. But whilest they are busie in parle, (an error which often chancing should make a Commander wise) the Germanis and Bourguignons, enter at diuerse places, and kill all they encounter. The Spaniards louing money at that time, more then bloud, saued many. And the Emperour causing the Towne to be razed, and spoyled, shall saue many soules which should be lost in the defence and winning thereof.

Therouenne
taken and razed.

Hedin taken
and sacked.

Hedin assailed, battered, and vndermined more then a foxes burrow, had like successe vnder Emanuel Philibert, sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, and Lieutenant Generall for the Emperour, his vncler by the mothers side. The Duke of Bouillon, and Horatio Farnese, newly married to Diana the Emperours bastard daughter, had taken the gaid thereof, and had prepared great store of wildfire at the breach, to defend the assault. A Priest, either through malice, or negligence, sets it on fire, and consumes many souldiers, readie for the defence. The Imperials on the other side, blow vp their mines, and burie a great number of men in the ruines thereof: they enter pell mell, and to become masters of the place. Farnese, the Vicont of Martignes, the Seneschal of Cassels, with many other gentlemen, were slaine there. The Duke of Bouillon, with many others, had a long, and hard imprisonment.

The Duke of Arscot taken.

Let vs take our reuenge. The French armie assembled about Amiens & Piquigny the Prince of Cande led the light horse, who in the midst of August incourtered with some troupes, led by the Duke of Arscot: he charged them, defeated them, and followed them about a League. hee slue seuen or eight hundred men, tooke about five hundred prisoners, and amongst the rest, the Duke himselfe with seuen ensignes. The Kings armie consisted of about seuen thousand horsemen, five and twentie thousand foot, with a hundred peeces of artillerie, great and small, desiring nothing more, then to make his valour admirable, by the issue of some happie battaile. The Emperour, on the other side, sought to temper this heat, and to wast this great power, at the seige of some place of importance. The King, to sound the Emperours resolution, aduanceth nere to Valentiennes: he wearieth his enemy with daily skirmishes, gals him to the quicke, and gets the aduantage. But the Emperour apprehends it not, & the King finding him loth to hazard any thing, sent the Marshall of Saint Andrew to spoile the Countie of Saint Paul: then in the end of October, he puts part of his forces into garrison, the rest hee dismisseth, and sendeth away. Now our armes are layed aside, vntill the next spring.

At the spring the King diuided his forces into three armies. The first was commaunded by the Prince of la Roche-sur-yan, being compounded of tenne thousand foote, three hundred men at armes, and five or sixe hundred argoletiers. The Constable had the charge of the second, containing five and twentie ensignes of French, as many Suisse, two regiments of Lansquenets, two thousand horse, some of them light horse, and some argoletiers, with some English and Scottish footmen. The third, led by the Duke of Neuers, had twentie ensignes of English and Scots, two regiments of Lansquenets, three hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and shott on horsebacke, with two hundred Reisters, pistoliets: and all three breathed nothing but reuenge, and desire to requite those confusions.

New exploits in Picardie.

The Prince enters into Arthois: hee spoyles, burnes, and defeats two Corners of horse,

A horse, he kills two hundred vpon the place, and sends their colours to the King. The Constable takes Mariembourg, fortifies Rocroy, ruines the forts of Trelon, Glaion, Simoy and others built within two yeares. The Duke batters and takes the castells of Ormont and Beaurin by composition, ruines and burnes a great number of villages: then hauing by the taking of some strong places seated vpon the Meuse, opened the passage of the riuier, he enters Liege and takes Agimont and Pouuizes by assault, putting almost all the Inhabitants to death, eyther by the sword or by the hand of Iustice, for that they presumed to stand against an army royal, & for their outrageous speeches: and to increase their punishment he burnt the Towne: he assured himselfe of Castelhiery and Valm being abandoned: he tooke & spoiled Dinan, but hee preferred the female sexe from the violence of the Germanis, being fled into a Church. Emanuel Philibert Duke of Sauoy by the death of his father Charles lately deceased, assembled his army with an intent (sayd he) to fight with the French, if they aduanced. We must trie this braue resolution.

The King passeth the riuier of Sambre, the 25. of Iuly, being followed by the Duke of Neuers, he enters the Countie of Hainault, spoiling, burning and making all desolate, seeking to drawe the enemy to fight. Some troupes charge euen vnto the suburbs of Niuelle, the first towne of Brabant, and for a noate of their passage, they fire the layd suburbs and villages thereabouts, so as many pleasant dwellings were consumed vnto ashes. The Duke of Sauoy flies the listes: and the army marching towards Fains, (one of the chiefe Townes of Hainault) lefied nothing behind it but tears, sighes, desolation, fire, smoake and ashes, and to conclude, a mournefull scaffold whereon two great Princes played a horrible tragedie, being cruelly incensed one against another. The Castells and pleasant dwellings of the gentlemen of the Countie, yea Fains it selfe and Mariemont that stately house, and others belonging to Mary Queene of Hongarie sister to the Emperour, Tragny that goodly and proud Castell, Reux Bauers with an infinit number of others, were (in reuenge of that goodly place of Folembray) reduced to that estate, as they might well say, here was Bains, here was Mariemont, here were Tragny, Reux, and Bauers.

In the end the French (hauing spoiled the whole Countie) drew the Emperour to fight: the two armies incourter about the midst of August, nere vnto Renty: the Imperiall foreward chargeth the Duke of Guise his troupes, but to their confusion: hee defeats them with the helpe of those succors that came speedely vnto him, he kills eight or nine hundred men, and strikes such a terror into the rest of the Imperiall army, as they retire hastily into their campe, as hauing no more desire to fight. So the winter approaching, and want of forrage troubling the men at armes, the King dismissed the Swisses and his Nobility: then leauing the Duke of Vendosme generall of the rest of the army, he tooke from the enemy all meanes to endamage the realme, but by sacking & burning of the Countie about Hesdin. The 23. day of March, Pope Iulius the 3. died, Marcel Cernin borne in Tuscane succeeded him: but soone after his election, death buried both his name and memorie. Iohn Peter Caraffe a Neapolitaine, called Cardinall Theam, the chiefe author of the Iesuits sect, held the Romain see, and called himselfe Pius the 4. We shal this yeare quench the fires of the yeare past, but it shall kindle new combustions, both on this side and beyond the Alpes. So as, no affection to the publicke good, but the only indisposition of the aire, hath made vs till now see such our armes.

Philip sonne to the Emperour Charles had the yeare past married with Mary Queene of England, by the decease of Edward 6. and whilest that England did flame with ciuill fires, by reason of the burning fires against such as had shaken off the yoke of the Romish obedience, they did solicit our two warriors, to pacifie their mutuall hatred, by some firme and durable peace. Cardinall Poole an Englishman was employed thereto, but without effect: for the seare not was yet ripe.

The courtes of the Imperialls made the French to attempt vpon Castell Cambrais (yet making faire warres with the Spaniards, and to victuall Mariembourg at diuers 1555. diuers times, while on the other side Francis of Cleues Duke of Newers, with the Admirall of Chastillon, gouernour in the absence of the Duke of Vendosme (who was gone to take possession of his new estates, fallen to him in the right of his wife, by the death of Henry of Albrét, and shall here after bee King of Nauarre, and Soueraigne of Beaurne) gaue order for the defence of the frontier.

The Admirall of France defeated.

But behold one of the tricks of our ordinarie confidencee. Fiftene hundred of the Arrierban, and foure hundred foote, with some garrisons of Picardie, returned home laden with spoile, Without Scoutes (saith the Originall) without order, without feare of the enemye, and without courage. Hausmont Gouernour of Bapaume, being more vigilant, encounters them betwixt a wood, a village, and a riuer: chargeth them, and in a moment takes from them, both their bootie and their liues, at his discretion. The Imperials seeing Mariembourg victualled, opposed a Fort called Ginets, whence forraging all the neighbour Countie, they did starue Mariembourg. Twentie thousand foote, some ensignes of the old Spanish bands, and five or sixe thousand Reifters, vnder the command of Count Farlemont, camped about this Forte, to hinder an other victualing, conducted by the Duke of Newers, the Admirall Sansac, Bourdillon, and others, with eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and some eight thousand foote.

War beyond the Alpes.

The 26. of Iuly, the French horse charge the Reifters, and driue them into their fort: then seeing the Imperials loth to make any farther aduenture, the time being very tame and vnseasonable, want of forrage, colde, hungar, and many other discomforts, called them to found a retreat, and to leaue the third victualing of Mariembourg, to Sansac and Bourdillon: after the which the rigour of the season, and the injuries of the aire, forced both parties to liue in rest. Whilest they remaine quiet vpon the frontier, let vs visit them beyond the mountaines. The Marshall of Brissac had the winter past seized vpon Turee and Bielle. In the spring he had fortified S. Iaco, taken Cresquore, surprised by the industrie of Captaine Saluafon gouernor of Verrue Cazal, the storehouse of victuall and munition, prepared by the Imperials for the recouerie of Piedmont, ruined Poman, S. Saluador, and other small places not to be held, and vncasily fortified in any short time. About the end of Iuly, the Duke of Alua, successor to Gonsaque in the government of Lombardie, went to field with twenty thousand foote, foure thousand horse, and forty Canons, who at the first besieged S. Iaco: but he found good resistance, Birague & Pimerat commanding in the place, forced him to retire, & to fortifie at the bridge of Sure, hoping to vanquish those by famine, who had repulsed his attempts by force. The Marshall being fortified from the King, with foure thousand horse, & foureene thousand foote, lead by the Duke of Anguien, Prince of Conde, Dukes of Aumak, & Nemours, Vidame of Chartres, Aubigny, Gannor, Vantadour, & Vrsé, la Chastre and Lude, with a great number of voluntarie gentlemen, besieged Vulpian, defeated the succours which the Duke of Alua sent, took the high and the lower towne by force, and the Castle by composition. Montaluo both Towne and Castle (after the dismantling of Falopian) followed the conquerours fortune: the French made these conquests in September and October, the remainder of the yeare was more quiet. But before we proceed, let vs speake something of the warres of Siene, which beginning long before, were ended this yeare.

The insupportable behaviour of Don Diego of Mendosa, gouernour of Siene for the Emperour, had driuen the Cittizens to put themselves into the Kings protection, and to bring into the Cittie foure thousand men, vnder the command of the Earle of Perrillano, who being entred, forced the Spaniards kill some, and expell the rest by compulsion. These men chased from Siene, teize vpon Orbittello, & fortifie it. After the siege of Metz, the Emperour sent Don Garfie of Toledo Viceroy of Naples, with fiftene hundred horse, and twelue thousand foote, to spoile the Countie of Siene: and the King to crosse him, sends the Lorde of Termes, with twelue thousand foote, besides the Inhabitants of the Countie, all hauing vowed to roote out the gouernement of the Spaniards. Termes being entred, hee provided for the fortification of the Cittie, and assured himselfe of Montselice, Montelie and Montalein against the threats of the viceroy, and of Ascanius de la Corne, attending the arriual of Peter Stroffy who came with the title of Lieutenant generall for the King, with a good troupe of men at armes.

Stroffy being arriued, hee makes newe leuies in Italie. Cosme Duke of Florence giues intelligence to the Pope and Emperour, & all ioyne together to send home the French, giuing the charge of their comon army to James of Medius Marquis of Marignan. The Marquis beseegeth Siene, and at his first approch had almost surprised it by night, the fortifications being not yet finished. The Siensis withstand him, giue him the repulse, and kill many of his men. He then incamps before the Towne, spoiles the Countie, and had already reduced them to necessity, while that Stroffy was busied to provide for the other places within the estate of Siene. Stroffy comes into the Towne, and goes presently to field againe with six hundred men: he surpriseth Ralphé Baillon and Ascanius de la Corne, who had an enterprife vpon Chiusti: he defeats their troupes, kills Baillon, and sends Ascanius prisoner to the King.

The King releued him with newe supplies in Tuscane, and likewise in the Isle of Corfu, where the Lord of Termes had taken from the Genouois, partisans to the Emperour, the Townes of Saint Florent, and Saint Boniface a port of the sea. Their last succours consisted of five thousand Suisses and Gascons, with some light horse. And whilest they take breath in Siene, Stroffy makes a second sallie, with five hundred good horse and six thousand choise foote, takes Montcalin and Montcarlo from the Duke of Florence, and by this stratageme he forceth the Marquis to leaue Siene, for to succour the Florentins: then seeing the Marquis fortified with newe troupes, hee returnes with his men to Siens.

Moreouer Leo brother to Peter Stroffy ranne along the coast of Tuscane, and spoiled the ports belonging to the Duke of Florence. But as he approached too neere to Scarlin, to discouer the place, he was slaine with a shot. Stroffy to reuenge this death, comes to continue the siege, attending the succours which the Lord of Montluc brought. Montluc being arriued, Stroffy makes an army, compounded of 600. Italians, two thousand Gascons, two thousand Suisses, two thousand five hundred Lansquenets, and about a thousand horse, with which troupes hee resolved to fight with the enemy, if he presented himselfe: hauing left the gard of Siens to Montluc, he went to batter Ciuitellein in the territory of Florence.

The Marquis goes to succour it, and at his arriual chargeth Stroffy, who makes head against him, and both the one and the other bathe the field with a great effusion of blood. Stroffy leaues Ciuitelle, to set vpon Foian, a strong and a rich place: hee batteth it, and the first day takes it by assault, cutting Charlot Vrsin in peeces with all those that kept it, spoiles it, and abandons all to fire and sword. But see a troublesome Caltrophe. The Marquis approacheth better furnished with artillerie, and Stroffy marcheth towards Montpucian, fauoring the retreat of his men, with many and rough skirmishes. Then the Italians, being the chiefe strength of his army, slippe from him, and leaue him much inferiour to the Marquis: who following with speed, ouertooke him betwixt Martian, Lucignan and Foyan, giues him battaile. Stroffy entertaynes it, and with a bloudie fight giues testimony of the valour of his courage. But Bighet an Italian, being enseigne Colonnell of the army, turnes his backe cowardly: and the French lauing their liues after him by the nimbleness of their legges, leaue the horse, the Gascons and the Suisses to endure the charge, who had rather die with their armes in their hands, then turne their backs. Bighet and the Earle of Alte were afterwards beheaded, the first as being the principall cause of this defeat: the other for that he had cowardly yielded Lusignan, a place impregnable. They reckon two thousand five hundred slaine (some say foure thousand) besides a great number wounded to the death, and five or six hundred prisoners. Stroffy saued himselfe in Montalein, & the Marquis recovered Foyan, Martian, Lucignan & some other places, which euen then began to force the Siensis to obey the Conquerours command, who camped before their towne with 1555. all his forces. Montluc comforts them, and confirms their resolutions: but the coming of Stroffy with two enleigns of foot, and two companies of men at armes, laued in this shipwreke, reuiued them more: the which he did hazard in fauour of the beleeged vpon a report of the death of Montluc. Montluc foreseeing, that bread would sooner faile the beleeged, then courage, had already set an order for euery mans diet. The Marquis repulsed by the losse of six hundred men, at a scalado giuen in the night to the Cittadell, and the fort of Camollia: and finding that by skirmishes, batteries, assaults, intelligences, nor other stratagems, he should neuer bee master of Sienne: he resolues vpon the longer, but the more easie expedient. so as the watches, the toyles, the diseases, and worst of all, famine and dispaire of succours, forced Montluc the twentieth of Aprill this yeare, to saue the rest of his men by an honorable composition, which is read at large, in the historie of the warres of Italie. Sienne tell afterwards into the hands of the Duke of Florence: and the Marquis, for that he had prolonged the warre of Sienne, contrary to the Emperours liking, and wasted a mightie armie before it, died in disgrace, in the end of the same yeare.

Now the Emperour (whose humour wee haue sufficiently learned by the discourse of the historie) shrieking vnder the burthen of the affaires of this world, wearied with the toyles of warre, toucht with some remorse for the blood spilt, in those long and mournfull wars of Christendome, being perswaded, that his discords with our Kings, had made the Turke to preuaile much in diuers parts of Europe, his coming otlate in fauour of the French, to the Isle of Corse, to assist them at the sege of Calui, and Saint Boniface: to ayd them to conquer the Island, then in their retreat to spoyle the coast of Tuscane, to beleege Plombin, and the Isle of Elbe, of the territorie of Florence: to afflict the estates of Naples, Sicile, and Calabria, with infinite miseries, and being laden with great spooles, to carrie away without controule, and to sell infinite numbers of Christian soules at Constantinople and other places.

These considerations caused him to call Philippe his sonne from England to Bruxelles, where by autentike letters, of the five and twentieth of October, hee resigned all his realmes vnto him: commaunding all his estates and subiects, to acknowledge him as their true and lawfull King, aduising him particularly among other exhortations, To make a peace, and entertaine loue with the King of France, vniing their common forces, rather for the defence, then oppression of Christendome. Philip was inclined to peace, and his wife Mary Queene of England more, who desired to hold him by her, to raise vp an heire for the Realme, and by the confirmation of the old religion, to restore the Clergie to the possession of their lands, held by the Nobilitie. So as a truce was concluded for five yeeres, but it was as soone broken as made.

Paul the fourth was enemy to the Spaniards: and the Colonnes suspecting him to be of the French faction, (as in truth the house of Caraffes had of old time fauoured the title of our Kings, to the realme of Naples) sought to assure their estates and persons. To this end they held some secret assemblies within Rome, in the houses of Antony Colonne, and the Cardinall of Saint Fior, enemies to the house of France. The Pope to crosse them, imprisons this Cardinall in the Castle of Saint Angelo, with Camille Colonne, Julian Cesarin, and the Abbot of Bresigue: he summons Mary Antoinette, and plants gards and sentinels throughout all the Cittie. The Colonnes and their adherents, flee to the Castilian. He commaunds the Duke of Alua to succour them. The Duke marcheth with that desseine, and takes from the Pope about Rome Anagete, Pilastine, Segne, Tiuolt, and by the sege and taking of Ostia, cuts off the victuals from Rome: and the *Colonna*s fortifying themselves about Rome, kept the Pope mewed up within compasse of his walls.

The Pope appeales to the King for ayd, and sends him by his nephew the Cardinall Caraffe, a triumphant hatt with a stately sword. Our two Kings did not greatly loue: their ancient hatred and discontents were yet fresh, and their household flatterers to whome common confusions did serue as a ladder to aduance their estates and to enrich their houses, whereas peace sends the most of them hometo

The Emperour resignes his Kingdom to his sonne.

A line priuately,) were glad that Rome kindled the coales of newe quarrells betwixt their maisters. 1557

So the French (meaning to crosse the Castilian, in fauour of the Pope) sent Stroffy (Marshall of France in the place of the Lord of Sedan, lately deceased after his returne from prison out of the Lowe Countries,) to oppose against the Spaniards, attending the succors led by the Duke of Guise. The Duke of Guise arriued at Turin, with about fiftene thousand foote, eight hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred light horse, being assured of supplies so soone as the warres should begin: hauing ioyned his forces with those of the Marshall of Brissac, he marcheth directly to Valence, making this his colour, that the garrison had shot at the French going to succour the Pope: and for that it was secretly giuen out that the French had taken Pauia, hee amazeth Spolverin, who kept the Towne with two thousand men: summons him to yeeld, threatening him to put all to fire and sword, if he enter by force. Thus Spolverin being terrified, departs with bagge and baggage, and looeth his head at Pauia for a reward of his base cowardise.

Valence taken.

On the other side Stroffy, Montluc and others which were in Rome, issue forth with six hundred horse and five thousand foote, recover Ostia by composition, and expell the Spaniards from Velitres, Tusculum, Marin, Grotteferrate, Palesan, Saint Angelo, Saint Paul, Vico Valerio and other small places in the territories of Rome. The Duke of Aluies retreat had opened the way to Rome for the Duke of Guise, presuming vpon the convention lately made betwixt the King, the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara: where by the Pope should furnish twentie thousand foote, a thousand horse, and the charge of the armie: the King the like number of foote, and two thousand horse: the Duke six thousand foote, two hundred men at armes, six hundred light horse, and twentie peeces of battery. But the Popes haue commonly aduanced their affaires at their costs that haue beleued them, and then haue abandoned them very lightly that haue assisted them at their neede. The Duke of Guise comming to Boullen, findes no men in field, neyther were the Popes cofers open: and it may be, if they had not toucht this string, the expedition had bene more successfull.

In the meane time the French army decreased for want of pay, the Spaniards increased, and the Ferrarois in steede of assisting, craued aide of the Duke of Guise his sonne in Lawe. What could our men do, but studie of their returne into France? but the Pope had not yet firmly settled his affaires: and it hee had long remayned a lone betwixt two stoopes, without doubt the Spaniard would haue ouer-ruled him. And therefore, to stay the Duke of Guise, hee sweares, Not to treat any accord without the Kings consent, and that for assurance thereof hee would send his sonne the Duke of Palliane for hostage into France. But it was rather to attend the successe of the affaires of Picardie, where they prepared a Theater to play a bloudie Tragedie, then with any intent to discharge his oath. The Admirall hauing, by the taking and spoile of Lens in Artois, begonne the warre in Picardie, the Duke of Sauoye accompanied with Ernest and Henry Dukes of Brunswike, the Duke of Arscot newly come out of prison, the Earles of Manfield, Aiguemont, Meigne and Barlemont, leading fortie thousand foote and fiftene thousand horse: ten English foote and fiftene hundred horse, came soone after that to his succour, The Queene of England, hauing newly proclaymed warre against the King, came & threatened Guise, but in effect it was to beleagar Saint Quentin bene furnished of men. The Admirall enters into it with such men as the present necessity could furnish: and the Constable desiring to saue Saint Quentin, vnder tooke to lead sufficient forces to withstand the enemy. As he returns the x. of August, being greater in number and therefore without any intent to fight, Philips army follows him neere, as he is forced to fight, in the which the Constable is hurt and taken prisoner with the Dukes of Montpensier and Longueville, the Earle of Rocheaucault, Lodowick Prince of Montaigu, the Marshall of Saint Andrew, the Lords of Aubigny, Vasé, Curton, Roche du Maine, Kochfort in Brie, Biron, Saint Heran, Neufuy, Alouy, Molinant Monsieur and many other Noblemen and gentlemen of account.

The Duke of Montpensier taken by the French.

1557. There were slaine, John of Bourbon Duke of Anguyen, the Vicount of Turaine, the Constables sonne in lawe, the elder brother of Roche du Maine, Pontdormi, Chancener, the most part of the Captaines on foote, and fivē thousand men (some say eight thousand) with many souldiars prisoners.

S. Quentin taken.

The successe of the Spanish army.

The Pope reconciles himselfe to the Spaniards.

This fatall battell caused the losse of S. Quentin: the besieged being but eight hundred, indured a generall assault: but vnable to defend eleuen breaches, being forced at a tower, which was vnfortified of men, they remained the 27. of August a lamentable prey to the Conquerour. The sonnes of Fayete, the Captains Saleuert, Oger Viques, la Barre, Esling, Gourdes and almost all the souldiars were slaine. The Admirall D'Andelot his brother (but he soone escaped) Iarnac, S. Remi, Humieres, and many others of make were prisoners. Caslelet was the Spaniards third Trophie. Han, Chauny, and all other places, that might annoy them, made their victory absolute. Thus the Spaniards forces, had a happy season: and the Pope resolved to leane to the stronger. Their losses made him easily forget the speedy succors he had found in France: so as at the first approach of the Duke of Alba, he sends him a blanke, by the Cardinall Caraffe, and renouncing in September following the league made with the King, he made frustrate all his designs against Italy.

A great inundation at Rome.

Doublelesse the Councell of the Constable, the Admirall and many others, advising to maintaine the truce, was farre more expedient, then this light and painefull enterprise in fauour of a Pope, who was content to haue embarked vs in a newe Labyrinth of confusions, whereof we shall not be freed, without a mournfull and exemplarische spectacle. To reach Princes: That an accord confirmed by a reciprocal oath, ought to be holy and inuiolable. So this reconciliation was made famous by a strangewonder. The same day, and the day after this peace was concluded, almost a third part of the buildings of Rome, and a great number of Christians perished, by a sodaine and violent inundation of Tiber.

There was some likelihood, that Philip would haue entered further into the realme with his army: but vnderstanding that the King expected a supply of fourtene thousand Suisses, and prepared his campe at Laon, hee was content to fortifie his last Conquests: and so gaue the King meanes to stay in Bresse and Lionois, the troups which the Dukes of Guise and Aumale brought out off Italy to chase the Baron of D'Polleuille from Bourg in Bresse, the which he besieged in the Duke of Sauois name, with twelue hundred horse, and twelue thousand foote.

Should the King then suffer the courage of these forces newly arrived to quail with idlenesse, when as he might profitably imploye them? The English had held Calais from vs, two hundred and ten yeares: the Constables imprisonment had hindered the execution of a dessein which he and the Admirall his Nephewe had vpon this towne, by the meanes of Senarpont Gouverneur of Boullen. But nowe they win that by force, which they could neuer get by policy or industry. His Maiesty declares the Duke of Guise his Lieutenant Generall, in all his countries: he leaues two armies, the one he giues to the Duke of Guise: the other, to the Duke of Neuers. The first aduanceth vnder colour to hinder the viualing of S. Quentin. The other turning towards Luxembourg, drawes the Spaniards and Wallons to the defence thereof: then sodainely he sends his forces to the Duke of Guise, who marcheth with all speed against Calais. In this army, among many others, were the Princes of Conde and Roche-sur-yon, the Duke of Aumale and the Marquis of Elbeuf brethren, the Marshall Strossy, Montmorency, eldest sonne to the Constable, the Lords of Andelot, Termes, Grandmont, Creuacœur, Piennes, Randan, Alligre, Sarsie, Tauanes, Senarpont, Esfree maister of the Ordinance, and Gourdan, who lost a legge in this action.

Calais taken.

The French army appeared the first day of January, and at the first arriual takes the fort of Nieulley: and the next day, that of Risban. Thus the waye to the towne being opened, and the besieged sodainely surprised, without hope of speedy succors first the castle, and then the towne returned to the obedience of this crowne, as gladly, as we haue seene her ancient Burgeesses bid their poore & desolate country mournfully.

A fully farewell, in the yeare 1547. The countie of Oye, and all the forts the English held there, returned likewise to the subiection of their first and lawfull Lord. Guines, and other places dismantled, spare the cost which should be consumed in the defence thereof. On the other side, the Duke of Neuers did take for the King, the Castle of Herbement: the forts of Iamoyne, Chigny, Rossignol and Villeneufue. Thus their sorrow was turned into ioye, their hearts panting yet with that bloody battell of S. Laurence. The Court was partaker of this ioy, celebrating the 28. of Aprill, in the midst of these prosperities, the marriage of Francis Dauphin of Viennois, with Mary Steward Queene of Scotland, daughter to James the 5. and Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude Duke of Guise.

The Dauphin married to Mary Queene of Scotland.

During these happy victories, and coniunctions of alliances: the Duchesse Dowager of Lorraine, laboured to increase these solemn and publike ioyes, by the conclusion of a peace betwixt the two kings. The Cardinall brother to the Duke of Guise, met with her at Peronne to that intent: but this parle without effect, hastened the execution of an enterprise vpon Theonulle, the which being battered frō the 5. to the 21. of Iune with fivē and thirty Canons, and the mynes ready to plaie, receiued an honourable composition. The proiect of this prize is giuen to the Duke of Neuers, the glory of the execution, to the Duke of Guise: and the Duke of Nemours, the Marshall of Strossy (who was slaine there, with a shot vnder his left pappe, the Duke of Guise leaning on his shoulder, as they caused a platforme to bee vndermined.) the Lords of Montluc, Villeuilla, and Bourdillon, had the honour to haue giuen good testimonies of their valours in this prize. Chigny taken afterwards from the Wallons, was fortified: Arlon, Villemont, and Rossignol, burnt and made vnprofitable for the warre.

Theonulle taken by the French.

The English in the meane time, spoyled the coasts of Normandy and Picardy: and the King to stop their courses, prepares two small armies, one at la Fere vnder the Duke of Aumale: the other at Calais, vnder the Marshall of Termes, who succeeded Strossy. The Marshall attempts Berghes (they feared not the French there, & the towns which the Spaniards held vpon that coast were ill furnished:) he takes it, sacks it, and by that meanes opens the way to Dunkerke. Dunkerke being taken and spoyled in foure dayes, intiched both the souldiers, and boyes of the arme.

But the Flemings force them to make restitution: the Marshall camped before Grauelines, and the Cont Aiguemont Lieutenant for the King of Spain, in the Lowe Countries, hauing speedily assembled out off the neighbour garrisons, and of other forces, about sixtene thousand foote, a thousand or twelue hundred Reislres and two thousand horse, cuts off his way vpon the Ruer of A, which comes from S. Omer, and forceth him to fight. At the first charge, the French army ouerthrowes some squadrons of horse: but at the second shocke, the Marshall is hurt and taken with Villebon, Senarpont, Moruiliers, and Chaune: a great number of Captaines and souldiars are slaine vpon the place, and all the troups so discomfited, as of all the companies of men at armes, of three corners of light horse Scottishmen, fourtene ensigns of French foot, and eightene of Lansquenets, fewe escaped death or imprisonment: a wound which requited the fear of S. Laurence, and did frustrate the Duke of Guise his enterprise vpon Luxembourg: but it was partly recompenced by the Lord of Kersinson, vpon six or seuen thousand English & Flemings which landed at the haven of Cognest, spoyling, and burning the weakest parts of the coast of Brittain. This was in the end of Iuly. The Duke of Guise sayling of Luxembourg, came to lodge at Pierrepont in Tiristete, and there fortified with seauen Cornets of Reislres, brought by William, younger sonne to John Frederick Elector of Saxony, and a newe regiment of Lansquenets, led by Jacob of Aushourg, made the French army as strong, as the yeare before. About all others, were most apparant the companies of the Duke of Guise, Lieutenant general of the Dukes of Montpensier, Neuers, Aumale, Bouillon, Nemours, Saxony, Luxembourg, of the Prince of Roche-sur-yon, of the Prince of Salerne, of the Cont Charny, the Marshall S. Andre, the Marquis of Elbeuf, and of the Lords of Rocheaucault, Randan,

The Marshall of Termes defeated.

1558. Randan, Curton, Montmorency the Constables eldest sonne, Escheuers, Roche du Motte, A Tenles, La Veuguien, Bourdillon, Tauanes of Beauvais. The light horse of the Earles of Eu and Roissy, of the Lords of Valete, Bueil, Laigny, Rottigotty, Lombay, and others, whereof the Duke of Nemours was generall, and so great a number of Cermaines, Suisses, and Frenchmen, as this flourishing armie of men (lodging nere to Amiens, along the river of Somme) prevailed much for the treatie of peace, which followed soone after.

Philip had his armie likewise vpon the river of Anthie, both intrenched and fortified with artillerie, as if they meant to continue there, and in time to tire one another. Some moneths passe without any other exploite then inroades and light skirmishes. In the end, the eternall God of armes, who from his heavenly throne beheld the state of these two mightie armies, changed the bitteresse of former warre into a pleasing peace, confirmed by alliances the yeare following. The Abbie of Cercamp vpon the limits of Arthois and Picardie, gaue the first notice. And as the Constable (being freed from prison) the Marshall of S. Andrew, the Cardinall of Lorraine, Moulliers Bishopp of Orleans and Anbesine Secreatarie of State, assembled for the King, treated with the Duke of Alen, the Prince of Orange, Regomes de Silues, Cupbearer to King Philip, Granducelle Bishopp of Arras and Figle, of Quichem, President of the Courcell of State of the Lowe Countie: beheld the death of Charles the 5. Emperour, chancing in September, and that of Mary Queene of England, al out the midst of November, charged both the place and the time of this conclusion.

Castle Cambrejs had the honour to finish it at the second conference, the which was confirmed by the marriages of Philip with Elizabeth, eldest daughter to King Henry: of Phillibert Emanuel Duke of Sauoy, with Marguerite the Kings onely sister: and of Charles Duke of Lorraine, with Claude a younger daughter of France. The King yielded to the Castilian all that hee had taken from him, as well on this side, as beyond the mountaines. To the Sauoyard, he restored Bresse, Sauiy & Piedmont: to the Genouois, the Isle of Corse, and about foure hundred places more conquered, during these fatall and pernicious warres, which had made so many Prouinces desolate, ruined so many Castles, Villages, and Townes, drinke so much Christian blood, and slaine so many millions of men of all qualities, retaining nothing but the territories of Boullen and Calais. Thus the winde doth sodenly drinke vp, all the toile, all the trauels, all the sweat of many ages. And the Lord saith vnto man: Thou seest, this might will take thy soule from thee, and who shall haue the things, which thou hast prepared? And, All men are vaine, doubtlesse man labours for a shadow, he troubleth himselfe for nothing.

But must the quenching of forraigne confusions, kindle new fires in the midst and foure corners of the realme? without doubt there needed no violent but spirituall remedies, to redresse those diuisions which grew daily for a religious cause. Henry was of a milde and temperate spirit, but hee gaue care too lightly to such as could not effect their desires but by troubles. The prisons were full of such as they called Lutherans, and euen then many noble families were toucht with that cause. Moreover, many officers of the Parliament, wished a milder proceeding against those prisoners. This diuinitie caused an assemblee, which they called Mercuriale, to heare the opinion of Presidents & Councillors vpon this controuersie, the which the King was required to countenance with his presence. Anne du Bourg vsed a great libertie of speech: some others did second his opinion. This freedome transported the King into chollier: he commands the Constable to put them in prison, and vowes to see them burnt within few dayes, if they persist. But oh Prince, The yeares of thy accompt are come, and thou entr'st into a path from which thou shalt no more returne. The Constable deliuered them to the Court of Montgomery, Captaine of his Maiesties gardes, who leads Henry to the Bastille, and the rest to diuerse other prisons. Let vs not iudge hereby, but admire how fouler, the iudgements of God: in that we shall see these three personages, every one in his ranke, dye an extraordinary and tragicall death.

The marriages of the Kings Daughters and Sister, were solemnized with all the pleasures and sports that might be deuised. The Court exceeded in sumptuous feasts, plays,

A playes, masks, dances, and bonfires: ordinarie acclamations in such ceremonies, testified the peoples publicke ioy, by reason of the peace: but this pleasant Comedie was conuerted by a sad catastrophie, into a pittifull and mournfull Tragedie. The King would the tenth of Iune, to be the day of the Challengers at the Tilt, in Saint Anthoine streete, being seconded by the Duke of Guise and Ferrare: and to runne his last course in fauour of the Queene his wife, he sent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery. The Earle excuseth himselfe to runne against his Maiestie: the day before hee could not hit any one, and it may bee now he feared a second shame. But hauing a second charge from the King to enter the Lists, he runnes, and breakes his Lance vpon the Kings cuirasse, and with a splinter thereof, (his Beauer being somewhat open) strikes him so deepe into the eye, as the tenth of Iuly his soule left his body, in his house of Tournelles, the 42. yeare of his age.

He had by Katherine of Medicis his wife, sixe Sonnes and five Daughters. Francis his successor, of the age of sixteen or seuentene yeares, Lewis Duke of Orleans, who liued few moneths: Charles Maximilian, Edward Alexander, afterwards named Henry the 3. and Henricus afterwards named Francis. Elisabeth married to Philip King of Spain, Claude to Charles Duke of Lorraine, Marguerite to Henry of Bourbon, then King of Nauarre, Jane and Katherine twins, who dyed soone after their birth: Hee was a religious Prince, goodly, of a milde disposition, peaceable, affable, not greatly subiect to passions, generous, loving his seruants and men of merite, but voluptuous, and not able to discouer in due time the ambition and couetousnesse of such as possessing him, made sale of lawes, iustice, offices, and spirituall liuings, emptied the subiects puries, and nourished the warres which we haue before obserued, namely since the breach of the vncie: finding such sweetnesse, profit, and honour, in the managing of the Treasure, and commanding of the Kings Armies in the voyage of Italie, and especially in this last Lieutenancie generall in Picardie: as hereafter wee shall see a young Prince raigne like a shadow, and they being seized of the gouernment, both of his person and of his realme, shall dispossesse the chiefe officers of the Crowne, keepe backe the Princes of the bloud, the true and lawfull gouernours of the State, the King being in his minority: and to plot the meanes to raise their race to the royall throne.

FRANCIS the second, the 60. King of France.

THis raigne is short, but very memorable, We behold a Theater, A whereon is acted a horrible tragedie, a King yong of yeares, and of iudgement, gouerned by his mother, and his wifes vncles: a new forme of Court. The Princes of the bloud haue no more credit: and seeme to neglect both the publike and priuat intrest. The Courtiers stand at a gaze, and for the most part stowpe to the stronger. The Clergie shuld themselves vnder those that kinde these fires in France. The Nobilitie wearied with former toyles, do yet wipe off the dust, and sweat from their armes.

The people diuided for matter of religion, and oppressed with burthen of former warres, desires to breath. The Constable holds his place: yet is he not so surely seated, but they will displace him. There are two factions in Court: the Constable holdeth the one, those of Guise the other. The first was firme and sincere, the last, cunning, and pleyable. The Queene mother ioynes with the last. The King of Nauarre might crosse them: and therefore to be the better informed of his desseins, she entertaines seruants, and pensioners about him. The Princes of the bloud, the Constable, the Marshalls, the Admirall, and many other Noblemen, prepared for the funerals of the deceased King, when as the Duke of Guise and the Cardinall of Lorraine, leading the King, his brethren and the Queene to the Loure, begin a strange alteration, a true patterne of the inconstancie of this world. The Duchesse of Valentinois had quietly gouerned the deceased King, and by her practises, had caused Francis Oliuer, a man of a singular reputation, and Chancellor of France, to bee dismissed. At the first entrie, shee is spoyled of her precious Jewels, which testified the Kings loue vnto her, to adorne the Queene that raigned: and by her disgrace, leaues the place to Catherine, to rule hereafter without Companion. They take the seale from Cardinall Beirrand, a

seruant

A seruant to the said Duchesse: and to haue a Chancellor at their deuotion, they restore Oliuer. They giue the Cardinall of Lorraine, the gouernment of the Treasure, and of the affaires of State. and to the Duke of Guise his brother, the command in warre. This was properly to giue the Constable to vnderstand, that without warrant hee should take his leaue: the which hee did, after that hee had conducted his good maiester to the graue.

And to play their parts absolutely without controule, they send the Prince of Condé into Flanders, vnder colour to confirme the peace: and him of Roche-sur-yon, to carry the order of France to the King of Spaine: then at his returne they depute him with the Cardinall of Bourbon, to conduct Elizabeth to Philip her husband. In the meane time, the Guisians call the Cardinall of Tournon from Rome: a man fitte for their humors. They displace part of the ancient officers of the Kings house, and place new at their deuotion: they furnish Prouinces, and frontier Townes with gouernours of their owne choise: they obtaine a declaration from the King sitting in parliament, whereby he made it knowne, that touching all affaires which concerned the estate of his Crowne and house, his pleasure was, they should hereafter repaire to his two Vncles.

To conclide, they do and vndoe, place and displace, in Parliament and priue Councell, like to a King of absolute power. And the Queene mother challengeth the gift of money growing of the confirmation of offices and priuileges of Townes and commonalties, the which by right cannot be exacted, but when the realme falls into a collaterall line. Now are they settled in this vsurped gouernment: they haue officers at their pleasure. But there is yet a moate in their eye. Those of the religion, who then were called reformed (let vs hereafter call them Protestants, for their common cause with the Protestants of Germanie) multiplied infinitely. Some Princes, and many Noblemen did countenance them, and were ready to take their protection. To weaken them, nay rather to ruine them quite: the Kings letters pattents are granted, the 14. of Iuly, with a Commission to certaine Iudges, for the triall of Anne du Bourg, and foure of his companions prisoners. It was to be feared, their proceeding against these five Counsellors, would preiudice the whole party. They beseech the Queene by their letters (who had made shew to incline to their doctrine, when as she was barren) to vse her authoritie in the restraint of these rigorous pursutes. She passeth her word to the Prince of Condé and Admirall, so as they will liue secretly and without any scandale.

Hereupon Anthonic King of Nauarre, greatly prest by some Princes and Noblemen (the Constable at the death of Henry, had perswaded him to seize first on the gouernment) arriues in Court, being at S. Germaine in Laye, hauing at Poitiers giuen good hope to some Ministers of the Protestant Churches, to make open profession of their religion. But what entertainment do they giue to this first Prince of the bloud of France: his harbingers finde no lodging for him within the Castle. It shall cost me my life, and ten thousand more with me (saide the Duke of Guise to his harbinger) before they take from me the place and lodging, which the King hath giuen me neere vnto his person. No man goes to meete him: those of Guise looke that he should go to salute them: and which is worse, the next day he hath no place in Councell. After some dayes, the King sayes vnto him, that his Vncles hauing the charge of affaires, hee desired them that would haue his fauour, to obey them in all things. So hauing obtained confirmation of his offices and pensions, he approued by his silence the vsurpation of the house of Guise, who lead the King to Rheims, where he was triumphantly annointed the eightene of September, by the Cardinall of Lorraine, Archbishop of that place.

F Soone after the Coronation, the Queene mother gets a resignation from the Constable, of the office of Lord Steward, in fauour of the Duke of Guise, & in recompence, made his sonne Marshall of France. The Admirall foreseeing that they would dispossesse him of the gouernement of Picardie: hee first gaue the King to vnderstand, that 1559. it belonged to the Prince of Condé, for that his predecessors had long enjoyed it. His resignation was willingly accepted, but not the condition. It was better to purchase a good servant and partisan, which was the Marshall of Brissac. Thus the Princes and chiefe officers of the Crowne were disgraced, but those that were least popular among the people, were not mute.

They had a good share in the priuate discontent of these great personages, for seeing the disorders that might ensue, and require a Parliament, as the Soueraigne cure for such diseases, whereby the Queene Mother might be excluded from the Regencie, and those of Guise put from the Kings person. To please the King, they perswade him, that they sought to bridle him and to make him a ward, that hee should hold them enemies to his authority, and guiltie of high treason that talke of a Parliament.

The King of Spaine crosseth them, and by letters written to the King his brother in Lawe (the which were read in Councell in the presence of the King of Navarre, he declares himselfe, (saith hee for the good affection he did beare) Tutor and Protector of him, his Realme and his affaires, against those that would change the government of the state, as if the King were not capable of the government. Pleasant people, which respect so much the word of lawfull Tutelage, and yet they vsurpe it against the Lawes and orders of the Realme, holding it onely by tyranie. This other affront sent the King of Navarre, home into Bearne whence he came.

All this did but increase the hatred of great and small against the Guisuns. Many treatises are published, written and printed, and all tend to prone, That it belongeth to the Estates, to provide gouernours for Kings in their minorities: that these two bretheren are incapable of the gouernment, being both strangers: the one a priest, the other presuming to say in the life of the deceased King, that the Realme belongeth to the house of Lorraine, as issued from Charlemagne, from whome Hugh Capet had vsurped it. A proposition which they haue presumed to publish in these latter times: but so often confuted, as it needes no further discours. The King began to growe, and euen now hee complaind, that they kept him from hearing of his subjects complaints, but he was so sickely as there was no hope of long life. To gett him footing in the government of Estate, they resolute to purchase many seruants in the Courts of Parliament, to winne the affections of Courtiers and men of warre, and by a burning zeale, to the rooting out of Protestants, to purchase the loue of the Clergie and people.

They publish sundrie Edicts against them, they promise great recompences to them that discover their assemblies: many Townes fill their prisons: they employ aire, fire and water to ruine them, and yet it seemes that the more they kill the more they increase. Amongest others, Anne of Bourg (persisting in the confession of his faith vpon the points of religion in controuersie,) was on the twentieth of December hanged at the Greue, and his bodie then burnt to ashes. The Counsellors, La Forte, Foix, Faur and Fumee imprisoned for the same causes, escaped with some sharpe admonitions.

Manie could not beare this oppression. The Princes were kept backe: the greatest of the Realme out of credit, threatened, and secretly pursued to the death: the conuocation of the Estates refused: the Parliaments corrupted, the Iudges for the most part at the Guisuns deuotion: the publike Treasure, offices, and benefices were given to whom they pleased. Some learned Lawyers and diuines answered: That the Princes beeing in that case borne Lawfull Magistrates, and called by the Estates of the Realme, or the sounder part thereof, they might with their fauour, or of some one of them, lawfully oppose themselves against the vsurped government and authoritie of the house of Guise, and take armes at neede to withstand their force and violence. But with this consideration of the publike, they had so manie priuate passions, as the enterprize must needes be fatal

A fatal to the vnder-takers. The enterprize required a stout and courageous leader: for the chiefe plot, was to seize at what price soeuer, on the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal his brother, and then to require a parliament, to make them yeeld an account of their gouernment, and to provide for the King and Realme.

Lewis of Bourbon Prince of Condé, is instantly required to accept thereof. The Prince examines the consequence of the fact, and hauing imparted it to some persons, louing the good of the realme, he gives Commission to some secretly of the crimes, louing with the house of Guise was charged, to provide for the same, as conscience, & the common good should require. They find by informations, and certaine personages well qualified, being priue to their secret designs, and witnesseth, that their intention was, the King being vnable, by the iudgement of the Physicians, to live long, nor to have any issue: first to roote out all Lutherans in France; then to murder all the Princes of the blood; and to seize vpon the realme. Moreouer they were charged with many thefts, robings, and extortions, and by consequence, were in many things found guiltie of high Treason.

The difficultie was, how to seize vpon these two persons: Cosette of Barri, Lord of Renaudie, a Baron of Perigot, accepts the managing of this action, and the Prince promiseth to assist him with his authoritie: So as nothing be said or done against God, the King, his brethren, the Princeesse, nor the Estate: protesting to oblige himselfe first against any one that should attempt the contrarie. All that were in the action, bind themselves to the like oath, yea to aduertise the King, if any thing were pretended against his Maestie: they appoint the tenth of March, hoping to find the Court still at Blais. Five hundred French gentlemen, with other troupes vnder the command of the Baron of Castelnau, should accompanie Renaudie, followed by a thousand others, besides their troupes on foote. But it is almost impossible to keepe secret an enterprize imparted to so many diuerse humors, but some one will discover it. Renaudie lodged at Paris in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, in an Advocats house, a Protestant by profession, who hauing discovered somewhat of this enterprize, vnder colour to imploy himselfe for the aduantage thereof, he learned all that passed. But hoping of some notable recompence, he sodenly went & discovered it to Alemant, master of requests, a fauorite to the Cardinall, and to Miles Secretarie to the Duke of Guise: And Lignieres one of the Captaines of the enterprize, did afterwards bewray the names of the commanders, the rendezvous for their troupes, with other circumstances, to the Queene mother, to saue (said hee) the honour and life of the Prince of Condé, whom they accused of high treason.

To assure their persons, they transport the King to Amboise, they send letters from the King, and his mother, to call the Admirall and his brethren to Court, they dispatch many letters Patents to Baylifs, and Senechalls, against all such as should be found carrying of armes vpon the way to Amboise. The Admirall being arrived makes great admonitions to the Queene mother, in presence of the Chancellor, vpon the extreme violences, and poursuits against the Protestants: and the Chancellor hauing freely pronounced the Admirals aduice in councell, there followed an edict for the abolishing of that was past, for matter of religion. But this pardon excluded all ministers, and such as should be found to haue conspired against the King, his mother, his wife, or the Princeesse, his cheefe officers or the estate, and all other culpable of like crimes.

Notwithstanding this Edict, Renaudie proceeds, and the Prince goes to Court, to present the informations to the King, against the house of Guise, when as they should be seized on. The execution was put off to the sixteenth, by reason of the change of the place. In the meane time, the Guisuns had assembled men from all parts, so as the troupes arriving one after one, to the appointed places, were presently seized on. The Baron of Castelnau, and the cheefe of the faction, are at the Castle of Noisy: the Guisuns aduerted thereof, perswade the King, that there are rebels assembled to murder him. The King sends the Duke of Nemours with a troupe 1560. troupe, who at the first surpriseth Captaine Mesgras and Randry, walking without the Castle, and sends them prisoners to Amboise: he doth dien beleaguer the Castle, summons the Baron to lay aside armes, and to go speake with the King, binding himselfe by the faith of a Prince, that he should have no harme. The Baron trusted to his word. But being arruied, they speake with no man but with comissioners, appointed for their trials.

Cruell executions at Am-boise.

Renaudie caused his troupes to aduance quietly through the woods: but they had walled vp the gate, by the which they should enter, and the horsemen sent by the *Guise*s compassing them in: many were led away, and presently hanged, and afterwards drawne to the river. And as hee laboured to rallie his dispersed troupe, the Lord of Pardillon encounters him in the forest of Chasteau-regnard, and passing by, dischargeth his pistoll, the which not taking fire, Renaudie had his sword first drawne, and as he was about to kill him, one of the Pardillons seruants ouerthrew him with a harguebus: being slaine, his bodie was straightway carried and hanged on the bridge at Amboise, with this inscription: Renaudie, called la Forest, cheefe of the rebelles. Those of Guise being assured of their enemies, and their troupe dispersed, they giue commandement to the Prince of Condé, in the Kings name, not to depart without leave. They begin to cut off heads, to hang and to drowne their prisoners, tyed to long poles, six, eight, tenne, twelue, and fiftene in a companie: and although there were herin more question of estate then religion, yet they giue out, that the Lutherans would maintaine themselves by the sword, and as such men, they caused many to be executed, who by their examinations, and impertinent answers touching matters of conscience, did witnes that they were not yet seasoned with any other doctrine, then that of their fathers.

The Chancellor dies
desperately

This alarm had put the yong King in feare: but more the impression of his Vncles, perswading him that they sought his person: And what haue I done, said hee often? what haue I done; that my subjects should attempt thus against mee? I will heare their complaints, and doe them right. And some times to those of Guise: I know not what it is, but I vnderstand, it is you onely that they seeke: I would gladly you would absent your selues for a time, to see if they would attempt against you, or mee. Amongst all the prisoners, foure are especially noted, Castelanau, Villemongis, Champagne, and le Picard, for that with an admirable constancie, and resolution, they had blamed the Chancellor, who against his conscience, had signed the sentence of their death: the which so terrified him, as hee sodenly fell sicke of greefe, and melancholie, and soone after left this world, murmuring, sighing, and sorrowing for the Counsellor du Bourg, and crying out some houres before his death, O Cardinal, thou hast damned vs all. Michel Hospitall then Chancellor to the Duchesse of Sauoie, was called from Nice, and substituted in his place.

An indiscreet
zeale.

See here a furious storme dispersed, which partly concerned the State, partly religion: but hereafter religion shall bee the onely marke, The Protestants in the midst of these rigorous persecutions, increased in multitude, and in many places they could not containe, nor content themselves with secret assemblies. An indiscreet zeale transported them of Valence, Montlimart and Romans, to exercise their religion in ordinary Churches at noone day. The Lord of Clairmont, Lieutenant for the Duke of Guise in Daulphiné, was of too mild an humor: and Maugiron more violent. The Duke giues him commission to suppress them, and to vse his authoritie in the Parliament of Grenoble. Maugiron enters Valence with sixtene companies of the old bands of Piedmont, and some other troupes of men at armes: hee makes the streets flow with blood, sacks the houses, and intreats the inhabitants as in a Towne which is taken by assault. Montlimart also followed the like fortune.

Cause of the troubles.

Moreouer, the President Truchon, and some Councillors of Grenoble, imprison 60. of the chief of Romans: they hang two, whip one, and then send him to the galleys: & at

Valence

Valence, they behead two ministers, & hang three chieftemen in the Towne: the rest escaped, some by abjuring, some by whipping, some by banishment, and some by a fine.

1560

At the same time Paulon of Richiend Lord of Moumans, one of the chiefe of the enterprise of Amboise, hauing failed to surprise Aix, loaded Prouence with two thousand men armed at their owne charge, and a great number of gentlemen, and other voluntaries. But their armes were no other wise employed but to conuert the Images, relikes and ornaments of the Church into gold and siluer, the which with some respect to warlike discipline, and more commendably then, in the following age, they left in the magistrats hands of the place. This was to summon the neighbour Prouinces to like B reuolts: but the Earle of Tande hauing stayed the furie of this flying army, they sheath their swords, and vnsheath their pennes, onely by supplications, to the Kings Maies-ty, and to his mother, protesting of their sinceritie: they discovered the ground of their griefes against the *Guise*s, and propounded remedies to auoyde Ciuill warres.

The Protestants petition
to the King.

Their admonitions conteyned three chiefe heads: That it might be provided, for the gouernment of the realme, offering the King a Councell, according to the ancient constitutions of France. That to pacifie controuersies touching religion, a free and holy Councell should be held, That those of the religion in the meane time might quietly, and with liberty of their consciences liue in their houses, following that which is contayned in the confession of their Churches. The two brethren seeing themselves directly charged by the Protestants, thunder out against them: they write to the King of Spaine, and to the Catholike Princes: That the Lutherans and Caluinists are the onely authors of the troubles of France, and of the tumult of Amboise. And to the Protestants; That such as were executed in diuers parts of the realme, are onely certaine sacramentaries, enemies to the confession of Ausbourg. A bare shift and weake remedie to quench the fire which began to consume a part of the world.

Hereupon Philip aduiseeth them, to bring the inquisition of Spaine into France. The priuie Councell yeelds to it, and the Parliaments allowe thereof: but the Chancellor Hospital was too wise a politician: he would not see France disguised after the Spanish manner. Katherine was much troubled, not knowing howe to saile in so many stormes. The conuocation of the Estates might eclipse her authority, the restoring of the Princes of France, incompatible with a Florentin humour: the restitution of the Constable, whome shee hated to the death, accusing him to haue sayd to King Henry, That no one of his Children, did resemble him, but his bastard, whome his Sonne Montmorency had married. These things did wonderfully afflict her soule. Yet would shee gouerne and rule, foreseeing that shee could not better maintaine her greatnesse, then by the discord of the two houses of Bourbon and Lorraine. She relies vpon the last: and arming them with her authoritie, shee puts the King her Sonne, and herselfe into the protection of the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine.

This makes them swell both in hart and speeche: but there must bee a meanes found to pacifie this quarrell which concerned the estate, that vnder the cloake of religion (a goodly and ordinary pretext for great personages) the people might forget the vnlawfull vsurpation wherewith they were charged. They protest therefore to imploy all their meanes, and their friends to suppress those that sought any alteration in religion: hoping that when they had cut this sinewe from the Princes of the blood, they should bee more easily reuenged, both of them and of the Constables faction.

But during these garboiles, the principall peece of their chafe slippes out of their toyles: the Prince of Condé escapes, and retires to the King of Nauarre his brother, whilst the Duke of Guise in open Counsell opposeth in shewe (though in effect he omitted no meanes to seize on him) against his brothers aduice, concluding directly to haue the Prince apprehended. They forget not to proclaime this retreat, and as if hee had doubted his cause, they publish throughout the Realme,

The Prince of Condé escapes.

1560. that hee had shewed himselfe guiltie. Presently newe forces are leuied and Commissions giuen to make warre in Gascogne. The Protestants fearing a nere storme which threatened them, flie to Nerac to the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé, they present themselves and their meanes, shewing them the wrongs done by them of Guise to the King and the Realme, and beseech them to vndertake the deliery of his maiestie and maintenance of the estate.

An Assembly of Princes & Noblemen.

These two Princes had already resolved to vse all their meanes, to chase the Lorrains from the government of France. This request confirmed them, and then they sought out all Noblemen, and gentlemen which by their armes and meanes might aduance this worke. The Constable, with the Vidame of Chartres and a great number of others, promise to maintain their iust quarrell against all men, except the King, the Queenes, and his bretheren. Their letters fall into the hands of them of Guise: the Prince his Agent is imprisoned, and the Vidame of Chartres shut into the Bastill, and shall not be freed vntill the day before the Kings death, and himselfe shall die within fewe dayes after. Thus all things tend to an open warre. The Queene Mother desired to see these two parties fight, but not with the ruine of either side, for the fall of any one of them had set her beside the saddle. She therefore caused to be propounded in Councell, by the aduice of the Chancellor, and Admirall, whomeas yet she did willingly heare: That it was expedient to assemble all the Princes, Noblemen of the Realme, and men of authority, to aduise of the meanes to pacifie the troubles, growne principallie by reason of the persecutions for religion. Those of Guise C approve this desseine: this was in shewe a pitfall to take the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé.

Moreouer they hoped to suborne so many witnesses, as all things should second their desires, and so forthatime should dissolve the conuocation of the Estates. So the King sends forth his letters into all parts, intreating them all to be at Fontainebleau the twentieth five of August, especially the King of Navarre: and to bring his brother and those Noblemen that were then with him. The *Guise*s also by their letters giue many good hopes and promises. But we haue sayd, they had in the beginning lodged spies in the King of *Navarre*s house. By their meanes they worke so as the King of Navarre stirres not, and lets slippe an oportunitie that he had to seeke a lawful government, within the realme.

The Constable better resolved, thinking the Princes would assist, arrives with eight hundred horse, and by this troupe makes the Lorrains to shewe him a good countenance. At the opening of the assemblee, the Admirall presents a petition to the King for the Protestants, who required to haue Temples granted them and free exercise of religion, throughout the whole Realme. There-vpon Charles of Marillac Archbishop of Vienne, shewed with such libertie of speech, the necessitie to assemble a nationall Councell, to remedie these controuersies growne for religion: and a Parliament to order the government of France, as hee furnished but fewe dayes after his oration. The Admirall toucht the cause of religion and state E more vehemently, taxing by ineffectiue such as giuing the King guards vpon guards, enterrayned him in distrust of his subiects, and his subiects in hatred of their owne King.

As they had made shewe to like of this assemblee, so they seemed to allowe of a Parliament. They appoint it first at Meaux and afterward at Orleans the x. of December, and the Synode for the Clergie at Paris the twentieth of January following, to determine of what should be expedient to be treated of in a generall council, whereof they gaue them hope. But as they had vnderhand withdrawne the Princes from comming to this Assemblee, so must they make them vnwilling to be present at the Parliament.

To this intent those of Guise, in the Kings name, command the companies of ordinarie souldiars to be readie the 20. of September: they lodge them in such sort as those whome they suspected, had them in front, in flanke and behinde them, and spies likewise

1560. A likewise to discover them: and they giue charge to the commanders, to coute all them in peeces that they should finde marching to ioyne with the Princes. If their forces were not sufficient to diuert the Prince of Condé, whom they knew to be more busie, and to endure lesse: they doe also procure Letters from the King, to the King of Navarre, whereby hee doth charge the Prince to haue attempted against the estate of France, and to haue sought to seize vpon some of the good Townes of the realme. Hee desires him therefore, to send him his brother with a good and sure garde: if not, hee himselfe will fetch him, well accompanied.

The answer of Antonie and Lewis, incounting the Lorraines with their owne armes, holding them guiltie of the same crimes wherewith they charged them, made them to change their note. They send a second commandement, whereby the King giues his word to the Princes to come in safetie: hee promiseth to heare all mens admonitions and iustifications, willingly: to receiue them according to their estates and dignities: not to disturbe any Prince in his religion, whereof hee now made open profession: and that they should returne when they pleased, free from iniurie and outrage.

Politic to abute the Princes.

And to draw them on, the Cardinall of Bourbon, (a Prince not well able to discover the deccites of the enemies of his house) is expressly sent vnto them. They marche, and are no sooner come to Limoges, but seven or eight hundred Gentlemen, well appointed, do visit them. The Deputies of Provinces offer them six thousand foot, C Gascons and Poitouins: foure thousand horse and foote out of Languedoc: as many or more out of Normandie, and the other Provinces promise to rise on all sides, to fortifie them at this assemblee of States: so as it will please the King of Navarre to declare himselfe Protector of the King and Realme, against them of Guise. But the Cardinall of Armagnac, Escars, Iarnac, and some other Councillors of the same mould, bad seruants to their maister, propounded so many dangers, so many inconueniences vpon their comming to Court with force, (and why should they not resist their enemies force) as hee sent back all his companie, and countermanded such as came promising notwithstanding to imploy himselfe courageously in the Parliament, for the good of all France.

D Herevpon they giue the King to vnderstand, that the Lutherans of Orleans practised something to subuert his estate, as they had of late attempted at Lions. To assure themselves of the Towne, and to punish some which were noted in the booke of death, whole confiscation was good, the *Guise*s first send Sipiere, Lieutenant to the Prince of Roche-sur-yon, gouernour of Orleans, to disarm the people, and to fill the houses suspected with men of war: they call together the nobilitie, & men at armes of France: then they conduct the King thither, to make his entry with the Queene the 17. of October. The Princes gouerned by their innocencie, arrive the eue of All Saints, and passe from the Portereau to the Kings lodging vpon the Escalpe, betwixt two ranks of armed men. The Cardinall of Bourbon, and the Prince of Roche-sur-yon receiue them. E Not a Courtier nor a Bourgeois meetes them: and for their first affront, when as they sought to enter on horse-back according to the viall custome, they were answered with a Brauado: The great gates do not open. The King attended them: at the first, hauing done their duties to his Maistie, and no man aduanced to bid them welcome. I am said he to the Prince of Condé (aduertised from diuers places, that you haue made many enterprises against me and the estate of my realme, and therefore I haue sent for you, to know the truth from your owne mouth.

The King
comes to Orleans.

The Princes
arrive.

Lewis iustifies himselfe so plainly, and doth charge his enemies so directly, as the King himselfe could not impute these accusations, but to the wilfulness of his Vnckles, against his owne blood. But he was possessed by them, and suffered himselfe to be easily abused. So hee commands Chaigny, Captaine of his guards (sent by them of Guise to seize vpon the Prince. Chaigny shate him vp in a house hard by, before time which they make a fort of Brick, flanked with Canoniers, and furnished with field peeces to defend the approaches. The Lady of Roye his mother in law, was likewise carried from

The Prince of Condé imprisoned.

1560. from Anici, a house of hers in Picardie, prisoner to S. Germaine in Laye, by Renouart and Carrouges. Ierosme Groslet Bayliffe of Orleans, (vnder colour that his father had beene Chancellor to the deceased King of Nauarre, and hee an affectionate seruant to the Princes, accused also to be the Protector of the Lutherans in Orleans.) was likewise imprisoned two dayes after the Princes arriuall. La Haye Councillor in the Court of Parliament at Paris, who did sollicite the Princes affaires, was also in trouble. Amaury Bouchart maister of Requests vnto the King, and Chancellor to the Nauarrois, was sent prisoner to Melun, which others brought from Lions, to haue proofes against the Prince, whose triall they did hasten with all speed. But they meant no harme to Bouchart, he had already retired himselfe, and blabbed by his Letters to the Cardinall of Lorraine, to the preiudice of his maister.

Commissioners to arraigne the Prince.

The Prince condemned.

Neither the informations taken at Lions by the Marshall S. André, nor the prisoners at Melun, were sufficient to make the Prince a spectacle vpon a scaffold. They send for the president of Thou, Bartholmewe Faye, and James Viole, Councillors of the Parliament at Paris, to examine the Prince vpon the point of high Treason: and if this peece of batterie were not of force, then to touch him vpon the point of religion, and to condemne him for heresie. The Prince propounds diuers causes of recusation, and appeales from them to the King. The priuie Councill reiects his appeale, and decrees, That vpon paine of high treason, the Prince should answer before these Commissioners. He answers: purgeth himselfe cleerly of all crime, and aduowes his religion free. By this confession, iudgement was giuen against him, & he condemned to dye: a C day appointed the x. of December, to countenance the beginning of the Parliament. They onely note, the Earle of Sancerre, the Chancellor, and the Councillor Morier, which did not pollute their soules with the approbation of this vniust sentence.

This sentence should in the end cause the ruine of all that were accused or suspected, as well for matter of State, as religion. And for the execution of this dessein, the forces of the realme diuided into foure, marched already into diuers Prouinces, vnder the command of the Duke of Angoulême, and the Marshalls of S. André, of Brissac and of Termes. And with the same furie the King of Nauarre should bee confined into the Castle of Loches: the Constable and his children to the great Tower at Bourges, the Admirall and some principalls, into one at Orleans, the which was afterwards called D the Admirale, neere to that of S. Aignan.

But behold, there are two more violent and more brutish counsellors, Brissac and S. André, they hold opinion, that to auoide trouble, in giuing the King of Nauarre any gardes, they should put him to death: they imploy both poison and sword, but neither succeeds. God had otherwise decreed, reseruing these princes for a more honourable death. But howsoeuer, let vs confesse, that the Lord hath strange meanes to punish the ambition of great men: we shall scarce see any one of those which are these furious parts vpon the theator of this Historie, end his dayes by an ordinarie and naturall death. The x. day of December approached, and the Deputies for the Estates anue by degrees. They presently forbid them in the Kings name, vpon paine of death, not to moue anything concerning religion, his Maestie hauing referred this controuersie to the Councill: which the Pope (being then Pius the 4. successor to Theatin lately deceased,) appointed to begin at Trent, at Easter following. Those of Languedoc amongst the rest, came furnished with ample instructions, both for the State and religion: but they found meanes to stop their mouthes, seizing both on their persons and instructions.

A miraculous deliuerie.

The ix. day of the moneth, they giue commandement to the King of Nauarre, to be ready to go to horse-back. their meaning was to carry him to Loches, whilst they should present the prince his Brother vpon a mournfull Scaffold, to the people of Orleans. But O God, we haue heard with our eares, and our Fathers haue declared, the worke which thou hast done in their time, and in the old time before them. Behold the King is taken during Euen-song with a great fainting, continued with a paine in his head, at the left eare, accompanied with a Feuer. The *Guise*s notwithstanding, send forth many

Commis-

A Commissioners to leuie men, and command the Marshall of Termes to ioyne with the Spaniard, who tooke the way of Bayonne to spoile the Countie of Berne, and then to assault all those whome he should finde to haue fauored the King of Nauarre, and the enterprise of Amboise.

It may be they would haue sold their liues deerely. Seauen or eight hundred gentlemen go speedily to horse, followed with five or six thousand foote, resolute, when the Marshall should passe Limoges, to hemme him in betwixt two riuers. He hath some intelligence thereof, and retires to Poitiers. This dessein being made frustrate, the Kings sicknesse encreasing, those of Guise meane to proceed with violence, and to murder the King of Nauarre. God rayfed vp the Cardinall of Tournon (who thinking to do a greater act) preuenteth it. Hee aduiseeth to attend the Constables coming, with his Children and Nephewes, to the end (sayd he) that killing one, we saue not the rest, who afterwards may do more harme then the Princes. The dispaire of the Kings helth, made them of Guise to set a good countenance on a bad cause. And the Queen mother seeking to hold her authority by supporting them of Guise, calles the King of Nauarre into her closet: As he was entering, a Ladie of the Court sayd to him in his eare: My Lord, denie the Queene Mother nothing that she shall demand, else you are dead. So he signed what shee desired: A grant of the right which hee might pretend to the gouernment of the King and Regencie of the Realme, and his reconciliation with them of Guise. Vpon this graunt, the promisseth to make him the Kings Lieutenant in France, both for peace and warre, and nothing should passe but by his aduice, and of the other Princes, who should bee respected according to the degree they held in France.

In the meane time death presseth the King: and those of the house of Guise shut vp in their lodging, and seized vpon three or foure scoore thousand franks which remained yet of the treasor, came not forth in two dayes, vntill they were assured of the King of Nauarre, who hauing imbraced one another, all quarrells seemed to be layd vnder foote. In the end this Catarre with a feuer brought the King to his graue, the fourteenth of December, hauing giuen no time, by reason of his yong age and the shortnesse of his raigne, to discouer any thing in him, but onely some shewes of courtesie, D continency and modestie: vertues which his Vncles had easily corrupted by the tast of crueltie which they began to make an impression of in his soule, as they did in his successors: little lamented for his person, but of such as possessing him in his nonage, grounded the greatnesse of their vsurped estates vpon his life, to ouerthrowe the fundamentall Lawes of the Realme. whatsoeuer some wretched writers do babble, whose soules haue beene as vendible, as the *Guise*s armes were then new in our France. This death gaue life to the Prince of Condé, opened the prisons for such as had beene committed for his cause, reuiued an infinit number, whome the Princes condemnation had drawne into danger, countermanded the troupes of Spaine, which aduanced towards Bearn, disapointed Montluc of the Earldome of Armagnac:

E the which he had deuoured in hope, by the promises of the house of Guise, and brought many of their most secret seruants to the King of Nauarres deuotion.

The death of Francis the 2.

CHARLES

CHARLES the 9. the 61. King of France.

1560.

NOW we fall from a feuer into a fienfie. Wee shall fee vnder another pupill King, of eleuen yeares of age, reigning in the name of God, the heavens to powre vpon this Realme, all the curses damned promised against a nation, whose iniquities hee will punish in his pleasure. A raigne cursed in the Cittie, and cursed in the field, cursed in the beginning and cursed in the ending. Mortalitye and famine haue followed it euen vnto the end. The heavens aboue are of braffe, and the earth vnder it of iron: the carcafes are a prey to the birds of the aire & to the beasts of the field, and no man trouble them. They suffer no thing but wrongs and rebbenies, and no man releues them. Men marry wiues but others sleepe with them. They fornicate, and plant, but the nations whom they haue not knowne, deuoure the fruit. To conclude, there is nothing but cursing, terror, and dissipation.

A Parliament
held at Orleans.

The 23. of December the Parliament began, and that which the Queene mother most desired, the confirmation of her Regencie, allowed by the Chancellor, and afterwards by those that were the speakers. John Quintin of Autun a doctor of the Canon Lawe at Paris, for the Clergie: the Lord of Rochefort Damoisel of Commercey, for the Nobility. Angelo then Aduocate of the Parliament at Bourdeaux, and afterwards Counsellor there, for the people. The Chancellor propounded manie articles touching the meanes to pacifie the troubles, and the remedies for that which concerned the estate and religion, & to discharge the Kings debts. Quintin, would haue the ministers of the Church enforced to discharge their duties, not altering any thing in the reformation thereof, the which cannot erre: not to suffer any other then the Catholicke

Apostolicke

A Apostolicke and Romish religion. Against such as demanded Temples, and against the deliverer of their petition (meaning the Admirall) against whom (said he) they should proceed according to the Canon and Ciuill constitutions, for the prohibiting of such bookes as were not allowed by the Doctors of the Sorbonné; and for the rooting out of Lutherans and Calvinists. Rochfort did speake against the iniudgments vsurped by the Clergie, against the disorders growne among the Nobles, against the wrong done to the true Nobilitie, against the confusions growne by confiscations, for matter of religion, against seditions, of the meanes to order the Clergie, & to containe them in their vocation: for the releefe of the people, especially in matters of Iustice, the which should be reduced to a certaine number of Officers. Ange insisted much vpon the ignorance, couetousnesse, and dissolution of the Clergie, whence proceeded the greatest part of these present scandales.

The next day, vpon the Admirals complaint to the Queene Mother, Quintin excused himselfe vpon the instructions which were given him in writing, and in his second speech hee did moderate his plea to the Admirals content. The Estates continued their conferences, and made the beginning of this yeare famous, by some prouision for matters of religion, where by it was forbidden vpon paine of death, not to reproach religion one to another, and commandement giuen to all Iudges and officers, to set at libertie all such as had beene imprisoned for the said religion. Many other good & necessary lawes were published, but with more confusion then profit. And in truth a number of lawes ill obserued, peruert Iustice, and giues the people occasion not to regard them. But when they come seriously to handle the discharge of the Kings debts, and that the Nauarrois submits himselfe to restitution. If it be found that he hath receiued any extraordinary gifts, those of Guise and others, which could not make the like offer, found meanes to frustrate this proposition, by the referring of the Estates to Pontaise, hoping hereafter to find some deuise to preuent their yielding vp of any accompt. And in truth all these assemblies vanished away like smoake, without any other resolution, then to lay the paiement of the Kings debts vpon the Clergie.

Put off to Pontaise.

The King of Nauarre, the other Princes of the bloud, & the Constable, seeing themselves held to no end in Court, and that for matters of State, they had but the leauings of them of Guise, it made them trusse vp their baggage to retire, with an intent to crosse the regencie of the Queene Mother, and the Guisians authoritie. To frustrate this defense, she makes a new accord with the Nauarrois, doth associate him in the gouernment of the realme, and concludes with him, that leauing the title of Regent, he should be called Lieutenant generall to his Maiestie, in all his countries and territories. But this was but a gouernment in paper: these strong partialities of two parties, shall briefly one assaile another, making great wounds within this realme, from whence wee haue seene the blood runne euen to these latter dayes.

This treatie did preiudice them of Guise, and in the end, peace must needs send them from Court, to liue at home like priuate men. They had in their conceits, the argument of a new Tragedie, the which we shall shortly see plaied vpon this Theater. The Protestants multiplied, and the King of Nauarre supported them openly. The Prince of Condé (who pursued the sentence of his iustification in the Parliament) and the Admirall, had preaching in their chambers. This string is strained too high. They publish generally, that these preachings will be the ouerthrow of the ancient religion within this realme: and particularly among the Duke of Guises partisans. That vnder colour of rendering accounts, and of extraordinary gifts, they would displace them, hauing managed the most important affaires of the realme, for the space of fortie yeares.

The Constable holding for a maxime, That the change of religion brings an alteration in the state, begins to applaude them: the Duke of Montpensier, and the Prince of Roche-sur-yon, Princes of the bloud of Bourbon; vpon this nice point of new religion, toynewillingly with them. The people conforme them selues commonly after the patteme of great men. Great personages looke awrye one on another, so do the people: one beares the name of Huguenot impatiently: an other cannot indure that of papist:

The Kings
coronation.

Edicts of July.

Theſe new broyles cauſed an Ediſt to be made at Fontainebleau (where the Court remayned, attending the renewing of the eſtates intermitted) prohibiting theſe mutual reproches of Papiſt and Huguenot: to ſerch no man in his houſe, nor to retaine any one in priſon for his religion. From thence the King made his voiage to Reims, and was ſolemnly crowned by the Cardinall of Lorraine. The Parliament at Paris (not able to digeſt this laſt Ediſt.) ſhewes vnto the King, That diuerſitie of religion was incompatible in an eſtate: reiects this pretended libertie of conſcience, and beſeeched his Maieſtie to force his ſubiects to make open profeſſion of the Catholike, Apoſtolike and Romiſh religion, vpon ſuch paines as ſhould bee aduiſed on in Councell. Now blowes a contrarie wind, the which aſſembles (in the Parliament at Paris) all the Princes, Noblemen, and others of the priuie Councell, with all the Chambers, to the end they might freely, and wichall puritie of conſcience deliberate, aduiſe and conclude vpon a matter ſo much importing the good and quiet of the Realme. This aſſembly brought forth the Ediſt, which they called of July, an ediſt confirming the decrees of former Kings, commanding his ſubiects vpon paine of death, to liue hereafter in peace, without iniuries, without reproches for any reſpect of religion, need beleeſe. But ſee the firebrand of ciuill warres, which now we handle. All religion, faith, or doctrine, other then that of the Church of Rome, was baniſhed the realme: all embelies of Proteſtants forbidden, and they condemned to ſeek their abode elſewhere.

Somewhat to temper this bitterneſſe, they lymit their exile, by the determination of a generall Councell, or next aſſembly of the Prelats of the Realme, at Poyſſy. And at the ſame inſtant the ſentence of the Prince of Condé innocencie was pronounced in Parliament, by the Preſident Baillet, in their ſcarlet gownes, the doores open, and all the chambers aſſembled, the King of Nauarre being preſent, with the Duke of Montpenſer, the Prince of Roche-sur-yon: the Dukes of Guiſe, Neuers and Montmorency, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, Guiſe, Chañillon, and other noblemen: his remedie reſerued againſt whome it ſhould appertaine, as the reputation and qualitie of his perſon and dignitie ſhould require. The King calling the Princes and Noblemen to S. D. Germain in Laye, hee cauſed the Prince of Condé, and the Duke of Guiſe to embrace each other, promiſing to continue good friends.

The Parliament remitted to Pontoise, hauing produced no other effect but a new approbation of the Regencie for the Queene mother (in whoſe fauour the Admirall laboured to the Eſtates, relying vpon the great aſſurances ſhe had giuen him, to procure much good for them of his partie. And the King of Nauarre, by reaſon of the refusals which the Deputies made to paſſe this article, declared vnto them by mouth, that he had renounced his right, and ſome meanes to open the cofers of the Clergie, for the payment of the Kings debts: they began to proceed to the conference of Poyſſy. For the Catholiks came, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, Armagnac, Guiſe, Chañillon and Tournon, aſſiſted by a great number of Prelats and Doctours of Diuinitie, and Canon Law. The Pope doubting leaſt they ſhould make ſome concluſions preiudiciall to his authoritie, ſent the Cardinall of Ferrara his Legat into France, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt any alteration in religion, and to haue the cauſe referred to the Councell of Trente, the which he had publiſhed.

Conference of Poyſſy.

A Petitiõ
preſented by the Proteſtants.

Theodore Beze, Peter Martir a Florentin, Auguſtin, Maylorat, Francis of Saint Paul, Raimond, Iohn Frel, and other to the number of twelue miniſters, and two and twenty Deputies of the Proteſtant Churches, offer a petition vnto the King, at his firſt entrie, beſeeching him, that the Prelats might examine the confeſſion of their faith, whereof they had had conference, ſince the moneth of Iune, to impugne it if they thought good. For their firſt aſſembly, and vpon their obiections, to heare the defences of the ſaid Churches, by the mouthes of their Deputies. That the King ſhould be preſident in this conference, with his Councell, and that the Clergie, (for that they are parties) ſhould not not take vpon them, the authoritie of Iudges. That all controuerſies, might be determined by the word of God. That two Secretaries choſen on either ſide, might examine the diſputations that were daylie written, and that they ſhould not bee receiued but ſigned by either partie.

Before they entred into open conference, the Cardinall of Lorraine would treat priuately with Beza before the Queene Mother: and hauing heard him eſpecially vpon the Lords ſupper. I am greatly contented (ſayd he) with that I vnderſtand and hope aſſurely that the ſiſue of this Conference will bee happy, proceeding with mildneſſe and reaſon. It began the 9. of September. The King did breiefely touch the cauſes of this aſſembly, cauſing his Chanceller to deliuer them more at large. The Cardinall of Lorraine, in the behalfe of the Prelats, demands the Chancellors propoſition in writing, and leuſed to conſider thereof: the which is reſuſed. Theodore with his companions brought in by the Duke of Guiſe, appointed to that charge with the Lord of la Ferté, viſſeau Captaine of the gard, makes an ample collectiõ of all the articles of the Chriſtian Doctrine, expounds thoſe which are in controuerſie, toucheth by the way the diſcipline of the Church, proteſts, that both he, his Companions and all thoſe that aduoe them, deſire nothing but the reformation of the Church. that they will liue and die in the Kings proteccion, deſt thoſe that ſeek to ſequeſter themſelues, and pray to God for the proſperity of his Maieſty, of his mother, his Councell and his Eſtate: then hee preſents vnto the King, the Confeſſion of the Proteſtant Churches, & deſires the conference may be made concerning it. The King hauing receiued it by the ſayd Captaine of his gard, deliuered it vnto the Prelats. The point vpon the reall preſence in the Sacrament had troubled them. They conclude, that the Cardinall of Lorraine aſſiſted by Claude Deſpenſe and ſome other Doctours, not by way of diſputation, but not to faile of a replie, ſhould anſwer to two points only, of the Church, and the Lords ſupper. And the 16. of the ſayd moneth he makes his oratiõ, & diſcourſeth at large of theſe two points, & then he intreats the king to continue conſtant in the religion of his Predeceſſors, & to ſummon the miniſters to ſubſcribe to that which he had deliuered, before they paſſed to the other articles: otherwiſe to deny them audience, and to ſend them out of the realme, which could alow but of one faith, one law and one King.

The ſoure and twentieth day Theodore made anſwer to the Cardinall, diſputed with the Doctours Deſpenſe & Saintes, and the 26. day, he treated with him againe touching the Lords ſupper: the other miniſters replied likewise to ſome obiections of other doctours of the Sorbonne, & finally al was conuerted into priuate cõferẽces, without any reſoluõ or cõcluſion that might end theſe troubles. The Prelats ſent backe their doctours in Octob. & referal reformation to the Coucel at Trent, whether the Cardinall of Lorraine & the doctour of Saintes went: of whoſe wee will ſpeake a word by the way, ſeeing it ſits with the matter. We find by a fragment originall, drawne out of the writings of a Chanoine of Reims, and publiſhed in the year 1598. by the means of Perrequin Maſtor of Langres: That the Kings Ambaſſadors at the Councell of Trente were amongeſt other inſtructions, ſigned Charles, Katherine, Alexander, which was Henry the 3. Anthony, and vnderneath it, Charles of Bourbon, Francis of Lorraine, Montmorency, M. Hoſpital, S. André & Francis of Montmorency, charged to demand, To haue the ceremonies corrected & al other things wherby the people might be abuſed, vnder a ſure piety. That the Cup might be reſtored in all comonions, within his realme & all his dominions. That al adminiſtrations of Sacraments to the Laitye, might be done in the French tongue. That in the pariſh Churches, & not collegial, Cathedral or monacal, the uſe of the proſne ſhould be inſtituted according to the firſt & moſt holy inſtitutiõ: that during the high Maſſe in the pariſh Churches, the word of God ſhould be red and interpreted at the houre accuſtomed, with then exhorting of youth, to the end that every one might be inſtructed, & capable of that which he ſhould beſeue, & how he ſhould liue according vnto God, and that in ſteed of the Proſne. publike prayer ſhould be made in the French tongue. That without changing of any thing of the accuſtomed ſervice of the Church in the latin tongue ſome houre ſhould be appointed, as wel at Maſſe, as at Euerſong, wherein it might be lawfull to ſing psalmes in the open Church, perſued firſt & corrected by the Biſhops & ordinary ſuperiours, & approved by famous vniuerſities or prouincial Councells.

1562. Councells. And also to complaine of the vnwhysse life of Clergy men, which breed so many disorders and corruptions among the people. These articles concluded, had without doubt made the way to reduce many realmes and Prouinces to the Union of the Church, appeased the troubles of this realme, satisfied many troubled consciences, and prevented a greater schisme. But hatred and humane passions makes vs yet to attend a stroke from heaven to draw vs ioynly into the fold of one vniuersal Bishop. Thus the conference at Poissy having not yeilded that remedie, which was expected, for the common enrichment, now diuers factions grow in France. The Protestants, which before had by many petitions required Temples for the exercise of their religion, they now established by force in many places, and without further attending the approbation of the demands, they assemble at diuers times. The Catholikes mutine, especially at Paris, and pursue them with sfoanes, swords, staves & fire in their returne from Cerys (a garden without the Temple gate) and in the suburbs of S. Marceau: they ring the alarm bell at S. Medard, they wound, kill, take and hang many. Gabaston amongst others, Knight of the watch, to appeale the people, lost his head. To make some Edict for the ordering of these broyles, the Q. Mother assembles the chiefe of the Parliamēt, with the Princes of the bloud, Noblemen, Councillors of the priuy Councell, Masters of request, & other men of authority, and to giue some contentment to those that vehemently required places and Temples for their assemblies with liberty. The chiefe Catholikes, especially those of Guise, disallow of this courte. they accule the Que. facility, & nurture openly against the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Condé, the Admiral & his brethren. These crosse the with an enterprise, made to carry the Duke of Orleans, the Kings younger brother into Lorraine so as they retire from Court: the Duke of Nemours, who had played the principall part in this tragedie, saues him selfe, & returnes not before the Civil wars haue fied all France. This newe change, seemes to draw the Regent to the Protestants party: she desires to know their forces, and their means. They giue her a list of two thousand a hundred and fifty protestant churches, the deputies whereof offered their goods & persons to the K. to withstand the forces of them of Guise, who called the Spaniard into France. The Cusians abience made easie the grant of that famous Edict, which beares vnto this day the name of January: the which disannulling that of July, gaue liberty to the protestants the 17. of the sayd moneth, to assemble without the Townes, and provided that all men might liue in peace one with another. But alas, in stead of peace it shall breed horrible confusions. The difficultie was in the execution. The Parliaments publish it as slowly as may be, & that of Dijon neuer. Those of Guise & the constable ioyned with them, diuerted the by their authority. But they had an other string to their bow, which preuailed according to their desires. They imploy the Ambassador of Spain, the Cardinal of Tournon, Escars, & some other house-hold flatterers to the K. of Nauarre, to persuade him, that carrying himselfe a Neuter, & cautiſing the Prince his son to go once to the Masse, the K. of Spain would giue him the realme of Sardaigne, in recompence of that of Nauarre. The Pope likewise confirms him in this hope. This was properly to conceine a mountaine & to bring forth a moule, & to take fro him all means to recover his realme of Nauarre, when he should attempt it. So as being drawne by those Spanish and Lorraine practises, he estrangeth him selfe by little and little from the protestants, solicits the Q. his wife to returne into the bosome of the Romish Church, and so to instruct her children. Vpon her refusal, there growes a breach betwixt the, and he falls in loue with one of the Queene Mothers maids. In the meane time, she entertained the Prince of Condé & the Admiral, who she knew to be yet strong within the realme, maintayned the protestants in their peaceable exercise. For that end commanded euery gouernor to retire to his gouernment. She would haue sent the Prince of Condé into Guienne (whose presence without doubt had stayed that horrible and euell shedding of bloud) whereby Montuc vpon his refusal opened the veins of a body wonderfully afflicted. But so passeth the world, euery one would gouerne the King in his turne, and the Regent by little and little did vndermine the foundation of the Edict, to ouerthrowe the whole body.

Moreover those of Guise were desirous to returne to their places, neyther had they retired

A retired but to get better footing. They are now strong enough, having drawn the King of Nauarre from the Protestant parte. They march towards Paris, and passing from Jainville to Vassy, they dispersed about twelue hundred persons, which were assembled for their exercise: murther two and fortie, wound many to the death, leade away prisoners, and sacke the Towne: this was the first firebrand of the ciuill warres, which were now a breeding. This act puts the Protestants in alarm, and makes them release the trowell and the hammer, which they imployed in many places, to build their Temples, euery one skowes his harness, euery one prouides him armes & hories. Their Churches and Nobilitie complaine, and demand iustice of the King. The Regent giues them good words: and the King of Nauarre rebuks them, & chargeth them to be the first motives of this trouble. They haue (saith he) cast stones against my brother the Duke of Guise. he could not retaine the furie of his followers. And whosoever shall touch the end of my brothers finger, shall touch my whole bodie. The arriual of the Duke of Guise, the Constable, the Marshall of Brissac, Montmorency, Termes, and afterwards of the King of Nauarre to Paris, draws the Prince of Condé and the three brethren of Coligni likewise thither. But the stronger carries it. They were too weake to encounter the Councels which were held daily, at the Constables house. To vnderstand what forces the Prince had within the Cittie, they make a proclamation: That all men, of what qualitie soeuer, should come and shew vnder what Captaines they were enrolled. vpon refusal, they should depart within 24. houres. So the Prince retires to Meaux, and calls together such as might by their armes force his enemies to some agreement. The Queene mother (seeing the Guisens fortified within Paris, and seized vpon the Kings person, whom they caused to come from Fontainebleau to Paris) writes vnto the Prince, and recommends vnto him, both the mother, and the children.

The Princes intention was to come to Court, when as newes is brought him, that they possesse the King, and bring him to Paris. He therefore leaues Meaux to go and seize vpon Orleans, and at the same instant either faction assures himselfe by diuerse surprises of places, exposed to their pleasure. The Constable causeth the houses of Jerusalem vpon S. James his ditch, and of Pepincourt without S. Antonies gate, to be beaten downe, where the Protestants did assemble for their exercise, & in all other places, the people transported with the like humour, vse extreame violence. The Protestants grow egar, & in all places wherethey had might, reuenge themselves on the Churches, images, priests, and religious houses. To conclude euery Towne thus diuided, prepares a wretched Theatre, to act a mourneful and bloudie Tragedie. Yet euery one iustifies his cause. Without the realme the Prince produceth the Regents letters in open Parliamēt of the Princes of Germanie. Within the realme, he exhorts the of his party to prouid men & money, & by an association made with the Noblemen, & gentlemen of his partie, he promisseth to imploy himselfe for the deliery of the King, and Queene, and for the maintenance of the Edicts, and the Estate of the realme. On the other side, the King declares by his letters pattents: that both hee, his mother, and his brethren, are at libertie, forbids all his subiects to arme vnder that pretext: commands them that are armed to surcease, and to retire home to their houses: and by an other Edict he commands the execution of the Edict of January, but within the Citie of Paris and suburbs thereof. But to quite abolish it, he calls the Nobilitie the 28. of Aprill, and declares by proclamation, the Prince and his adherents to be seditious and bad Christians, and that the Prince made prouision of forren forces to disturbe the quiet of France. It is an example of dangerous consequence, when a people armes vnder colour to set their Prince at libertie, for often times in stead of liberty, they make him captiue. The Queene mother did easily arme that partie which she ment to imploy: but great men, who most commonly maintaine their authoritie by armes, do more willingly take them, then lay them downe. She cannot now cause them to surcease, whom she had armed for this deliuerance: the confusion is too great, their courages are too much incensed, and their harts pult vp with many hopes: they must come to blowes, their fingers are hecd on either side. In the meane time the heads beeing gone, and persuaded to preferre the publike before all private respects, they offer in shew, to lay

1562. downe their armes, and to retire home to their houses, so as their aduersaries will submit themselves to the like. But to conclude, the companies of men at armes being for the most part arrived at Paris, with part of the old bands, the King of Nauarre, the Duke of Guise, the Constable, and the Marshall of Saint André (the Protestants called the three last Triumvirs, and in truth they were but three heads in one hood) hauing by an Edict banished the Caluinists out of Paris, take the way of Chasteaudun with twelve thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The Prince was as strong, and euen then would haue ioyned with them: d'Andelot and Boucart about all others vrged it. but the Regent abused them with frivolous hopes of an accord, while the Kings armie grew stronger, both with French and forren forces. Hauing thus lost the oportunitie of a battaile, the Prince maintaines his armie about two monethes, with a commendable discipline, without blaspheming, whoring, robbing, or theft. In the end they loose all patience. Baugency taken by assault, opens the dores to disorders: for this first heate soone past with the French growes cold, money for their pay growes short, & the nobility could not frame themselves to this strict discipline of war, which the Admiral did practise, being a great enemy to robbings. In many Prouinces, matters were indifferently betwixt the Catholikes, and the Protestants: and to giue two strokes with one stone, to stay the disputation of this armie, and to releue them that might in the end fall, the Prince sent the Earle of Rocheboucault, with some troupes into Poitou, Kaintonge, and Angoumois: Soubize to Lions: Yuo brother to Genlis, to Bourges: Montgomery into Normandy: d'Andelot, to hasten the succours of Germany, and Briquemaunt into England. These troupes from the moneth of Aprill, vntill the midst of August, did possesse Orleans, Baugency, Yendosme, Blois, Tours, Poitiers, Mans, Angers, Bourges, Angoulême, Rouan, Chalon vpon Soan, Maçon, Lion, & the most part of Dauphiné with many others, not without effusion of blood, spoyleing of Churches, and such inolenities, as the warre doth cause in a Countrie of Conquest.

Orleans and Bourges held by the Prince, did much helpe their affaires, but Bourges might be easily surprised before it were fortified. The King then (whom the commanders had drawne into the armie) marcheth thither, and the composition which They made with his Maiestie, put him for a time in disgrace with the Prince. This arme cut off (as the *Guise*ns said) from the Huguenots, inuited the Kings armie to the siege of Orleans, where the Prince and the Admiral were. But the resolution of these two Commanders, and the feare to receiue shame & losse, made them passe on to Rouen, where Montgomery commanded with seuen or eight hundred souldiars of the old bands, and two companies of English. The end of September, was the beginning of this siege: famous for the hurting of the King of Nauarre in the shoulder, as hee surmoued the weakest part of the Cittie: whereof he died the 17. of Nouember, three weeks after it was taken by assault, and spoyled. Montgomery saued himselfe in a gallie, but many of the chief passed through the executioners hands. On the other side, Lewis of Bourbon, Duke of Montpensier, reduced to the Kings obedience, the Townes of Angers, Mans, & Tours, the Marshal S. André tooke Poitiers from the Lord of S. Gemme, and Henry of Montmorency, Lord of Damville, incountred the Protestants forces in Languedoc, where the Earles of Tende and Suze, by the defeat of Montbrun, tooke Cisteron for the King, & Montluc with Burie gouernours of Guienne, put to rout the troupes of Gascōis which Duras led to the Earle of Rocheboucault, beseeing S. Jean d'Angeli. The ouerthrow of Duras brought the Earle with 300. gentlemen, & the remainder of the defeated armie, on this side Lore, to ioine the Prince with the Reistres whom d'Andelot brought. This supple made the Prince resolute to go to Paris, & by annoying it, to encrease the feare where in they were possessed. He marcheth, forceth Pluviers, takes Elampes, & beseegeth Corbeil; but finding it better furnished with men then he expected, he approacheth to Paris, makes a great skirmish, & beates backe the troupes that were come out off their trenches. So hee camped at Gentilly, Arceuil, Mont-rouge, and other neighbour villages; The Queene mother busies him seuen or eight dayes with diuers parles, during the which foure and twentie ensignes of Gascōis, and Spaniards arriuing, were lodged within the suburbs of Saint James. The Prince then seeing his enemies forces

A forces to encrease, resolues to fight with them, before they were fully assembled, so as all hope of peace conuerted into smoke. hee riseth the tenth of December, takes the way to Chartres, and resolues to goe into Normandie, to receiue the men and money which came out of England, and by that meanes to diuert the siege of Orleans. The Constable and Duke of Guise march after him.

Dreams are lies, as we comonly say: yet haue we often tried those which present themselves in the morning, (the spirit hauing taken sufficient rest,) to bring certaine aduertisements of that which is to come. The night before the eue of the battaile, the Prince dreames that he had giuen three battailes one after another, obteyned the victorie, ouerthrowne his three principall enemies, and finally himselfe wounded to the death, hauing layed one vpon another, and he about them all, yeelding in that sort, his soule to God. And to say the trueth, haue wee not seene this vision verified by the death of the Marshall of Saint André, which is at hand: by that of the Duke of Guise before Orleans the yeare following: and by that of the Constable at the battaile of S. Denis, and of the Prince himselfe in that of Bassec.

In the Kings armie, they numbred two thousand horse, and nineteene thousand foot. In that of the Prince, foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foot. They ioine the nineteenth of December, and without any skirmishes, charge with all their forces. The Princes Suisses loose seuentene Captaines, with three parts of their troopes, which were about three thousand, and endure three charges before they could bee broken. On the other side, the taking of the Constable, the death of the Marshall Saint André, the defeat of their troupes, caused a generall confusion in the Kings armie, if the Duke of Guise charging the white cassaks, & the Reistres with furie (whose pistols had made a great slaughter of his men) had not forced through the Princes horse, who straying too much from the battaile, fel prisoner into the hands of the Lord of Damville, the which made the victorie doubtful, seeming before to incline to his side. The conflict continued from tenne of the clocke in the morning, vntill night, with many charges: there were seuen thousand men slaine vpon the place, on both sides, many hurt, and in a manner, all died, and a great number of prisoners. The King lost (besides his Suisses) the most part of his horse, and a great number of foot. There were slaine of men of marke, the Duke of Neuers, killed by one of his household seruants, either by hazard, or of purpose, the Lords of Montbrun (the Constables son,) d'Annebault, Guiry, la Brosse and his sonne: there were hurt, the Duke of Annale, brother to the Duke of Guise, Rocheport and Beauuais. Aussun a Nobleman of Gascōie, (whome feare made flie to Paris) and there hee died of greefe. The Prince lost about two thousand two hundred foote, and a hundred and fiftie horse, French and Reistres.

This battaile is famous, by the taking of two Generals, the one in the beginning, the other in the end of the battaile, so as the field was left by both parties: but after the retreat, it was viewed, and taken againe by the Duke of Guise, and the next day, as it were, recovered by the Admirall, who presented himselfe in battaile. So the Prince had the aduantage ouer the dead, & the honour to haue made his retreat with order: but the Duke had the aduantage of the victorie, for that he lodged vpon the place of battaile, spoyled the dead, and wonne the Princes artillerie, who (a strange matter considering their hatred) supped, and lay all night with the Duke of Guise. Doubtles, it was a curtesie in the one, and a resolution in the other.

By the taking of the two Commanders, the Duke of Guise was declared the Kings Lieutenant Generall in the armie, and the Admirall tooke the command for the Protestants. Either had sundrie desseins. The Duke to recouer the places held from the King: the Admirall to preserue Orleans with more facilitie, by the conquest of some places about it: and then to finish his voyage into Normandie, whether the treasor of England called him. So hauing taken Selles in Berry, Saint Aignan, Montrichard, and Sully vpon Loire, he deliuered the gard of Orleans to his brother d'Andelot, with foure-tenne ensignes of French and Languenets, foure of the inhabitants of the Towne, and a 1562. great number of the Nobility vnder the conduct of Duras, Bouchanues, Puss, S. Cre, A & Anaret & other voluntaries: and tooke the way to Normandie, thinking by this meanes

 1563. to diuide the enemies forces, who had Orleans for the cheefe object of their armes.
 The first day of February, he camps before it, and the next day hee wins the Portecrau, with the slaughter of foure hundred good French souldiars, being abandoned by the Lanquenets, who cowardly left the place they had in charge. The 18. of the moneth, hee was readie to giue an assault: and making his reckoning to winne the Towne, he writes to the Queene mother, that within 24. houres he would send her newes of the taking thereof, and would make the day very memorable, sparing neither sexe nor age:
 that after he had shroued there, he would extinguish the remembrance of the Towne.
 But man knoweth not his destinie, nor what shall happen vnto him. The same day as he returned towards night, vpon a little moyle, from the Campe to the Castle of Cor- sey, his ordinary lodging, John Poltray Seigneur of Merey, a gentleman of Angoulmois, mounted vpon a Spanishe horse, by his owne proper and priuate motion, shoots him into the shouldar with a pistoll charged with three bullets, and saues himselfe by flight:
 but hauing wandred all night, he was taken the next day: soone after, hee was pincht with hot irons, and so drawne in peeces with horses at Paris. The Duke of Guise died the 24. of the said moneth, and was interred at Paris, with pompe like vnto a King. Hen- ry his sonne being yong of age, was preferred to the place of great Chamberlaine, and Lord Steward of France.

The siege of Orleans by
the Duke of Guise.

The Duke of Guise slain.

The Admirall in the meane time, runnes ouer Normandie without opposition, and C followed with foure thousand horse, he coopt vp them into their forts, who had had free scoape, since the taking of Rouen. The Marquis of Elbeuf namely, and Renouart a new Knight of the order, molested by the Protestants of Caen, tooke some, and slue others. The money, artillerie, powder, with fine companies of English, and two of French, which he newly received, came very fitly to reduce the Towne, and the strong Castle thereof, to his deuotion, Mony conquered him Honfleur: and the Lord of Calu- biere, Feyeux: and by this prize, he so amazed the garrison of Saint Lo, as they left the place. The Admirall sent Montgomery thither, who was receiued into Auranches without contradiction. Fire being taken by assault, endured the ordinary rigour of the war.

The Earle went on with his forces, euen as the packet of peace arriued, the D which called the Admirall to Orleans. So the 14. of March, he marcheth thitherward:
 the 18. he entrencheth into Berkey by force, and castrich some Priests to be hanged being found in armes, and perswading the people to kill in a public dog-hole. Two daies after the Vicent of Dreux takes Aigle, and putteth the sword that he finds armed. Fi- lisse compounds: Argenton redeemes it selfe for a hundred thousand francks. Montegut a great village in Perche (seduced by some indiscreet priests) makes resistance. They force it, and the most mutinous pay for their follie with the price of their liues. The monks of S. Calais had receiued garrison, and illintended some of the household fer-uants of the Lord of Coignee: but now he takes a sharp reuenge, and Cernoy surpriuing the Castle of Meziere neere vnto Dreux, makes it a desert for ever after vnable to beare armes. So the Admirall re-enters into Orleans the three and twentieth day of March.

At the beginning of the siege of Orleans, the King being then, the priuie Council, and certaine deputies of the Court of Parliament, came to Chartres, to arraigne (said they) the Prince of Condé. The Duke of Guise had by this meanes giuen two strokes with one stone: for the losse of the Prince of Condes head, had stroke of the Constables. But Damville hauing the honour to haue taken the Prince in battaile, had likewise the honour to preserve his life, by the dispersing of this assemblie.
 Now that the Queene mother stands no more in feare of the Duke of Guise authori-tie, shee reuiues the treatie of peace begun before his death. For the effecting whereof shee holds an assemblie in the Isle of Oxen, where the Prince and the Constable assist being prisoners yet. The Constable protests at the beginning, that hee will not suffer any peace made with the conditions of the Edict of January. The

A The Prince craues leaue to confesse with his Councell in Orleans. His Councell giues him to vnderstand, that neither the Queene, nor he, can derogate from the Edict so folemnly made, confirmed, and sworne, at the instance of the Estates, and so notable an assembly of the Parliaments of the realme. 1562 & 1563.

But the Prince was grieved to see himselfe garded by a companie of horse, and three enignes of foote: and many Gentlemen had not of long time seene their families. Moreouer, they gaue the Prince to vnderstand, that the Articles of the Edict of January were not altered, but onely to content the Catholikes: that armes being laide aside, they should by little and little obtaine free libertie. So the articles of peace drawne in forme of an Edict, were concluded the xii. of March, and all confirmed in the Kings Councell at Amboise, the xix. following, verified in Parliament the xxvii. and the same day proclaimed throughout the Towne by the sound of Trumpet. The executions qualified with the name of Iustice, the robberies generall & priuate, massacres, committed in the persons of the Protestants at Paris, Senlis, Amiens, Abbeville, Meaux, Chalons, Troyes, Bar vpon Seine, Epernay, Ceant in Othe, Sens, Auxerre, Nevers, Corbigny, Ambrise, Moulins, Issoudun, Mans, Vendosme, Angers, Crao, Blois, Tours, Bourgneil, & places thereabout, Poitiers, Rouen, Falongnes, Vire, S. Lo, Bourdeaux, Agen, and generally in all parts of the realme, are read at large in the Originals, and would augment this volume beyond the iust proportion. Time and leifure may hereafter giue all this discourse specified more particularly. Let vs onely obserue the most memorable exploits chanced during these first troubles, from the moneth of April, in the yeare 1562. vnto the publication of the peace.

The Protestants of Meaux exceeding the Catholikes in number, had vntill the end of June, continued the exercise of their religion, without any disturbance: then transported with an indiscreet zeale, and ill aduised presumption, grounded vpon their numbers, they siet to the Churches, beat downe images, and make the Priests retire. This insolencie made the Court of Parliament at Paris to censure them, and to abandon them to any that could spoile or kill them without any forme of proceffe. Therevpon Lithoux brother to Montluc, comes to Meaux, and with the consent of the Protestants, restores the exercise of the Catholike religion, and then giues commandement to the D inhabitants, to bring their armes into the Towne house. Some obey: others to the number of foure hundred, march to ioyne with the prince Portian: they charge them, and kill them all but fortie, which recouer Orleans with much adoe, leauing their wiues to the mercie of the stronger, whereof many were forced to go to the Masse with blowes, many marriages solemnized anew, many children (but without order) baptized againe. The 13. of February 1563. some fugitiues tried to recouer the place:
 but this caused a totall ruine of their companions, who remained within the townie, they were massacred, drowned, and hanged, their wiues and children rauished, their goods spoiled, and their houses made inhabitable.

At Chalons des Bordes the Lieutenant to the Duke of Neuers, gouernor of Champagne, E slue many men and women, imprisoned handicrafts men, spoiled their houses, caused marriages to be resolemnized, and children to be rebaptized. Those of Bar vpon Seine became the stronger, but rashly in a place easie to be forced. Some Cannons planted onely against the Castell, scattered all within it like vnto partridges. So the besiegers entring, finding few men to execute their reuenge on, they fall vpon the women, maydens and Children, open some of their stomakes, pull out their hearts, and with a furie (vnworthy doubtlesse of one created after the same image and like-nesse,) teare them with their teeth. Ralet a yong Aduocate, sonne to the Kings Protor, was (a prodigious thing) hanged by his fathers procurement. In the moneth of January following, some fiftie horse of the garrison of Antrain, surprised the townie at the breake of day: and at the first tied this Ralet to the top of his house, then with their pistolls caused him to expiate the death of his sonne. The other murderers were murdered, and their spoile spoiled by other spoilers. So the Lord requires the blood of man by the hand of man himselfe.

A peace concluded at Orleans.

Particulatroubles at Meaux.

At Chalons.

At Bar.

1562. Saint Etienne being returned from Orleans, with two of his bretheren and himself, thers to refresh himselfe, in a house of his neere vnto Reims, was beset, battered with the Cannon, by a troupe of fiftene or sixtene hundred men, who came forth vpon their word to speake with the Duke of Neuers, who (they say) asked for him, was murdered by his owne Cousin germaine the Baron of Cerny, and his bretheren with sixtene others slaine.

At Sens.

A hundred persons of all qualities were miserably slaine at Sens, their bodies naked into Seine, their houses spoiled, and (as if it had beene no sufficient reuenge) their vines were pulled vp. The eleuenth of May 1562. the Catholikes of Neuers and in many gentlemen of the Countie, seized vpon the gates, and three daies after vpon the Protestants. Fayete arriues, ransacks their houses, rebaptizeth the children, expells whome hee pleased, and so laden with bootie, worth fiftie thousand Crownes, he retires to his house in Auxerre. Noisat Marshall of the company of Fayete, intreated them of Corbigny in the like sort. Capitaine Blany surprised the Towne fewe dayes after, and restored the Protestants to the publike exercise of their religion.

At Antrain.

Capitaine Blosse surprising the Towne of Antrain, stayed the Catholikes from committing the like excesse, as they had done at Auxerre. Steuens Blondelet a prest, and another called the Dangerous were hanged and shot. Ifferieux (called in by the Protestants of la Charité to take the charge of the Towne) was seised vpon by Cheuenon, Achon, and other troupes, and finally being besieged by Fayete hee yeelded vp the Towne vpon an honest composition for his partie. This was the x. of June, but the Grand Prior entring, he pulled the Capitulation (being signed) out of Ifferieux hand, and afterwards la Fayete abandons these poore protestants, to spoile and ransome, like to them of Neuers. The 3. of March following, the Captains du Bois, Bloisset and Blany, reenter by Scaladee. Leauing it afterwards in gard to du Boisse, who defended it with threescore and seauen soldiars, and some Inhabitants, against an armie of foure thousand foote and horse, slue aboue foure score of them, and forced them to raise the seige.

Chastillon vpon Loue.

Those of Chastillon vpon Loire, standing amidst many difficulties, and in the ende spoiled of all their commodities, fortified their little Towne, and the 5. of January endured an assault against the Lord of Prie, kill seauen or eight of his men, and hurt many others, the men defending themselves with stonnes, and the women powring boyling water vpon the assaillants. In the end, Monterud gouernour of Berry beleeged it, battered it, and tooke it by force, killed men and women, young and olde, spoiled the Towne, euen to the hingells of doores, glasse and barres of windowes.

At Gyen.

Gyen maintaynes it selfe long, the Protestants were the stronger, but the insolencie of Captaines and soldiars, whome the Prince of Condé lent thether from Orleans to refresh themselves one after another, forced manie of the Inhabitants to retire to Orleans. So the Towne remayning at the deuotion of the kings army, who camped before it, it was subiect to the violence of the stronger, where the Italians among other insolencies cut a yong childe being aliue into two peeces, and with a horrible turme catch his liuer.

At Montargis.

Montargis was the Sanctuary of many Protestant families, vnder the countenance of Renée of France daughter to King Leuis the xix. and Duchesse dowager of Ferrara. The Duke of Guise sonne in lawe sends Malicorne thether with foure companies of men at armes, but the prey hee sought was safe within the Castle. This time fell vpon an olde man met by chance, who was slaine and cast into the river. Malicorne threatens the Duchesse to bring the Cannon to force her to yeeld the Castle and the Protestants that were in it. But the generous resolution of this Duchesse, and the death of the Duke of Guise, stayed the execution of his threats.

At Aurillac.

Bresons, according to the Commission he had from the Duke of Guise to seise vpon the forts of high Auvergne, enters into Aurillac, murders eight men, spoiles the Towne & that of Argentat, with some Castels, rauisheth wiues & maydens, making his accoustroote out all the Protestants in the Countie, if the Ed. & of pacification had not forced him

A to surcease. Montare comes to Moulins with like Commission: expelled out of the Towne whom he doubted, then giuing a libertie to his troupes, spoiled the houses and farmes thereabouts: he caused six men to be hanged, and five others to be drowned, returning from Orleans with three marchants of Dauphiné, and suffred the hangman to execute those without any forme of proecesse, whom the multitude deliuered vnto him to be put to death. Thirteene yong men of Issoudun were beaten downe in the water the 8. of May at S. Lysaine, a village two leagues from the Towne, and the 9. of July following, Sarraz seized vpon Issoudun, armed the Catholike Inhabitants, drew male-factors out of prison, and filled it with Protestants, who for the most part died, being smothered vnder the ruines of a Tower of sixteene that escaped, ten saved themselves at Bourges. Vntill the Edict of peace, he spoiled both the towne and Countie, ransoming some, deliuering others to the hangman, which had not means to redeme themselves: he rauished wiues & mayds: and to conclude, exposed these poore creatures to all the insolencies of soldiars. The 3. of Aprill. 1562. those of Mans became masters of the towne: But violence neuer continued long; and soldiars led by a Commander of small credit and little authority, did neuer see their armes prosper.

These men are no soner armed, but they imploy themselves to the beating downe of images, laking of Churches: and from the towne they run to the villages nere. The commons assemble, kill such as they meete, and rescue the bootie. In the end an apple of discord diuides them of the Towne & the Castle: the insolencies of the Captaines and soldiars amaze the Protestants: the Duke of Montpensier prepares to assaile them, & of three Captaines which command within the Towne, two haue intelligence with him. This being discovered, the towne being also ill furnished, La Mothe Tibergeau draws forth tumultuously eight hundred men carrying armes, leading them through many difficulties into Alanson, who then tooke sundrie parties: some not practised in armes remained there: others put themselves into the troupes of the Comte Montgomerie, others of the Duke of Bouillon, and the other two Captaines submitted to those to whom they had giuen their words. Thus the Catholikes haue their turne, they were driuen out of the towne, and now they reenter, and full of spleene they spoile the protestants houses, both within the towne and abroad, eight leagues compasse: & without respect of kindred, kill, spoile, and ransome men, women, and children. Some women of state, some simple people, seruants & chambermaides: some retired to their farmes, or to their friends in the country, remaine at the deuotion of five hundred Harguebushers, leuiued for the gard of the towne and country thereabouts, who forbore no kind of reuenge & rigour. The prisons are filled, they forbid by any means to sollicite for the: the accused are not admitted to except against any witnesse, and for the last act of this Tragedie, aboue two hundred persons of all qualities & sexes, purge by their mournful deatches the insolencies of these first furies. The absent were executed in picture, their goods confiscate that were dead carrying armes: their children degraded from all offices, and declared incapable to succeed. In villages nere & farther of, aboue six score persons yeelded their throats to the reuenging swords of them, whome the change of armes had now giuen the aduantage. One Capitaine Champagne, to glut the pikerils in a poole, which he had, doth gorge them with aboue fiftie persons: Bois-lardin his Lieutenant fills two trenches nere vnto his house, with fiftie or threescore carcases. La Ferté, Bernard, Sablé, Maine, Loire Castle, Memers, Belesme, and Martigue, had the fields there about white with the bones of the slaine, whose flesh was deuoured with birds and beasts. The Images ouerthrowne at Vendosme, the altars beaten downe, yea the monuments of the house of Vendosme, too insolently broken, might not these stirre vp some reuenge. You beat downe (say the Catholiks) the images and destroy the relics of the dead: but we will beate downe as many lying images as shall fall into our hands. The Monkes of Saint Calais second them, and of many Protestants which held their Abby they massacre five and twentie, or thirtie. Some troupes which kept the fields, kill the first that passe, slaine them and cast them into wells. The Lord of Congnee ioyning with some gentlemen comes to charge them, kills the murderers, and except a few which fled betimes, puts them all to the sword: then hee dischargeth the Cruelties committed in Mans.

At Vendosme.

1562. the rest of his fury vpon the Priests and Monkes, and causeth two of the most industrious to be hanged in their Church, yea where the alarm had rung to assaile the Protestants.

At Angers.

Those of Angers become the stronger, yet without any offence to their fellow citizens, and make an agreement with themselves: To live peaceable one with another, under the Kings obedience, with obseruation of the Edict of January. This modesty continued from the 5. of April to the 22. Then they loose all patience, overthrowing the images and reliques of S. Samson. The Catholikes rest patient, but they could well chide the time of their aduantage. It chanced that the Prince of Condé, required a supply of men and money from the Protestants of Angers. Many Gentlemen and souldiers march, and by this meanes make their party weake. Puygailhard a Gascon Captaine, sent by the Duke of Montpensier, enters the Castles the 5. of May, and the next day wins a part of the Towne: then to lull the Protestants asleepe, and to haue them in the end at his deuotion, he graunts them free liberty of religion. But two dayes after, vnder colour of disarming them, they enter their houses. A receiuer of subsidies and some others barre vp their gates. They found the alarm, their houses are spoiled, and the prisons filled with men and women: and after the eleuenth of the said month vnto the end of the yeare, about foure score men were executed after diuers manners. Many women of all qualities, were put into sacks, drawne through the dirt, and their bodies cast into the riuer, their daughters rauished and some making strong resistance were stabbed with their daggers. And the Duke of Montpensier, hauing published the Edict of the Parliament of Paris, To pursue all them that should bee any way suspected of the Protestant religion, many Gentlemen and others about Angers during these furies lost both life and goods.

At Blois.

At Blois they were maisters both of the Towne and Castle, but being too weake to incounter the forces of the Duke of Guise, all the men of warre rettyred to Orleans. Those which remained in the Towne, payed for their companions: for besides them that were beaten downe in the streetes at the Duke of Guise entry, many tyed to stakes, were cast into the riuer, wiues and maidens were rauished, houses spoiled, and as it often chanceth in these inciuill tumults, many Catholikes were slaine in these confusions, as liberty giues euery man meanes to reuenge his priuate quarrells. They complaine to the Duke. There is no remedie (saith he) we haue too much people in France to deale so, as victualls shall bee good cheape. As if the disposition of seasons, were in thy power oh Duke: or if the earth should desire to be watered with mans blood, to become fertile.

At Mer.

The towne of Mer was spoiled ten dayes together. Beaupais a minister of the Church hanged, some men slaine, some women rauished died, some of them in the hands of them that rauished them, others of griefe soone after. The foresaid decree was published euery Sunday in places depending on the Parliament. It was a meanes to amerce theeuers, vagabonds, villaines, leud and idle persons: it made the plough-man to leave the plough, and the crafts-man to shut vp his shop: to conclude, it did change the multitude into Tygers, and Lyons, and sleight them against their owne countreimen. A troupe of these rascalls fall vpon Ligneul, hang some men, pull out a ministers eyes, and then burne him. Another company runs vpon the marches of Comeri, Pisse-bouchart, Loches, and the burnt, and neighbour places, beating downe, and murdering men, women, and children.

At Tours.

Those of Tours were seized of the towne, but hauing spared the images no more then the rest, the Duke of Montpensier comes in July, and summons them to yeeld. They had no meanes to keepe the towne, nor the Prince of Condé to succour them. So they make three Ensignes of foote, and two Cornets of horse, and ioyned with them of Chinon, and Chastelleraud, making a troupe of a thousand men of warre. This was but a fire of strawe: seven or eight companies of men at armes, and some Cornets of light horse of the Earle Villars, charge and ouerthrowe them, kill some, and carry other prisoners to Chastelleraud: some recouer Poitiers, others which had yeelded them-

A memoriall is at the first in this defeat, being sent back to Tours with passports, tell out of galla into Caribdis. The multitude receiues them disarmed, & beats them down. About three hundred recouer the gates of Tours with running, hoping to finde a Sanctuarie at their houses. But the people arme, and murder most of these amazed men, cast their bodies into Loire, massacre their companions remaining within the Towne, lacke their lodgings, and in this furious liberty, die the ruer with the blood of their fellow Citizens, men, women, and children. Chauigny armes, & by his presence doth countenance this popular insolencie. Bourgeau President of Tours, no Protestant, but onely suspected to fauour their partie, had redeemed his life out of the hands of Cleruauux, Lieutenant to Chauigny, for three hundred Crownes, and a Basin of silver. but in the end, being murdered with stauces and swords, hanged by the seete, his head in the water vnto the brest, they open his belly, teare out his bowels, and cast them into the riuer, & placing his heart vpon the top of a Lance, they carry it through the towne, crying. Behold the President of the Huguenots heart. The Duke Montpensier arrives, & by gibbets, wheels, & other tortures, plaies the last act of this inciuill Tragedy. The Protestants of Poitiers, being maisters of the towne, did not forget to beat downe the Images. The Earle of Villars, & the Marshall S. André besiege them. S. Gemme commanding there for the Prince of Condé, sustaines a furious assault, making the assailants to determine of a retreat. While Pineau Captaine of the Castle, practised by the assailants, giues them a signe to returne: he shoots against the gate, & forced them to leaue the defence.

A horrible cruelty.

Trouble.

The gate being thus wonne, they come to fight for the market places. The Protestants began now to yeeld to the victors force, when as Mangot a Captaine of Lodun, beating the locks of S. Cyprians gate, makes a way for the Citizens & soldiers to succour Poitiers, leaue the Towne and country about subiect to all the insolencies incident to a countrey of conquest. Cornille a Scottish Captaine, escapes from Poitiers with his troupe, & to suppress the peasants furie, greedy of blood and spoile, he laies an Ambush, & then cunningly ioynes with them, and by this stratagem, takes from them all desire to assemble together againe for the like effect. The vntirestrained liberty of armes, made the strongest of all sides to seize vpon their Townes, thinking delayes to breed danger. But alas, how many pitifull catastrophes grew by these inciuill and fatall tumults? Rouen was not the last to make triall thereof. The 15. of April 1562. the Protestants seize vpon the Towne, enter the Churches tumultuously, beat downe and ruine reliques, images and altars, in about fiftie parishes, Abbies, & religious houses: the exercise of the Catholike religion surceased, & the Court of Parliament retired to Louiers. During these broiles, the Duke of Aumale comes, as the Kings Lieutenant generall. Villebon Bailiffe of Rouen, seizeth vpon Pont de Larche: the Baron of Clere, on Caudebac: & so block vp Rouen both above & beneath the riuer: the Magistrate ceaseth to administer iustice, the merchant his traffick, & the handicrafts man shuts vp his shop: heavy foretellings of a horrible confusion to come. Many difficulties did now presse them of Rouen, when as Morvilliers coming from the prince of Condé, & slipping cunningly by water into the towne, prouides for the soldiars disorders, & for the gard of S. Katherins Fort, prolonging the hope of the besieged. The Duke of Aumale assailes the fort, and tires them with daily skirmishes, but most fatall for himselfe: he looeth at the first charge 100. men, & the besieged S. Agnan & Languetot braue Captaines: at the second a great number of men, & two Ensignes carried into the towne. The xi. of July, the Duke giues a generall assault, and so furious, as three ensignes of the enemies planted vpon the rampart did so inflame the courage of the besieged, as they ouerthrew both ensignes and men, pursued them to their campe, & forced them to dislodge the night following, in confusion, with losse of their victualls, munition and baggage, to go and reuenge the dishonour lately receiued at Rouen, by the taking of Ponteau de Mer and Honfleur.

Morvilliers content to haue preferred Rouen, at this time retires to his house, & leaues the charge to the Earle of Montgomery, called by them of Rouen out of base Armanchy. About the end of Septemb. the King, the Queene, & the King of Nauarre come to the arme, consisting of fixene thousand foot, & two thousand horse, besides Reisires & Lansquenets: five dayes are spent in skirmishes, but with most aduantage to the besieged.

The King.

The

1562. The first day, most part of the souldiers go to refresh themselves within the Towne. A Capitaine named Lewis, who had intelligence with the enemy, gives them notice. They runne hotly to the assault (during these skirmishes, they had made a breach in the wall with five or six hundred canon shot) they kill many good souldiers, many prisoners, 28. women, and take the place: but with the losse of Lewis his life, slaine by one of his souldiers, as he did helpe the assailants to mount. A worthy reward for so notable a treachery. Three hundred Burgesies did runne to the defence: but the fury of the assault, carried some to their graue, and others to prison, and made the way easie for the taking of the Bulwarke of Martinville, and the fort of Montgomery. The 13. of October a hot assault was given against the Towne, from the morning until night, and many men on both sides slaine. The next day, about eleuen of the clocke, they renewed the assault, and plant three Enseignes vpon the Rampar of S. Hilary. Montgomery repells them, and driues them back beyond the trench, killing of his enemies about eight hundred men, and loosing of his party, foure or five hundred men, women, and children.

The next day was fatal to the King of Nauarre. If I may (said he to a Nobleman) escape from this siege, I will neuer carry armes more for this quarrell. A certaine foretelling of the mischance that followes vs, doth commonly touch our hearts. Having visited the trenches, and dined neere vnto the wall without the battery, he was shot in the shoulder as he made water: the bullet being drawne out too late by the Surgeons, and his wound inflamed by his voluptuousnesse, accompanied with a feuer, hee gaue his soule to God, the 17. of Nouember following, as we haue said before. In the meane time, the battery continues, many thousands of shot beat downe diuers towers, many mynes play without effect. The fourth assault, was more arailable, the 24. of October. Therby the assailants win the breach at the port Hilary, they enter in troupe, and kill all they encounter, force houses, rauish wiues, and maides, and commit all acts ordinary in the like accidents, Montgomery vnable to withstand this last violence, saues himselfe in a gally with such as could get in, the rest remaining in prey were spoiled, slaine, drowned and made prisoners.

The Parliament returnes three dayes after the taking of the towne, and at the first sitting, the president of Mandreuille lest his head: Soquence and Berthouille Counsellors and Marlorat a Minister were hanged, and the next day five Capitaines, and diuers Burgesies of the towne. Moreouer enuy and hatred an idell these popular iuries brought in question the Seigneur of Anthot chiefe president, and Loisager, the Kings aduocate, being catholikes, but enemies to sedition and wise politicians. In ciuill tumults, the vulgar doth commonly take for essentiall markes of religion, the insolencies and excesses, which fury, and the sufferance of the magistrate doth suggest.

Diepe serued for a retreat to many Protestant families, but the ouerthrow of some troupes which Briquemaull sent to Montgomery for a supply, and the taking of Reauz, terrified the most part of the inhabitants, who being pressed, by Aumale, and Villebon, were content to yeeld, and to cease the exercise of their religion. Ricarnille and Baquetuville had the government, the former of the Castle, the other of the towne. But howe many Capitaines by indiscretion haue lost both liues and places? Ricarnille going out off the Castle to see his horses, is slaine, and sodainly the Castle is seized on by Cateuille and Capitaine Gascon, who going from thence into the Towne takes Baquetuville, and restore the exercise of the Protestants vnder the government of La Curee.

Montgomery laboured with all his power to mainteyne the Protestants in base Normandy, but he had the Duke of Estampes and Matignon to encounter him. In May, hee had taken Fire, beaten downe the Images, and carried away the reliques. The last of Iuly, the Catholikes awaked at this first rumour, surprize the Protestants comming from the preaching, reuenge their losses, by the death of some, and hurting of others. About the end of August, la Mothe, Tibergeau, Auaines and Deschamps sent by Montgomery with fixe score horse, surprize the towne, and spoyle both it, and the country.

A The 4. of September, the Duke of Estampes comes with eleuen Cornets of horse: they force the towne, kill Auaines, take the Castle, slabbe two hundred men that were fled into it, rauish and kill women and children. Tibergeau, and many others ransomed their liues. So as generally, there was nothing, but taking and retaking of townes, with most cruell and inciuill stratagemes.

The Vidame of Chartres, and Beauuoil la Noelle, his brother in lawe, hauing assured themselves of Newhauen, the Vidame going into England, treated with the Queene to succour the Protestants: and for assurance of her men and money, deliuered the sayd place into her hands, with protestation, as well by him, as by the Queene, no way to preiudice the Kings soueraigne authority, nor the estate of the Reaume. Also she shall shortly yeeld it without any difficulty. According to the treaty, there arrives fixethousand English in Normandy, vnder the command of the Earle of Warwike, and are disperfed to Rouen, Diepe, and Newhauen. After the taking of Rouen, the Reingraue brought his Reiffers before Newhauen. But his violence preuailed as little, as fifty thousand crownes did, with a collar of the Order, & a cōpany of men at armes enterrayned, which the Queene Mother promised to Beauuais, to corrupt him to yeelde vp the towne. Brittain continued vnder the moderate gouvernement, of the Duke of Estampes, both for that the Queene mother liued in suspence, and enterrayned both parties, as also for that the factions of Normandy had drawne away the worst affected.

Those of Guienne, Languedoc, and other places, made warre against the Images and Calars, ministring occasiō to shed the blood of liuely Images at Grenade, Castelnaudary & Cahors, where aboue six score Protestants assembled to heare the preaching, were slaine. On the other side, Bury and Montluc (scourges to the Protestants) reuenged the bearing downe of Images, throughout all Guienne, with infinite murders, and lamentable spoiles, Duras hauing abandoned the protection thereof, vpon a commandement, which he had receiued from the Prince of Condé, to bring him forces to Orleans, which succeeded ill for him, as we shall see.

Bury and Montluc did run vp and downe the country to crosse the Protestants defenses: and those of Bourdeaux (hauing too slackly proceeded in an enterprize, made against the towne and Castles, caused the Parlement to search their houses, and to put them to death, who had not in time retyred themselves vnder Duras Enseignes. Montluc, incensed especially against them of Agen, tryed all his wits, to bring them vnder his power and command. He had against him the Lord of Memy, Generall of the warre for the Protestants in Guienne, and the neighbour cōtrie, a sickly man, and not greatly practised in such affaires: for if he had made benefice of the great forces, which he had at his command, and would haue beleueed Aspion and Marchestell, hee might in shewe haue cut Montluc in peeces, beeing much weaker of men, who knowing the carriage of his aduersary, wearied him with dayly courtes and alarms, to the contempt of the Protestants, which fell into his hands, as hee himselfe doth vaunt in his Commentaries, a true portrait and table where wee may read at large the horrible desolations chanced in those countries, during the first troubles.

In the ende, those of Agen seeing their Towne vnable to resist the Canon, make a troupe of about fixe hundred men, and retyre for the most part, to the Castle of Penne committed by Duras to Capitaine Liouran. The next day, the common people of Agen, troupe together, spoile and kill all they meete: Bury and Montluc, flye thither, they execute many prisoners, and such as were absent they hang in picture. Duras not able to diuert this heauy accident, takes the way of Quercy, wins Laufette by force, kills fixe hundred threscore and seuen men, amongst the which, niue score & fourteene Priests, were found slaine, without any respect of their order, through this detestable warlike insolencie. For a counterchange, Montluc comes to beleege the Castle of Penne, forceth the place, after the death of Liouran, puts man woman & child to the sword, and (continuing the course of his prosperitie) takes and sackes Castel-laloux, Marmande, Saint Macaire, Bazas, Toncins, Port S. Mary, Yllepensue of Agnois, the castle

1562. of Duras, and Montsegur, leaving bloudie trophies, of an vnciuill and pitifull victorie. & Lecloure, the capitall Towne of Armignac, was at the Prince of Condes deuotion. 1563. Bugole a Captaine of Bearne and a Catholike, commanded there: who by the taking of Sauuelat of Gauye, of Larromien, and of Tarraube, had assured the Protestants of his constant affection to their party. Montluc sends Captaine Peirot his sonne to suppress Bugole. Peirot treats with Bugole, and reapes the fruites which follow by his parle. Captaine Mesmes lead two hundred souldiars to fortifie Lecloure: Bugole caueh them to stay vpon the way, vnder colour to send them a garde to make their passage easie. And to this intent he speedily sends to field three hundred men at armes, & 40. and forty Argoleters, & himselfe leads other troupes of foote to Tarraube, that by the weakning of Lecloure, Peirot might haue meanes with his men at armes to hinder the returne of the troupes of Tarraube to Lecloure, and by the same stratagem cuts off the passage for Captaine Mesmes, leaving him in prey at Roquebrune a poore village, from whence he passed through his enemies, being 4. or 5. to one, and retired into Fearn. Moreover, although Tarraube were vnfurnished of meale and water, yet hee kept his footmen therein, that being besieged, they might more easly be at Peirot mercy, as it afterwards fell out. And to fill vp the measure of his treacheries, soone after the yeelding vp of Tarraube, he with a brother of his followed Peirot enseignes, & against his plighte faith, he beheld him to cut in peeces 231. prisoners at Tarraube, hang some, and ranfome many. Montluc aduertised hereof, assembles the commons, with fix companies of foot, besiegeth Lecloure, makes a breach, giues an assault in foure places. Bri-mont giues him the repulse, hauing not with him aboue 100. souldiars, a weake number, the which induced him in the end (together with the Queene of Nauarres intreatie, to whom the Towne belonged,) to depart by composition.

Now we must performe our promise touching the exploits of Duras in Guyenne: with the first forces he had gathered together, he tried to assure Bourdeaux, but hauing failed of his deskeine, he chose the country betwixt the river of Garonne & Dordonne, to reuiew his troupes. S. Mataire gaue him bullets as he passed, in freed of victuals, & kils some of his men. He is offended therewith, assaults the towne, forceth it, & takes his reneg of the former outrage. Burie & Montluc pursue him, (they knew well that hauing flaine him, all Guyenne vnfurnished of a commander, would be at their discretion): they cuertake him neere to Rozan, and charge him at their aduantage, being abandoned by the most part of his company, which were vnwarlike, and not capable of discipline. This first check was sufficient to make him abandon all: yet the cause whereof he had taken the defence, did summon him once more to trie the hazard of armes. He gathers together what he can, assembles new forces, takes the way of Agenais and of Quercy, helps them of Agen, reuengeth his iniuries vpon Lauferte, as we haue heard, marcheth towards S. Antonin, and there fortifies himselfe with two companies of foot, lead by Marchisset. His meaning was to go into Languedoc, and ioine with the Lord of Crispi: but the Earle of Rocheaucault inuites him to the succour of Orleans, & for a garde, sends him Bordet, a valiant gentleman of Xaintonge, with 60. horse, 200. Argoleters, & 200. enseignes of foot. These troupes consisting of about 5000. men, horse and foot, march to Montauban, there they receiue men, munition & artillery, and so turne to Xaintonge in the way they force the Castle of Marcues, take the Bishop of Cahors there, threaten to hang him, as the author of a massacre made of the Protestants within his diocesse: five or six souldiars made satisfaction for this offence by their deaths.

Bordet had a spleen against them of Sarlat: they had in his passage flaine two of his gentlemen. So at his periuasion Duras incampes before it the 1. of Octob. Burie and Montluc sie to succour it with a great number of horse, and some 8000. foote. Duras raised the siege, and to lodge at ease, diuides his men into Hendreaux, Ver, and other places neere the raine wether gaue them likewise some impression and confidence of the enemies temporising. But they were vigilant, & fearing lesse the iniurie of the aire then Duras, they came thundring vpon him. Without doubt when 2. armies are neere together, the first that makes his retreat, giues the other an aduantage. Duras, who supposed they had bin but the enemies scouts, determined to retire softly, & to put his men

A in safetie: when as Burie and Montluc seeing him returne backe, charge him behind, and finding very small resistance, kill five or six hundred of his souldiars, charge home to the artillery, and baggage, kill fifteene hundred seruants, hang some prisoners, especially ministers that followed the troupes. But the bootie qualifying the victors heate, gaue leisure to the first that fled, to set wings to their feete, and by a sodaine flight to prolong their liues for some dayes: for the most part of them which escaped, were taken againe, and led to Agen, and there hanged on a gibet set vp expressly, which they called the Consistorie.

Battles are variable, and he is no marchant that wins alwaies, saith the Proverb. Duras gathers together some remainders of his shipwracke: and aduertised that Lauferte was a Captaine sent by Sansac to ouerthrow him quite, did attend him at Embornet, with five hundred men, he marcheth directly against his enemy, surpriseth him at the breake of day, cuts in peeces both the captaine & his souldiars, reseruing 3. only to carrie newes vnto Sansac, and by this foule slaughter, reuengeth the disgrace which hee had lately receiued: then most of his troupes being gone, some to Rocheil, some elsewhere, and hauing no man of command remayning, but his eldest sonne, Bordet, Push and his brother, with about fortie Carbines, and eightene hundred souldiars halfe disarmed (his horsemen being gone before, and ioined with Rocheaucault) he recovered Orleans, and there died, vpon the conclusion of the peace. Through the absence of Duras, the Protestants estate in Guyenne was very lamentable, their bodies and goods left to the discretion of their enemies. Piles a gentleman of Gascogne, hearing of the outrages which Burie and Montluc committed without controule, parts from Orleans (he came with the troupes which Grandmont brought out of Gascogne) & surmounting a world of difficulties, in the end he recouers his house neere vnto Bergerac, and notwithstanding the garrison which the Duke of Montpensier had left there, he opens the prisons, and sets all them at libertie that were committed for matter of religion, and then retires to his house.

This new and bold attempt puts the Country into armes: all rise against Piles, who forced to yeeld to violence, withdrawes himselfe, being followed by fifteene horse, and fifteene hargubuziers on foot: at Montagnac he surpriseth a Cornet of sixe score light horse, commaunded by Montcasin, hee kils their leader, with foureteeen others, and puts the rest in rout, and by meanes of the horse, which hee recouered there, of good souldiars he made profitable men at armes. Piles had left la Riviere about Bergerac, a yong gentleman, who (wedding the practise of armes to the studie of the lawes, from which he was newly returned) became as soone a braue Captaine, as a resolute souldiar: for his first stratageme, hauing sodenly trouped together some twentie souldiars, and a good number of peasants with staves, he surpriseth S. Foy vpon Dordonne: by scaleado, cuts the corps de gard in peeces, that was set in the market place, and commanding in the streets many and sundry things, as if he had beene followed by seven or eight hundred men, he slue Rezat one of Montluc Captaines, his Lieutenant, his Prouost with foure score of his souldiars, and became absolute master of the place. Burie and Montluc chafing at this disgrace, receiued by an apprentise in warre, lodge many troupes betwixt Bergerac and S. Foy. But la Riviere hauing forced through the troupe of Captaine Salé, and a Squadron of horse, made his retreat, passed the river of Dordonne in safetie, and went with his troupe to ioine with Captaine Piles. Vpon the way, behold a band of souldiars incounter him being farre from his men, and as hee inquired newes of Piles, they ouerthrow, hurt, and take him. But passing ouer a bridge he casts himselfe into the water, recouers the contrary banke, and so saues himselfe at Hymet, a Towne of Agnois, whereas Piles prepared for the surprize of Mucidan, the which Montluc thinking to take from him about the end of Ianuary. 1563. by means of the Seneschall of Perigord, he left the vndertaker confounded in his deskeine, and his troupes put to flight.

This successe giues courage to Piles: he attempts against Bergerac, and at the second charge, enters it the 12. of March, putting 3. guards to the sword, & all such as could not

1562. in time recouer the Castle. The next day a Towre being mined, hauing smothered & them that were within it, the Castle vnfurnished of munition, yeelds at the victors 1563. ccretion, who puts them all to the sword. A cruell and more then inciuill warre. What worfe vsage could we expect of strangers and barbarous people, whose inhumane wee willingly abhorre: and doe wee not tremble at the effusion of our Countreymens blood? In the quarters of Angoulmois and Coignac, the Seigneur of Marton, by many Angoulmois. murthers, ranfomings, and robberies, rauishing of wiues and maidens, and other oppressions, which the war doth vniually bring forth, reuenged the excessse the Protestants had committed, in beating downe the images at Angoulesme.

In Xaintonge, Conte Rochefoucault maintayned their affaires, but the taking of Foitiers Xaintonge. before described, and the defeat of Duras, caused the Protestants to be spoyled at Xa- intes by Captaine Mogere, and the exercise of their religion to be abolished at Rochel, and the neighbour Islands, by the Duke of Montpensier. But alas, all these disorders, Toulouze. and bloudie confusions, doe not counteruaile the horrible furies of Tholouse, and other places of the Parliament of Languedoc. Tholouse is one of the greatest and best peopled Cities of the Realme, and at that time the Protestants numbred aboue five and twentie thousand persons of their religion, of all qualities, ages, and sexes. After the publication of the Edict of Ianuary, matters passed with great moderation vntill Aprill. A little sparkle doth soone kindle a fire of sedition: and a small cause thrusts the seditious into furie, especially if the Magistrate (ordeyned rather to restraints the blodie minded) doth countenance their insolencies. The buriall of a dead bodie was the Prologue to a horrible Tragedie, whereof the first act was played in the suburbs of
 S. Michel, S. Steuen, and S. Saluador: and so passed the wals, and put all the Cittie into a mournfull confusion. The Parliament did winke at it, but the Capitouls being more modest, imploied their authoritie to quench these first flames, which must needs put all their state in combustion: foure of the most seditious being hanged, & two whipt, did make some satisfaction for the blood and death of such as were wounded, slaine, and cast into wels. This punishe makes the people mad. The Protestants, to warrant their liues, and to saue themselves by some good Capitulation, seize on a gate, & vpon the Towne house. The Parliament stormes, calls in the Nobilitie, assembles the commons, giues authoritie to their furious armes, and by a generall proclamation, both within the Cittie, and abroad, commaunds them to arme, and to fall vpon the flague- nets, with warrant from the Pope, the King, and the Court of Parliament. Then they kill, they fill the prisons, they massacre many. When they find no holes to hold them, the riuer is heaped vp with carcasses: they cast them aliue out of the windowes, and they labour to recouer the banks, they beat them downe with stones, and stauers.

The Protestants shut vp in the Towne house, hauing no other helpe but to despaire of health, resolute to sell their liues deere. They had Canon, and with the thunder thereof doe amaze their enemies, they make many sallies with great effusion of blood on either side. They treat an accord with them: They demaund an assurance for their liues and goods, with the obseruation of the Edict. It is recited: and so this vniuersal & E fatall combat continues many dayes. In the end the 16. of May, they graunt them, To retire in safetie, leauing their armes and harnes in the Towne house. They goe forth towards night. But oh confusion, it is the best expedient to disarme an enemy with dispensation of conscience, with whom they will keepe no faith. At their going forth, they impriso such as they can lay hand on, the rest scape by the gate which they held: some recouer Montauban, or other places of their partie, others are subiect to the mercie of the peasants and souldiers, lying in the fields. So as aboue three thousand five hundred persons (saith the Originall) lost their liues in this mutinie.

The Catholiks are now absolute maisters of the Cittie: they beate downe the Protestants Temple, and foure dayes together, they kill, imprison, and spoyle. These broies and popular tumults haue often times confounded the authors themselves, and the spoile of rich houses is a very dangerous and attractive bayte. The Parliament knowes it well, and begins now to feare, least the insolencie of such to whome they had given

A giuen libertie should fall vpon themselves. They therefore leuie a summe of money to content the companies, and to voyde the Towne of them. So Montluc and Terrides march against Montauban, Fourquenau against Beziers, Mirepoix the yonger, against Limoux. The Court hauing the gouernment without controul, displace two & twentie 1563. Councillors that were least partiall, and most suspect with some cheefe men: condemne prisoners, and from the end of May vnto February following, they execute by diuers manners, foure hundred persons.

This massacre of Toulouse, that of Gaillac in Albigeois against eight score persons, Montauban.
 and the approach of Burie, and Montluc had so amazed the Inhabitants of Montauban, as they abandon the Towne: but the taking of Agen, and the troubled estate of Bordeaux
 B (as we haue heard) called away both of them for this time. In the meane time, Arpa- ion and Marchastell, putting two thousand men into Montauban, had put courage into them, when as newes comes, that Montluc & Terrides comes to beleage them with a thousand horse, and fise thousand foote: the which made the Captaines take a new resolution to go to Orleans: The people are amazed, feare drives many out in confusion, the drum sounds, they issue forth tumultuously, forsake the Towne, and abandon the gates. But which was the better expedient, either to die in defence of their houses, and families, or to fall into the hands of the enemy, from whom they might expect no mercy? The most part being surprised in the fields, were forced to yeeld their throats to their swords that pursued them, others brought to Toulouse ended their C liues vpon sundry gibets: the Captaines and some few others, recouered the Towne.

The 24. of May, Montluc's armie arriues. but being content with some skirmishes, Three sieges and to haue wasted the corne, hee retired to make a greater leape. Hee returns in of Montauban September following, with nine companies of men at armes, a great number of voluntary gentlemen. 25. ensigns of foot, foure companies of Argoletiers, and three of Spaniards, which made twelue hundred men, and thirteene peeces of artillerie. The partie was stronger on either side then at the first, for Duras and Marchastell were en-tred, vnder hope to leade both the companies, and Canon to Orleans. So as Montluc hauing lost some six hundred men in diuers skirmishes, and refused to fight with Du- ras, who offered him bataille, he retired the second time.

D Then Duras and Marchastell leading away the troupes, vnfurnished the Towne of two great Canons, and two field peeces, the which were afterwards lost in the battle of Ver. Montluc aduertised of the estate of Montauban by Fontrane, one of the Captaines of the Towne, hastens thither, offers the scalado, and giues the alarm in three parts. Two hundred recouer the first courtine, being followed by the two ensigns of Bazourdan. Laboria borne in the Towne, and Captaine there, beats them backe, and with the slaughter of two hundred of their men, forceth them to leaue their attempt to winne it by force. The 13. of October, they batter it with nine pec-ces of artillerie, and continuing vntill the two and twentieth of the moneth, hee beates downe a peece of the wall. Bazourdan will needs discouer the breach: but being short E in about the left pappe, he could not returne with any newes. The next day they giue a furious assault: the more courageously the assailants presse them, the more resolutely the assailed defend themselves, men, women, and children, euery one in his place.

Often times they obtaine that vnder the foxes skin, which the Lions cannot effect.
Laboria might doe much, to draw the Inhabitants to composition. Terrides promisseth him the gouernment of the Towne, vnder the Kings authoritie, and three companies enterpayned. Hee accepts this offer. But his new proceeding brings him presently into suspect, so as hauing no more credit, and the Citizens resolute not to giue care to any capitulation with men, who hauing (say they) no faith, cannot keepe it with any men. Laboria followed by his sergeant, retires himselfe to Terrides campe: from F that time, vnto the 15. of Aprill, the day of the publication of the peace, the siege passed in assaults, sallies, and skirmishes, wherein the besegers lost aboue two thousand men, with a great number of Captaines and worthie gentlemen, without any profit.

1563.

Car. Sene
and others.

Carcassonne, Castelnaudary, Beuch and Limoux were partakers of these disorders. A
The Protestants of Carcassonne had their exercise in the suburbs. The 16. of March 1562. the Catholiks having taken view of foure or five thousand men, give an al-rum to the Protestants assembled in the suburbs: they made them to leaue the place at the sound of their Canon, drums, and trumpets: they pursue them, kill, hurt, hang, and ran some them. Castelnaudary was subiect to the like fortune: about fittie persons were murdered, with the like furie, and popular tumult. Those of Renel hearing of this confusion at Toulouse, saued themselues at Castres, and els where, leauing their families and goods, to the mercie of theeeues and robbers. Some being apprehended, by vertue of a commission graunted by the Parliament, were led to Toulouse, and conceined, some to the gallies, others were fined, & some banished. At Limoux they had aduantage ouer the Catholiks: but Pomas being entred with tenne companies, and eight hundred bandoliers, Spaniards for the most part, and the Marshall of Mirepoix being sent by the Parliament, the Towne was subiect to the will of the stronger, and suffered the ordinarie insolencies of conquerours, robbings, murders, and rapes.

Befers.

He that sees his neighbours house on fire, should looke to his owne. So the Protestants of Befers aduertised of the murder of Vassy, draw some souldiars vnto them, and ruine the images in all the Churches. Beaudine cheefe of the Protestants troups assisted them, and by the taking of Magalas and Espignan, strong places which did much annoy Befers, assured the towne to their partie. Joyeuze followed by 5000. men, & 12. peeces of artillerie, crossed their attempts, & hauing at the second assault forced Lezignan, & taking Montagnac by composition, he tooke the way to Pezenas. Beaudine comes against him, and might easily haue defeated him, but fise hundred Crowes which the master of his campe had receiued of Joyeuze, with promise of a thousand more, made him loose about six score souldiars, and by the rout of his companies opened the gates of Pezenas to Joyeuze. Befers was readie to receiue a law from him: but the sacke and murder of their neighbours, and the feare of the like vsage, made them to shut their gates against him, and to go to field, to force and burne Lignan, with the defeat of two companies that kept it: and then to surprise Seruian, to force the garnison of Casinals, scale Villeneuve, neere vnto Befers, and so to preserue themselues vntill the publication of the peace.

Beauuaise.

Beauuaise feared like vsage to Limoux. They therefore obteyne two companies from Nismes. S. Peran a Beauuaise, with Seruas and Bouillargues lead them, they assure the Towne and Castle, ruine images and altars, and then retire, leauing a companie for the safetie of their companions. To incounter them, the Catholiks by twilight bring in a great number of souldiars attyred like peasants, and in the night open the gates to fiftene or sixteene hundred men, who comming from Tarascon, separated onely by the Rhone, made their coming famous by bloud and sacke. The Protestants recover the Castle, and speedily call backe Seruas and Bouillargues, who returned to Nismes. They turne head: Seruas enters into the Castle, and to descending into the Towne, surpriseth his enemies, kils a great number, and pardons such as laying downe their armes craue mercy. Bouillargues comming from the rescue of the boote which they carried away, and wearie with killing them that fled, he likewise enters into the Towne, and puts all to the sword that he encounters. Thus Beauuaise remayned in the Protestants hands, vntill the Edict of peace.

Montpellier.

The like feare troubled them of Montpellier. The proceedings at Toulouse and other places amazed them: they fortifie themselues, raze the suburbs, in a manner as great as the Towne, beate downe thirtie Churches, and by these ruines, make themselues able to sustaine a sege which threatned them. The enemy discharged his choller vpon certaine short lodging in an old Towne ill flanked, a League from the Towne, who hauing yeilded to haue their liues saued, were notwithstanding slaine as they came forth. The like chance fell vpon the Capitaine, and twentie souldiars that were in Maguelonne, and deferuedly, according to the diuine iustice, hauing treacherously sold the Castle.

At

A At that time, the Lords of Suze and Sommerive, the chiefe of the Catholikes armie 1562.
in Languedoc, had passed the Rosne, with about 3000. foote, foure hundred Maisters & and three Cannons, with an intent to besiege S. Giles, a small towne vpon the Rosne. 1563.
Beaudine, vpon this aduice, parts from Montpellier, speedily assembles sixe hundred horse, and eight hundred foote, vnder the command of Bouillargues, Albenas, and Grille: he is aduertised by some prisoners, of a disorder in the enemies campe: he marcheth towards them, and chargerth presently. Suze and Sommerive turne their backs, their Capitaines and souldiars are amazed, and run away: Bouillargues followes them that they not one makes resistance. Grille falls out likewise, & both ioynly do kill, what by the sword, & water, 2000. men, and win all their baggage, being richly furnished, as to a certaine victory, with two canons (the culuer in beinge sunke in the riuer of Rhone.)
22. Entaigns, & the Colonels gurdon. This victory makes them proud, and Grille correming the aduice which was giuen him, suffered himselfe within few daies after, to be surprisid, & taken at Arnas, to loose a hundred or six score souldiars, his troups to beget to flight, towards Luell, Mauguel & Sommieres, & had it not bin for the ar-madet of Beaudine, who freed him, he had remained in trophie for his enemy.

In the meane time, Joyeuze (seeing the plague to wast his men dayly) retires from the Campe before Montpellier. it was rather to free the Inhabitants from iealousie. Hee had practised certaine intelligences within the Towne, but the iustice of God, brought two of the chiefe Marchants to be a spectacle vpon a scaffold, for other crimes. who C hauing confessed the treason, euen as the sword hung ouer their heads, ended Joyeuze practises with their liues.

His attempts vpon Adge were as fruitlesse, and much more prejudiciall vnto him:
for beinge repulsed by Sanglas from a scaladoe, and two sundry assaults, Bouillargues lost two hundred and twenty of his men, in his retreat, hauing diuided them into three bands. He drew three hundred Catholikes, lodged within Aramon, into an ambulcadoe, slue the most part of them, and soone after seized on S. Laurent in the Com-tat, he chased fise and thirty Italian Landiers, threescore Argoletiers, and a companie of foote. But the course of his prosperitie was somewhat stayd, by the death of Rays, gudon of his company, and of Capitaine Aisse, who kept the Tower of Carboniere lea-D ted in the marishes of Aiguesmortes, & did wonderfully molest the said towne, it being surprised in an ambuscado, & they slaine, the 12. of Nouëber. The death of these men was recompensed by the slaughter of fourscore, surprisid & slaine by the 10. of Montpellier, within Bourg, a small Towne vpon Rhone, besides a great number, that were drowned, seeking to saue themselues by the said riuer.

This happy successe inuities them to newe attempts, A companie of the enemies ledged in Agnane, and spoiled the country about. Rapin, gouernour of Montpellier, being followed by fise hundred foot and Gremians troupe of horse, awaked them in the night, about Christmas, surprisid some asleepe, others in their snits, slue the greatest number, and brought the rest prisoners to Montpellier. The yeare ended with the ta-E king of S. Paul & Damiatte, separated by the riuer of Agout, beleeged, battered, & within three dayes taken from the Protestants by Peirot son to Montluc, with great slaughter. A Capitaine Goson hauing slaine a Priest of purpose or otherwise, made them beleeue it was the minister within fewe dayes after he went to Castres, where the Protestants had still the better during these inciuill troubles. Let vs briefly looke into the provinces of Vinaretz, Rouergue, Guaudan and the countie of Foix. In Aprill the Protestants of Norray become maisters of the towne, beginning presently to beat downe images: they opened and publike burnt the relike which they call of holie vertues.

Doubletless man could iudge by the present what would after chance, he would reflect on his passions. For the interchange of worldly things suffers most offices at length
F to finde a reuenge. The towne was vnfurnished of armes, and Sarras their Gouernour (threatned with a sege) goes forth, the 22. of October the next morning he comes at the breake of day to S. Etienne in Forest (the abundance of armes & harnesse, that is forged there, makes the towne famous, & sets fire to the gates, takes & packs vp such armes as hee needed. But O man, remember that thou shalt bee measured with

1562. with the same measure wherewith thou hast measured thy neighbour, and whilest thou & doost loyter with thy Souldiars to search houses, for the goodliest armes, and the ri-1563. rest women, thou giuest thine enemy leisure to prepare thee a potion full of bitter-nesse. S. Chaumont sent by the Duke of Nemours (who then made warre in Lionnois) incounters him, chargeth and takes him prisoner, hurts, and kills about six score men of his troupe: and from that time, those of Nonnay lay open to many outrages. He gathers the commons together, besiegeth the towne, wanting both men, armes, and a Commander: he enters, sheds as much blood as he pleaseth, spoiles it euen to the locks, fiers it, and burnes two and twentie houses: then vpon a brute of the Baron of Adrets approche with greater forces, he dislodgeth without Trumpet, and seemes rather to flee, then retire.

 ing of Nonnay

Rouergue.

Givaudan.

About the end of the yeare, S. Martin, by the commandement of the Lord of Cru- fol, and the Cardinall of Chastillon, then gouernours of Guyenne and Dauphiné, vnder the Prince of Condes authoritie, came to Nonnay, repaired the ruines, and provided for the defence thereof, leauing Captaine Prost, le Mas and Morgroft there. S. Chaumont sits thether with foure thousand men, but vnfit to force places well furnished, hee treats with the Cittizens, offers an honest composition, as well for themselves, as for their strangers. They accept it, the strangers depart, and the same night S. Chaumont cautieth or suffreth his men to enter, who forgetting no kinde of inhumanitie, murder some, others they cast from an high Tower, some they burne in their houses, many they make to leape out at the windowes, beate them downe vpon the pavement, stab them in the streetes, sell prisoners by the Drum: and for want of buyers, they murder them in the place, burne the houses for want of present money to redeeme them: there were six score by this meanes burnt to Ashes. And to fill vp the measure of this horrible confusion, wiues and maidens were barbarously rauished, Come and other things which could not be carried, were scattered about: the heads of Wine vessels beaten out, the walls for the most part beaten downe to the ground, the Towers dismantled, and the gates carried away. Bonlieu a small towne neere vnto Nonnay, did accompany it in this lamentable desolation.

In Rouergue, Valfergues one of Monluc Lieutenants, and Captaine of the garison of Villefranche, hauing wonderfully oppressed the Protestants of that place, and the Nobilitie of Rouergue, those of Villeneufue, Perrouffe, Froissae, Sauignac, la Guepie, Esparillon, S. Afrique, those of Brescul, Compeyre, Millau, S. Felix, Cornus, and of Pont Ca- mates, resolueth to defend themselves, and by their constant resolution, had made frustrate their enemies attempts, if two of their Captaines had not by their ouerthrow shaken their affaires. About thirty men lead by Peigre, going out of Millau to refresh Compeyre, besieged by Vesin and others, were cut in peeces, their leader lead to Tou- louse, was at the instance of the Cardinall of Armagnac quartered aliue. And Sauignac hauing failed an enterprife he had vpon Villefranche, was inuested in the Castle of Gra- nes, where for want of water, he was forced to accept his life sauied, and theirs that followed him, being about a hundred Souldiars: notwithstanding, all but fixe or seauen were put to the sword.

These tempests fell likewise vpon Givaudan, those of Ceuennes entring into Queix, burnt the Image of our Ladie, and made a booty of two hundred and foure score Markes of siluer, of the reliques and ornaments of the Church being molten. But this prosperitie was like a fire of Strawe, wherein they often confound themselves in their ouerweening. Afterwards they campe before Mendes, and in the end of Iuly, they enter by composition, but they suffer one Copier to change his profession of a Minister to a Captaine, to order the Treasure, and to dispose of matters of warre: who vnder this rash presumption, sends about six score men to an other enterprife, vnder the conduct of a Hosier of Alby called La Croix, as very a nouice in matters of warre, as his pretended Colonell. Treillans the yonger, sends part of his men, who surpriseth them in the field, and out of order, and kills the most part: and hee with the rest of his troupe, rides directly to Mendes: hee enters without any difficulty, carries away the Gouer-

Gouernour, spoiles what hee pleaseth, and leaues the rest to the discretion of other hands, who laying hold vpon Copier, make him yeeld an account of his vsurped go-uernment: notwithstanding the troupes of his party rescued him within fewe dayes after, and brought him backe safe and sound with his companions. The Province of Givaudan enioyed then some rest, when as the Barons of Gaise and Saint Vidal, Treil- lans and others came to molest it. They make a troupe of two thousand men in the beginning of October, to ioine with Loyeuse at the siege of Montpellier: but the defeat of their men at Saint Giles, made them to change their desseine, and to attempt Floras.
 Eight men onely commanded by Boissy a valiant soldiari of Montpellier, kept it. The besiegers vse both batterie, scaladot, assault, mines, and parle, and get nothing but blowes.
 In the ende a report flying of the coming of Beaudiné to succour the beleeged, they raise their campe with confusion and disorder.

Marbasset, a Castel belonging to the Seigneur of Peyre a Protestant, had an other issue.
Coffart gouernour of Recoles, beleeged it in the beginning of February, and hauing taken it by treason, he kept his faith with the soldiars like vnto Granes, which then was vsed as a prouerbe in the mouthes of the Protestants. Peyre afterwards incountred Coffart, slue three score and ten of his men, and recovered his house. These confusions continued still euen after the publication of peace: for the Baron of la Fare hauing tried by all meanes (saue the Originall) to haue a mayde of excellent beauty at his pleasure, besieged Floras the first of Aprill. But Beaudiné making hast to succour it, preferred both the virgins honesty and the Cittizens blood.

The Lord of Pailles, Seneschal for the King of Nauarre in the Countie of Fois, fed the Protestants with words. The desolation of Toulouse made him to change his coppie.
 So the wolfe (according to the Fable) hauing sent away the dogges, doth then breake into the fold, and deuours the sheepe at his pleasure. Hee aduifeth such as hee feared among the Protestants (seeing they had beene charged with the beating downe of images and altars,) to retire themselves: else he should be forced to impryson them. His terror chafeth manie. Pailles entring into the Towne, puts some in prison, and so terrifies others, as they were glad to leaue the Towne. Of the prisoners, two were beheaded, two burnt, sixe hanged, twentie fixe condemned to death, ten to the galleis, and the goods of them that were fled abandoned in prey to the soldiars: the other townes of the Countie terrified with his stratageme, accepted such conditions as Pailles would prescribe them.

Onely Pamiers resisted. The towne belonged to the Queene of Nauarre, and the number of the Protestants was great. Man hath many meanes to preserve himselfe from humane forces, but what harbour, what shelter can protect him from the wrath of heauen? Men make warre one against an other, and two parties seeke one an others destruction: but God with the same arme strikes both the one and the other, and it falls vpon whome hee pleaseth. The Catholikes of Pamiers seeke all meanes to oppresse the Protestants, and the Protestants to crosse the practises of their enemies, when as a common scourge assures them both. The plague comes into the Towne, and in fewe weekes takes away three thousand Cittizens. But (a strange thing) of all this great number they did not account aboue fiftie Protestants. So as subsisting in the midst of this mortality, and by this meanes protected from the iniuries of their enemies abroad, they succour their neighbours of Castres, kill the Vicomte of Seres and his brother, with the greatest part of three hundred men which he commanded, and so disperse the rest, as the way was open for them to recouer their houses: where discouering a practise made by some begging Friars, to bring in Pailles and others, they made such a spoile in their Couents, as neuer after were they more feare or heard of. This bloudie stratageme amazed the Preefts & Chanons. They saue themselues in the Towne of Fois, they spoile their houses & the Bishops. As one mischiefe folloves another, the peace concluded, in the beginning of May a furious haile, continuing by fits for the space of 3. weekes, about Fois, cuts the corne & al greene things so as there was no hope of fruit. The commons mutine, accuse the Clergy becing fled,
 to 1562. to be the motives of this tempest, and were redie to fall vpon them. They avoided the & popular furie and retire to Maugency.

1563. Let vs change our Camate, and turne into Gaule Lionnoyse. The last of Aprill the Lyon. Protestants were seized of Lions at two of the Clocke after midnight, without any slaughter but of two men. The Lord of Sault had the first gouernment. Amongest many of the Princes faction which posted thither, the Baron of Adrets (a valiant man but proud and cruell) seized on the gouernment. The Prince sent afterwards Poncenat and Changy: the first to command the horse, the last the foote. Herevpon the Baron of Saint Vidal and other Anuergnats advanced, with three or foure thousand men, to wait the Country of Lionnois, whilest the Duke of Nemours assembled an army of bour- guignons, Anuergnats and Forens for the sege of Lion. Poncenat with five hundred men goes to discouer them, chargeth them at the first approach, makes such a slaughter, as by their route he ouerthrowes their desseine, and pursuing his victorie, neere vnto Furs
in Forest, he encounters with some troupes of horse, which made head against him: hee chargeth them, puts them to flight, and presently forceth the towne of Furs, where most of them that fled had saued themselves.

Des Adrets arrives, who hauing resisted the forces of Sommerive, Suze, Carres, Man- giron and others, brought some places vnder his subiection, and amongst others Montbrison the chiefe of the Prouince. But there he blemished the reputation which he had gotten in Daulphiné, and by his crueltie did violate the Lawes of humanity, and made himselfe odious, the which plunged him in many miseries, as we shall see here after. One afternoone hee tooke a delight to see many prisoners leape out of the high Tower of Montbrison, amongst the which there were some gentlemen of account.
Soubize comes to Lions, being sent by the Prince of Condé, with the title of Lieutenant and gouernour: and did so politikelly handle the violent disposition of Adrets, as he perswaded him to returne into Daulphiné, where he did goodly exploits. But this decay of his authority did presently discontent the Baron: who on this first spleene layed the leuaine of a speedie reuolt.

On the other side, Tauannes approached with five thousand French, and three thousand Italians, led by the Earle of Angusole, not with any intent to force the Towne, but to hinder the harvest and the vintage. These Italians had many goats, so as in destruction of this horrible medley, the peasants cast all their goats among the Carrion where they passed. The Duke of Nemours arrives, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant generall, and for the first fruits of his armies, hee receiues Vienne vpon Rosne by composition, by the fauour of the Catholikes: he kills fewe, and spoiles much. The taking of this towne shortned their victualls at Lions. Soubize, to haue meanes to keepe the field, calls backe Adrets and the Prouensalls. Hee brings foure or five thousand foote, and foure hundred horse. The Duke conceiuing an assured hope of victorie by the weakenesse of their horse, encounters them, puts them to life in route neere to Beau- repaire, but with small losse: and if the conduct and resolution of Adrets, with the aduan-tage of the place had not fauored him, he had then recieued a mate. Hauing speedily rallied his troupes, he incamps within two leagues of Vienne, holding the Duke of Ne- mours occupied with continuall skirmishes, whilest that Soubize gathered in victualls from all parts.

Herevpon a packet comming from Orleans to Soubize, falls into the hands of the Marshall of Brissac. Amongest other letters one from the Admirall conteyred: That he must endure the violence of the Baron of Adrets as much as he could: lest of an insolent man he should make him madd. This was a fit expedient to put the Baron into furie. Brif- fac hauing presently sent Saint Sernin to Nemours and Adrets, causeth them to enter into strange practises one with an other. Soubize (who was alwaies Vigilant both at home and abroade, and had (as the History commends him) spent largely vpon spies, discouers presently their secret intelligences, causeth the Baron to be apprehended, & by the commandement of Crussol and the Cardinall of Chastillon sends him vnder iure gard to Nismes, whereas nothing but the benefit of a peace which presently followed, preserued

A pretended him from the danger of death. Notwithstanding the Duke making his profit of the Barons practises, drawes nere to Lions, and by sundrie skirmishes cuts off their victualls. But he that vndertakes too much, speeds but ill.

At one instant he attempts both Romance and Valence. The whole bodie of his army was necessary for this desseine: and whilest that he seekes to deuowre all at once, hee looseth all. Hee tryes all his wits, and imployes all his deuises to vanquish Lions, and vpon hope to be assisted by them of the Towne that were of his faction, hee attempts it by escaladoe in diuers parts, but all in vaine. He is ill serued both within and without, and so rudely entertrayned by Soubize, as hee must now put on another personage.
Hee heipes himselfe with the newes of the battaile of Dreux, and proclaimes this victorie. But now hee finds out a newe practise, whereby he hopes to attaine his desire.

Mart Herlin, receiuer of the subsidie at Lions had beene taken in skirmish in the moneth of February 1563. To giue two stroakes with one stone, to saue his life or his ranome, and to mocke the Duke, he giues him to vnderstand, That he had meanes to do the King a notable seruice: that they had accustomed to imploy him in the gard of the Towne, and to trust him with many matters of waight: that if hee will grant him liberty, he will watch some conuenient time, to giue him entrance at Saint Iouis gate, whereby hee should bring in a sufficient number of men to make himselfe Lord of the towne. We easily beleue that which is plausible to our desires. The Duke accepts this offer. he frees Herlin, but as if hee had escaped of himselfe. Herlin comes to Lions imparts it to Soubize, then returnes to Nemours, and appoints him the 7. of March following.

The eue before this pretended execution, Soubize plants his artillery in the night, to scoure the streetes, lodgeth three or foure thousand shot in the bulwarkes, walls and houles of approach, and appoints Poncenat with his troupe of horse to followe them.
Tuesday being come, Nemours approacheth: they giue him a sige from a small Tower.
Threethousand foote enter into the suburbs of Saint Iust, and from thence aduance vnto the gate, Herlin goes to meete them and brings them in. But being entred by the wicket, hee sodenly shuts it. The artillery plaies vpon them: two or three hundred muskets and all the other shot discharge vpon them: Blacons, Poyet, Andefroy and Entrag- nes pursue them with six hundred choise harguebuziers, who defeateth them quite: and if the horsemen had made speed, scarce any one had carried newes of this stratagem to his Companions. Foure hundred were slaine in the suburbs, many without, and a greater number ended their liues flying to the Campe, to Vienne, & other places. This disgrace did so trouble the Duke, as he continued two monethes sicke in his bed, and in the meane time a peace was concluded.

The first ciuill tumult in Daulphiné, was at Romans. La Mothe-Gondrin, Lieutenant to the Duke of Guise in that Prouince, would haue beaten downe a house, where as the Protestants had heard some sermons. The protestants troupe sodenly to gither: and if he had not retired himselfe, they had put him in danger of his life. The second happened at Valence, but fatall to the Authoritye the five & twentieth of Aprill was the day of the election of new Counsillers and of Counsellors at Valence. La Mothe meaning his pistoll should giue the first voice, and then to haue such named as he pleased, hee sends some horse out of the Towne, either to preuent that none should come to crosse his dessens, or to cut such in peeces as should seek to escape: hee causeth the gates to bee shut, enuirones the place of the assemblie with armed men: hee enters it with a lauchion in one hand, and his pistoll in the other, the which hee dischargeth vpon a secretary of his whome hee finds there. The Protestants doubting that Gondrin would begin with them: a number of them retired into a house, and resolute to defend their liues.

But as they came to force them, they slippe out at a backe doore, and recouer
Saint Felix gate, where discouering Gondrins horse scouring the plaines, they couer theuselues within the gate. These horsemen incountring no man, fall vpon some Countrie

mours.

Daulphiné.

1562. Countrymen that came to Valence, and kill some of them, whose bodies are brought to the Towne vpon ladders: for with outrage the people require iustice. The next day being Sunday, the Protestants stirre not: they feared least by reason of others of their partie which came from all parts at the report of the former dayes worke, some new tumult should arise. Gondrin commends them, and with sweete wordes perswades them to go out of the Towne for the exercise of their religion: that in doing so, they shall shewe themselves obedient to the Edict. When they are abroad, they discover, or at the least imagin, that they seeke to surpriue them: some runne to the gate, others enter the town, and seize vpon the other gates. Monday morning, the whole partie araises, they beseege Gondrin's house and fire it, who being retired into the next, hee was slain with six or seauen of his house-hold seruants, his house sacked and to appease the multitude, they hang his carcase at a window towards the streete. These are the effects which the insolencies of an armed multitude brings forth.

They proceede yet farther: the report of images beaten downe in many other Provinces, transports them to the like insolencies: they chose the Baron of Adrets, Chief by prouision in Dauphiné, attending a confirmation, or some other certaine nomination by the Prince of Condé. The Baron (to make the entrance of his authority famous) sends boldly to the Parliament of Grenoble: That they should thrust out of the town, the second president, the Attorney general, the Advocate of the town, the fourth consul, and some others, whome he termed seditious, and therefore he threatened to hang them. These men, without eyther commandement or compulsion, were glad by a voluntary exile to auoide the Barons threats.

The Protestants thus freed, seize vpon the gates of Grenoble the first of May, enter into the Friars, ouerthrowe altars and images, plant the exercise of their religion: and for the suretie of the town, bring in a companie of foote sent by Adrets, who to encounter Maugiron (that termed himselfe the Kings Lieutenant generall in Dauphiné,) came in the ende to Grenoble with a troupe of horse and foote. Their first waie was against images and relikes, afterwards they seize vpon the Castells of Buissiere and Mirebel, and burst the great house of the Carthusiens three Leagues from Grenoble. Whilest these taile in full seas with a prosperous winde, behold others suffer a most pittifull ship-wrake.

The massacre at Vassy, the Italian troupes of Fabricio Serbellone, a Bolonis in Auignon, and those of Prouence ioyned with Fabricio, terrified the Protestants of Auranges nere vnto Auignon, who to crosse the intelligences, which they sayd these troupes had in Auranges, protect themselves with six hundred men. Moreover Fabricio writes to Sommerive: That seeing he hath an armie readie, he should performe a great worke, to bring it speedily before Auranges, whether there resorted daylie a great multitude of Huguenots. If they were not suppressed at their first beginning, not onely Auignon should be annoyed, but also all Prouence receiue great harme. So Sommerive and Suze march against Auranches, and at the first, finde a good meane to ruine the Towne. Parpaille President in the Parliament of Auranges, had bene taken at Bourg vpon Rhône returning from Lions, where he had bene to make prouision of armes, for whole rescue the troupes of Auranges, being of their neighbours Townes runne to Bourg. Sommerive and Suze fortified with many companies of Dauphiné and Auignon, beseege Auranches, being without soldiars: they batter, make a breach, force it, and forget no kinde of crueltie that the victors furie doth usually furnish.

All are put to sword without distinction of age, sexe, or quality: and by a new kinde of death practised synce in Ciuill warres, they cast some downe vpon the soldiars halberds, they burne others, tied to their hookes in Chimnies, they hang men, women, and children at their windowes: they shoote some with their harguebuzes, murder others in their mothers armes: and to finish this dissolution, they sacke and burne the Towne, Castell, Palace and Bishops houses: fixe weekes after, Parpaille at the instance of the Viclegat of Auignon lost his head.

But alas this was (as they say) but to anger a hornet. The Baron of Adrets studies

A of nothing but reuenge. He runnes, he cries out, he stormes, and rines with indignation and threats, beates Pierrelate, and forceth it in few houres, puts all that he findes armed to the sword, enters in furie into the Castle garded by three hundred fouldars of the troupes of Suze, some he kills, others he casts downe, not one escapes: with the like furie he takes the Towne of Bourg. Pont St. Esprit brings him their Keyes. Hee forceth Boulene a frontier of the Contar, puts the company of Capitaine Barcelasse to the sword, and threatned Auignon: when as newes came, that Maugiron entred by intelligence into Grenoble, spoiles, kills, & drownes. He posstethether, assures himselfe of Romans by the way, reduceth S. Marcellin to his deuotion, and puts three hundred of Maugiron's men to the sword. Maugiron fearing the furie of this man, retires into B. Sauoy, and from thence into Bourgogne to Tuannes, leading with him all those of his faction: and the 26. of Iune Adrets reenters into Grenoble, seizes things in their former estate, and then he marcheth into Forest, as we haue seene.

Behold strange alterations: Suze and Fabricio beheld the Barons actions being in safety: his passage into Forest, drawes them now to field. Mombrun makes head against them, and by the taking of Mornas, doth partly reuenge the spoiles of Auranges. Suze will haue his reuenge, and comes to besiege Boulene: but finding nothing but blowes to be gotten, he goes and spoiles Vaucreas, in the County of Venaissin: and thinking to enlarge his limits, he meetes with the Baron, who with a furie (without viewing or giuing him leifure to arange his troupes) doth charge him, defeats him, cuts in peeces the most part of his foote, kills him, with many Gentlemen, and winnes his Artillery: but he shall not keepe it long. Then extending his victory, hee undertakes the defence of Cisteron, threatned by Sommerive, forceth S. Laurent des Arbres, and Rocquemaure a strong place: takes and burnes the Castle of Pont Sorgues, kills all Fabricio's Souldiars that kept it, and the next day surpriseth Fabricio himselfe, and chafeth him euen vnto the gates of Auignon.

As he continues his course along the riuer of Durance, and findes nothing to stay the violence of his victories, newes comes of the Prouençals arrivall at Gauillon. He wades through the riuer the first of September, chargeth them at the first, kills the most part, and puts the rest to flight. But instead of going directly to Cisteron, whether he had sent Mombrun with five hundred men, and the Canon taken from Suze, (he had some spleene against Mombrun's, Capitaine of Cisteron,) hee takes the longer way by the plaines: whereof followed the ouerthrow of Mombrun, the losse of his Artillery, and the taking of Cisteron, as we shall see.

Adrets had left the Councillor Ponat for his Lieutenant at Grenoble: a man more capable of lawes then fit for armes. Herevpon Vinay takes an occasion to attempt against the Towne. S. Mauris and la Coche receiue him so roughly, as the death of threescore of his best Spaniards and Italians, at the first skirmish, makes him to leaue Grenoble, to go burne the peasants houses in the valee of Pragela. In the end, the course of the Barons prosperities is stayed by the taking of Vienne, & of the Castle of Pipet, & by the two seuerall ouerthrows he had at Beau-repaire, whereof followed this change of sides, and the losse of the reputation and credit which he had gotten among his followers, as we haue heard. These losses caused the siege of Grenoble, whereof Ponat (being called away by Adrets) had left the defence to La Coche. Sixe thousand men campe before it. But a goodly desaigne, and easie to be effected is often made frustrate by the discord of the Commanders. Many heads are the cause that Grenoble holds firme. They assaile it, but slowly: their visualls now growing short, after three weekes siege, pressed La Coche to capitulate, when as Capitaine Furmeier, having assembled six or seuen hundred foote, and foure score horse, passeth the riuer of Isere, surmounteth the straight of the Mountaine, forceth them that kept it, and aduanceth vnto the riuer of Dras nere to Grenoble. Meaning to Ferry ouer, he sees the passage garded by three or foure hundred horse, with a great number of foote, & discouers an other troupe in ambush within the next wood, to charge him behind. He retires; and with a counterfet feare, makes shew to turne back: the enimie pursues him, he turnes

& beakes them, and by the resolution of his passage, in the face of so many enemies, he 1563. mazes all the troupe, scattereth them, chafeth them, killing on all sides: and thus unexpected annuall, strikes such a terror in the Campe, as euery one abandons the trenches: euery man flies, and stayes not vntill they haue recovered the marches of Sauoy. Crusol had recovered Serignon and Auranges in base Daulphiné. La Coche surprised the Tower of Lemps, in the beginning of the year 1563. whilst those of Grenoble victualled their place, and prepared to indure a second siege. About the end of February, there comes against them eight thousand men, foote, and horse: two great Cannons, and three field peeces: La Coche had to make head against them, besides the Citizens, six hundred good souldiers, nine braue Captaines, and some voluntarie gentlemen, who hauing repulsed the assaillants at the first assault, preferred, with the points of their swords, both the sacke of their Cittie, and the blood of their Citizens.

Prouence was betwixt the father and the sonne.

First Siege of Cisleron.

The second siege.

Mombrun decimated.

Let vs passe into Prouence. The Earle of Tande was Gouverneur, and of his two sons Sommerive (issued of the first ventrie) was Lieutenant for the King in his fathers absence. Cipierre, being then very yong, borne of the second wife, and the Lord of Coriet of the house of Salusses, sonne in Law to the said Earle, were (as many others did vntill in those dayes) mastiues which did defend the Protestants troupe. Sommerive, a valient man and too bloudie, did suddenly incense all Prouence against them: and being armed with force, he made his gouernment famous by a horrible and generall execution of men dismembred, hanged, burned, fled, cut in peeces being aliue, drawne, C through the streets, cast downe headlong, stabbed, starued, and such like miseries. The Earle his father, abhorring this generall desolation, and not able by his authority to diuert his sonne from this wicked proceedings, gathers together what force hee can: giues the command of the horse to Cipierre, and of the foote to Cardet, who by their armes kept all the Townes beyond the river of Durance, (except Pertuis) vnder their command. On the other side, Sommerive, after the executions of Auranges before described, hauing taken vewe of fiftie ensignes of foote, and some Cornets of horse, flies fiercely to the siege of Cisleron, being full of many Protestant families, that were retired thither, and manned with eleuen companies vnder the Lord of Beauieu, nephew to the Earle of Tande, and three hundred men commanded by Furmeier. The eleuenth of July, Sommerive giues three assaults, continued from three of the clocke in the eateer noone vntill night. Most of the month was spent in skirmishes: The prisoners on either side finding no mercy, nor grace of the souldiers. In the end, Sommerive (fearing some new checke by the hands of Adrets, who had lately wonne the battaile of Vourdas), he went and intrenched himselfe three Leagues from Cisleron. Cardet approacheth, but he cannot by any deuice draw his brother in law out of his trenches. So the Earle of Tande, dist. ckt for victuals, rayseth his Campe, puts some of his troupes into Cisleron, and sends the rest to Adrets.

Sommerive doubles his courage and force, and the 27. of August, followed by a hundred and two ensignes of foote, and many horse, beseegeth Cisleron anew, on three parts, and vpon an intelligence that was giuen him, that Mombrun approached to succour the beseeged (as we haue before specified) Suze marcheth against him, chargeth Mombrun, kills about a hundred and fiftie of his men, puts the other in route, and wins two peeces of Canon, which hee had lately lost. This victorie was to Sommerive a foretelling of a good successe. The 14. of September he ouerthrowes a hundred and fortie paces of the wall: he planted two small peeces, to batter the friars. Three and thirtie ensignes of foot, supported by a troupe of horse, go to the assault, and continue it with a wonderfull furie, vntill seuen of the clock at night: that powder failing them on either side, they fall to stones, swords, and handie blows: the greater number preuailling, the beseeged abandon the breach, retyring themselves with great losse, and des Adrets returned into Daulphiné. Senas, Mouuans, & other Captaines, seeing themselves vnfurnished of munition, without hope of succours, charged with a multitude of men, not trayned vppe in warlike affaires, together with the enemies obstinate resolution, they preferre the safetie of their liues and persons before the place: and in the night recover the straights, and deserts of the mountaine, and so come safe to Grenoble, from thence they were conducted to Lions, and there liued vntill the Edict of pacification. Sommerive, at the breake of day, sends some troupes after them: but the difficultie of the waies, and feare to loose their part of the spoyle, stayed the pursuite. So the victors enter into this abandoned Towne, and put to the sword about foure hundred women and children, without distinction of age, or religion.

Sommerive is now master of Prouence, leauing in all places pitiful signes of a bloody victorie, whereof the originall notes (as principall instruments) Carcés, Mentun, Flafans, thrust forward especially by Begarris, Chefne, S. Marguerite, and others of the most seditious of the Court of Parliament of Aix, who with all impunitie gaue libertie to all thefts, spoyles, and murders: so as after the Edict of pacification, the Kings priuie Councell gaue commission to the President Morsan and some Councillors of the Court of Parliament at Paris, to suppress such disorders: who by an exemplarie punishment of many, caused the following warres to bee managed with farre more moderation. But the qualitie of some, and the credit of others, saved many heads which were prepared to vomit vp in open vew the blood which their hands had too prodigally spilt.

As for the Duchie of Bourgogne, Tauannes Lieutenant for the King in the Duke of Bourgoigne Annals absence, loued siluer better then the blood of the Protestants, and the Parliament of Dyon hauing by vertue of letters obteyned the first of March 1562. forbidden the exercise of their religion, Tauannes disarmes them, puts the cheefe in prison, forceth some to depart with threats, others he expels violently. The Mayor and Sheriffs proceed farther: they thrust forth wiues, maids, and children, commaunding the peasants by proclamation the 7. of Iuly, to set vpon the rebels, not to receiue, lodge, nor feed them that are expelled the Townes: (a rigour which humanitie neuer vied to the most barbarous) they condemne them, as guiltie of high treason that had carried armes, or assisted them with ayd or counsell: and they giue libertie to kill them all with impunitie, that should hereafter assemble in any other places, but in their ordinarie Churches. This libertie bred many thefts and spoyles, at Aussonne, Autun, and Beaune: yet the people are commended to haue conteyned themselves within the bounds of modestie. Chalon vpon Saone, Mascon and Belleuille, seized on by the Protestants, serued them for a time as a Sanctuary and refuge. Mombrun commanded at Chalon with fiftie hundred hargubusiars: but being sodainly beleagard by Tauannes, and finding not the Towne furnished or defensible, by a dangerous, and (as the Originall saith) a detestable example, he left it in prey to Tauannes, and retired to Mascon.

Tauannes goes thither, with all speed, and presents himselfe at the gates, hoping by kind offers to perswade the people to receiue him, but he finds no admittance. So he gathers together all his forces, and the third of Iune beseegeth the Towne. His armie consisted for the most part of Bourguignons of the Countie, carrying openly red scarfs. The beseeged countenance themselves with this pretext, and make their profit thereof, to auoid this present storme that threatned them. They giue the King to vnderstand, That it was not reasonable, they being his naturall subiects, and desiring to liue in peace, vnder the obedience of his lawes, should bee forced to open their gates to Tauannes, armed with strangers enemies to the Crowne, who is suspected of them for many other great reasons. This admonition preuailed somewhat: for Tauannes straightwaies retired by the Kings commaundement, but it was to prepare for a second siege.

Those of Lions send Entragues to defend the siege. Tauannes makes his trenches, wins the suburbs of Saint Laurence, and the fourth of Iuly, beats downe the defences, makes a breach, and vews it, but to their cost whom hee sent. So (as if some important business had called him into Bourgoigne) hee rayseth his Campe, and making his account that the beseeged would follow him, hee layes a strong ambush: but Entragues had no men to loose. Mascon freed from this second siege, behold Belleuille is assailed. Saint Poinet with other gentlemen of Daulphiné came from the spoiling of 1563. some boates laden with the value of forty thousand Franckes in rebkes of gold and silver, which two Sheriffes of Mascon had sent of their owne authority to Lions, to be converted to their priuate vses. So the robbers are often robbed. This boote puts them in hope of an other. The 28. of Iuly, he comes with two hundred horse, sixe or seven hundred Souldiars, and the common people thereabouts, to beleagar this little Towne: but the night before, two companies parting from Mascon, were entred into it, by whom the assailants being repulsed with losse, turned their reuenge vpon their neighbours Carrell. The retreat of Saint Poinct, made Entragues seeke to extend the limits of his territory. Hee beseegeth the Castell of Pierreloux, forceth Montsat, and five and twenty Souldiars which hee commanded there, to yeeld at discrecion: and causeth them to be lead prisoners to Mascon: but this was to feed the Fox, who in the end shall eate the pullaine.

The third siege and taking of Mascon.
1563.

During these broyles, Pontenat comes to Mascon, with Suisses and French, draws forth the chiefe forces, beseegeth Tournus, and becomes maister thereof. But what can the furie of inciuill armes forbear? Clugny forced with the same rage, sees that exquisite and famous Library defaced: a most precious treasure, which made that Abbey to be greatly esteemed amongst others of France. Tauannes, aduertised that Mascon was vnfurnished, and that Entragues, to please Pontenat, followed his ensignes, parts from Chalons with foure Cornets of horse, and eight hundred foote, being assisted of a practice which he had within the Towne, whilst that his enemies, transported with their priuate affections, employed their forces elsewhere.

The 17. of August, many waines drawne with Oxen, enter by his meanes that kept the keyes of one gate, being of the intelligence: they passe the first and the second gate: at the third, the first Cartter ouerthrowes his waine willingly, and by this policie stays the rest. Twenty men coucht vpon their bellies behind a wall in a garden neere adioyning to the gate, runne thether: they kill some, bring in their men, ouerthrow a corps de garde, and become maisters of the Towne: the Souldiars of Pierreloux are freed from prison, and cut off heads, armes, and legges of the Protestants: they cast many into the riuier, spoile their houses, and ranfome the wealthiest. Thus Bourgogne returns to the Catholikes deuotion, and S. Poinct had the gouernment of Mascon, a violent and bloody man, who often times glured his eyes, after his meate, with the mournfull spectacle of such as he caused to be cast into the riuier. These confusions did pitifully afflict all the prouinces of this realme: when on the other side, the heads of both parties, being prisoners, did solicit the conclusion of a peace. The Admirall, by a simple letters to the Queene, purged himselfe of the accusation laid against him, touching the death of the Duke of Guise: whereof Poltror himselfe, in the midst of his most terrible torments at his execution, freed him. And the Queene mother (leaving this charge in the Admiralls foote, that she might raigrie among these combustions of the houses of Guise and Chastillon) did cunningly giue two stroakes with one stone: for she made the Prince of Condé beleue, That the restraints propounded vpon the Edict of January, tended only to content the Catholikes in some sort, and to open the way for the Protestants to haue greater liberty. She pleased the young Duke of Guise with the execution of Poltror, and his aduancement to his fathers offices: & the Constable, by the moderatiō of the edict: for he had protested neuer to yeeld to the edict of January. So the iudicious reader may see, by the course of the history, which party did first break it. But that which did most import Katherine in disarming her enimies, she entertained a discord betwixt two mighty families, whereby she maintained her authority.

The chiefe Articles of the peace.

In the end, a peace concluded the 13. of March, gaue liberty of religion to Noblemen, hauing al manner of Iustice for them, their families & subiects. To other Gentlemen that had inferior iurisdiction, for them and their families, with permission of the Lords of whom they held. In al Bailiwikes & iurisdiccions depending on the Parliaments, a place appointed for their assemblies, at the election of the prouince: besides al other places where the exercise had bin since the 7. of March. The Vicountie of Paris onely excepted. Euery one restored to his former possession, of goods, honors, and offices.

A ge-

A A generall abolition of all things past for matter of armes. All offences (except robbing) pardoned: and a forbidding to iniurie one another, either for war or religion. This treatie did please and displease many. It reioyced such as made an account, that this sweet and pleasant name of peace should make an end of all their calamities, and restore euery man to his former estate. It grieved such, as of three mightie enemies, seeing two preuented by death, and the third a prisoner, esteemed that the gouernment of the state was lawfully fallen to the Prince of Condé, who by consequence did derogate from his authoritie, subscribing to so weake and easie conditions of peace: foreseeing also, that the secret oppositions of the Parliaments, and the violences of the most mutinous, (who being armed slue daily some of their men with all impunity) would in few yeeres giue cause of new confusions.

So by this peace, the Germaine was sent home. Elizabeth Queene of England held Newhauen, whereof the Prince had put her in possession, as a pawne and securitie for the money, wherewith she had assisted his partie. To make a breach betwixt her, and the Protestants, the English must be chased away by them that had called them in. The King goes thither in person: they likewise vrge the Prince to go with most of his partie, and cause them to make the point. The place is strong, both by nature and art, but the fresh water being cut off, and the plague hauing wasted about three thousand men, the Earle of Warwike entred into Capitulation the 28. of Iuly, and the next day yeilded the place to the King. One of the chiefe motives, that induced the Prince recovered.

C to yeeld so easily to these conditions of peace, was the Lieutenant Generall, which he expected by the King of Nauarres death, and the Queene mothers goodly promises. But to confirme her Regencie, she puts the Prince from all his hopes. She causeth the King to be declared of full age, being yet but fourteene yeares old: carries his Maiestie to the Parliament at Rouan, makes him protest, That he will not hereafter endure the disobedience that hath beene used against him since the beginning of these troubles that his pleasure was to haue the Edict of pacification duly obserued, threatening such as should oppose or make any Leagues. And afterwards, by an admonition made in writing, by the Parliament of Paris, touching the Edict of his maiortie, confirming that of pacification, the Queene mother causeth her sonne to name her overseer and President of his affaires: and for an answer to the Court, according to the instructions of his mother: I do not meane (said hee) you should deale in any other thing, but with the administration of good and speedie Iustice to my subiects. Vnderstand hereafter, that you are not confirmed in your offices by me, to be my tutors, nor Protectors of my realme nor Gouernours of my Cittie of Paris, as hitherto you haue perswaded your selues.

The King being returned to Paris, the Duke of Guises widow, his children, and kinsfolke, came solemnly, and demanded iustice, of the murder committed on the person of the deceased, taxing the Admirall, as the chiefe author thereof. But it was not yet time to suffer these two houses to incur ter. That of Guise might receiue as much, or more, losse then the other, and Catherine pretended, to make her profit of the first. E To auoyd this brunt, she causeth the King, to command them to surcease this quarrel, & appoints the another time to aduise thereon. In the meane time, she honours them with the chiefe charges, and giues them all acceffe and countenance neere his person. The rest of the yeare was spent in the confirmation of many Edicts, touching the Ecclesiasticall and ciuill causes, and then was the Iurisdiction of Iudges and Consuls among the marchants erected, and the notaries of consignations established.

As these things passed in France, the Prelats assembled at the Councell of Trent: provided for the support and maintenance of the Catholike religion, namely in this estate. The Cardinall of Lorraine, a man greatly practised in the affaires of the realme, catcht all he can to root out the Protestants. To that end, they find this expedient, F That the Kings of France, and Spain should make a strict League, and hee of Spain should giue the French such forces as were requisite for the execution thereof, and in the meane time, they should seeke all meanes to abolish the Edict which allowed the exercise of the pretended reformed religion: that this treatie made for the preseruation

tion of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish religion, should bee called, The holy League. The Cardinall promisseth to imploy all his indeuours and meanes to this effect, and assures the assemblie of the willingesse, and good affection of the Queene mother, and the Lords of the Councell. The cheefe of this League were the Pope, the Kings of France, and Spain, the Princes of Italie, the Common weale of Venice, and the Duke of Sauoy. Of the Emperour, and the house of Austria they speake diuerfly.

So from the beginning of February, they labour to produce some effects. Their Ambassadors come to Fountainbleau, demanded the obseruation of the decrees of the Councell throughout all France, whereof the reading should be the first. The twentieth of March at Nancy, in the presence of the Ambassadors of all Catholike Princes, asssembled to make a general League against those estates that were false from the obedience of the Romish Church. They require also, that in fauour of the Clergie, the King should cause the alienation of Ecclesiasticall goods to cease, as against the law of God, and prejudiciall to his Maiestie and the Realme. That the Edict of pacification should be disannulled, and heretikes rooted out, namely, such as had bene partakers of the Duke of Guise murder. Behold new firebrands to cast this monarchie into the flames of a second ciuill warre. But the fires of the first did yet smooke. And things not being so soone prepared to enter into new homebred combustions, the King answered: That he hath graunted the Edict, to free the Realme from strangers: and that hee hopes henceforth to maintaine his subjects in peace, according to the institution of the Church.

The Edict of peace ill observed.

In the meane time, such as were worst affected to the publike peace, attempted many things contrarie to the Edict. The Comissioners sent for the obseruation thereof, had small credit in many places. The Estates of some prouinces sayd plainly, that they could no more endure two religions, then two Sunnes: the execution thereof had small or no effect, in places where it was proclaymed: the Magistrates delayed to appoint the Protestants places for their exercises, and by their slacknes caused many to seeke their dwelling elsewhere, to liue in quiet and safetie. The complaints and discontentments which fountained in the Kings cares from all parts, gaue Catherine (vnder colour to lead the King in progresse through the Prouinces of his Realme, and by his presence to end many controuersies, which euen then seemed to threaten him with some eminent confusion) a goodly pretext of conference with the King of Spain.

The voyaging of Bayonne.

Charles begins his voyage by Champagne, and through Bourgogne comes at Lions, forbidding the Protestants, the exercise of their religion, following the Court, yea euen in the Townes that were assigned them for their assemblies, whilst his Maiestie should bee resident there. The Protestants were here in great numbers, and might well fortifie themselves againe at need. To take from them all meanes, they build a Citadell, and the King sties not before it be in defence. By the example hereof many other Townes receiued the like restraint, whilst on the other side, they dimanteled Orleans, Montauban, and some others. The Edict of peace is greatly impugned by an other made at Roussillon. The King forbids all Iustices to allow the exercise of the pretended reformed religion, but in places specified by the Edict. For the first time, he banished such ministers as had exercised their charge, in places not comprehended in the Edict: and for the second time, punished them with death. He commaunded all Priests, religious men, and Nunns that were married, to make separation, and returne to their Couents: if not, to depart the Realme, forbidding the Protestants all their Sinods, as making Monopoles vnder that pretext, and stirring vp the greatest part of the Realme.

Murder of Creuan.

From wordes they fall to deeds. Those of Creuan in Bourgogne murder many assembled for their exercise, with all impunitie. And the Kings absence from those places where they were accustomed to see him, caused many seditions, and mutinies: amongst the which la Curre, Gouverneur of Vendosme, a Protestant by profession,

Was

A was murdered, by the command of Chauigni, Lieutenant to the Duke of Montpensier, as he sought to suppress some, who vnder fauour of the troubles, had purpoiedly murdered many men, women, and children, in the Countie of Maine, and places thereabouts.

As this insolencie increased, a Licentious rage transporting them of Tours, to lay vpon the Protestants of their towne, coming from their exercise, they murder some, hurt others, and with the same rage, bringing their weapons bloodie into the towne, they kill, drowne, and spoyle, without distinction of age, sex, or qualitie. The Marshall of Uille uille was sent to suppress this mischeefe, before it spread farther. Hee was readie to carrie himselfe therein, according to the tenure of his charge: but Chauigni opposing by open force, caused all this premeditated punishment to turne into smooke, as if the examination thereof should discontent both great and small, and make things tend to new troubles. In the end, at the importunate sute of the Protestants, who complayned of these horrible insolencies, and that they were forced in all places to furnish holy bread at the parish masses, to hang tapistrie before their lodging on Corpus Christi day, to contribute to brotherhoods, and such other things: and at their instant sute, not to bee forced in their consciences against the conations of the Edict, the King staying in Dauphiné, commaunds all gouernours (i) Prouinces by his letters patents, to entertaine and to cause the Edict of pacification to bee duly obserued, and to haue a care that no mutinies should grow within their Governements.

This voyage of Bayonne is famous, by that notable sute of those which with a presumptuous and partiall title, termed themselves of the societie of Iesus, decided in the Court of Parliament, Steuens Pasquier pleading against them, for the Vniuersitie of Paris: a vehement and most graue Aduocate of so rare a cause, and master Peter Perfortis for their company: their pleadings are read, and their beginnings, and first entrie into France, their aduancement, and all that concernes their sect, is so leauendly expressed in an epistle of the fourth booke of the sayd Pasquier, and in his pleadings, as it is needlesse to insert here.

This new yeere bread new troubles at Paris, and was likely to haue stretched farre. D The Cardinall of Lorraine coming from the Councell of Trente, accompanied with his nephew, and a number of men with hargubuses, contrary to the Edict, & followed at hand, by the Duke of Aumale his brother, went to Paris. The conclusions of the Councell, and this carrying of armes, did much disquiet the Protestants. It is giuen out, that their meaning is to offer them violence: they flic to the Marshall of Montmorency, gouernour of the Ile of France, a wise man, & louing the publike peace. He intreats the Cardinall not to enter in this maner. This request neglected, he resolues to vie his authoritie. The Cardinall growes obstinate, and offers to enter with all his force. But the Marshall (as the Kings Lieutenant) opposeth himselfe, being followed by the Prince Fortien, and about fortie gentlemen of account. The Cardinall growes amazed, giues himselfe with his nephew in the next houses: and after some dayes of stay at Paris, he goes into Champagne to attend the Kings returne from Bayonne. Hereafter there is nothing but associations, Leagues, and conferences. They must bee reuenged of this affront. But they finde too strong a partie for the two houses of Montmorency and Chastillon (most straightly allied by consanguinitie, doe likewise vnite their wils in this defence. The Marshall assisted by the admirall his Cousin, contains the Parisians in peace, and makes the Parliament and the Kings Councell to approve this act. The Queene mother (fearing least this mutinie should hinder the effects of the voyage of Bayonne, and by that meanes the fulfilling of her desseins would bee made frustrate.) makes the King to commaund by his letters patents, such as were not yet entred into Paris, not to approach any neerer, and to such as were there, to depart vntill that his Maiestie had ended this quartell, after his returne out of Gascogne.

Now the court was full of complaints. The Protestants accused the Catholiks of violence and and breache of the Edict. To content them, the Queene assigns them deputies at Toulouse: but they returne without any satisfaction, but a discovery, that they mean no good vnto them. There it was concluded, that all Princes and others, of what qualitie soever, (whereof many were very farre engaged by their promise in a certaine League made in France without the Kings priuie) should renounce all confederations, both within and without the realme, and should binde themselves by othe to the King onely, vpon paine of rebellion. This was the aduice of Montluc. But the difficultie was to draw the Arrieles, for to make a Soueraigne Prince to enter into association and company with his subiects. Was it not by a pernicious consequence to blamish his authority royall, and ouerthrow that which should serue as a fundamentall lawe, for the quiet of the realme, the obseruation of the Edict?

In the end, the King having visited all Aquitaine, he arriues at Bayonne in June, and thither comes his sister Elizabeth, wife to King Philip of Spaine, to meete with him, accompanied with the Duke of Alba and others, to the end (saied she) that the matter should bee lesse suspected, and that their league might take sure hold. But the most cleare sighted did attribute it to ambition, least the Spaniard should seeme to vse any submission. How soeuer it were, the holy League was confirmed betwix the two Kings, by Elizabeths meanes: For the establishing of the ancient religion, and extirpation of the new. And for that this Doctrine did extremely afflict France, the Spaniard did promise the French such ayde and succours as he could, and the French to the Spaniard (for that he did see his estate of the Lowe Countries to hatch a great confusion, which the following ages did bring forth) the like assistance according to his power: but both doe promise ioyntly; to maintaine by all meanes the dignitie of the Catholike religion, to cut off (as much as in them lay) all lets, and speedily to seeke all occasions profitable for this desseigne, beginning first with the heads.

This businesse was not so secretly managed, but the Prince of Condé, the Admirall, and other Noblemen of that partie had intelligence. They stand vpon their gardes, aduertise their men, and for this time preuent surprisles. The end of the yeare brought the King home, much satisfied with the ioyfull entertainment his subiects had made him, plunging himselfe with his yong brethren, in masks & delights, whilest the Queene his Mother, with her Councillors, gouerned France at their pleasure, and layde plottes, which shall soone breed as dangerous stormes as the former. Whilest our Christian Princes studie by their enterview and League, to kindle horrible combustions in their estates, they giue the Turkish Armie the better meanes to land in the Isle of Malta, to besiege and take the Forte of Saint Elme, lately built by the Pryor of Capoua, and by this victorie to make the siege of Malta more easie.

The Turkes
army at Malta.The death of the Pope and Emperour.

Let vs obserue three notable things, before we conclude the yeare. The first was that braue attempt of Peirot the eldest sonne of Montluc, who weary to liue idle, rigged out some shippes, with a good number of Gentlemen, Souldiars and Mariners, to make a voyage into Affricke: hee tooke and sackt the Isle of Madera, but with the losse of his life, leauing his troupe excluded from all returne into France, by the pursute the King of Portugall made, demanding satisfaction of the outrages done to his subiects. The Earle of Sanjay was sent to pacifie him: and euen then was treated (but without any effect,) the marriage of Marguerite Sister to Charles, with the sayd King. The second was the death of Ferdinand the Emperour and King of Hongarie, deceased in September, leauing his Sonne Maximilian for his successor. The third was that of Pius the 4. in whose place was choiten to the Pontificall Chaire, Michel Giseleo a Iacobin, Cardinall of Alexandria, and tooke vpon him the name of Pius the 5.

The first fruites of this yeare were very commendable, and if they had giuen hope of the like proceeding, the harvest had bene very happy: but such as trust not but vpon good cautions, take not all kindes of money for payment, growing very suspici-

A suspitions, by reason of the conclusions taken in this voiage. To make it more glorious and lesse suspect, the King calls an assemblie at Moulins, of the greatest personages of his Realme, as well for the gouernment of Iustice, as for other causes concerning the good and quiet of the state, whereof followed that great volume of statutes, of the which they rightly say: That they were as iust and holy, as ill obserued. Those of the houses of Guise and Chastillon were called. The quarrell of Paris inuited the Marshall of Montmorency. And the Admirall hauing purged himselfe by oath of the crime whereof they pretended him to bee principall mortue, (the King had already pronounced him innocent by his letters pattents) the King, the Queene Mother, the Duke of Angou brother to the King, the Cardinalls of Bourbon, Lorraine and Guise, the Constable, the Marshall of Bourillon and Vielleville, the Bishops of Kalence, Orleans, Limoges, Thou and Sguier first and second Presidents of Paris, Dais the first of Toulouse, Ligheaston of Prouence, and many other Noblemen assembled to that effect: besides the aboue named Statutes, made a reconciliation betwix the two houses, whereof followed imbracings, protestations & promises, not to attempt any thing whatsoeuer against another. But the issue will verifie the saying: That there is no trust in a reconciled enemie.

In the meane time the resolutions of Bayonne appeared manifestly: the moderations they made of the Edict: the insolencies they committed in many places with all impunity, the threats they gaue the protestants amazed them on all sides. The Prince and Admirall were vigilant, obseruing the countenances of their enemies. The preparations of Spaine against the Lowe Countries, made them to foresee that this enterprife would in like sort preiudice their partis in France. The Prince of Roche sur Yon had before his death discovered many particularities: they complained, that about three thousand persons had perished of violent deaths, since the Edict, without any Iustice, and their complaints had no other satisfaction, but goodly words and gracious letters. To conclude, the winds (saied they) which did blow at Bayonne, must needs cause a strange tempest.

So the causes of their discontent were manifest and secret, and consisted in the dismantling of some townes, to take from them the meanes, in the building of Citadels in some places of their exercise: in the ordinary murdering of their men, in the massacring of men of accout without punishment, in the ordinary threats: That shortly they should not lift their heads so high: but especially in the leauie of six thousand Suisses made vnder a fained pretence, to gard the frontier against the coming of Don Fernand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alba, (who marched against the Protestants of the low Country with a mightie army) whom notwithstanding they caused to enter into the realme, & by some letters intercepted, being sent from Rome and Spaine, they had discovered many practises made for their destruction. And the intelligences they had from one in Court well affected (yet secretly) to their party: That it was decreed in a secret Councell to seize vpon the Prince & Admirall, to put the one to death, and keepe the other prisoner, at the same instant to bring two thousand Suisses into Paris, two thousand into Orleans, & the rest into Poitiers: & then by the abolishing of the last Edict, to establish one quite contrary. All these considerations made the chiefe heads resolve to stand vp to their defence, & to obserue four things in this new taking of armes. To seize on few townes but of importance. To bring a gallat army to field. To cut the Suisses in peeces, by whose fauor the Catholikes should be auaies masters of the field: & to chase the Cardinal of Lorraine from Court if they might, as the chiefe fire-brand of the confusions which would consume the whole estate. Man purposeth, and God disposeth: and of many resolutions fewe haue their desired ende. The pleasure of God doth often dispoint the desires of men which are most practised in knowledge, valour, discour, & wilidome: & some enterprises litle or not at all premeditated, do often fall out very successfully. For the execution of the first point, diuers considerations had made them to name three townes, Lions, Tolouse and Troyes.

A Father

Protestants
discontents.The army was to arrive.

But

1567.

But a great desseine, imparted after the French manner to many meane persons, vncapeable of such actions, turne them easily into smoake. Not one of them that undertooke the charge could effect it. For the second, the Protestants being first armed, were in the beginning masters of the field, but within sixe weekes the Catholikes forced the Prince and the Admirall to flie to the Germanys, which the Duke Iohn Casimir brought them, as we shall see. Their proiect against the Suisses was likewise discouered, and the forces which should haue met at an appointed day, failed in their expedition. The fourth succeeded, but it imported least of all: but this separation was but in shew, and not in authority, nor credit.

The retreat of Meaux.

The King is much incensed against them. He was at Meaux, and prepared to lemmize the feast of Saint Michel, according to the custome of the Kings of France. The Prince approacheth with five hundred horse, and by this attempt forceth the King to retire with some amazement to Paris, in the midst of sixe thousand Suisses, and a good number of horse, the which had beene in danger, if a hundred and fiftie horse comming out of Picardie, and the harguebuziers on horse backe which attended the Prince, had arrived betwixt Paris and Meaux, at the day appointed. At the same time the Protestants party arme on all sides: and this generall taking of armes vnlocked for, with that bold enterprize vpon the Suisses, and the taking of Orleans, Soissons, Auxerre and some other places, had wonderfully amazed the Catholikes. But that which augmented this alarme, the Prince being too weake, loath to engage himselfe in this sort of halbarbs, pikes and shot, went to lodge with his troupes in Saint Denis, where some others arriuing, in fewe dayes made vp the number of two thousand horse, and foure thousand shot.

The beginning of the second troubles.

The King assembles his troupes, and had already ten thousand men. But this Madaine approche to Paris might perswade them, that the Prince expected speedie and great forces, and that he had good intelligences in Court and at Paris. Paris was the chiefe object of his armes. The Parisians were not accustomed to fast taking their vittalls from them, hee hoped of two things to effect the one, either to force them to fight, or to drawe his enemies to a more assured pacification then the first. To this end he sends d'Andelot with five hundred horse, towards Poissy and Pontoise, to seize vpon the passages of Seine beneath Paris: and other troupes to seize vpon such places as were about the Towne. Some companies were sent to ioyne with the forces that came out of Guienne, who should come to Orleans, being lately surprised by la Noue. He and the Admirall with about eight hundred horse, and twelue hundred harguebuziers keepe Saint Denis, and intrench Saint Owin and Aubernilliers, to couer Paris on that side.

But how could so many excellent Captaines vndertake so painfull and vnlike a desseine? May an Anteaissaile an Elephant? Howe many mighty armies haue in former times lost their labours, thinking to effect such an enterprize? To remaine idle, had impayred their reputation. They were suddenly drawn into it, and they must for their honours sake attempt that which occasion seemed to present vnto them. Their men being fresh and full of resolution, made difficult things easie. One thing onely staid in the course of their prosperities. Such places as the Prince hoped to surpris vpon Marne and Seine, (whether if he should be forced to abandon Saint Denis, he meant to retire himselfe and attend his Germanys) there were two onely seized on, Lagny and Montrecau.

On the other side, the Constable, Lieutenant generall for the King in this armie, resolved (hauing increased his troupes) to force theemie to fight. The great advantages he had, inuited him vnto it. He had fiftene or sixtene thousand foote, and two thousand Lances: he was furnished with artillery: hee had a commodious place for a bataille, and fit to lodge his troupes and Cannon. The Parisians felt famine, and were much grieued to see such tenants in their farmes. And many cried already against the Constable, as a great temporiser, and as firme a partisan to his Nephewes, as to the King his Master.

They

A They were to blame: for he was no sooner advertised of the error the Prince had committed in dismembriing the bodie of his army, as we haue heard, but he presently embraced the occasion, sends seauen or eight hundred Lances, followed with some shot for their retreat, to discouer the certaintie of the Protestants forces: and the next day, the x. of Nouember, he goes to field, with all his army, and giues him bataille. The Constables foote men, for the most, did little good, and the Princes very much. The horsemen on either side shewed great resolution and courage. In the end the Protestants are forced from the place, and followed about halfe a quarter of a League, and it may be, but for the Constables hurt, (whereof he died within fewe daies after) they had bene chased more hotly: but the night fauored their retreat, and parted the battails. To conclude, the Catholikes were masters of the field, and had the spoile of the dead: and by consequence the honor of the bataille, the which shalbe blemished the next day with a great disgrace.

1567
The bataille
of Saint Denis.The Constable hurt whereof he died.

This aduantage seemed to inuite the Catholikes to perfect their victorie the next day, but the losse of the Constable kept them within their walles. The Prince attended a second charge, not thinking his enemies would haue taken it for a repulic. hee therefore sends speedily for d'Andelot, who comes to Saint Denis at midnight, some to haue lost his part of the banker. Hauing rested a while, the Commanders conclude, to make an attemp to abate some of their aduersaries glory, gotten the day before. They bring their small army to field, present themselves before the suburbs of Paris: stand there some houres in bataille, burnt a village & many windmills, to vrge them. But no man comes forth. They bury their dead, dresse their hurt men. The Captaines viewe their Cornets and companies, and will hazard no more. What should the Prince then do, being incamped before Paris with a fewe men? The losse of one man did import him more then a hundred of his enemies: and to stay there, was his ruine. He dislodgeth, marcheth to Montrecau, and there augments his army with the forces that came to him from Orleans and Estampes.

The death of this incomparable olde man (but farre more happie in his age, if hee had shed his blood against the stranger, enemies to this Crowne, the which he had so freely employed, during all the course of his life, and not against his Countrymen, yea against his owne blood) gaue the commande of the royall army to Henry Duke of Anjou the Kings brother, a Prince of 16. yeares of age, vpon whose head shall wee see the Crowne after his brothers decease. Hee sought the oportunitie to fight: this elder Captaine prest him forward, taking the Princes retreat for a kinde of flight, and grounding their aduantage vpon the great forces newly arriued of twelue hundred horse and two thousand foote led by the Comte Aremberg, one of the famous Captaines of the Lowe Countries. Moreouer, if the Protestants did ioyne with their Reistres, the warre was like to continue long, or else to make the chance of a bataille doubtful. But they dissuaded him weighing the importance of their generall, and the constant resolution of the Contrary partie: who (sayd they) had then no other Councillor but despaire, and no other welth or riches, but their armes and horses.

retreat.

To withstand the leuie of the Protestants Reistres, the Duke of Anmale was sent into Lorraine, to receiue the forces which were brought to the King, by Duke Iohn William of Saxony, the Marquis of Bade and other Commanders, and yong Lansie, into Germanie, to diuert those of Duke Iohn Casimir which were leuied in the Princes fauor. The Prince had ioynd with the troupes of Guienne and Poitou, consisting of eight Cornets of horse, and three regiments of foote, vnder six and twenty enseignes: and aduancing towards Lorraine, he forceth Bray & Nogent vpon Seine to open their gates, and to giue him passage, and seizeth on Esparnay vpon Marne, where he assembles the bodie of his army.

Experience reacheth vs now, that all pollicies and deuises are allowed in warre. To coole the heat of such as flie to the aide of strangers, to staye them, and (it may be, to surpris them). Vnder this pretext, they begin to speake of a peace, in the which the chiefe chiefe of their partie are employed: and the better to conferre (saied they) of the point. A propounded, they agreed vpon two suspensions of armes, eyther being of three dayes. But whilest the Prince thought to enioye the benefit thereof, he had almost fallen into a pitfall. The Duke of Aniou approached, and the Prince remayned nere vnto Chalon, in a bad lodging far from his troups, & had it not bene for the route of the Captaines Bois, Blasset and Clerj, defeated by the Earle of Brissac during the truce, the Prince himselfe had bene in apparent danger.

Misfortune is good for some thing. This furie of Brissacs teacheth the Prince not to trust his enemy, but vpon good assurance. And not withstanding the injuries of the aire and the difficulties of the waies, leauing the Duke twenty great leagues behinde, he makes him to loose all desire to follow him, and goes on into Lorraine, to learne some newes of his Reistres, the which hee receiued at Pont a Mousson. From hence Duke John Casimir, the yonger Sonne of Frederic Comte Palatin of Rhin, Elector of the Sacred Empire, being chiefe of this army, protests by writing vnto the King before he enters into France, That he comes not for any profit of his owne, or priuate respect: but only to assist those who afflicted for the same religion, had required his helpe. That if it please his Majesty to assure them libertie of conscience, and free exercise of their religion, he is ready to retire himselfe.

Herevpon they renew the treatie of peace pretended the yeare before. The Queene Mother comes to Bois-de-Vincennes, accompanied with the Cardinalls of Bourbon, Lorraine and Guise. For the Prince there came the Cardinall of Chastillon. He lets her vnder-stand: That to settle a peace in France, the King must receiue all his subjects into grace, impart his fauours and the offices of the realme indifferently vnto them, and gree them conuenient liberty of their religion. Katherine answers, that such matches are not to be allowed. that the Prince and those of his partie should before all things countermande their Reistres, lay downe armes, and come and yeeld the King a reason of the enterprize of Aleaux.

The Cardinall replies, that they onely defend themselves, that they oppose their succors to all sorts of strangers called in by the Catholikes, and cannot lend them backe, but they must presently subiect their throats to their enemies swords: that they are ready to disarme when they shall see the Realme freed from Suisses, Flemings, Italians and Germanes, which were come to spoile them, and matters restored to their former estate. As for the enterprize of Aleaux, their intention was onely to before the King (from whose presence the violence of their enemies deprived them of all access, but by force) to reuoke that cruel sentence, which some determined to execute against all their partie, being ready to preue by armes against all those that would maintaine the contrary, That they had neuer any other will against their Soueraigne, but as his most faithfull and obedient subjects.

During this negotiation, the Duke of Aniou sought for the comoditie which he had lost to fight with the Prince, & the Prince receiued his strangers with a wonderfull contentment to the whole armie, fearing least the heauineesse of the Germanes should make them attend long in Lorraine. They expected a hundred thousand Crownes at their entry, but they which had so suddenly drawne them to horse-backe, must haue leysure to make money. At neede they make a vertue of necessity. And what might not two Commanders, (whereof the one by his naturall pleasantnesse, and the other by his grauity, tempered the excessive chollier of some, and the exceeding sulphurion of others,) obtaine of their men, amongst whom they had so great credit. The Prince by their example summons both great and smal: the Ministers in their sermons moue men, and the Captaines prepare their soldiars. Euery one contributes, some for zeale, some for loue, some for feare, and some for shame of reproch. They gather, what in money, plate, chaynes, gold and Jewells, some foure score thousand frankes, and by this voluntary liberality satisfie the first and greatest hungar of their Reistres. Being ioyned, the generall opinion was to make warre about Paris: an apparent meanes to haue a peace. Orleans was their Nurse, neyther could they from any place else recouer artillery,

Peace renewed,

An artillery, munition, and money, to commodiously. They therefore take the way to Beauisse, & for their first beginning, they defeat some troups of Italians and French, that came to charge them in the rereward vpon their passage of the riuer of Seine. They force Irany, and passe ouer the riuers of Yone, Loing, and la Cure: they draw diuers commodities from all the small townes opposite to their passage, alwayes assailing and alwayes assailed, and full with the losse of the one partie or the other.

Whilest this company (hauing the mightie army of the Duke of Aniou opposite vnto them) marched into Beauisse, they fall to armes in other parts in fauour of their partie.
Aster, Sipierre, and others in Languedoc, Prouence, Dauphiné, and Gascogne, make diuers assemblies, leize vpon Nismes, Montpellier, and many other places. Poncanat and Verbe-lay, leane troups in Bourbonnois and Auuergne, whereas the forces of Guyenne which marched towards the Duke of Aniou, incounters them, breakes them, and for that time make their attempts fruitlesse. Moreover the Duke of Neuers, with an armie of fourteene thousand French, Suisses, and Italians, besieged Macon, battered it, and tooke it by composition, but being incountred by foure score horie, and some foote, issied out of Antrain, vnder the commands of Captaines Beauuais and Bourgoin, as he advanced with a hundred horie, to go see the Duchesse his wife, hee was shotte in the knee with a Harguebuse, which made him lame all the remainder of his life. Montluc Pons, the Bishop of Tulles, and many other Catholikes in Guyenne, being followed with foure thousand foote, and seuen hundred horie, surprise and kill about foure hundred men, spoile the Isle of Ré, attempt to besiege Rochell: but too long delays makes their desseigne fruitlesse.

In the meane time, the Vicountes, Mouuans, Rapin and other Protestants, aduanced with seuen or eight thousand men, of the bands of Gascogne, Prouence, Dauphiné and Languedoc. S. Heran Gouverneur of Auuergne, S. Chaumont, Gordes, Vrsé, the Bishop of Puy, Hautefeuille, Bresleux and others, assemble a troupe to stop their passage, and runne as to a certaine victory, for bidding expressely all the neighbour Townes, Not to receiue any one that flies, what liucie so euer he beares. The which shall cost them full deare. The Vicountes charge these horsemen, kill a great number, and of the chiefe vpon the place put the rest in route, and makes them seeke their safety by flight. But the pea-D fants armed with the former prohibition, know no mā, neither do they spare any man, and make of their countymen as great a slaughter as the victor did, and by this indifcreet itaragem, open the way for the Vicounts to recouer Orleans. Being arriued, they lay the inroads which Martinenghe, Richelieu and others made, euen to the gates of Orleans: they take Baugency, attempt Blois, and take it by composition. The Gascons do not easily forget their hands, and the souldiars of Richelieu, who was retired thither, could not free themselves from the sword.

Herevpon the Princes armie comes into Beauisse. Chartres is one of the chiefe store-houses of corne for Paris, and being taken, would much auaille the Protestants. Liqui-eres was made gouernour for the King there, with two and twenty companies, fortifi-E ed vpon feare of a siege, with a regiment of foote. The Prince besiegeth and batters it, but to small purpose: fine Canons, and foure small Culuerins preuailed little against so many men of warre, being intrenched with great aduantage. They found out a place of small strength, where a breach gaue hope of victorie: but the Lord of Valete, a great Capitaine, comes to succour the besieged, with eightene Cornets of horie. The Admirall is aduertised: and not to faile of his prey, he made choise of three thousand fue hundred horie, marcheth towards them, chargeth Valete, ouerthrowes part of his troups, carryes away foure Cornets, and puts the rest to flight. The Duke of Aniou incamped beyond Seine, and loth to hazard a battaile, left Chartres in apparent danger. But Katherine knew how (for so she did visually vante) with three sheetes of paper, to effect more then her warriours with their armes.

A good peace was no lesse necessary then desired. The Protestants did generally believe, that the Catholikes would disarme with them, and the Nobilitie were particularly moued with a great desire to see their houses: it is a desire whercof wee can hardly

1568. hardly stay the effects, in them that are voluntaries) Many whole Counties had already taken the way of Xaintonge and Poitou, they would not loose the season of their Vines: many other pretend, the lacking of their houses, where their presence was necessary: the footmen of some countries, lying farthest off, slipped away daily, their purses were empty, and no man payed. It was in Marche, when as armies are accustomed to go to field, and their French forces decreasing visibly, had driven them in short time to stand upon their defence: their enemies were whole and strong. To divide their strangers into townes, were to dismember themselves. These considerations and others, made the heads of the Protestants to accept of a second Edict of Pacification, concluded in Louismeau, saying: That those of the pretended reformed religion, should purely and simply enjoy the first Edict, and that it should be executed according to the tenour, notwithstanding all restrictions, modifications, interpretations, and declarations made since the day of the date thereof, untill the publication of this second declaration made the 23. day of March.

A second peace.

Discontentments of the Catholics.

It is counterfeited peace carried John Casimir with all his forces home into Cermanie: the Prince, and the Admirall, with all those of his party, retire every man to his home. But diuers breaches of this Edict, did suddenly open the gate to the third civil warres: and whilst that every one imputes the cause of this sodaine repull of armes to his enemy, the effects fall both upon good and euill. The Catholics grounded their discontents, for that in many Townes refused the restraint made by this last Edict. Sancerre, Montauban, and other Townes of Quercy, Vivarets, Dauphine, Languedoc, and else where, would not absolutely submit themselves to his Maiesties good pleasure. Rechel refused to receiue the garrison sent by Larnac their ancient gouernour: they continued their fortifications before begun, neither did they restore the Catholics to their offices, goods, nor religion: they armed out ships to keepe the seas, without the Kings allowance. They refused the ayde and subuention, which his Maiestie required for the affaires of his realme. Many Captaines (without the Kings Commission) lead Souldiers to the Prince of Orange, against the Duke of Alba, to draw afterwards (sayd they) the Protestants of Flanders into France, and ioyntly to oppresse the Catholicke religion.

The complaints of the Protestants.

The Protestants on the other side complained: That in steed of enjoying the Edict and libertie of their consciences, they gaue them declarations vnder the Kings authority, to hinder the exercise of their religion: That hauing dismissed their men, both strangers and French, with the least oppression of the people that might be; and deliuered into the Kings hands the Townes and strong places which they held: yet they receiued the Suisses, they entertayned many companies of Italians, they distributed their horse and roote into such Townes as did most import the Protestants, Tours, Orleans, Amiens, and others, to the end (sayd they) to take them like Partriges in a Net, being retired to their houses. That they sued in the Court of Rome for leaue to sell the temporall lands of the French Clergie, to the valew of a hundred and fiftie thousand Frankes a yeare, the money to be employed to the rooting out of their party. That this counterfeited peace ruined more of their men, then the rigours of warre. That they garded townes, bridges, and passages of riuers. These grudges were openly published, when as another occasion makes them both speake aloud, and to take armes. In a manner all the Duke of Aniours horse staid about Paris, with five or six thousand foot, vnder colour to fortifie the gardes of the King, the Queene mother, his bretheren, & the capitall Citie: and Tauannes sent towards Bourgoigne with many companies, made them suspect that it was to beset and surprize the prince at Noyers, a little & weake towne of his owne, & the Admirall at Tanlay, a Castle belonging to his brother d'Andelot. Some acquainted with this practise giue them aduice: they complaine to the King of the iniustice is done them, beseeching his maiestie to quench the fires kindled in his realme by the factions of the Guisens, & to free themselves they take Rechel for their sanctuary.

Practises to surprize the Prince and Admirall.

This brave prey being thus escaped, Katherin and the faction send forth commissions, and appoint the rendezvous for the troupes in Guyenne and Poitou. The Duke of Aniours prepares

A prepares: and for a reuenge of Meaux, he chafeth away the Protestants. The Queene of Nauarre, accompanied with three regiments of foote, and eight Cornets of light horie, (notwithstanding the endeouours of Esars and Montluc,) retires to Rechel with the Prince her sonne, (at this day our most Christian King Henry the fourth,) and the Princeesse her Daughter. The Cardinall of Chastillon is forced to leaue Beauuoisin, and to saue himselfe in a small Barke in England. The Nobilitie of Poitou arme with the first and repaire to Rechel. The Earle of Rochefoucault was armed some dayes before. D'Andelot marched with a thousand good horse, and two thousand shot, gathered together in the confines of Maine and Brittaine.

The Protestants arme.

The Duke of Martignes, gouernour of Brittaine, going with three hundred Lances, and five hundred braue shot, to Saumur, to the Duke of Montpensier, he is aduertited that many of the enemies troupes are lodged in his way. He sends to discover them, and finding them lodged at large, after the French manner, passeth brauely through them, with the losse but of twenty men, and with the gaine of an Enseigne, and the slaughter of about foure score of his enemies: and recouers Saumur, whilst that D'Andelot, la Noue, and other Commanders, ioyned with the Prince. If the Dukes of Aniours, Montpensier and Martignes, who assembled men from all parts to oppose a mighty armie against the Protestants, had in time foreseene, that those which dilodged in so great hast, went to seeke their fortunes a farre off, and had sought to crosse their designs: the Prince & all his part had in all shewes bin coopt vp in Rechel. But behold, of poore vagabonds, in two moneths they become maisters of Niort, Fontenay, S. Maixent, Saintes, S. Jean d'Angely, Pons, Cognac, Blay, Angoulême, and are strong enough for the continuance of a long war. While the Dukes arme, the King begins the warre against the Protestants by the Pen. He declares by his proclamation, that the Edict of Lannuac had bene but prouisionally, vntill he were of full age: that now he forbids all exercise of the pretended reformed religion, in all the territories of his obedience: forbids both the bodies and goods of them that shall breake it: commands all Ministers vpon penalties, to depart the realme within fiftene dayes. And by another, he suspends all officers making profession thereof, from their offices and charges, commanding them to resigne them into his hands within fiftene dayes.

The King makes a Proclamation against the Protestants.

The Protestants make their profit of these Edicts, and send them into Germany, England, and to the Suisses of their religion, to proue, That they are not pursued as rebels affecting the Crowne, (crimes by the which their enemies would make them odious.) And in truth these Edicts were spurs to hasten the League, which the Duke of Deux-ponts shall bring the next yeare, and for the heads of Dauphiné, Prouence and Languedoc, to go and oppose the forces of the sayd Prouinces against the Kings armie, which was ready to fall vpon the prince. To this end, Acier, Mouuans, Pierre Gourde, and others, draw forth sixteene or seuentene thousand shot, but few horse: seeming with this multitude of men to haue vnpeopled all that climate. But as they did fortifie the princes affaires on the one side, they did weaken them on the other: for after their departure, the Catholics seized vpon many places, the which they might well haue held, lodging halfe their forces in them, then marching in troupe close and speedily, they might haue arrived safe, where their presence was most profitable and necessary.

But the presumption of equalitie, doth commonly ingender a pernitiouse ialousie among great men: and the opinion one conceiues of his forces, and of his owne valour, with an obstinacie not to yeeld vnto another, is a dangerous plague in an armie. Mouuans and Pierre Gourde, finding themselves annoied by straight lodging, as they had done till they came neere to Perigueux, they meane to lye more at large at Menignat, not discovering that the Duke of Montpensier approached, who at his arrivall puts in route two regiments, and kils a thousand souldiers at their Colonels feete: who selling their liues deere, to tyre the Dukes troupes, as they could not charge Acier; yet they were amazed by the fearefull report of such as were escaped, who made the Dukes forces exceeding great, beyond all truth, who retiring to Chasseleaud, made the way

Gggg 2 open

1568. open for Aiers troupes, which remained of this shipwreck, to fortifie the Protestants' armie: and to make it able, not onely to endre the shocke, but to attempt some thing against the Catholikes. The Prince did murther in his armie aboute eight thousand Harquebuziers, and three thousand good horse. The Duke had ten thousand foote, beside Suisses, and foure thousand Lances: the Souldiars of both armies were well experienced in warre.

Hee that takes not the French in their first heat, they are easily broken: the discomfited news of warre failing, might greatly coole this new vigour: and Winter approaching, withdraw the greatell part of them. The Prince therefore seekes to fight the number and courage of his men invites him. He comes within two Leagues of Castelleraud, and by his approach annoyes the Duke of Amieu. The Duke moved with like desire, and greued to see so many men at the Princes deuotion: knowing also that the forces of Germany would be ready to Marche in their fauour in the Spring, seekes to diuide his enemies power, and to overcome them by peccemeale. On all motions are sodaine, but they do not alwayes bring forth effects premeditated. To come to a battaile, was properly to cutt away the finewes of the realme, and by their mutuall weakening, to invite the forraigne enemy to the invasion of this estate. The foueraigne commander of battailes, did thew at this time a signe of his accustomed fauour to this Crowne, taking from both the Generalls the sharpnesse of their iudgements, and to loose in one day a notable occasion for eyther of them to prouide against his enemy, as we shall heere.

The Prince had intelligence, that the Duke camped in a place of aduantage, vnder the fauour of a medow, intrenched in diuer places: so not able to draw his enemy to fight, he dislodgeth, and goes towards Lusignan. The Duke takes the same counsell, and one not acquainted with the others designes, the Marshalls of both Campes meete in a manner at one instant, at Pamprou, five leagues from Poitiers, a great village, furnished with victuals, and in a very good countrey. They chafe and recheate one another, but loth to dispute this Rendezvous with more hazard, they both leaue (yet with an honourable retreat of eyther side) to put themselves in battaile, a quarter of a league from the place.

The Admirall and d'Andelot his brother, supported their men with five Companies of horse, set in order vpon a small hill, to keepe the Catholikes from viewing of the valen, and to giue them some apprehension of greater forces lodged there. The Prince at a League from thence, and aduanced with great speed. On the Dukes part there appeared ten or eight hundred Lances, commanded by the Duke of Martignes. Being approached within Canon shot, the Admirall carrieth a Capitaine of Anglenes to aduance alonge a hedge, who more valiant then discrete, falls presently to darraich, and then retreateth to second them. Martignes thinks that they meane to fight, and reals forth three or foure squadrons of Lancers: The Admirall and his brother greiued they had not prevented the indiscretion of their Capitaine, engaged them to fight vnderdressed, and contrary to their charge, calls back the Lancers, and with an affected countenance, couers the weaknesse of their troupe. Martignes taking a troupe of seruantes for a battalion of Harquebuziers which appeared behind a village, ites his Lancers, and for want of footmen, loseth the opportunity to fight. In the meantime the enignes of foote, and troupes of horse arrive in all parts: the night approaching, gaue them leisure onely to skirmish with the Duke of Amieu Foreward. The Dukes Foreward was too weak to endure the shock: the Commanders desire a poffey, whereby they perswade the enemy, through fauour of the night, that all their forces were present: their drums sound after the Suisses manner, they double their gards, make great fires, cast many matches amongst the bushes, keep their men close without any skirmish, least some prisoner should discouer their trick, & after they had refreshed themselves, they dislodge without any noise, some marching to Isenmeil, where the Duke lodged with the battaile, the rest to the village of Sansy. Seeking one another in suspence, they loose the opportunity of a great aduantage, the first the Duke, the second in the Prince.

They encounter at first with small though-ter.

A politike stratagem.

1568. Mans counsell without God preuailes nothing, and The actions of great men, are in 1568. happier, as those of the meanest. So saith the Oracle. For, the next day many things changed more by hazard then by counsell. This retreat giues them courage to fight: to this end, the Admirall followes them at the heeles, and the Prince marcheth after. There were two wayes, one led to Sansy, the other to Isenmeil. At the break of day there riseth a great mist, which causeth the Prince to stray: after he had marched two leagues, he findes himselfe in the front of the Dukes armie. Necessitie giues him resolution: he puts his Harquebuziers before, which were aboute twelue thousand, and forced to make some shew of fight: salutes the Duke with his Canon, skirmishes with euers volleys of shot, sends to learne newes of his foreward, and wills the Admirall to make hast.

He had already turned head vpon the discharge of the Canon; but the Sunne setting at his arrival, preventing a generall fight, caused all to passe in sharpe skirmishes, with losse on cyther side: and after a dayes breathing, eyther part retired, the Duke to Poitiers, the Prince to Mirebeau. Few dayes after, they both returne to their first resolution to fight. The Duke goes to field, & recouers Mirebeau. Few daies after, they both returne to their first resolution to fight. The Duke goes to field and recouers Mirebeau. But he doth not obserue the composition, & giues d'Andelot cause for a reuenge, to cut in peeces the garrison he finds in S. Florent, an Abbey nere vnto Saumur.

The Prince held Loudun. It was in the Dukes way, and enjoying it, he held a fertile country from his enemies, which might feed his Armie a moneth together: and there was no reason, the Prince should hazard his forces for the keeping of a weak place. The Duke approacheth: the next day hee hath newes that the Prince puts his Armie in battaile alongst the suburbs: hee likewise arangeth his: the Canon playes on both sides, and passeth through their squadrons, doing some harme. About forty thousand men, almost all French, beheld one another in the midst of a champion field: without any aduantage, and with an equall courage and countenance, attend but the signe of battaile. But the outward cold did quench much of this inward heat: the frosts were great, continuall mists, and the wayes so slippery, as no man could hold his footing. It was dangerous for the first that charged; the slippery wayes stayed their horses, and the maine ditches (made to diuide their lands) serued them as trenches. So as either of them being loth to hazard any thing, stands firme, beholding one another, expecting when the most rash should begin the charge. Such as go to the skirmish, eyther brake or put some member out of ioynt: their falls hurt more then the shot.

Three dayes passe in this sort. the fourth the Duke retires to warme his troupes benumbed with colde, and for the most part lodged in the open ayre (of twenty yeares there had not bene felt so sharpe a winter) in his retreat three companies were cut off in a village, one of Suisses, and two of French, and the sicknesse falling amongst the Souldiars, diminished both the armies of eight thousand men. This fruitlesse aboad caused a generall murmure, and both Nobilitie and Souldiars on eyther party did threaten, if they were not lodged in safe and well fortified places, they would prouide for themselves, not able to endure the extreame frosts and colde without any effects. Their Commanders agree. The Duke goes to winter beyond the river of Loire, about Saumur, and the Prince at Thouars, Montheuil-Bellay, and places thereabouts, eyther hauing some secret pretence against his enemy, but with small effect. This retreat gaue the Prince leisure to deuise meanes for the maintenance of the warre. The goods of the Clergie of Poitou were ingaged, and sold to them that durst buy them: the Recheleis contribute foure foure thousand Frankes, and the Queene of England sent a hundred thousand Angles, six Canons, poulder and shot, for the which she was paid in Salt, Wax, oil, and Bell-metall, for the most part at the Catholiks cost.

Succours of money and munition in England.

The Abbey of S. Mitchell alone, amongst all the other places of base Poitou, bridled the Protestants. They besiege it, batter it, and take it at the third assault, and cut foure hundred men in peeces which defended it. Martingues, Entraigues and la Chastre gouernours of Oren, Orleans, and Bourges, besiege Sancerre, giue many assaults, loose Sancerre besieged.

1568. loose many men, and finally tyred with many fallies, leaue this small Towne in quest, A to be hereafter a mirrour of singular patience, in the preservation of their liues and families. But those of Sancerre, seeking to enlarge themselves, & to build a fort vpon Lare, suffer themselves to be surprized, loose both fort and some fifty men, and are enforced to shut themselves within their walles.

During the sharpenesse of winter, and this small surceasing of armes, the Vicomtes of Bourniquet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon and others, with seven thousand shot, and some horse, made war, especially against them of Tholouse. Montauban was their chiefe retreat, and experience had lately taught them: That it were better to defend this Prouince and their countreymen, against Montluc and their enemies, then transporting their armes into a strange country, to leaue them againe in prey. Piles was commanded, to perswade them to ioyne with the Prince. At their refusal, he armes twelue hundred shot, and two hundred horse, takes Bergerac and S. Foy: passeth into Perigord, burning all the villages: and to purge the death of Mouuans and Pierre Gourde, hee kills all that were suspected of their ouerthrow: and so hee marcheth towards the Prince.

The Prince had now taken breath, and hearing that the Duke marched towards Angoulesme, fortified with threethousand foote, and some horse, which the Earle of Tende brought him, and two thousand Reisfers led by the Reingraue and Bajompierre, he retires along the riuer of Charant, to viewe the Dukes countenance, and to fortifie the places of his obedience: but with the preiudice of his armie. The Duke comes likewise to Chasleauroux, a towne vpon the riuer of Charente, and at the first takes a Castle by composition, which was kept by a Scottishman. The Admirall likewise arrives, followed with seven or eight hundred horse, and as many harguebusiers: and to hinder the Dukes passage, he lodgeth two regiments of foote neere vnto the bridge, seconded by the horse: charging them, to vex the enemies guards, with continuall alarms: to make them thinke, that all the Princes vanguard was lodged there, and then he retires to Bassigny, with the rest of the vanguard.

But this commaundement wrought no effect. They had forgotten the manner of camping, every one would lodge, liue, and forrage at his ease: so as the most part going to quarter elsewhere, and leauing the passage vnsurrounded of men, make the possession easie for the Duke. The Duke, through the care of the Lord of Biron, repairs the bridge: makes another of boares, and in the night passeth the riuer of Charente. At the breake of day, fitye horse beeing in garde, a quarter of a league off, discover the enemies troups that passed, and aduertise the Admirall: (the Prince being a league beyond at Larnac) the Admirall sends for his men dispersed in their lodgings, to come vnto him, and to make their retreat together, & in the meane time, he attended them at Bassac.

In a great action, all delayes are dangerous. He spends three houres to attend them, and might easily haue rettyred, if his troups had bin ioynd. Hee had nine Cornets of horse, and some Enseignes of foote. Montgomery, Acier and Punault were Colonells, whom he was loth to loose. Beeing all ioynd with him (except Acier, who could not arrive in time with his fixe thousand shot) hee findes all the Dukes armie past, making shewe by their skirmishes, that that day, being the thirteenth of March, should not passe without a battell.

The Prince was aduanced halfe a league in his retreat, but hee was too well bred, to see his friends engaged, and to fight in his absence. Hee turnes head towards the Admirall, with those fewe horse hee could sodainely drawe out off his battell: for he camped not, but his armie dispersed into quarters. The Admirall making his retreat, incounters a small riuer, which could not bee passed, but in two or three places. Then the Duke sends forth the flower of all his horse, beeing seven or eight hundred, who at the first ouerthrow foure Cornets, take la Noue and la Loue, fighting, vanquish Punault, charge d'Andelot, but with the death of Montalez, and fiteene or sixteene others of account.

In

A In the ende, the Prince and the Admirall see themselves in a manner engaged be- 1569. twist all the Dukes forces and the riuer of Charente: they go to the charge, first the Admirall and then the Prince, and at the first make them turne their backs that were before them: and now they endured a second charge, more fierce and of longer continuance. But suddenly all the army falls vpon them, their horsemen are in route, the Princes horse slaine, he ouercast vnder him, abandoned by his troups and prisoner to the Lord of Argence, to whom he had yeilded, but he was shot in the head with a pistoll by Montesquieu a Gascon and Capitaine of the Princes gardes. A lesson for great men, and a maxime of warre: That a generall should not fight, but being forced, for that in the losse of his person consistes the ruine of his army. This Prince hath left this memorie of him, to haue yeilded to no man of his age, neyther in courage nor curtesie, eloquent in speech, liberall, affable to all the world, and a most excellent commander in warre.

The Protestants lost in this battaille neere foure hundred men, most horsemen, & few footemen of account, la Tour a Poitouin Capitaine of Marine: yong Chasteliers, Lorant, Chandenier, Mesambert, Prandaniere, the eldest of the Bessons, the yonger of Tabariere, Barrete, la Mesleraye and a great number of other gentlemen of diuers Prouinces, many wounded, and many prisoners: the amazement and disorder beeing so great, as they could not flie fast enough. Of Catholikes there died about two hundred, amongst the which were Montalez, the Barons of Ingrand, and Prunoy of the house of Billy, the Earle of Mirande, of Morte, Montanure, Limieres, and some other of make.

Many Protestants would haue gathered together againe: but they pursued them too neere, and the Reisfers arriving in the pursute, so hastened them that fled, as night surprized them in the midst of their flight. The Admirall and d'Andelot not able to pacifie the amazement, nor repaire the disorder, tooke their way towards Saint Ian d'Angely, and gaue the rendezvous for them that escaped at Xaintes, whether the yong Princes of Navarre and Condé were retired. The bodie of the army was entred into Cognac. The footemen with their Commanders, Acier, Beaudiné, Blacons, Chellar, Mirabell and many others, and of the horse Montgomery, Chaumont and others. To dislodge them from Cognac, the victorious Duke sends to beseege it: but his attempts against Cognac, his intelligences within Saint Ian d'Angely, and his fruitlesse threats that he vsed against Angoulesme, stayed the course of his victorie.

In the meane time the Protestants gather together the peeces of this shipwrecke: the Admirall led the Princes to Tonay-Charente, hee tooke viewe of the horse: Henry Prince of Navarre was declared generall, and Henry Prince of Condé an assistant, foure thousand masters tooke the oath, d'Andelot gathers the footemen together, provided for money, and staid the enemies courses, when as a burning feuer tooke him out of this world the seauen and twentieth day of May, in Xaintes, leauing for euer a famous name purchased by him of a Knight without feare. Acier did succeed him in his charge, Beauuais la Noe had his company of men at armes, but the Admirall the care and government of the whole army, with the managing of the chiefe affaires which concerned the protestants estate.

The Dukes army did ouerrunne Xaintonge, Angoumois and Limousin, vnder the conduct of the Earle Brissac Colonel of the Interior of France, Having recovered Anteberte and some other places from the protestants, hee attempts Mucidan, beeing vigorously battered and valiantly defended. In the ende it is burnt to ashes, the Castell endures some assaults, the most worthy men of the regiments of Brissac, Montluc and Escars loose their liues there, and finally Brissac himselfe approaching to viewe the breach and the defences, is shot into the head and slaine vpon the counterscarpe, leauing a wonderfull grieve to them that knewe him, beeing now but fiae or fixe and twentie yeares olde, and might in time haue proved one of the valiantest and greatest Captaines of his age. Yet necessitie forced the beseege haue lost their Colonels, and so many braue soldiars, made most of them to be slaine, issuing out of their walls. Filles recompensed this losse by the taking of Medoc betwixt Bordeaux and Rochell, the spoile whereof enriched all his troupe. Then

The Duke of Deuxponts in France.
Vuolfgang Comte Palatin of Rhin and Duke of Deuxponts, brought vnto the Princes about sixe thousand Reisires and siue thousand Landsquenets. Ciuill warres alway make the way open to a neighbour stranger, the which he durst not attempt without the support of one partie. The difficultie was to ioyne with the Princes being farre off and without a French conuoi, it could hardly be done: but see what chanceth vallo-ked for.

Mouy, Tenlis, Moruilliers, Fequieres, Estrenay and others, had in the beginning of this third inciull warre, assembled siue or sixe hundred horle, and two thousand harque-busiers, whome the difficultie to passe into Guyenne had transported into Brabant to the Prince of Auranges: the Comte Lodowike his brother, and Comte Volrad of Marfeld, who hauing for a time entertayned the warre with a variable successe against the Spaniard, passed the Meuse, and offered battaile to the Duke of Alba: but he fought onely to consume them for want of victualls, whereof they were so scantied, as necessitie carrying them backe into France, they came to Vitry, and so strooke vp into Germanie, and by their annuall gaue Vuolfgang the helpe he desired.

We must nowe begin anew. The Duke of Anjou leaues Guyenne, and takes the way of Berry, to keepe the Duke of Deuxponts from ioyning with the Princes: but it had C beene better to haue preuented his entry into the Realme. To this ende, the King commits two armies, the one to the Duke of Aumale, the other to the Duke of Nemours:
(neyther of them being verie fortunate in warre) both strong in footemen, but weaker in horse then the Germanie. They aduance vnto Sauerne: coast the Germanie Duke, who crost through Bourgonne, presse him on the flanks and behinde with sundrie skirmishes, and often times encounter goodly and fauorable occasions, which they let slippe for want of iudgement, and good correspondencie, the true bond of the brauest exploits that may be practised in warre.

But was it not a want of iudgement in these two great Commanders, fortified with twelue hundred horse and foure thousand foote sent by the Pope, to leaue D la Charité vnfortified of men, knowing well that the Protestants could nor passe the riuer of Loire, without getting by force or surprising some of the passages thereon.
Vuolfgang attempts la Charité, it, terrifies it and takes it, before that any succours can come, and thereby shortens his way about three scoore Leagues, where hee must haue passed at the head of Loire, and frees himselfe from a passage full of wood and mountaines, where as the horsemen would haue beene but an incumbrance.

The Admirall could by no meanes fauour these succours (for hee had the Duke of Anious armie in front) and holding it as a matter impossible for the Reisires to get a passage vpon the riuer of Loire, hee attended hourelly newes of their route. E
But advertised of the successe: Behold (saied he) a good signe: let vs make it absolutely our diligence and resolution. So the Princes aduance towards the marches of Limosin, to keepe the Dukes army occupied, whilest that their Reisires marching through the Country performed the funeralls of the Duke of Deuxponts, who being lately deceased of an ague, left the command of the army to the Earle of Manfield, and in the ende of Iune both the Protestant armies ioynd, the which vnited together made about siue and twentie thousand fighting men: and in the Kings, they numbred about thre thousand.

The Country of Limosin is vnfrutefull, and the sterilitie of the soile forced the troupes to lie disperfed, the which might easily cause some surprise: but the Admi- F rall desired rather to preuent, then be preuented. The Dukes armie camped at Racheabeille. To surprise him, they march resolute to giue him battaile, and are in vewe of the enemy before he hath taken any alarum of them.

There

A Three hundred harquebusiers of Colonell Streffes kept the principall approach to this place, being strong both by situation and nature, and happy were they to be so a place of defence. At the first brunt Streffes releues them with nine hundred soldiers who the space of an houre held good against foure thousand of the Princes men, while the Dukes armie was put in battaile. This passage being vncasie to force, the Admirall sends forth foure Cornets of horle, which renew the charge: they breake vp certaine passages which couered Streffes regiments, kill two or twentie Canons, and siue or sixe hundred men vpon the place: take their Colonell (without whose resistance the Princes foreward had passed euen vnto the Canon without any lesse the rest to flight, and nothing but the raine that fell, hindered the successe of a B great victorie, the which was continued the next day by a skirmish against two hundred Lahans, and some horsemen of the Duke of Nemours, whereof Mouy slaine some, took others, and chased the rest being mounted vpon horses of aduantage fier for such a vtterate.

After this incounter, the Duke sent to refresh his troupes vntill the beginning of October, in the garrisons neere to Guyenne: giuing the Princes by this meanes, opportunity to seize vpon many places, both by force and composition: Tiniers, La Roche, Ramonne, Chateau Euefque, la Chapelle, Consolant, Chabannes, S. Genis and others.
Which the Duke rested, the Earle of Lude, gouernour of Poitou, promised to surrender but more in word, then in effects. He had siue thousand foote, and some Canons, C whereof he had foure ouerthrowne by la Noue, neere vnto Niort: the Princes absence encouraged him to bessege Niort: where Puissant entered in despite of the assaults: hee sustained three assaults and some scaladoes, forcing Lude after the losse of siue hundred men, to raise the siege.

In the meane time the Princes approached to Poitou, and at the first had taken Chbraud by composition, the 12. of Iuly, and the 21. following, Lusignan, Cour, S. Maj. d'Angoune, and other small places about Poitiers, to cut off victualls from the townes.
At the same time, the subjects of the Queene of Nauarre, had their part in the Ch-Touide, Gouernour of Quercy, had accepted the Commission, to summon the Ch-Queene, and the Prince her sonne, to leaue the party of the pretended reformed
D gone: if not to invade the Countries of Bearn, Foix, and Nauarre, so neere joined with Negrepelisse, Sainte Colombe and others, hee had easily reduced to the Kings obedience, and held Nauarin beleeged, the onely strong place that remained to the Queene.

The Princes send the Earle of Montgomery to incounter him, who with a small armie of siue hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, forced Terride to raise the siege, and to retire himselfe into Orthes. His men were disperfed, and to preuent him from gathering them together, the Earle pursues him, bessegeeth him, and in the last, and forceth the towne, makes a great slaughter: and to beate Terride with his owne armie, he sodainely plants the Canon he found in the towne against the Castle.
E Terride vanquished with these terrible stratagems, yeelds vpon composition, to returne with their liues and goods: Sainte Colombe, the Baron of Pardiac, Gohis, Ercis, and some other of the Queenes subjects, were excepted in the capitulation, and as guilty of treason, (hauing seized vpon her places, and stirred her subjects to rebellion) were put to death. This resolute repulie of Terride, and the execution of the above mentioned, did sodainely reduce all the other places to the Queenes obedience, and so Terride hauing managed the townes of his new conquests, came to Nersac, made there a with strong beaur garrisons, & so came to the Princes army. Let vs see the progress of their armie. la Charité que the Protestants meanes to annoy the prouinces about side Loire, & taking this place from thence, then the Duke of Aumale should reuerne by commoditie to refresh his armie. To this ende, he appoints Sinfac, who was yet more in commendations of such importance. Yet he gathers together out of the garrisons of Orleans, Bourges, Chartres, Neurs, Gien and other Townes, about 7000. men, and siue or sixe hundred horse, bessegeeth la Charité, being yet but weakly fortified, challengeth

1569. changeth and rechangeth his batterrie, ouerthrowes a great part of the wall, and find A to the assault, the which was so resolutely defended, that of a hundred of the assailers scarce five returne to the Campe: and vpon a false bruce, that the Princes came to re-courage it, the beseegers display their ensignes, and without any farther inquirie, recouer their garrisons, after a moneths sege, & the losse of about a hundred men. With in few dayes after, Blaslet, Boys, and others disbanded from the Campe to visit their families, fortifie the Towne, spoyle the Countrey, and by the taking of Douzy, Pouilly, Antrain, S. Leonard, and other small Townes, they made the way open to Berry, Ni- uernois, and the neighbour Countries.

Poitiers besieged.

The sege of Poitiers was lesse fatal, and of as small successe for the Protestants. B
The Admirall held opinion to force S. Maxent, then Saumur, and to fortifie it speedily, to haue a passage vpon the riuer of Loire neere vnto them, and to transport the war towards Paris in the time of harvest. Poitiers was then very well furnished: the Dukes of Guise and of Maine had put themselues into it: many Captaines, and companies both of horse and foot shewed a great resolution for the defence thereof, vnder the en-seigns of the two yong brethren: these great and spacious Townes being commonly the sepulchre of armes. Yet all these reasons were of no force. The Nobilitie thereabouts preferring profit before honour, vrged the contrary: That Poitiers was indeed strong of men, but weake of defence, and to be forced: that this place taken, would be the conquest of all Poitou, a rich Prouince, the which would disaioynt the Duke of Anjou of an assured retreat. But the hope of spoyle was an enticing bayte to drawe C the vnto it: for the more men are within it (saide the Nobilitie) the greater shal our bootie be. Yet the respect of their priuate profits made them forget the constant resolution of such as had vndertaken to gard it, the great meanes they had to defend themselues, and their small prouision of artillerie, munition, pioners, and other thing neces-sarie for the sege.

Chastellaine besieged.

In the end, pluralitie of voyces carries it. The Princes loose some weekes before Poitiers. The Towne is commaunded by hills, which annoyd them much: but their slow batterrie giues them time to fortifie the breach, and force the assaillants to make new attempts elsewhere, and with the like successe. Hungar oppressed the Citizens, hauing lost many Captaines, with a great number of souldiars: and the plague afflicted the Princes Campe: those within find a good meanes for their libertie: and the Princes an honest cause to dislodge. The Duke of Anjou vnderstanding the extre-mitie of the beseege, and that the Protestants armie began to dissolue, propounds two things to the commanders, either to free Poitiers, or to suffer a place of that importance to be lost, in the which were many of their confident friends. He beseege Chasteleau, and makes a breach: the French will haue the point: the Italians contend for it. In the end, the chance of the dice giues it them. They come brauely to the assault. the French disdain to follow them: and they within defend the breach. They ouerthrow the most resolute with a fierce vollee of shott, and force the rest to retire in confusion, leauing five ensignes vpon the breach, about two hundred and fiftie slaine, E and a great number wounded, whereof many died. This was the 7. of September.

They prepared for a second attempt, when as the Princes taking this second assault for a lawfull occasion, raise their sege, wherewith they were no lesse troubled to depart with their honour, then the beseege were prest with extreme necessitie. The Duke hauing no complete armie, and seeing his dessein succed, dislodgeth all night, retyres to Celle in Touraine, passeth Vienne and Creuse, lodgeth his troupes and artillerie in a place of aduantage, gathers together all his dispersed bands: and now the way is prepared for a second battaile, and a notable victorie.

The Princes being aduertised of this sodaine retreat, takes it for a kind of flight:
march all night after them, passe the riuers, put themselves in battaile, to force the Duke or to make him to retire to Tours, where the King then remainend. Both the armies are in battaile. but betwixt them is a small riuer, which makes the Countrey Moorish and very vnfit for a Generall fight, so as they could not ioyne their battalies,
and

And no meanes to bring the Caanon without hazard to loote it. The Duke who was lodged in Celle, a village well intrenched, flanked, and gabiond, covered on the one side by a riuer, & on the other with a wood, could not by any skirmishes be drawne to fight, vntill he had assembled all his forces.

The Princes, for want of victuals repasse Creuse and Vienne, lodge at Eze la Vineuse, and from thence (the Countrey being spoiled, and ill to lodge in) passe to Montcon- tour, a lodging of aduantage, both for the situation and commoditie of victuals. The Duke pursues him, and by his speede deceiues the enemies. His forward led by Brion meets them vnlooked for at Saint Cere, chargeth Mouy, who made the retreat with 300. horse and two hundred harguebuziers, kills about fiftie men at armes, and almost all of his footemen, so amazeth the Princes army, as they all begin to wauer, and had not a straight beene, where onely twenty men might march in fronte, the whole army had then beene in route. The Admirall makes hast to repaire this disorder, and by his presence renues their daunted courages. They charge and recharge twice or thrise at this passage, and not able to be forced, the two armies campe within shot of murther:
leauing it betwixt both. The Duke had eight or nine thousand horse, seauenteene or eighteene thousand foote, French, Suisses and Italians, and fiftene peeces of artillerie.
The Princes had six thousand horse, French and Reistres, ten thousand harguebuziers
French and Langquenets and eleauen peeces of Caanon.

Art vnto
for accid. m.

As these armies beheld one another, two gentlemen following the Dukes campe, present themselves to the first they meete of the protestant party. Aduertise the Ad- mirall (saide they) that he forbear to fight, for the succors newly arrived haue greatly for- tified our army: let him temporise a moneth onely: it is the time the Nobilitie hath giuen vnto
the Duke, with protestation to serue him for that time, but not afterwards. then shall hee bee forced to a peace, to your aduantage. Of two Councells those which hasten to their owne ruine do commonly followe the worst. They aduertise the Admirall hereof he apprehends it, and desires to followe it, so do the most modest, and that at nine of the Clocke at night they should take the way to Ernaux, putting the riuer that runnes there, betwixt the two armies. Others of a more boyling humour, inferre: That these nightly retreats terrifie them that make them, preiudice their reputations, augments the enemies courage, and that they must do it only at the pointe of day. Moreover, this might be a practise to amaze their troupes, and that coming from suspected persones, accused to deceiue, it was also suspected, and to be reiected.

This diuersity of opinions troubled the Admirall, but see what assisted him more nerey. The Reistres did mutine for want of pay, the Langquenets refused to march:
three or foure French regiments of the most remote Countries, had already asked leue to depart, many gentlemen were retired to their houses. And the Duke appro-ched. The Admirall then beseecheth the Princes that were at Parthenay to come to the amic, that by their presence they might conteyne them in obedience. They bring a hundred and fiftie good horse. But whilest the Admirall labors to pacifie the mutinie of the Germanes, two houres are spent, so as the troupes cannot re-couer a place of aduantage nere vnto Ernaux, where they could hardly haue charged them.

These broyles appeased, the armie takes the way to Ernaux the third of October, and discouers the Dukes which aduanced. They cause the Princes to retire, being yet too yong, (but vnder colour to conduct them with more assurance, many retire with them), and arange themselves in a vallee, being couered from the Caanon.
And vpon the approche of the Dukes forward, consisting of nineteene cornets of Reistres in two squadrons marching directly against the Admirall, the Admirall sends to Comte Lodewike who led the battaile, to send him three Cornets. The Earle obeyes, but hee leads them himselfe: who hath no sooner leste his place, but hee remaines engaged in the skirmish, the which continued three quarters of an houre: the Admirall was hurt in the face, his horsemen ouerthrowne, leaue the field.

Error of Comte Lodewike
in the

1569. The battaile makes a great resistance, but vnfurnished of a head, it is forced to yeeld to the greater number: part of the footemen are cut in peeces, and part dispersed here and there, the artillery lost, and the ensignes carried away: all flee, every man saues himself. Comte Lodowike retires with three thousand horse in one company, turning head still against them that pursued, & recouers Parthenay, the refuge of the remainders of this shipwracke.

Battle of Dismontour.

Four thousand Lanquenets died in this battaile, fiteene hundred French soldiars, about three hundred men at armes, many horses, seruants and Lackeys of men of marke, Pugressier, Biron brother to him that led the foreward, and Saint Bonel Cornet of the Admirals company. La Nouë was prisoner againe with Acier and others the Reistres baggage was spoiled, that of the French being more aduanced towards Niort and Parthenay, was saued. The Duke lost fewe foote, but five or sixe hundred horse, & twice as many hurt, wherof the most part died, as the eldest Reingraue, the Marquis of Bade, Clermont of Dauphiné, and fewe others of quality.

Notable Errors.

Seldome doe we reape the fruits of an absolute victory. The Protestants footemen were dispersed: and their horsemen (for the most part Reistres) were discontent for want of pay, and losse of their baggage. A hot pursute had in shewe produced one of these two effects, eyther their defeate, or their retreat into Germanie: two monethes pay had drawne them vnto it. To leaue the remainder of these forces at the Commanders deuotion, was to giue the Admirall meanes (being a wife Commander in the warre,) to gather together the remnant of this shipwracke, to repaire his broken vessel, and in the spring to go to field with newe troupes, to spoile diuerse Prouinces, and in the ende to bring the warre to the gates of Paris. Moreover these daunted spirits would be soone reuiued by the presence of their Princes, whereas vpon this fresh defeate they might shut them into some place whereby the warre should be soone ended.

Victories after the battaile

Thus discoursed the most iudicious: but others finding the recouery of those places easie in this amazement, which the Princes held in Poitou, Xanterege, and Argoulmis, the Duke follows their resolution, and for the first fruits of his conquest marcheth to Parthenay: but there he finds nothing but the neast, the place emptie, and the gates open. The Princes vpon the first brunt had recouered Niort, and so to Saint Iean d'Angely. The Baron of Mirebeau kept Lusignan, a place sufficient to winne much reputation, yea for a Captaine of no great valour: yet the parles of yong Lansac prevailed more with the Baron, then five thousand Cannon shot which the Dukes of Martiques and Aumale spent against Piles, as we shall here after see. Niort being summoned, began to wauer, and Mony who had the gard of it (being gone forth against some scouts that were approached to the gates, and trayterously shot with a pistoll by Mareucl a gentleman of Brie, who had newly put himselfe vnder his Cornet, and shall within fewe yeares make himselfe famous by an act equall to the first in trechery, and detestable villany) retyring himselfe by the aduice of the Princes to Rochell, where soone after he died of his wound, the Towne being abandoned returned into the Dukes power without any difficulty. Puuiault, also leauing Fontenay, the garisons of Chasteleraud, Chauigny, Rochepele, the Castle of Angely, Prutilly, Cleruant and other small places, dislodged in company, and vnder the conduct of Briquevault came to make head in Sancerre and la Charité, being set vpon in their way, by the Commons of Berry and la Chastre gouernour of the Country.

Soldiers taken by the Protestants.

Mombin, Mirabel, Verbelay, and some six or seauen hundred horse of Dauphiné, Guaretz, Auvergne and Languedoc recouer their houses, vnder colour to prouide for some places of importance in their marches, and to make the way easie, which the Princes pretended to followe, for to winter in Limagne of Auvergne, if they had not altered their desseine. We shall see shortly what course they tooke after their defeate. Nismes returns into the Protestants power. An aduenturous soldiard, did with a secrete file, in fundrie nights, file asunder a grate of iron, which stopt vp a hoale at the foote of the Towne wall, by the which did flowe a fountaine for the benefit of the inhabitants. The passage

A passage being made, Saint Cosme, Chastilly, Mingelle & other Captaines enter, they cut in peeces a corps de garde, towards the Carmes gate, force an other nere to that of the Crowne, open the gates, bring in their men that remayned without the Towne, and become masters thereof, to the preiudice of Saint Andé, being gouernour, who having no leyfure to slip into the Castell, brake his necke leaping ouer the wall, and his Lieutenant his thigh. Astout Captaine of the Castell kept it almost three monethes against the townesin the ende being vnfurnished of men, some lost by fundrie accidents, some dead or languishing of sicknesse, and a good number oppressed vnder a mine, he yeelded, to depart with bagge and baggage.

On the other side Sanjac, by vertue of a Comission granted him frō the Duke, to take from the Protestants whatsoeuer they held on that side of Loire, had taken Louza a place abandoned, then Noiers by composition, the which was ill obserued: most part of the soldiars were led to Troyes in Champagne, and about threescore, passing through the streetes were abandoned to the peoples rage. But Vezelay is seated too high vpon the toppe of a stepe montaine, hauing but one approach. Tarot and some other gentlemen, Protestants his neighbours had lately seized thereon, and Blosset, Sarasin, Besançon and Ribompierre Captaines defended it. Sanjac makes his approches with three companies: but at the first the Captaines cut off two companies, kill the captaines and fortie soldiars, the third being scattered in the vinyards retire in the night. He returnes with greater forces, makes his batterie, opens two breaches, giues an assault and scalado, but in vaine: he loofeth about three hundred men: and the beseege lost Sarasin with some thirtie soldiars: Sanjac doth change and rechange his battery, hee tries an other assault, & as (at the first) he is shamefully repulsd with losse, but not discouraged. Some of his confident friends within the Towne giue him aduice, that most of the gentlemen are gone to field: he returnes with newe artillery, (his owne being broken or crackt) newe munition, and newe forces. Twelue Cannons begin a long and furious battery, takes away the defences, inlarge the first breaches, and makes the rampars euen with the ground. They giue a generall assault, but the sege of la Charité, made the assaillants attempts cōtemptible to the beseege: the more earnest he is, the more obstinate they growe. Three thousand Cannon shot doth nothing abate their courage: contrariwise fiteene hundred soldiars of the assaillants being slaine, inflame the Vezelois, they kill the brauest of them vpon the rampars, at the breach and in the trench. Then Sanjac forced to retire, is contented to blocke them vp in the end of the yeare. Briquevault and Guerehy gouernour of la Charité, do afterwards releue them with some refreshings.

Vezelay be-seeged: it was shut out for Sanjac.

Ciuitil warres are but a perpetuall ebbing and flowing of losses and conquests. Poitiers had been the Theater whereon the Princes had to their ruine played the first act of their tragedie, and now Saint Iean d'Angely must end the victories of the Duke of Anjou. The Duke putt vp with the happie successe of his victories, comes the 16. of October to beseege Saint Iean: but he finds not so easie approaches as at the rest. Pyles commanded therein, who by fallies & diuers skirmishes, shewes that they must come well armed. At the first assault hee kills many of their Captaines, and of their best soldiars. Montesquieu (he that grew so famous by the murder of the Prince of Condé) died there, but too honorable for him.

In the end Biron generall of the artillery, (seeing the resolution of the beseege,) did mediate a truce, at the end whereof Piles should yeeld the Towne, if within a certain time succors came not, or an answer from the Princes. The day comes, when as Saint Seuerin leading fortie horse, doth polittikly deceiue both sentinels and gardes, and vnder the name of a friend, slippes into the Towne. So the hostages deliuered on both sides, they begin againe to play and batter with their Cannon, and the Townesmen to carrie earth, make rampars, and to shoote with such a greate and mightie furie, as Sebastian of Luxembourg, Duke of Martiques and gouernour of Brittaine found this Towne fatali to lodge him in the monument of his Ancesters.

Saint Iean
d'Angely be-seeged.

During

1569.

During this batterie, the Queene would honour the seege with the presence of the King her sonne, being then nineteene yeares of age. But this bred a jealousie betwixt the two brethren. Charles was quicke, vehement, and somewhat forward; Henry more tractable and curteous: and Charles euen then perswaded himselfe that his mother would make him receiue a disgrace at Saint Iean d' Angely, to fauour the Duke her yonger sonne, whose aduancement she made shewe to desire. The succeeding yeares will teach vs, that this impressiion made Charles to loue his brother best being farther off in the North, then by his presence to enioye the Mothers affections, & to haue authority within the realme.

Saint Iean
yeeded.

Finally, the second of December, after two monethes seege, the King signed their capitulation: That they should depart with their goods, armes, horses and Enseignes displayed, and of foure monethes should carrie no armes for the pretended reformed religion. But as this seege is famous for that it was valiantly followed and defended, so is likewise famous by the breach of faith giuen by his Maiestie. At their going forth, they spoile them of their armes, apparell and money: the Duke of Aumale, and the Marshall of Uelleuille are notable to make good the Kings promise: nay, the Duke of Anjou, his presence can not restrayne their intolencies.

The composition.

They robbe their baggage, they take away their horses, they spoile their men. And to encrease their villanies, the regiment of Sarricn being lodged at Saint Iehan hate a League off, comes ouerthwart, beats, kills, murders and casts them into the river: and happy is he that can escape in his shirt to recouer Angoulesme, where Piles and some others holding them selues (by reason of this treacherous and vnworthie vslage contrarie to the Lawe of armes) freed from the conditions wherevnto they were bound by the capitulation, went to the Princes, to vnderstand their pleasures. The historie obserues aboue ten thousand men of warre lost before Saint Iean, fise thousand Cannon shot spent, fise and twentie or thirtie Commissaries of the artillerie slaine in their charge, many shronke away, and in the end the Campe was diminished eightene or twenty thousand men.

The army tired with labour, and prest with want of victualls, and other discommodities, dislodging from Saint Iean d' Angely, gaue the Princes leysure to determine of their voyage, and the King retyring to Angers, assigned the Princes deputies ther, to begin the yeare following by the continuance of a treatie of peace begun in the moneth of Nouember.

A treatie of Peace

1570.

Beauuais la Noelle and Teligny come thether in February, and returne with another answer to the Protestants, but a libertie to liue within the Realme free from search in their houses, and for their safetie two Townes which Biron should haue vnto them, in the which they might do what pleased them, without their impugning the Kings authoritie, nor the quiet of the Realme: his Maiestie offering to restore them to their charges, except such as had bene dismissed by the order of Iustice, and the money (growing by the sale thereof,) received by the Kings commandement: but forbidding all exercise of religion, but the Catholike Apostolike and Romish: banishing all ministers out of the Realme, and requiring them to disarme, to send backe presently their forraigne forces, and to yeelde vnto Townes possessed by the violence and force of armes. In the meane time postes flie into England and Germanie, and to diuert or staie the succours and strengths which the Protestants might expect from thence, the brute flies, that a peace is made in France.

Enterprise
vpon Bourges
faill to the vndertakers.

The Princes and Admirall, thinking they were but deuises to hinder their affaires, euery one prepares againe to put on harness: their forces were dispersed into diuers Prouinces: those about Bourges had an enterprise vpon the Towne, by the practise of a souldiar, who by treacherie makes them to loose thirtie men at the entrie, and as many prisoners. So hee that thinkes to take is often taken himselfe.

The reduction of Poitou, had likewise brought Marans and the Castell of Beauuais vpon 1570.

At the sea to the Kings obedience. Angoulesme and Rochel only remained to the Protestants. They had lost Lusignan: but Blaye, Taillebourg, the Isles of Xaintonge, Marannes and Brouage, were yet at their deuotion. To trie Rochelle, the King threatens them by his letters, and by promises he seeks to winne the Gouernours of Flaye and Taillebourg, Pardailan and Romégou. They answer (saith the Historie) the King wisely, and Lansac courageously: You cannot be more greued (saith Pardillan) to attempt to force mee in this place then I shall be, for the shame, losse, and confusion, which I shall cause you to receiue, or another that shall attempt it. Romégou speaks in the same sence. The effect was more to be feared then words: yet Lansac attempted nothing against them. The Islands had much annoyed the seege of S. Iean d' Ang. ly, and the Lansqueniers escaped from Montboulour, were dispersed there. The Earle of Lude, Puigaillard, and la Riviere Puitaillé, gouernours, the one of Angers, the other of Marans, with eight Corners of horse, and twentie enseignes of foote, force the said Islands, and make such a slaughter, as there remained not aboue three hundred fighting men.

La Noue the Princes Lieutenant in Guienne, studied to recouer Brouage, a place of great importance for the Rochelois, when as the Baron of la Garde attempting vpon Tonne-Charente, made both their enterprises to proue vaine. Rochelle is now blockt in on all sides. Lude and Puigaillard had an armie in Poitou: la Riviere Puitaillé the elder held Marans and other places thereabouts: the yonger commanded in Brouage. Landerneau Viceadmirall held Olone. The Brittons and Bourdalois cut off the Rochelois victualls by sea. La Garde then Generall of their galleyes, did runne often times, euen into their hauen: but to presse them on all sides, hee would gladly haue bene maister of Tonne-Charente. La Noue had vnderaken the defence thereof, who vnderstanding the Barons practise, so planted his shot, as at his enemies first landing, he slue their commanders, and many others, gaue libertie to the slaues, and became maister of the galley: and if heate had not too soone transported them, the rest comming to enter into Charente, and resolute to land, they could not haue escaped death or prison. This galley did afterwards serue Romégou to beate the Catholikes in many places. And if La Garde preuailed nothing by force, his pollicies were of as small effect. So as he lost his time, men, and money, and did nothing of moment.

Contrariwise, the defeat of some troupes at Nouaille by the hargubuziers of la Noue, vnder the leading of Scipio an Italian Ingener, and the recouerie of Marans by la Noue, vpon Chaparon Gouernour of the place, after the death of the elder Puitaillé lately deceased, was the cause of the winning of tenne or twelue other places thereabouts, and gaue the Rochelois meanes to enlarge themselves. The spoile of Olone did enrich them, furnished them with fortie good vessels, with some armes and Canon, and a good number of prisoners, and diminished their enemies strength of about foure hundred fighting men. This reuiuing caused Puigaillard and Fernacques to make enterprises vpon Langon and Gué of Nelugre, and by the recouery of Luson to molest Marans and Rochel againe, if that la Noue had not speedily taken this Fort from them that came to seize on it, and slue Sforce a valiant Gentleman, the head of a company of Italians, who were come to charge him behind in his retreat.

The tower of Morie, the Castle of la Graue, Talmonde, and the Castle of Chife, being taken againe by Puigaillard, recompenced the losse of Luson: and the conquests of Puigaillard, were at the same time crost by Puinaut Gouernour of Marans by the death of Captaine Dante, who scoured all Poitou, by the route of their companie: and wounding in a manner, of all the members thereof, and by the ouerthrow of Chaumont and Goulenes, issued out off Angoulesme with two Corners of horse: by the death also of Guiniere Gouernour of Saint Iean d' Angely: by the ouerthrowe of young Riviere Puitaillé, the route of his men, and the losse of two Enseignes.

But the death of Captaine Herbelete, commanding a company of French, and two of Italians,

1570. Italians, and the defeat of his troupes by Coignes issued out of Angoulême; this then A held for the Princes, made the mid-may famous, a season when as the second peace of peace was renewed.

The Protestants fortified.

Time brings many changes, now it favours the Protestants, revives their courage, fortifies their hopes, and the Catholics are new to beginne the King was weary of this variable continuance of warre, it drew his subjects from his obedience, ruined his Provinces, wasted his treasure, and consumed his forces. The Queen Mother, since the battell of Meaux, did still nourish in her breast a fire of revenge. She was wonderfully discontented, that the Protestants in the beginning of the first troubles had so violently opposed against her desire to rule, by the mutuall ruine of one and the other. But there was paine and perill to suppress the heads of the Protestants: many murderers and many poisoners, offered themselves, but the most part drew backe when it came to the effect. Moreover the Princes grew in rage and indgement, they framed themselves to affaires, they began to knowe the friends and enemies of the Common-weale.

And on the other side many Noblemen of eyther partie, labored to temper the humors, both of such as were best affected to the publike quiet, and others in during these incivill confusions, made a way for their ambitious desires, which at Iron and Teligny chiefe deputies, the one for the King, the other for the Princes, labour about a peace. Let vs see what course the Princes tooke since the battell of Montcontour until the peace. A small ball of snowe rowled from a high mountain, grows great in a short time, and becomes able to endure a great force. So the Councell whereby the Princes resolved to retire farre from the Conquerors army, did much awaye them. for they assured their men, fortified themselves with new troupes, and consumed their enemies, in the taking and retaking of places which they had possessed.

The Princes voyage after the battell.

But still the poore people suffer for great mens follies. Agnois and Quers, serves now as a good retreat for the Protestants. They find there a far & a fruitfull Country, where by the spoile of the contrarie party, they refresh their persons, and make newe bodie. There is nothing but inroads, spoiles and robbings of the enemy but there was violent warre about Tholouse, and horrible fires in their houses which belonged to the Court of Parliament. They have Leone (saied the Protestants) re-violent to burne them of our religion, beheaded Captaine Rapin, who carried from the Edict of peace from the King, and to commit many other insolencies, whereof opportunitie nowe cries for vengeance. Doubtlesse the iustice of God doth sometime send a wished encounter to be revenged of an indignitie received. The Marshall of Daxville, la Valette, and some other Commanders of qualitie, made some battles with diuers variable euent, but not stryng farre from their walles for feare of surpris.

Carmain, Oriae, la Faye, Lesbos, Montestruc, and generally all they beseege (except Saint Felix, from whence the Gascions were repulled in the assault, with the losse of five men, and the Vicomte of Montclar hurt whereof he died at Chastres) is forced, and the garrisons cut in peeces. During the armies aboade in Albigois, the Princes (notwithstanding the crosses of Escars, Pompadour, la Vanguion and others commanding three thousand men) being fortified with five or six hundred horse, brought from Rochelle by Beaudin and Renty, send Piles into the Countie of Roussillon, where he did spoile and greatly annoy the Spaniard, whilst the Kings deputies conferred nere vnto Carcassonne, with Teligny, Beauvais and la Chassetière, who going afterwards to his maiestie, considered what we shall see in briefe.

Languedoc, Vivarox and Daulphiné, having fortified the army with about three thousand harguebuzies, most of them mounted at the Countie mens charge, in steede of those which Moubrun had (through fauour of the fort which hee built vpon Ryze right against Pajin) led away to refresh themselves in their Countie: having surmounted

A surmounted the difficulties of the mountaines: and the Admirall being freed from a grievous sicknes, which had brought him to death's dore, at S. Effienne la Forest, the army comes into Bourgongne, where being fortified with fiftene hundred light horse, come from la Charité and the neighbour garrisons, vnder the command of Brique-mault, they encounter a good occasion to aduance the peace.

It seemed to the Protestants a matter of some difficulty, to obtaine a peace, vnlesse they approached nere vnto Paris: and to that ende, the Admirall had suffered almost all his footemen to furnish themselves with horses, and aduanced by great iourneys into the heart of France, whilst his troupes were fresh and lusty, and free from diseases. But he had before him, the Marshall of Cosse, the Kings Lieutenant in the absence of the Duke of Antou: who, to hinder the Princes approach to Paris, seeks means to fight with them. They incamped at Renéle Duke, a place not very strong of situation, from whence they thought to dislodge them with their Canon, whereof the Princes were vnfurnished, and by diuers volleys of shot, to make them leaue certaine passages which they held. The Marshall, la Valette, Strossy, and la Chastre, come with all speede, charge and recharge them, and at the first, they force them from a passage. Brique-mault Marshall of the Campe, Montgomery and Ienlis, endure the shooke, they kill, hunt & take many: and by this firme resolution, make it knowne, that their lodgings are not to be forced.

So the Marshall sounds a retreat, and the Princes to whom all stay was preiudicial, being strengthened with newe companies drawne out off Sancerre, la Charité, Antrath, Vezelai, and other places of their partie, and furnished with some artillery: they turned head towards Paris. But a truce of ten dayes, stayed all exploits of war, betwixt them, and the Marshall. While the Barron of la Garde, Puissillard & Rimiere Puitaille, chiefe enemies to the Protestants, laboured to become Masters in Guyenne, & the neighbour country. To that ende, after they had overcome the troupes of horse and foote, led by la Noue, Soubize, and Puissault, and by a shamefull chase shut their companies into Rochelle, they recouer all the forts and places which had bene taken from them since the surpris of Marans. And the more to restraine the Rochelois, they build a fort at Lusson, vnder the command of Captaine Mascaron. They hoped this fort should be a bait to drawe the Protestants to field, but having built it without contradiction, Puissillard tries another stratageme. He retires his forces into high Poitou, giues out, That the Princes had gotten a great victory, and that he must by the Dukes commandement, leade away his troupes with all speed: That by a strong ambush and turning head suddenly, he might charge the Protestants, & defeat them at their first approach. Notwithstanding, la Noue & his companions keepe themselves quiet, giuing their troupes (amazed by their last fight) time to take breath, the which causeth Mascaron to slacke the gard of his fort.

la Noue being aduertised, that the fort was to be forced, goes out off Rochelle with foure Corners, eleuen Enseignes of French, and three hundred Lansquenets, which remained: Puissillard gathers together speedily what troupes hee can, which now began to leaue him: and to shut vp la Noue betwixt Marans and Lusson: makes them to march two dayes & a night to S. Gemme, halfe a league from Lusson, but with one light repulse. Here his second policie of war preuailes as little as the first. He saynes himselfe sicke, & giues out, that a burning ague detained him in his bed: then vnder colour of the deliuey of Roussiere a gentleman of Poitou, & others whom Puissault had lately taken in an encounter: he sends a trumpet to assure them of this pretended sicknes, & to discover the strength of the beseegers.

But this spie was not cunning inough: he trips in his answers, and by his faintnesse discovers his maisters practises. Puissault extorts the truth by force: then shewing them, that they had to do with men that were toyled & broken with their great march, they dislodge from S. Gemme to ioyne with la Noue. Puissillard is aduertised that the enemy flies, and retires in disorder to Marans. He approacheth, enters the Bourg, and finding nothing but the nest, some run to the victuals, others to the spoyle. But they

haue

1570. haue a contrary aduice. That the enemy is neere and in bataille. La Noue had aduised A his men by the fauour of the ditches, hedges, and bushes, which compassed in the Villes of that Country, where as Puigaillards horse could not passe but by small companies. La Noue commanded the charge. S. Etienne and Bruneleire begin it, against a hundred and fifty maisters, of the chiefe troupes of Puigaillard, and makes them to stagger. Puigaillards forth through them, kills some, and amazeth the rest. Puigaillard and made that were best mounted, flye vnto Fontenay, foure leagues from thence: the footmen hemmed in on all sides, and broken by the hoise, presently giue way, and remaine at their mercy, without mercy, namely of the Lanquenets, who reuenge vpon them the blood of their countrymen, shed neere to Montcontour: Sixteene Enseignes, and two Cornets were taken, five hundred old souldiars slaine vpon the place, and thirty men at armes, with many Commanders and Officers of Regiments and Companies. Seven or eight hundred prisoners were sent away with white wands in their hands. The Fort being valiantly assailed, and yeilded by Mascaron, added foure companies to the victory, and this victory caused the conquest of Fontenay la Comte, from whence the besieged retired to Niort: La Noue hauing lost his left arme in the siege, Oleron, Mareennes, Soubize and Brouage, yeilded to the victors, where as the death of Riniere, Puitailé, recompensed *La Noue*s hurt. So as by the recouery of all that which the King held about Rockell, the Protestants coopt vp the Catholikes within the walles of Saint Jean d'Angely. The Prince Daulphin came into Poitou, to repaye Puigaillards losses, and to strengthen the forces of the Earle of Lude, for the making C of some new attempt, when as a peace concluded betwixt the King and the Princes, stayed the course of theyr triumphes, the eleuenth of August, and caused a suspension of armes, to renew it againe two yeares after, with a more vnworthy and horrible proceeding.

By this third Edict of peace, they had foure Townes of safety, Rochelle, Montauban, Cognac and La Charité, to be held two yeares in the Princes names, and the Princes, with the chiefe Commanders of the Protestants, attending the full execution thereof, retired to Rochelle: the armies were dismissed, and the strangers conducted into Lorraine. Soone after, the Emperour Maximilian the second, gaue his eldest daughter in marriage to Philip King of Spain, (so the Vncle married his Niece, D and the house of Austria hath oft times obteyned such dispensation) and so our Charles in the Towne of Metz in the end of Nouember, tooke to wife Elizabeth the younger sister, a wise and vertuous Princeesse.

There was a peace concluded, but no full obseruation of the Edict: wherevpon the princes sent Briquemault, Teligny, Beauuais, la Nole and Cauannes to Court. The King at their instance, sent commissioners throughout all the prouinces of his realme. But there were some amongst them, who (not many yeares before) had condemned the Admirall to be hanged. Amongst others, the Marshall of Coffé, and Prouitiere master of Requests, were at Rochelle, to consult with the Queene of Nauarre: and the Admirall about the meanes in generall, to mainteine the realme in peace: & particularly E to treat of a marriage betwixt Henry of Bourbon Prince of Nauarre, and Marguerite of Flois the Kings sister, and then to conferre with the Admirall touching the warre in which his Maiestie seemed to pretend against the Spaniard in the Lowe countries, to the protection whereof, he was greatly sollicitud.

The Kings good countenance, and the gifts hee gaue to the Deputies (namely to Teligny, who seemed to be greatly in his Maiesties fauour) (& likewise might do much to perswade him) is rather in Lawe to come to Court, makes them at their returne to Rochelle, to extoll the Kings singular loue and affection to the Queene of Nauarre, the Princes, the Admirall, and to all the rest of their party, and to assure them by his commandement, that he will not onely mainteine the peace, but also confirme it by the alliance of his owne sister; and that he desires to conferre by mouth with the Admirall, touching this new expedition of the Lowe countries, and therefore they should make haste to go vnto him.

And

A And the better to confirme them in this beleefe, the King sends Biron after them with the same charge, and that hee would procure the Queene his mother and the Duke of Angion his brother, to moderate their spleens and discontents, and would worke a reconciliation betwixt the Duke of Guise and the Admirall.

This apparent meanes to confirme a publike concord did please the Admirall, beleieving this marriage should be the ground of a most happie peace, and the Queene of Nauarre feared least delay should alter the Kings good meaning. But the accomplishment of the marriage was hindered by some letts: The Pope made some difficulty to dispence therewith, as well by reason of the consanguinity of the parties, (the one being petie Nephewe, the other grand-child of Francis the 1. King of France) as also, for the difference of their religions. The Queene of Nauarre likewise made some scruple of this disparity of religion, of the ceremonies, and of the place of the solemnizing. She would not haue the marriage celebrated after the manner of the Catholike Church, and feared the City of Paris, as most affected to their religion, and of long time an enemy to the house of Nauarre.

Contrariwise, the King would haue Paris to be the Theater, where this notable act should be solemnly celebrated in the vewe of the Capitall Cittie of his Realme, without changing any thing in forme of royall marriages. In the end the respect of ciuill reason preuayled. As for the motives of this warre pretended in the Lowe Country: (they were goodly in shew), for besides this hereditarie hatred of the French against the Spaniard, being reuiued by the outrages and warres made in France by Charles and Philip his sonne, the remembrance whereof was yet fresh, they renewed the ancient quarrells of many possessions in the Lowe Countries, depending of this Crowne. Moreover they pretended newe causes, which seemed lawfull to breake the alliance betwixt the two Kings. That his Maiestie had most certaine intelligence of poyson giuen by Philip to his wife, the Sister of our Charles, vpon some discontents and sildie jealousies.

These reasons had a shewe of truth, and the Admirall to the end the French, (who cannot liue long together in mutuall concord, and that by a long vse of warre breathed nothing but warre) should not seeke some newe seeds of ciuill diuision, held it D good to diuert this vehement heate against some stranger and nation a farre off. Many necessarie considerations fortified this ciuill Councell. The forces of the Prince of Orange, and his bretheren, who spoiled by the Spaniard of many rich possessions both in the Lowe Countries, and in the Countrie of Bourgogne, had long time sought to recover it by armes. The credit and fauour of the Lowe Countrie men in Germany, by reaso of the exceeding crueltie of the Duke of Alba, Lodowike of Nassau, brother to the sayd Prince, a man of great courage and resolution, prest it forward, and his presence was a spurre to the Admirall. Moreover, to the end it should seeme this warre was managed with the Kings consent, his Maiestie did suffer the Prince of Auranges fleet to ride about Rochelle, annoying the Spaniards and Portugalls, which E failed vpon that coast for the trafficke of the Lowe Countries: and for the Comte Lodowike, to sell the bootie hee had taken from the enemy freely and pubbkely at Rochell.

So the Admirall, a wydower by reason of Charlotte of Laual deceased in the second troubles, after he had espoused the Coutesse of Antremont in Sauoye at Rochelle, and giuen his daughter Louyse to the Lord of Teligny to wife, he comes to Court, relying vpon the Kings assurances, so often confirmed by messengers: and especially by the Marshall of Coffé, whome the King had sent to accompanie him, presuming the Admirall would giue more credit to the Marshalls words, by reason of their familiarity.

F The King receiued him with all demonstrations of loue (those of Guise leaue him the place, not to yeeld any thing vnto him, but to returne soone after with greater authoritie) and to take from him all jealousies & distrusts which were giuen him from al parts: the King at the first doth recopence the losses which the Admirall had sustained

during

1571. The Kings distimulation with the Princes and Admirall.

Pretexts for the Lowe Countie warres.

The Admirall comes to Court.

1571. during the former warres, by the gift of a hundred thousand frankes, and grants A him for one whole yeare, the reuenues which his brother the Cardinall of Chastillon enioyed (being lately deceased in England). He giues him a place in the priuy Councell, doth ofte times conferre with him touching the warres of Flanders, and makes shew to be gouerned therein by his aduice and Councell: he honours him with that plausible name of father, and treats with him so familiarly, as the Countries tooke this familiarity for a seale of his Masters affection to the Admirall, and the people began nowe to murmure, that Charles not onely fauored the Huguenots, but would shortly himselfe become a Huguenot. A Cunning bayte to free the Admirall from suspicion by the aduertisements which had beene giuen him to the Contrary. Hee could nowe tast no admonitions, his spirit was so transported with the Kings Countenance and words.

Doubtlesse the wisdom of man failes euen in the wisest, when it pleaseth him that giues it, to weaken the strongest spirits, and (by a iudgement incomprehensible to man) to cast a vayle before his eyes, and to make him vnable to conceiue the iustice and horror of the iudgement which hee meanes to display. For the better aduancing the enterprise of the Lowe Countries, the Admirall thought it fit the King should make a peace with Elizabeth Queene of England. They might treat with a very honest colour, to the preiudice of the Spaniards. Elizabeth was not married, and Henry Duke of Aniow had no wife, the dignitie of so high an alliance was honorable for the Duke, and the qualitie of a Kings Brother was not to bee contemned by the Queene: hauing also in his yong age purchased great glorie and reputation.

Peace with the English.

This charge is giuen to the Marshall of Montmorency. But the issue did shewe, that besides this negotiation of peace, their meaning was to abuse both the Admirall and all others whome it was expedient to abuse for the execution of the Councell of Saint Cloud, and by the same practise to send the Marshall farre from Court, least by his ordinary conuersing with the King, hauing a good iudgement, and smelling out the complots of this pitifull Tragedie, hee should discouer them to the Admirall his Cousin: and by meanes of this newe peace, the English in the midst of this indignity, should bee restrained from attempting of any thing in fauour of the Protestants, as it chanced. During this time the Admirall retires to Chastillon: and in the meane season they prepare a fleet at Bordeaux and Brouage, vnder the Commande of Stroff, Landereau and the Baron of la Garde. The pretext was the warre of Flanders, yet had they expresse Commission to attempt vpon Rochell, and by open or secret practises to get it in their owne powre.

The Queene of Navarre comes to Court.

The Admirall hauing founded the fount, vpon his assurance to the Queene of Navarre of the Kings singular affection to her and to all her house, in the ende she goes to Blois, where as the Court remayned. Here vpon falls out an accident, which made the aduancement of the sayd marriage more easie: The death of Pope Pius the 5. Gregorie the 13. succeeded him, where vpon the King sent the Cardinall of Lorraine to Rome, to assist at the new election, and to procure of his successor a necessary dispensance, for the accomplishing of the solemnity.

Letters intercepted.

Some letters of the Cardinall of Pelue (sometimes a scullen in the College of Montaigne, and then seruanto to the Cardinall of Lorraine during his studie, and afterwards growne to be a Cardinall) written vnto his maister, beeing intercepted by the way, conveying among other things: That the Court of Rome did wonder greatly at the familiarity the King vsed to the Admirall, during his abode neare his Maestie: that it was fit to use such policie, attending the execution of the priuie Councell, the which discovered sufficiently that which was generally spoken of throughout all France.

This had beene concluded at Saint Cloud neere vnto Paris, amongst fewe persons, but it was common in many mens mouthes: and Lignerolles, gouernour of Bourbonois, one of the Duke of *Aniow*s mignons, for that hee had blabbed out something which hee had learned in secret of his master, hee did expiate the rashnesse of his

licentious

A licentious tongue, with the price of his blood. But wee shall see in our daies a more strange effect of Gods iustice, for that the last of our Kings of the race of Valois, shall end his life miserably in the same chamber where the fatall Councell had beene held in his presence.

Neither could the aduice of Peine, nor any other, stay the Admirall from coming to Paris as soone as the King: being solicited by his Maestie, by many and iudicious letters, to conclude fully of the marriage (besides they treated the marriage of the Prince of Conde with the Marquise of Lisle, the yongest daughter of the house of Nauarre and of the voyage of Flanders. The Queene of Navarre, to whome this long delay was very troublesome, prepared all things necessary for so famous an act, but shee falls sicke of a quotidian feuer, the fourth of Iune, eightene dayes after her arrival, and dies the fift day after her sickness, growing (saide the Physicians) of an extraordinary hardnes of the lungs, with a great impostume, augmented by the great heat of the season, and her continuall trauell in the time of her health. A Princess of a notable courage, inuincible in aduersitie, of a ready wit, iudicious, absolute in her actions, capable of Councell, comprehending things with a great viuacity of spirit, and deliuering her mind with an admirable grace, either by word or by writing: of a beautilfull complexion, and very pleasant in conuersation. But happie chiefly in this, that shee hath left to vs a lawfull heire for to inherite this Crowne, to redeeme it out off the hands of the stranger, and to preferre it with happinesse and C prosperitie.

The Admirall comes to Paris.

The death of the Queene of Navarre.

Her vertues;

Many are amazed at this sodaine death, as an assured foretelling of some future mischiefe. The King, the Queene mother, and all the Kings house shew a wonderfull sorrow: and to take away ail suspicion of poyson, Charles commaunds the bodie to be opened, and to search the causes of her death. The Physicians report, there is no shew of poyson, but her braine was not opened. Some hold opinion, that an Italian, the Kings perfumer, presented her with a paire of gloues, which prevented her from beholding of that pitifull and bloodie Tragedie, which shall bee shortly acted. The continuall messages sent from Charles, had likewise drawen the Princes to Court: and this death did seeme to aduance the marriage, for shee gaue vnto her sonne the kingdom of Navarre, and now hee began to enioy the title of King, and all his mothers succession. The Popes dispensation was necessary, without the which the Cardinall of Bourbon vnckle to Henry, who was appointed to marrie them, refused to proceed therein. In the end it comes, and the day of the consummation is appointed to bee kept the eighteenth day of August.

Suspected to be poysoned.

Such were the actions of the Court, whilest that Count Lodowike, la Noue, Saucourt and Tenlis, to whome the King had giuen cheefe Commissions for the Belgic warre, had by the taking of Monts in Hainault, drawne all the Duke of Albaes forces against them. Flussegue had slaine their Gouernour, with the most part of the Spanish garrison, and repulsed thote the Duke had sent to recover the Towne. Many other Townes of the low Countries followed the like example. Holland and Fland insisted for their libertie. Beginnings which seemed to draw after them a long continuance of great consequence: and the authoritie the King gaue to the aboue named to provide for the succour of Monts, and for the continuing of other like exploits, induced the Admirall to beleuee firmly, that the King embraced this businesse without dissimbling. According to this authority, Tenlis led five hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, whereof the Duke of Alba being aduertised, he surprised him sodainely, defeated his troups, tooke him prisoner with many others, and slue many of his men.

Beginning of the warres in Flanders.

Tenlis defeated

The King seemed displeased with these newes, hee sends to Monduet his Ambassador in the low Countries, to procure the libertie of the prisoners, and suffers the Admirall to send such succours as hee could, to ioyne with the armie of Meanes to reuine the Admirall.

1572. of Resfres which the Prince of Orange had leuied: he caused money to be made, eadie for the entertainment of the foote, which they esteemed foure regiments, and little companies of men at armes. The Ambassadour of Spain was gone out of France. The Queene Mother likewise playing her part, seemed to bee ignorant of the Kings desseignes, and being informed thereof, she seemed ready to retire from Court. These reasons did still confirme the Admirall, Teligny and the rest in that beliefe: That the King concurred with the Admirall in one will, to send the warres faire off into the King of Spaines countries, the which he had before kindled in the foure corners, and in the midst of this realme, pretending to entertaine it there, and to maintaine himselfe with the shipwrack of this Crowne, and to seize thereon in time, as the attempt of his desseignes in our dayes haue testified.

The Marshall of Montmorency returned from his Ambassage, bringing a mutual league offensive and defensive, with and against all men, not naming any one: but the marriage, whereof he had charge remained fruitlesse: which made many beleue that it was but a meere fiction, fit for the season, where they prepared a scaffold, on the which they should soone present a horrible spectacle. The Marshall eyther not to be a spectator nor councillor, or doubting to beeing engaged in these publike and private furies, retires himselfe to his house. Roebell was in the meane time belagard, soldiers arrived hourly, giuing terrible threats against the Towne, who began to crie to the Admirall for succours. In other Townes they heard secret murmurings, which terrified the most cleere sighted among the Protestants. These aduertisements found continually in the Admirals eares. But he continues alwayes like vnto himselfe, constant in the midst of all motions, and grew resolute against all such as laboured to call him from Court, eyther by mouth or writing. As for the house of Guise (sayd hee) whereof they will put me in feare, the King hath taken order, making vs to sweare before him to continue friends: and as for them of the religion, the marriage of Madam Marguerit, whom his Maieslie giues not to the King of Navarre alone, but as it were to all those of the party, to ioyne himselfe vnto them by an indissoluble union, is the finishing of their quiet and safetie. To conclude, he will be no more troubled touching the Kings ill meaning, nor the Queene Mothers, the Duke of Aniours, the Guisens, nor any others.

Negotiation
of Poland.

And that which fetles the Admirall the more in his conceit, he finds the King, after the death of Sigismund King of Poland to affect the pursuite of that Crowne in fauour of his brother. Charles was cleere sighted in affaires of State; he was young, yet of a quick and ready wit, and (if bloudie and furtious counsels had not peruered him,) without doubt he might haue brought forth better fruites, and this Monarchie had bene freed from the miseries which haue since ruined it. His brother had great credit generally in France: his mildnesse made him pleasing to his Mother, and his liberality, to the people. He desired rather to see him command farre off then nere. And the Admirall, who knew the Duke of Aniours to be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants, supposed that the King would by his absence settle a firme peace. That Henry being confined in Poland, his adherents would grow more milde: that the house of Guise disappointed of this support, would feare the Kings lookes, the which sometimes appeared terrible: and that Charles would soone discharge the Queene his Mother from the government of affaires, and take it wholly vnto himselfe, as already he made some shewes of his intent.

The Admirall seeing Iohn of Monluc Bishop of Valence, a man of iudgment, and practised in negotiations, departed for this Ambassage, hee fed himselfe with new hopes. And contrarywise, Monluc (foreseeing the imminent storme,) was very glad to be neither a councillor nor a witness of the miseries that were like to fall vpon the Protestants. And indeed he had before counselled many of the principalls amongst them, not to meddle in this imaginary warre of Flanders, but to retire in time to their houses, and not to trust ouermuch in the goodly shewes of Court, considering the enuie of the great, and the ill will of the people of Paris. But thus God confounds the iudgment, and blinds the vnderstanding of such as he referues for an example to their posterity.

Apoteryty. O France, my haire stands vpright, and I tremble, to enter into the relation of so inhumaine a tragedie. And shall wee neuer bee satisfied to heare the lamentable and continuall slaughter of our countrymen? what man would not be troubled? what minde would not be oppressed with heauinesse and griefe, to see so much bloud vnprofitably spilt in our Citties, which should be carefully preserved for the defence of our country against strangers and common enemies? yet let vs passe this dangerous pillage: the course of times inuities vs to proceed.

A great number of Noblemen, both Catholikes and Protestants, repaired from all parts, to the solemnizing of this marriage. Those of Guise come, bringing with them a large traine of persons, of all qualities faithfull vnto them. The water which moues by little and little, the birdes which houer aboue it, and the ayre colder then of custome, foretelt a storme to come. So the common murmurings, the stirring of the quarter maisters, and other Captaines of Paris, the Kings guards dispersed through the City, the ordinary threats against the Protestants, were certaine testimonies, That this marriage should be seasoned more with bloud then water. The day appointed comes: the Cardinall of Bourbon marries the parties vpon a high scaffold, built before the doore of our Ladyes Church at Paris. Foure dayes are spent in playes, feasts, dancing and masks: which finished, the King protests to the Admirall, that he will answer and satisfie the Protestants requests. Euerie one of their Churches had their Deputies in Court, for many affaires, wherein the Admirals authority was very necessary. They ought a great summe of money to the Germanes, due for their entertainment in former warres: for the payment whereof, the King had suffered them to tax themselves to the fifth part of their estates. The Commissioners and Receiuers prest the collection, being desirous to make an end of that businesse, the day of payment being past. Hereon the Admirall treated with the Priuie Councell, on Friday the two & twentieth of August, where the Duke of Aniours in the Kings absence was president.

The marriage
solemnized.

At the rising of the Councell, the Admirall hauing attended on the King, who went to play at Tennis, he retyred himselfe to his lodging at dinner time, being accompanied with fiftene or sixteene Gentlemen: and reading a petition, when as being about Da hundred paces from the Louvre, a Harguebuse shotte from the window of a lodging neere by, belonging to Villemur, sometimes Schoolemaister to the Duke of Guise, carries away the forefinger of the right hand, and wounds him in the left arme. They brake downe the doore of the lodging: they finde the Harguebuse, but not him that discharged it. This was Maureuel (vnder a counterfet name of Bolland of the Kings gardes) a fitte man for such murders: who mounting vpon a Genet of Spain which was provided ready for him, fled by Saint Anthones gate, to a place of safetie.

The Admiral
hurt.

The King played, and vpon the first report of this hurt: Shall I neuer haue quiet (said he) shall I dayly see new troubles. And casting his Racket to the ground, he retyred to the Louvre, and sweares with an execration to the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé, (who were come vnto him to complaine of this outrage) to take such exemplary iustice of the offender, his fautors and adherents, as the Admirall and his friends should haue cause to rest satisfied. Hee presently commands to pursue him that shotte, (but they go slowly after him) hee appoints three of the Parliament to make informations against the culpable, Thran, Morsan and Viole: hee leaues onely two gates open with great gardes, vnder colour to search for such as were priuie with this outrage, putting the whole City into armes. The Queene Mother seemes to bee discontented. They doe great wrong vnto the King, (cries she): if hee should suffer this crime unpunished, they would in the end attempt against his owne house. These counterfet speeches retein the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé, who had desired leaue to retyre themselves, but then they made no more mention of leauing the Court.

Charles himselfe & Katherin his mother, come in the aftermoone to visit the Admirall. The 1572. The Admirall shewes vnto them the miseries which the breach of the peace would bring vnto France: beseecheth him to chase away these mutinies, and to mainteine his promised faith, whereupon he was come to Court, and to prouide for the preferuation of the realme. But the Queene Mother knew well how to prevent him, least he should acquaint the King with some secrets, touching the preferuation of his Estate. The King protests againe to be exceeding forry: that this acte toucheth his honour, and that he will be reuenged, so as the memory thereof shall remaine for euer. Hee perswades the Admirall to suffer himselfe to be carryed to the Louure, for the safetie of his person: that it was to be feared, least the multitude stirred vp by the authours of his hurt, should fall into some greater mutinie. He also aduiseeth the Gentlemen Protestants, to lodge about the Admirals lodging, least (sayd hee) that being disperied through the City, they should receiue some wrong. But to shew that hee would not forget any thing that might concerne the Admirals safety, seeing the grieve of his wound would not suffer him to be transported, hee commands Coffeins Captaine of his gardes, to giue the Admirall as many of his garde as hee pleased, and to suffer no Catholike to enter. And least any man should grow amazed hereat, the King writes to the Gouvernours of the Prouinces, to the chiefe Townes, and Magistrates: That he would take such order, as the authors of so wicked an acte should bee knowne and punished. And to his Ambassadors with forraigne Princes: That they should make it knowne to all the world, that this outrage doth displease him. The Queene mother writes in like maner, but this was onely to keepe euery byrd within his nest.

Treachery in a King.

In the meane time the Dukes of Aniou and Guise, tooke counsell of that which they had to doe the right following. Saterday in the morning, it is bruted through out the City, that the Protestants did threaten the house of Guise. Herevpon the Dukes of Guise and Amale go vnto the King, and say vnto him: That of late they haue found their seruice to be little agreeable to his Maiestie: that if he were pleased to see them reryed to their houses, they were ready to depart. Go (saith Charles vnto them with a frowning countenance) where you please, I will haue you at all times, if you bee found guilty of the Admirals hurt. So making shew to be discontented, they go to horse, and many with them, yet meaning to lye in Paris.

The King resolves to mil-litate the Protestants.

Paris was a pit-fall to intrap the chiefe of all the Protestants: they being dead, the baser sort of that party, would in all likelyhood remaine quiet. The time now offered a fitt opportunity of reuenge, the which should not be lost. This counsell was taken after dinner at the Tuileries, by the King, the Queene Mother, the Dukes of Aniou, Neuers, Rejts and Tauannes. The King of Nauarres life, with the Prince of Condes, were put in ballance, the warres had bene managed in their names: If they liue (sayd one) they will serue as an Enseigne, to reuiue those Huguenots which shall remaine in diuers Prouinces, and shall euery day minister new motiues of confusions. Contrarywise, the Admirall and the principals being taken away, it shall bee easie to retrain the young Princes, not onely not to attempt any inuouation, but also in time to win the Kings good fauour by their seruices: also the indignity of the fact would purchase an insupportable hatred among strangers. God disposed the hearts of the Councell to this second aduice, so as they will imbrace the Catholikes religion, and liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty. As for the rest (whom the fury of their armes should touch,) they might with a goodly pretext, leaue to the ancient quarrell of the *Guise*s against the Admirall, and take for an excuse, the feare they had least the Huguenots should seeke a reuenge for his hurt. To lay all the hatred vpon the *Guise*s, they giue the charge of this businesse to the Duke of Guise: they appoint him the meanes, the time, and the ministers of the execution.

The Duke of Guise giues order for the massacre.

The night being come, the Duke calls vnto him the Captaines of the Suisses, and other companies, (whom to that end they had drawne into the City, and deliuer his charge vnto them, which was, to roote out the Admirall and all his Partisans. He exhorts them to bloud and spoile, and disposeth his troupes in some speciaall places. Then he giues aduise vnto the Prouost of the Marchants, the Sheriffes and quarter maisters: That

That throughout all France, the like should be done to the Huguenots as at Paris. That the Palace Bell ringing at the breake of day, shall giue the signall: and the marke of these executioners should be a handkercheffe tyed about their armes, with a white crosse in their hartes, That they should put their men in armes, and be at midnight in the Towne-house, to receiue order what they had to do.

They assemble at midnight, and place many gardes in the streetes. Some Gentlemen lodged neere vnto the Admirall, rise at the noise of their armes, and the light of their Lampes, and going into the streetes, they inquire of the first they meete, what this assembly of armed men meant at so vnseasonable a time. A doubtfull answer being giuen them, makes them to repayre to the Louure, to discouer more. Here the gardes go from words to blowes, and fall vpon them. The Duke of Guise parts second, the Duke of Amale, Coffeins, Sarlaboux, Gous, Attin a Piccard, Hausfort an Au-negne, and Besmes a Germaine, with some Harguebuziers of the Kings, and all the Duke of Anious garde. The Alarm Bell rings at Saint Germaine Auxerrois, and they publish throughout the City: That the Huguenots had conspired against the King, the Queene Mother, and all the chiefe in Court. Coffeins knocks at the Admirals gate: hee enters at two of the Clock in the morning, the 24. of the moneth, stabbes him that comes to open it, forceth the dores of the lodging, enters with seuen or eight armed men. Besmes a household seruant to the Duke of Guise, offers the Admirall the point of his sword. Herevpon the Admirall being risen vpon his secte, and covered with his night gowne, sayd: Yong man, thou shouldst haue respect vnto my olde age, and infirmite, but thou shalt no way shorten my dayes: he thrusts him through the breast, and then doubles it on his head. Attin shootes him through with a Pistoll: and when as the three wounds were not able to ouerthrow him, Besmes wounds him on the legges: euery one of the rest giues his blow, and thus they cast that body miserably to the ground, whom liuing and in health they durst not looke in the face. The Duke of Guise hearing the noyse of their armes in the base Court, enquires if it bee done, and commands them to cast him out at the window: who yet breathing, layes hold on the pillar: but these butcherly murderers hurle him downe headlong, where the Duke wiping his face with a handkercheffe. I know him (sayeth hee) it is the very same: and so spurnes him with his foote, then going into the streete: Courage companions, we haue begun happily, let vs proceed to the rest, the King commands it. An Italian of the household of the Duke of Neuers, cutts off his head, and carryes it to the King and Queene Mother, which causing it to bee imbaulmed, sent it to the Pope and the Cardinall of Lorraine, for an assurance of the death of his most capitall enemy.

The chiefe
murderers.

The Admirall
murdered.

The Palace clocke strikes, and the people flie to the Admirals lodging like madde men, one cutts off his hands, another his priuie members: and for the space of three dayes, they dragge this poore carcasse with all indignity through the streetes, and then they carry and hang it by the feete at Montfaucon. His lodging is spoiled, his household seruants murdered. Those which attended on the King of Nauarre and Prince of Conde, are driuen out of their chambers: (they were in the Louure, where the King had lodged them, to the end, (sayd he) that those of Guise, hauing the people at their deuotion, they should not in like maner feelee the effects of their violence) and murdered in the base court, the Noblemen and Gentlemen lodged in the Admirals quarter, vndergo the like fortune. The like furie oppresseth the other Protestants throughout the City and Suburbes, of all ages, conditions and sexes, men, women, and children, riche and poore. There is nothing to be heard in Paris, but a horrible noyse of armes, horses, and Harguebuses: a lamentable crye of people going vnto death, a pittifull complaint of such as cryed for mercy, and the pittiflesse showts of murderers. The streetes are strewed with carcases, the pauements, market places, and riuer dyed with bloud. One day alone (by the murderers saying) hath ended the quarrell, which neyther Pent, Paper, decrees of Iustice, nor open warre, could

The Protestants massacred.

1572. see determined in twelue yeares. About ten thousand soules makes this Sunday famous A for euer, polluted with the spoyle of goods, and the effusion of their blood that were asleepe, disarmed, and at such a season as they thought themselves most safe. And doubtlesse the horrible catastrophes happened since to our Charles, to his brother and successors, and to the bretheren of the house of Guise, in the last acts of their liues, and generally to all this realme, euen vnto our dayes, forceth vs to confesse, That mans blood violently spilt, when as the manner of it may not lawfully be qualified with the name of Iustice, cannot please his sight, who hath created them to his owne image and likeness, and sels them deerly to the authors of this effusion.

The same of this massacre, had already passed from the City to the Suburbes, when as the Earle of Montgomery, Iohn of Ferrieres Vidame of Chartres, Beauneville, Noële, Fontenay, and many Gentlemen, lodged in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, perceiuing a number of men to crosse the riuer, to make them equall with their companions: they abandon their baggage, go sodnly to hoise and saue themselves with speed, being pursued halfe a dayes journey by the Duke of Guise. But he that should haue brought the Keyes of S. Germain gate, hauing mistaken them, gaue them some leisure to get the aduantage.

The King
aduowes the murder.

The King sends for the King of Nauarre and the Prince of Condé, and gives them to vnderstand: That hauing been crost many yeares with a continuance of warre, he had in the end found an assured meane to cut off all motiues of confusions to come, that by his commandement they had slaine the Admirall (the pernicious author of pasted C troubles:) that now they did the like to others in the City, that were infected with the poyson of heresie, and the ministers of his wickednesse. That he remembered well the discommodities hee had receiued by their two meanes, making themselves the heads of a troupe of desperate men. That now the cause and opportunity gives him meanes to be reuenged of such outrages: but notwithstanding hee doth pardon their offence, by reason of consanguinitie and their young age, beleeuing that all had bene committed, not by their fault and counsell, but by the Admirall and other wicked subiects, who now haue suffered and doe suffer a iust punishment due to their desert, so as hereafter they repair their faults past, by fidelity and obedience, and renouncing the doctrine of their prophane superstition, they cleaue to the Catholike D religion, and returne into the communion of the Church. That hereafter he will haue but one religion within his realme, euen that which hee hath receiued from his Ancestors: That they should aduise whether they would obey him in this point, if not, let them resolute to yeeld their heads to the like punishments of their companions.

The King of Nauarre beseecheth his Maiestie to remember his promise, and the alliance lately contracted, and not to force him in the religion which hee hath learned from his infancie. The Prince of Condé answers: That the King hath giuen his faith, to all them of the religion, and that he cannot perswade himselfe hee will breake to solemne an othe. As for the obedience (saith he) you require of me, I haue faithfully performed it vnto this day, neyther will I hereafter straye in any thing from my duty. E But as for my religion, my Lige, I am resolu'd to continue constant, (and with the hazard of my life) mainteine it to bee true: you haue granted me the exercise thereof, and God hath giuen me the knowledge, to whom I must yeeld an account, leaving my body and goods to the disposition of your will. This resolute answer puts Charles into choller, who full of threats, giues the Prince but three dayes liberty to aduise, whether he would soone loose his head vpon a scaffold. In the end, both abjure the doctrine they had followed, and by the intercession of the Cardinall of Bourbon their Vncle, they obteyned pardon of the Pope, and were receiued into the bosome of the Church.

A noble resolution of a young Prince.

After the massacre, those of Guise, according to the conclusion of the Councell, F should retyre themselves into some one of their houses out of Paris, and Charles should expresse charge and command the Gouernours of Prouinces and Townes, to obserue the Edict of peace, and to punish the breache thereof seuerely, to the end

A the people of France, and their neighbours, should impute all the fury of this massacre, to the ancient quarrell of those of Guise, with the house of Chastillon. But the foulness of the fact might heape vpon them and their posteritie, the hatred of all men, with whom humane society and vertue is in recommendation. For they had not spared an infinite number of learned men, of reuerent old men, honest virgins, honourable matrons, women with child, chaste maydens, young Schollers, and little infants hanging at the breasts of their mother.

The Guiseans
denie to take the massacre
vpon them.

Arming themselves therefore with the peoples loue, they refuse to go out of Paris, handling the matter so politickly, as they cause the King to auouch all that had bene done. So Charles writes other letters to his Ambassadors and Gouernours, aduertising them. That the tumult which had happened concerned not religion, but the preservation of his estate, his house and person, against the practises of the Admirall, and some other seditious persons; who had ioynly conspired his death, his Mothers, and his bretherens, and therefore he would haue his Edict of pacification religiously obserued. Yet if any Huguenots (moued with these newes of Paris,) should assemble armes, they should roote them out, as perturbers of the publike peace, referring the surplusage of his will, to the credit of the bearer. And the better to authorize this approbation, the 26. of August, Charles with his bretheren assits in Parliament, all the chambers being assembled, where sitting in his seate of Iustice, he declares openly, that those things which had chanced in Paris, were done by his owne proper motion and commandement, yet making no mention of the cause. Chrislopher of Thon the cheife President, commended his zeale in the name of all the company.

The Admirall
accused of conspacie.

But to what end did he write the contrary the next day, to his officers and the Magistrates of Townes; That to his great grieve, the Admirall his Cousin, and some others of his party, had bene slaine at Paris: commanding them to preuent all murders and murders, and to proclaime, that every man should remaine quiet in his house, without taking of armes, or giuing any offence: and to giue order that his Edict of pacification be exactly obserued: and yet the same day to publish a declaration of the former tenour, containing, that by his expresse commandement, the Admirall and other his complices had bene slaine, not for matter of religion, but to preuent the execution of a wicked practise made by them, against the Kings person, the Queene Mother, his bretheren, the King of Nauarre, (this was for a colour of excuse, to such as would object, why then was this Prince saued from shipwrack, and it may be for the loue of him, the Prince of Condé his cousin,) and generally against their houses, and the houses of France?

Doubtlesse there was small likely hood, that a little troupe of men, dispersed some in the suburbs, others within the City in small numbers, should presume to attempt any thing against the Estate. Charles had both night and day his ordinary gardes, French, Swisses, and Scottishmen: the most of the Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the realme were in Court to honour the marriage. Those which had accompanied the King of Nauarre and the Prince of Condé, had no other armes but their swords: and for a gage of their innocencie, had brought for the most part their wives, children, sisters, and kinsfolke, studying onely to shew themselves at the Tilt and Tourney. The accusation made no mention of time, place, or adherents, neyther of the meanes, or any witnesses of this conspiracy. If it had bene plotted since the Admirals hurt, three hundred Gentlemen vnarmed, which had accompanied him, could they haue effected any thing, vnder a Commander, tyed by both the armes, and ready to see the one cut off by the aduise of the Physitians and Chirurgians, in a mighty City, and against about three score thousand men, ready to be opposed at the first alarm?

F Moreouer, the King of Nauarre and Prince of Condé, who had bene still present at all councells, would they haue blemished their honours and houses with so great an infamie? And if their innocencie had freed them from the common danger, the consultations of the Admirall and his followers, had they not bene very childish at such a 1572. time, in such a place, among so many naturall Frenchmen come with him, who had neither goods, kinsfolke, pleasure, nor content without the Realme? Besides, if the Admirall were suspected of this attempt: might they not haue committed him presently to a safe prison, informe of his practises, and take such conclusions as the crime might deserue according to the Lawes? To conclude: admit the Admirall after his hurt, or else his friendes had giuen forth some bad speeches, must the same punishment deuoure so many persons, who conuersed onely with their bookes and papers, with their traſlike, and with their worke, so many women, who dreamt but of their husewiferye, so many virgins and infants, whose age and condition kept them from the conference of any counsell?

As for the attempt against the King of Nauarre: that accusation is frivolous. Had not the Admirall him in his power, for the space of three yeares? what benefit should he reape by his death? Haue they not conuersed long together with an humble & sincere respect of the Admirall towards him, and a perfect loue of the said King to the Admirall? Let omit all other reasons that might refuse this slander: let vs onely obserue the testimonie which Monluc giues in the 7. booke of his remembrances, vpon this subiect. The Queene mother (saith he) did me the honour to write vnto mee, that they had discovered a great conspiracie against the King and his Estate, the which was the cause of what had happened. I knowe what my belief was, it is not good to offend ones master. The King did neuer forget, how the Admirall made him retire in hast from Meaux to Paris: mee loose our iudgments soberly, and doe not dreame that Kings haue greater harts then we haue, and doe sooner forget seruices then offences. And a little aboue: My Lord the Admirall was ill aduised, to thrust himselfe into Paris, to shew that hee gouerned all. I wonder, that so aduised and wise a man, should comit so grosse an errour. Hee payed deere for it: it cost him his life, and many more.

The particularities of such as, during this horrible butcherie, haue shed their blouds for religions sake, at Meaux, Troyes, Orleans, Bourges, la Charité, Lions, Tholouse, Fourdoux, Rouan, and other Townes, in villages, and in the open fields, as they sought to saue themselves without the realme, haue bene obserued in other workes that are extant, and the bloud of these murdered persons, which amount to about thirty thousand, hauing died the earth, and made the waters reddy, haue cryed so loude, that the heauens haue continued their vengeance, ouer great and small, for so many yeares, as there remains scarce any one of the authors of this violent fact. Brittanie and Picardie remained reasonably quiet: Champagne and Bourgogne shed little bloud, through the pollutione of them of Guisse, that all the blame might light vpon the King, (as also they had saued many of the chier Protestants in the midst of the furie of this Parisien euent.) In Auuerne Saint Heran put more money into his cofers, then he shed bloud in his gouernment. In Daulphiné there were some murders committed. In Prouence, the humanitie of the Earle of Tende restrayned the hands and swords of the bloud minded.

In the end, the people (glutted with the bloud, and cloyed with the spoyle of the murdered protestants,) growe quiet, and the King appoints an extraordinary subtile with generall processions, where his Maiestie assisted with the Queene his mother, his brethren, and the Court, of purpose to giue thanks to God, for that which had so happily succeeded. There were yet some thornes stucke in Charles his feet: Rochel, Sancerre, Montauban, Nismes, Aubenas, Millaud, Priuas, Mirebel, Anduze and other small Townes of Vinrets and Seuennes, serued as a Sanctuary for the Protestants that were escaped, to keepe them from danger. Rochel was not to be dealt with all, and it seemed that industrie and secret practises should preuaile more then open force. Strossy and la Garde will relecue the inhabitants with men to keepe it, and vsfurnish them of victuals, requiring a quantitie to refresh their armie.

But they had men inough: a great number were fled thither, and many Protestant soldiars, whom the hope of the voyage of Flanders entertained in the Kings army, slippt hourelly into their Towne. Their priuileges likewise did free them from garnisons, and

A and as for victuals, they had for their prouision, but could not spare any. Strossy and la Garde, spent both time and money in vaine about Rochel: they therefore send Biron vnto them for their Gouernour, with expresse commandement to receiue a garrison. They answer: That they cannot beleue that that charge comes from the King, who commanded the strict obseruation of the Edict, and grants them the vse of their ancient priuileges vnder his obedience. And for a testimony, they produce the Kings letters of the 22. and 24. of August, whereby his Maiestie layes the motives of the sedition vpon them of Guisse, saying; That he had much adoe to mainteine himselfe in the midst of his gardes, in his Castle of Louure. As for the reasons which made them to auoyde all the surprises and baits, of such as Biron sent to treat with them, they vsed the meanes which politicke wisdom doth vsually furnish in such incoun- ters: offering notwithstanding to accept Biron, so as the troupes may bee retyred from thence; the exercise of their religion to remaine free, and that he bring no forces into the Towne.

Biron summons them by vertue of his authority, and vpon refusall, proclaimes war against them: and euen then, vnder colour to giue the armie at Sea meanes to disperse itselfe, he labours by all meanes to cut off their victuals and prouisions, and to weaken them of their men. The King by his Letters Pateents of the 8. of October, calls home all that were fled out of diuers Townes, saying, that as a good father of a family, he had pity of his poore subiects, being out of their houses: and for not coming, he did seize and declare their goods forfeit. Yet the excuses which the King made vnto the Pope, to the Duke of Alba, and to the Ambassador of Spaine: That the brutes of the Belgique warre, and all the former Councils had tended to no other end but to the ruine of the Huguenots: that his intent was to liue in peace and good correspondencie with the Catholike King: and the Commissions he had sent to the Gouernours of Provinces, to degrade all Protestants from their offices and publike charges, although they were ready to renounce their religion, except such as aduanced to meaner offices, were continued by the King, abiding according to a forme set downe by the College of Sorbonne; and to search for all Protestants, that during the troubles had had the command of armes, or Townes of warre, made this repeale of Charles to be wonderfully suspect.

Hereafter they vse all acts of hostilitie against the Rochelois: such as they know to be of the Towne, are kept prisoners, and put to their ransome: ships that sayled towards their Port were stayed, all marchandise belonging to the Rochelois seized and confiscated. They therefore hasten the succours which the Counte Montgomery, the Viscount of Chartres and others, prepared for them in England. The 25. of October they set sayle, but not able to approche, they returned back. Those of Sancerre hauing refused to receiue a gouernour and garrison from the hands of La Chastre gouernour of Berry, were beleagard in the beginning of October. Cadaillet Grome of the Chamber and the Kings Huntsman, very well knowne in the Towne as an ancient seruant to the Earle of Sancerre, was sent to conferre with them: hee brought the inhabitants to that point, as some desiring, and others refusing: the Lord of Fontaines being a Catholike, his brother surpriseth the Castle, by the meanes of some inhabitants, who shutt themselves into it with him: but the resolution, and the greater number of the Protestants displaced them within foure and twenty houres, as Fontaines came to their succours. So as La Chastre prepares now for open force, whereof we shall see the progresse in the beginning of the following yeare. This vnworthy and strange proceeding against the Protestants, had made the French name hateful to strangers, especially in Poland, and did much trouble the negotiation, in fauour of the Duke of Anton. Moreover the Protestants both within & without the realme, laid plots which in short time might produce dangerous effects. To make the Bishops negotiatio more easie, and to crosse the proiects of others, they obserue hereafter some forme of iustice against any one that were found after the furie of the massacre. Briquemault a Gentle- man of three score & ten yeares old, and Canaignes maister of Requests vnto the King, (both 1572. both inward friends vnto the Admirall, and of great reputation) were of the number. A They threaten them with an extraordinary torture, if they set not downe vnder their hands, to haue conspired with the Admirall, the death of the King, his brethren, the Queene mother, and of the King of Nauarre, promising them pardon if they demand it, in aduowing that wherewith they are charged. We will neuer (said they) accuse innocents, nor our selues of so execrable a crime. The Commissioners not able to extort from them any such confession: they were both by sentence of the Court, as guilty of high Treason, vnrorthily hanged the 27. of October, in the presence of the King, Queene mother, her two other sonnes, and the King of Nauarre.

A decree against the Admirall.

To the same execution was added the like decree against the Admirall. His bodie had bene taken from Montfaucon, and secretly buried: the which the greatest water of his enemies could neuer discouer. They therefore make the forme of a mandragora it through the Cittie, and then cause it to be hanged. Moreover the King commands by his letters patentes, That those of the pretended religion should be maintained in safetie in their houses, bodie, goods, and libertie of consciences. And to excuse what was past, they cast abroad many libels, defaming the memory of the Admirall and his followers. They giue new charges to the Ambassadors being in Germanie, Poland, England, Swisserland, and other forraigne Countries, to iustifie the actions of the King, and of the Catholikes, to the confusion and shame of the Admirall and his party. But all these proceedings were meanes to discouer the iniquitie of their penitious Councils.

For, the intent of this declaration in fauour of the Protestants was presently discovered by the tenor of the letters which the Duke of Guise did write vnto his wife, the day that Briquemaunt was executed. The King (said he) hath decreed in Council, utterly to roote out this felitious vermine. But few would be taken, and the practises against the Prince of Auranges and others being discovered by this letter, vanished into smoake. In the meantime they continued their attempts against Rochell and Effars being chosen cheefe of the warre for the Rochelois, hauing taken one of the Faron of la Garde galleys, who had approached too neere vnder colour of bringing a letter to the whole bodie of the Towne, caused Biron to publish the Kings letters patentes, giuenthe sixth of the moneth, and to make open warre to the Rochelois. But Charles was not willingly drawne to armes: hee sees well that hee had kindled a fire which hee should not quench when hee would. Hee now tries the last stratageme. La Noue sent home by the Duke of Alba, after the taking of Monts in Hainault, had great credit among the Protestants, as one of the cheefest Captaines which remained. The King solicits him to bee a meanes to bring the Rochelois to composition. The impossibilitie of the thing (saies hee) and my conscience will not suffer mee to aduise the Rochelois, to offer their throats to them that will cut them. Yet the Kings authoritie makes him to accept of it as charge: but rather with an intent to serue the Rochelois, and to retire himselfe from Court, then to hurt them of his religion. After hee had given an account of his Ambassage to Biron, who was then at Saint Jean d'Angli, hee returns to Rochell; where hee performed his dutie so well and carefully, as they acknowledged him for one of the cheefe Instruments of the preferuation thereof during the siege.

A Comet.

Then appeared there a new starre in heauen, hauing the forme of a Lozenge of foure points, and continued (beginning the ninth of November,) the space of nine moneths, immovable (by the saying of the Astronomers) the first three weekes, resembling that which serued as a guide to the wise men that came out of the East, to worship Iesus Christ in Bethlem. The nineteenth of the said moneth, the King by an other Edict, called home all his subjects to their houses, vpon paine of losse of their goods, and solicited the Protestant Swisses, to chase away such as were fled to them for succour.

But the Ambassadors instance was of no force, & the taking of Sommiers by the Marshal of d'Anville from the Protestants, the perswasions of Gourdes to drawe into the

A some of the Catholike Church Monbrun, Mirabel, and Les Diguieres (who euen 1572. then made shew of a most valiant, most wise, and most happy Captaine for their party, and shall hereafter haue a good share in our History) the assurance hee gaue them. That the King was resolu'd to suffer but one religion within his realme, with all the preparations for the destruction of them in diuers Prouinces, tooke from them all desire to returne.

Seeing then, that no Edicts can draw them home to their houses, and that Rochell, Sancerre, and other places (being threatened) prepare for defence, they must at the least take from the Protestants such refuges as they haue within the realme. To that vpon Rochell, Biron enters into the Country of Onis in the beginning of December, with seven Cornets of horse, and eightene Enseignes of foote. Those of Sancerre runne yet at libertie: but the opinion of their chiefe Commanders, that they would attempt some other thing, and the vaine presumption they had of the situation of their hilly place, made them the more negligent, both to furnish it with victuals, and to reparaire the necessarie fortifications to endure a siege, against the which they should haue foreseene the small hope of succours, and the constant resolution of the assaillants. Leys consider of these circumstances, and prepare our selues to see the greatest reformation of men, lead by Captaines to whom the necessitie of the time gaue more credit, then their beginning, gaue them authority. Martignon, Pilard, Martinat, La Har, Chailon, Montauban, Buissou, Paquelon, La Mince and Dorival commanded there six hundred and fifty men, and for Colennel they had Andrew Jonneau Bayliffe of the Towne. A hundred and fifty strong labourers in the Vines, wrought great effects with their shingls (which were called the Pitols of Sancerre,) for seruices vpon the wall assaults, scalladoes, and sallies.

In January, La Chastre Lieutenant for the King in the government of Berry, and general of this armie, came before it with about five hundred horse, and five thousand foot, sixteene enseignes of Pioners, and a great number of peasants gathered together: at the first he offers a reasonable composition to the besieged, if they will accept it. As the beginning of the Generall was courteous, so was the proceeding of the besieged incivill, disdainfull, and contrary to the lawe of nations. They reteyne the Drum, and make no answer. To make his approches, La Chastre builds a fort within three hundred paces of the Towne towards Fontenay, another vpon the way of S. Eustache, a palisadoe in the field of S. Ladre: intrenched the approches and wayes about the Towne planted ten peeces of Artillery in the field of Saint Ladre: and fixe others at Orme au Loup: (it is a high mountaine vpon the South side of Sancerre, which commands the Towne) he shootes against the walls and houses at random; and spends in two moneths about six thousand Canon shot (and yet the besieged lost not above five and twentie men) giues an assault, but with the losse of many that were slaine, and a great number hurt.

1573. Siege of Sancerre.

The 18. of March, La Chastre, by a second battery in three diuers places, beates downe the defences both of Towers and wall, makes a breach of about three hundred paces, giues a generall assault, presents a scallado on an other side, mines and saps on the third, that the Sancerrois (wearied with so many difficulties,) might thinke vnder their burthen. But well assayed, and well defended, the besieged with the losse of seuentene Souldiars, not onely repulse the enemy, but also make them leave about three score of their most resolute men slaine in the ditches, about two hundred wounded to the death, and as many maimed for euer, then coole their heate calling them to change this hasty fury of Canons and assaults, into a more long, but a more violent war. They make many forts neerer vnto the Towne, & notwithstanding the sallies and ordinary skirmishes of the Sancerrois, they furnish them with artillery & munition sufficient to cut off all reliefe: so as being shut vp on all sides, they begin to want ordinary victuals in the beginning of Aprill they eat their Asses & Moiles, then fat they kill horses, dogs, cats, mice, moales & kether & in the end to parchmin, hornes, trapping, of horses, girdles, and wilde rootes. And in the end of Iune, three parts of them had no 1573. bread to eate, some make it of flaxe seede, others of all kinds of hearbes mixt with branne, beaten and ground in morters, and others of straw, of nut shels, and of flax greafe and tallow serued for portage, and frying, yea some (a strange thing and neuer heard of,) laboured to incounter the crueltie of their hungar, by the excrements of horses, and men. But a horrible thing to see, the nineteenth of Iune, a labourer in the vines and his wife, satified their hungar with the head and intrayles of their young daughter about three yeares old, being dead in languishing, giuing no other grane to the members of this poore carcase, but their bellies. But the magistrate aduertised of this inhumanitie, did for examples sake shorten their dayes, finding them guiltie of other crimes. neither were they forced hereunto by any extremitie, seeing the same day they had bene releued with portage made of hearbes and wine, whereof there was store in the Towne.

An admirable meane for the deliuerie
of Sancerre.

To conclude, foure score men died by the sword at Sancerre (saith the Historie) but of hungar both within and without, aboue siue hundred. And euen now the King began to see his threats to take effect: I will make them, (saith he) eate one another. They were hopelesse of all humane helpe: such as they sent out for succours, either fell into their enemies hands, or died by the sword, or returned no more, or could not reenter. So as they could not hope for any helpe, but in dispayring of helpe, when as the providence of God brings them a strange and far-bred nation, to giue them the libertie of the fields, and the vse of bread.

Sancerre yeelded by capitulation.

The Estates of Poland had chosen Henry Duke of Anjou brother to our Charles C for their King, (as wee shall see in the end of the siege of Rochell) but with a promise and oth taken by the Bishop of Valence and Lansac in the name of the King their master: That all the Townes and persons in France molested for the cause of religion should be let at libertie. At the request thereof, the Ambassadors of Poland, this poore people languishing for hungar (yet resolute to die one after another, rather then to fall into their enemies hands, who threatened them with a generall massacre) the nineteenth of August they obteyned of la Chastre in the Kings name: To depart with their armes, and baggage: impunitie for such as would remaine still, permission to dispose of their goods, promise to preserve the honour of women and maidens, and to pay la Chastre forty thousand franks, by the inhabitants that were absent. So la Chastre ending D the last of the sayd moneth, dismantled Sancerre, beate downe some houses, tooke away the Clocke, Bells, and other markes of a Towne: but the other pointes of the capitulation, were reasonable well obserued: the Bayliffe tonneau was massacred the 12. of September neere vnto la Chastres lodging.

Siege of Rochell.

Nowe followes one of the most memorabie sieges that hath bene in many ages. A siege where many of the Commanders, and most part of those, which were noted to haue forced the Admiralls lodging, began the butchery, and committed for many murders at Paris and else where, came to seeke their graues. The Kings army was held to be fifty thousand men, by land and sea, and three score peeces of artillery. The besieged had a good number of gentlemen and horlemen, eight companies of inhabitants, nine of strangers, one of the Mayor, one of voluntaries, consisting of twenty Musketeers, siue and twenty armed with corselers of prooffe, and thirty harguebutiers: the two thirds thereof, were Gentlemen, and such as had the charge in the former warres. Yet the mildest way is the best. And therefore Biron in the beginning seekes some meanes of an accord, but the Rochelois discovering every day some new practise, beleued that their preservation consisted in distrust. And a gentleman being in Rochell, reuealed the intelligences which Biron had with him for the surprising of the Towne, hauing already drawne into the Towne some souldiars of Puigalliers and Saint Martins companies, and was readie to drawe in the most resolute Capitaines, if the Mayor and Councell had not held it more fit by a small exemplarie execution, to breake off a great and dangerous enterprise.

To incounter the enemy, la Noue is chosen chief of the forces within the Towne, without any diminution of the Maiors rights and authoritie in other things. Montgomery 1573.

These succors could not passe. la Noue sends newe deputies into England to the same end: but the league confirmed of late yeares, betwixt our Charles and Queene Elizabeth was againe renewed by the baptisme of the Kings daughter (whereof Elizabeth was Godmother with the Empreisse,) seemed to withdrawe the affection which was wont to come from beyond the seas, for the releefe of the Protestants, whilest the false and daylie skirmishes, at Rochell, inflame both the one and the other: where by the reason of the nereness of their retreat, they do greatly wast the number of the assistants.

The Duke of Anjou comes to campe.

The eleuenth of February the Duke of Anjou arrives at his army, accompanied with his brother the Duke of Alanson, the King of Nauarre, the Princes of Condé and Daulx, the Dukes of Longueville, Boulon, Neuers, Aumale and Guise, the yong Earle of Bretagne, the Grand Prior, and many other Noble men, bringing with them a great trayne of men, who for the most part would haue bene greued, they should haue taken this Sanctuarie, and succor from the Protestants. This siege was great, and seemed to be of long continuance. Every man runnes thether, every one will haue his share. They prepare things necessarie for the batterie, and in the meane time make many skirmishes. Before they come to their greatest force, the Duke solliciteth the gentlemen and inhabitants by letters, conteyning both promises and threats. They humbly shew vnto him the necessity of their defence, knowing no siter meane to preserve their liues against the enemies of the peace, then to oppose force against violence, and to retire themselves into well fortified places, vntill it should please the King to provide for a lawefull assemblie of the Estates, and a free Councell.

The King on the other side, protesting of his sincerity in matters lately passed, and laying the fault of the outrage happened vpon the pretended conspiracie of the Admirall and his partisans, he summons the Rochelois to open their gates to Biron, or to any other hauing charge to enter into the Towne, as they ought to maintayne his royall authoritie, and so to order it as the place may be no more at the disposition of mutins. Which doing, hee graunts them exercise of their religion, with the like libertie as hee had graunted by his Edict of pacification, and withall hee takes from them all hope of succors from England.

Biron, Stroffy, Villequier and the Abbot of Gadagne, carrie the Kings promise to the Rochelois: which now neglected, he would neuer be perswaded by any intreaties or reuocalls, considering howe much the King abased himselfe vnto his subiects. They insuing the equity of their defence, and the tyrannous iniustice of the Baron of la Garde and others, accept the articles offered by the King: but they request that the Edict may not onely be maintayned for their priuate respect, but also generally for all of their religion in France. But these were words without effect on either side. The Rochelois are aduertised, how the enemy approcheth with two and thirty peeces of battie, and that after dinner they should keepe them in skirmish. They preuent them, they sallie forth at noone, kill and hurt in one skirmish of sixe houres, a hundred and fiftie men, amongst the which were many Capitaines: la Noue had two horses slaine vnder him, three Capitaines, siue soldiars, and twentie hurt. Thus their counter-batterie is set on fire, and the batterie begins: the one prepares to assault, and the other to defend. The chance fell vpon Claude of Lorraine Duke of Aumale, Vncle to the Duke of Guise, slaine behinde a gabion, with a peece planted vpon the bul-warke of the quartier: and the Townesmen issuing forth at the end of the batterie, kill many, and close the enemies heate.

The Duke of Aumale slaine.

In the beginning of March they trie againe, whither they may winne the Rochelois to combat. They offer them the exercise of their religion within their Towne, and continued in all other places of the Realme. Those of the partie might haue taken them for double dealers. One day of parle was more hurtfull vnto them then many peeces of warre. They resolute therefore to preferre a iust warre before a shamefull and doubtfull peace.

The batterie is renewed: about thirteene thousand Cannon shot spent in that moneth, shakes 1573. shakes both the fortifications and walls: many skirmishes are made: every one flours A to surprize his enemy, and la Noue (seeing his presence of no import to the besieged, where he must yeeld all, or in a manner all, to the popular government, comes to the Dukes army, where he effected more in fauour of the Rochelois being absent then present, as they afterwards confessed. The ordinarie sallies of the besieged, waited the Dukes troupes daylie, losing in fewe weekes about 20. good Captaines. The batterie continues in Aprill, & with such violence, as a long wal frō the olde fountaine vnto the ende of the bulwarke d' Euangile, was beate downe to the ground the bulwarke warrmed, and the Towre of Cognees beaten downe. In the euening the enemy cast a bridge of wood into the trench, aduancing euenvnto the bulwarke: they come to the assault, and winne two casemats. But they dislodge them, from the one with the Cannon, from the other with a furious charge: some of them remaine for a gage, the rest saue themselves by flight. Two hundred rondaches and coselets passe by their budge of wood, and the Cannon playing without intermission, seemed to keepe the besieged from their defence. But the women and maides, running with an incredible resolution to cast wild fire and stonnes, inflamed the courage of the soldiars. They kill and wound, and in the end force them to abandon the trench, but they loose about threescore men and some Captaines.

The Rochelois endure nine assaults.

Hereafter there is nothing but thundring of the Cannon both by land and sea, furious assaults, showers of shot, planting of ladders, ruines of bul-warkes, sappes and mines, most fatal to their authors: and vntill the ende of May, all the attempts that might be deuised in a mightie and obstinate sege. On the other side, men, women, and Children, without feare, endure the rough charges of the enemy, fill vp their breaches, ouerthrowe the first that mount, beate backe their enemies into their trenches, followe after them, and fight with variable successe: but most commonly to the aduantage of the Townesmen, hauing endured nine assaults no lesse courageously, then valiantly giuen.

Victualls began to growe short in the Towne, the Cannons continued the battery daylie, the number of the soldiars decayed, they had no meanes to refresh them, and many retyring themselves, bred an amazement in the Towne. Some of the chiefe winne many men to their wills, and alreadie there were three hundred men, who weary of the warre, will haue a peace at what price soeuer. Others deuise to seize vpon a gate, to depart when they please. These murmurings and diuisions cause newe parties, the Duke of Anjou being desirous to retire with honour. But before the Ambassadors of Poland arrive, they must trie their last force. The 12. of Iune the assaillants giue a fierce scaldoe, at the little breach nere to the old fountaine. About a hundred or six score gentlemen mount with targetts and courtelas: some get to the toppe of the mount, and viewe the trench and the counterscarpe gabioned within the trench. A vollee of shot, overthrowes fiftene or twentie vpon the place, and makes the rest retire. The Duke himselfe is in danger, but the prouidence of God referued him for a more exemplarie ende.

The last charge giuen to Rochelle.

As he beheld the breach made at the olde fountaine, a soldiar shoots at him from the Towne: but de Vin the master of his horse, seeing the fire in the cocke, steppes before him, and with the willing losse of his life saued his masters. In the end the Ambassadors of Poland come the 17. of Iune, to carrie away their new chosen King. God with this meanes to deliuer Rochelle, being vnfurnished of victualls, of munition for the warre, and of many hundreds of their men. The King, by his articles of peace made in forme of an edict, grants to them of Rochell, Montauban, Nismes, and other Townes which had mainteyned themselves, free exercise of their religion, and to others permission to liue in their houses without search, to solemnize Christenings and marriages after their manner, without any greater assemblie then ten persons besides the parents: but the said exercise was forbidden in Court, and ten Leagues round about. An other meanes did greatly ease the besieged, the diuision in the Dukes campe, and the aduertisements they receiued from their friends following the armie. So the ende of Peace of Trechade.

A of this sege, being of exceeding charge, and the graue of aboute twentie thousand men, layne in skirmishes, encounters, surprises, assaults, and dead of hurts, hungar and diseases, caused the King to make great desseins for the repaying of many errors, into the which the priuate ambition of some, abusing the youth and the violent passions of this Prince, had drawne him: But too late for him, for hee sees his Realme inflamed with the same fire, which they perswaded him should haue beene wholie quenched with the blood that was shed at Saint Bartlemewes; and the warres of ciuill diuision vterally extinct. So the seeling hee had in himselfe of these actions whereinto they had drawne him, shall soone lodge him in the sepulchre of his Predecessors.

B The other exploits of warre done else where in diuers Prouinces of the Realme, require some place in our historie. The Baron of Serniac, a wise man, vertuous and louing martiall discipline, with some others of Quercy, Foix and the neighbour Prouinces, hauing caused Montauban to resolute to armes, go to field with their troupes, put garrison into Terride whereof Serniac named himselfe Baron; tooke Euzet vpon Tar three Leagues from Tholouse, by icaldo, assure themselves of Villemur; seize vpon many other places, fortifie those they had held during all the former troubles, warrant the passages: then at an assemblie held at Realmont in Albigais, they made a diuision of their charges and governments. The Viscount of Gourdon had a part of Quercy towards Cadenac; and Serniac the other towards Montauban and Gascogne, the Viscount of Paulin Lauragais, the Viscount of Panas and his brother Rouergue, the Viscount of Caumont the Countie of Foix, and the mountaine Countie.

Warre in diuers Prouinces.

They were equal in their Commands: but to auoide ieaousie, they decreed that one of them wanting succour, the other commanders should succour him with all their forces, and be commanded by him. So they all retire to their governments, euerie one giues order for the preferuation of their estates. Serniac occupes some neighbour places, then hee campees with two thousand shot, and some horse before Monricou, makes a breach, giues three assaults and one scaldoe, & is repulsed with losse. Vouze and Realuille make him receiue the like disgrace, and kill many of his men. But he is reuenged to the benefit of one of his Captains, besieged in a village with foure score men: he slue about two hundred men, and put the rest to flight.

In Languedoc.

The Earle of Villars, Admirall of France and Lieutenant for the King against the Protestants, in Quercy and the Countries there abouts, gathers together his troupes, dispersed into garrisons, beseegeth and takes Saint Geniez in high Quercy: carries away the Lord of the place, notwithstanding the cōposition made to depart with their liues and goods: who was sent prisoner to Cahors. It is better to hunt a farre off, then nere at home. The pursute of many, against whome he had made cruell warre, brought him to a scaffold, as a spectacle and triumph to his enemies. Brifenell in high Rouergue had a capitulation better obserued: but the Admirall lost in counterchange, in the moneth of May, Soreze Montesquieu, two Leagues from Tholouse, Lodeue a Bishoprike and riche in the mountaines of Languedoc, and Mus Saintes Puelles, nere to Castelnau-dary.

The Marshall d' Anuille did likewise arme against the Protestants, fixe Cornets of horse and ten thousand foote, with foureteene peeces of battery, pretending to beseege Nismes, and then Vez, but the surprise of Sommieres nere to Beziers and Montpellier, called him from his enterprise. He beseegeth it, makes a breach and giues two assaults, which were defended to the losse of the beseegeth. The Earle of Candale brother in Lawe to the Marshall, arriues with a hundred horse and twelue companies of Gascons, who desire to haue the forward at the third assault: but with the losse of three hundred of the most resolute. This checke amazeth the Earle. What socks are wee, (saierth hee to the Marshall his brother in Lawe) to cause our selues to be thus beaten, murdered and layne, for their pleasure, who haue murdered our kinsmen, friends and allies, and will one day paie us with the same money?

The sege of Sommieres.

Hee

1573. He had reason, and the issue will teach vs soone the effect of this true deuination. if the Marshall of Montmorency had bene present, this farall 24. day of August, the same furie had interred him with all his house vnder this common ruine, as many others, yea Catholikes suffred the like violence by the practises of their priuate enemies, to whome the time and force gaue meanes to reuenge their priuate quarrells vnder an other pretext.

There were foure moneths alreadie spent at this seege, aboue fise thousand Cannon shot had beaten the walles of Sommiers to powder, victuals fayled, and the beleeged demanded nothing but composition. But the Marshall would haue it by force. He exhorts his brother in Lawe to reuenge the death of his Capitaines and soldiers, who suffers him selfe to be perswaded: but as he goes resolutely to the breach, performing the dutie of a braue Commander and a resolute soldiari, hee sees the place covered with a great number of his men, and himselfe in the ende ouerthrowne dead vpon the carcases.

This hens roust might haue bene the sepulcher of many more, but Grenier (to whome the honour of the taking, and keping of Sommiers is chiefly due) after they had performed the duties of valiant men, accepted the composition was offered by the Marshall: To depart, their droms sounding, Ensignes displayed, their marches light in their cockes, with seauen daies libertie to carrie away their bagage, and to retire where they pleased. So the Marshall seeing the resolution of them of Nismes, and having lost two thousand fise hundred of his best men, dismissed his troupes, and proceeded afterwards against the Protestants, by seizures and sale of their goods within his gouernment. The Admiralls army had an other successe. Terride, Flaignac and generally all which the Protestants held beyond the ruer of Garonne, recompensed the losses he had receiued. But Caussade stayed the course of his victories, and made him vnable to do any thing worthe of fame. La Motte-Puissols kept the Towne with fise hundred barguebuziers, and the repulse the Admirall receiued after a long wasting of his forces, caused in the end the ruine of his army, the which the Viconte of Gourdon shortned of a companie at the passage of Dordonne, chafing the rest which marched to the seege of Rochelle.

The King of Navarre had lately inuited his subiects of Berne to returne into the bosome of the Catholike Church. They answered their Prince with excuses, thinking it proceeded from an other motion, then his owne: and protest to other Churches of that partie, to perseuer and maintaine them elues with them in the same religion. See nowe the effects of their protestations. The Baron of Grandmont, marcheth into Berne to plant the ancient religion. They troupe together within the Countie, retayne him prisoner, and cut the most of his men in peeces. Saint Romain was chiefe of the Protestants in Vivarez, Mombrun in Daulphiné. The first held Villeneuve, the last seized vpon Orpierre, Serres, Meuse, and by diuers courtes he became terrible in the Diocesse of Die and the neighbour mountaines.

These newe broyles thrust their neighbours into like reuolts: and the King who thought by the abolition of the Edict, of the yeare 1570. at the least by the departure of his brother into Poland, and a peace granted before Rochelle, to enioy an assured rest, finds himselfe incombred with newe and generall combustions. Those of Quercy, Languedoc & their neighbors, planting an order and rule for the warre, and the administration of Iustice, protest against this Edict, terming it captious, and a forerunner of newe massacres. Our Capitall enemies (saied they) the authors of forepassed disorders, remayne the onely Councillors and gouernours of the King and his estate: all the Churches of France, are deprived of the publike exercise of religion solemnly graunted, and nowe by this Edict abolished: all the contents of this last pacification, and whatsoeuer else is promised vs, are but words without effects: it is a generall abolition of what is past, the murderers are absolved, and no mention made of any iustice to be done to them: All Ecclesiasticall discipline being forbidden vs, they will plunge vs in Atheisme. This treaty is but coloured by some priuate persons without any generall

Protestations against the peace of Rochelle.

A general aduow: whose approbation cannot preiudice the vniuersall bodie, neither ought they to yeeld to any thing without the common consent of our Churches. These complaints and Protestations cause them to assemble at Milland, and after at Montauban, and there diuiding Languedoc into two gouernments, they make Montauban chief of the one, & the Viconte of Paulin gouernour in that part, & Nismes of the other, for the neerenes of Seuennes and Vivaraux, vnder the command of Saint Romain: but by this subject to the authoritie of the Estates of the Countie, who gaue them counsell, and furnished them with money, being chosen in either gouernment of the worthiest men of the Countie, yet in such sort, as the particular estates of euery Diocesse, did in matters of importance, confer by their Deputies with the estates of the whole gouernment, and according to their conclusions, the gouernour should carrie himselfe, and receiue money from their hands. To fortifie this order, they decree: That the soldiars should be content with his entertainment, without spoiling of the Countie: that the Townes and villages of the contrary partie, should be taxed and forced to contribute for the enterainment of garrisons, to the end, their labour & reaping of their fruits might be free. The reuenues of benefices was appointed to make a stocke of money, to be employed in their greatest affaires, the which they had leytire to effect: for the election of the King of Poland busied the Court and Counsell in feasts, dancing, & pleasure. So they man many places, from whence they might at need draw forth almost entie thousand men, and by seising on the Clergie lands, and the contribution which came from all parts, they weaken their enemies. Many Catholikes otherwise discontented, growing familiar with them, and beginning to ioyne their forces together, lay great desseins, which shall soone breake out in all parts.

Matters thus handled, gaue a beginning to the fise troubles in France: but before it brake forth, the Protestants of Languedoc sent their Deputies to the King. They humbly thanke him for the affection he had seemed to haue to the maintenance of peace within his Realme, and necessarie meanes to restore an estate threatned with eminent ruine: they protest of their obedience, but they beseech his Maiestie, not to find it strange, if they assemble to preuent the pernicious attempts of wicked Councillors, who by their fraudulent, and violent practises, had induced him to declare himselfe, both by mouth, and his letters pattents, to the great blemish of his reputation among strangers, the Author of the massacre committed at Paris, the which he had few daies before disauowed, That they cannot beleue he should willingly condiscend to so bloudie effects: and the feare they had to fall into the like, forced them to seeke all meanes they could to warrant themselves, with the losse of their companions blood to victoriously shed.

They request therefore. That for the effect of the peace, those of the religion should in those Townes they held, & in two others of euery Prouince, chosen by four Deputies, haue garrisons enterdayned at the Kings charge, the exercise of their religion free and publike, to all such as would demand it, the observation of their benefices without discipline, the buriall of their dead, without distinction of religion, the church-yard: the exemption of contributions for the Ceremonies of the Romish Church: the Reception of their children into Colleges, vnder tutors of their owne religion: Legitimation for such as should be borne of the marriage of Priests conuerted to their doctrine. Election of a new Parliament in euery Prouince, composed of iudges of the same religion. The tythes which they payed to the Priests, to be reserued for the maintenance of their ministers. Punishment of the authors, Councillors, and executioners of massacres, as theenes, and disturbers of the publike quiet. Moreover, they demand, that the Admiral, with all those that had bene murdered, and that were then liuing, should be reputed to haue bene, and to be faithfull seruants and subiects to the King, and his estate, innocent of rebellion, and guiltles of confiracie. A nullitie of all acts made against them as calumnious. Restitution of goods, honours, and offices, to the heires of them that were murdered. Abolition of all infamous monuments, and generall processions instituted in memorie of so execrable a day.

These

The Protestants order in Languedoc.

These petitioners were chosen by the King.

1573. There were the principall points of their propositions, amongst other articles concerning the government. But they treated partly, as humble seruants, partly as armed subiects, like vnto such as beg for almes with their swords in their hands. And as a new alteration flies easily and sodenly from one Prouince to another, so those of Prouence, Daulphiné, Lionnois, and others, ioyned with the first: and by the mouth of a Deputie, present their petition and admonitions to the King. The King sends him to certaine Commissioners, to conferre thereof; and promiset, that after he had conducted his Brother out off the realme, he would do all things necessary for the contentment of his subiects.

The apprehension of Charles.

This hardy resolution taken in Languedoc and the neighbour Countries, made our Charles to change both his countenance and his speech. Hee sees well, the more he hastened, the more impatiently they did beare his Brothers departure: namely the Queene mother, the Duke of Guise, and the Clergie. Henry himselfe desired rather to beare the title of Duke of Anjou in France, then the King of Poland: neyther was hee greatly pleased, to make so long and so crosse a pilgrimage. His most confident seruants would willingly haue discontented the Polonois in their answer, eyther to haue sent them away ill satisfied, or to winne time vntill the spring. But there was no remedie. Charles could no more containe himselfe amidst the complaints which came from so many parts of his realme, but sometimes giues out threats against them which had abused him, making him beleue, that after the execution of the 24. of August last past, he should raigne free from confusions. Strangers reproche him openly with the irreparable wrongs he had done to himselfe, and to his subiects: & accuse him, that in steed of a father, he had bene a butcher, and a hangman of his people, or at the least taxed his honor with this title, by the induction of the principal authors of this horrible disorder. The delays of his Brother displeased him. Henry by his affability wonne the peoples hearts. The affection which Charles noted of long time in the mother, to his aduancement as her best sonne, the credit which the house of Guise had in him, or at the least seemed to haue, & the hope which the Clergie grounded vpon his authority (they had already recompensed these agreeable seruices which hee had done them, with a present of three hundred thousand Crownes, and had much augmented it, if Rochelle had bin taken) made him to be suspected and searefull to the King his Brother, who D even then would willingly haue found the means to chastise such, as vnder the shadow of his name, had opened the way to so great iniustice, & such enraged furies. But during these garboiles and confusions of affaires, he found not any one of his Councillors of State, that did teach him to dissemble, and to containe himselfe, vntill that opportunity should giue him meanes of reuenge. So his complaints and threats were carefully observed, and bitterly digested by such as it concerned. The Queene Mother, not able any longer to differ the departure of her sonne Henry. Go (saith she) my sonne, you shall not continue long there. And as Charles goes before vnto the frontier, pressing his brother to follow him, he is sodenly staid by a great sicknesse, at Vitry in Champagne, giuing occasion to his most confident seruants to thinke, that aboute two attended the issue of his infirmity, and to speake disgracefully of the Queene Mother, the new King, and their trustiest seruants, whereof some retired from Court, & went to shrowd themselves in Brittany, seeing that the vigour of the Kings youth, had expelled the venom of his disease, by his head, neck, and visage. The King of Poland building vpon his mothers promises, departed in the end of October, being assured of the loue shee bare him aboue the other two. She feared the humors and threats of Charles: and Francis Duke of Alanson did not greatly affect the house of Guise, neither had he approved the massacre.

King Charles falls dangerously sick.

New practices in Court.

The malcontents, who with a lesse odious name called themselves Politiques, finde credit with him, thinke him fit to reduce the affaires to a better course, & make him to repire at the small account is held of him: they let him vnderstand how small a proportion was allotted him for his maintenance: the distrust they haue of his faith, the opposition of the Q. Mother, to keepe him from the Lieutenantcy of the Realme (who gave the King to vnderstand, that by meanes of his malcontents, hee might stirre vp some factious

A factious mutinie hauing the forces at his commaund) the search was made of him, and the meanes which were offered vnto him to restore the Realme. Catherine was well acquainted with these practises, but the cunningly makes her profit of them all, during the Kings sicknes, to auoid the danger when she pleased, and to ruine one by another at need, as hereafter we shall see they will doe their best.

During these alterations, those of Languedoc fortified themselves. To keepe them at a stay, vnder hope of some content, they appoint a generall Parliament at Compiègne: the Prouinces prepare their remembrances, some Deputies were on the way with instructions and Commissions, to speake boldly, namely against the Authors and Councillors of murthers. The Queene mother and her followers fearing the touch, obiecting a reuocation of the States, and labouring at the first to pacifie these deputies by promises and wordes, in the end they change their countenances, they vse threats, and do so terrifie them, as they returne home onely with a vaine hope, to receiue satisfaction shortly to their demaunds, and permission (especially to them of Languedoc) to assemble againe for the drawing of new articles, concerning the preservation of themselves and their associates: the which they did afterwards at Milland in Rouergue, and those of Rochelle entred into association with them, forced vnto it by the practises and deuises of Fugaillard, Landereau, the Baron of la Garde, and others attending to surpriue them: but ended with the yeare, and the liues of some, that vndertooke it, being publickly executed.

C The fourth troubles begun with the massacres, had some respite by the peace of Rochelle: but now this last conspiracie discovered, and the practises to surpriue them of Languedoc, the secret leuies of men, to assaile them sodainly, giues an enterance to the first. The Protestants alleage for the ground of their arming, the infinite outrages which haue bene done them within few monethes, and send aduertisements, and admonitions to the Princes, Nobilitie, the Parliaments, and the Estates. The Malcontents, and such as were most inward with the Duke of Alanson, foreseeing the shortnes of the Kings life, yet not daring to complaine of it, but in shaking of the shoulders, and holding downe the head, sollicit him to gett the Lieutenantcy generally, to represent the Kings person, or if they will employ him against them of Languedoc, that he should seeke to saue the Realme, from the violence of such as by the death of Charles, and the absence of Henry, would seeke to seize thereon.

Hee makes request vnto the King, being at Saint Germain in Laye, and the King doth acquaint the Queene mother, and the Marshall of Montmorency with the Dukes desire. To deny the Duke his request (saith the Marshall) were to do him wrong, and to call his sufficiency into question, seeing the same place had bene giuen to the Duke of Anjou without demanding it. But the Queene mother, and those of Guise, desired it rather for the Duke of Lorraine, whome soone after shee expressly called to Court: and in the meane time seemes to beleue, that they bee practises of the Marshalls of Montmorency and Cossé, at the perswasions of the King of Nauarre, and Prince of Condé, to the end the Kings furie might bring to ruine both the one and the other.

She therefore takes Councell to assure her selfe, and to destroy such as would follow any other partie but her owne: and euen then did shee trouble the Kings head with an exceeding feare, and distrust of his household seruants. The Duke of Guise would gladly haue vndertaken the house of Montmorency: but it was to no purpose, if all the foure bretheren were not taken in one nett. The Marshall of d'Anuille was in Languedoc, and determined to ioyned with the Protestants: yet the death of the eldest might make the rest easie. So the Duke of Guise one day picks a quarrell in the base Court of Saint Germain, with Ventabran his household seruant, and for a slight cause, being resolved to kill him, hee drawes his sword. Ventabran flies directly to the Marshall of *Montmorency*s chamber, which hee finding shut, hee mounts higher to that of the Constables Ladie and widow: where finding Thoré, hee staves, and there receiues some blowes, but it was flatlings with his sword. This Tragick act (turned 1574. to a iest sent the Marshall out off Court, but hee shall soone returne, to receive a disgrace. The Duke of Alençon resolues likewise to leaue it, and to leade the King of Nauarre with him; but the execution was of great difficultie. To aske leaue, would breed too many scruples, and ielousies in the Kings head: to go without leaue, was to accuse himselfe of some plot, and to be pursued as a fugitiue. He therefore sirs not, but lets passe a troupe of two or three hundred horse, assembled in Normandie, to iour (as the common bruit was) the Duke of Alençon's retreat, or as others would haue it, (but without any likelihood) to murder the King, his mother, and his Councell. This leuie terrified the Court, and brought it to Paris: they presently charge the Duke of Alençon, and the King of Nauarre. To purge themselves, they publish a declaration the foure and twentieth of March, touching the fact of Saint Germain: they protest of their good affection to the King, and they offer their seruices against all rebels.

The Marshall of Montmorency put in the Bastille.

Diuers exploits of war.

Caste Montgomery taken.

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency is perswaded to come to Court. He is no sooner arriued, but they appoint him the Bastille for his lodging, and for companions in prison, the Marshall of Coffe, la Mole, Cocornas, and Tourtay, seruants to the Duke of Alençon, whereof the three last lost their heads at Paris, culpable onely to haue beene acquainted with some of their masters. Councels to abandon the Court. During these broyles in Court, the Protestants and their associates make their profit in Vivarez, Dauphiné, Languedoc and Poitou. And the Marshall d' Anuille, hauing by letters surpris'd, discovered the practise against him, conferred now with Saint Roman Gouverneur of Nismes: But seising on Montpellier, Beaucaire, Lunel and Fesque, he gives the Protestants some cause to suspect his desseins. The Politicks of Poitou hauing ioyned with La Noue, seize vpon S. Maixant, Melle, Fontenay, Lusignan and other places. They checke fell vpon the Normans, Montgomery, Lorges, and Gahard his children, Colombières, Sey, and others with troupes of horse and foote, had secretly taken Saint Lo, Carentan and Valognes: but Matignon and Fernuques ioyned with the forces of the Conte Therigni, (who alreadie camped before Saint Lo) shut him into Danfrone, a weeke place, and ill furnished, with three score horse, and foure score hargubuziers. They batter the Castle, make a breach of five and fortie paces, and hauing beene vigorously repulsed from a sharpe assault, the Earle abandoned by his people, (whereof the most part were gone to his enemies, and the rest watering, being vnfurnished of munition, water and succours, perswaded by the Lord of Vassé (for he held it farre more honorable to die vpon the breach, with a pike in his hand, then to fall into the Queene mothers power, to end his dayes ignominiously on a scaffold:) he did capitulate, but not without a greuous apprehensio of Colombières, desiring rather to die vpon the breach, then to serue as a spectacle at the Greue at Paris,) to depart with their lues, and to carie away some furniture, with their swords and daggers: vpon condition notwithstanding, to remaine some time in the hands of Matignon, and Vessé kintman to the Earle, with suretie of his life.

A capricious and fraudulent composition: the obseruation whereof must needs be broken. The Earle goes forth, and was led away by Matignon and Fernuques at midnight: but his company remaine at the enemies deuotion, who force the Castle, kill some, spoyle the rest, and put them all to ransom. Then Vassé appointed by the two commanders, lead the Earle to Paris: where since wee did see him goare a mournfull scaffold, & expiate by his death (to the Queenes content) that of King Henry her husband. In the meane time, the Duke of Montpensier made warre in Poitou, but slowly: and except the Castle of Talmont which he tooke from the Protestants by composition, he did not any thing worthie of memorie.

The taking hereof was encountred with two great disgraces, the one neer to Sainte Hermine, in the defeat of his companie by Saint Estienne, Captaine of Fontenay, (who slue many gentlemen: led away fiftene or sixteene prisoners, gott great store of baggage, and the Dukes plate:) The other at the sege of Fontenay. Some thinking to reuenge a disgrace, doe oftentimes increase it. Hee gott nothing but blowes, with 1574. A with the losse of the most resolute of his troupes: and then an honest colour, the Kings sicknesse called him from this sege, to attend new Commotions and forces. At that time, the Prince of Condé did recreate himselfe in Picardie, wearied with the turnes of the Court. Being aduertised of diuers practises layd to seize vpon his person, he flies into Germanie, with Thoré, il beloued by reason of the Marshalls of Montmorency and d' Anuille his brethren, and the Councels given to the Duke of Alençon. Being at Strasbourg, he exhorts the Protestant Churches, to relie vpon his loue and zeale for their releefe, and Thoré perswades his brother d' Anuille, to open his eyes, and to embrace the occasion that was offered. This Marshall held the wolfe by the eares: for on the one side, the Protestants of Languedoc might greatly crosse him, if he had banded his forces directly against them: and on the other side, he feared the King, and the Queene his mother, who to keepe him in awe, carried his eldest brother to be iudged, as a sure pledge for his yongers actions. Hee must therefore assure himselfe on all sides, and according to the coure of the market, entertaine both the one, and the other, expecting a Catastrophe of this strange and horrible Tragedie, which was acted in Court.

The King decayed in the meane time, & decayed visibly in the prime of his age: & since the King of Polands departure, he seemed more changed in mind, then in body, being incensed especially against the authours and Concellors of the massacre, (as he made known by his speeches, to some of his Court being enemies to iniustice, and by letters written out of the Realme) for whom he prepared a strange portion, if the prouidence of God had not reserved them as scourges and ministers of that punishment he meant to inflict vpon this Realme, to the end that seeing him afterwards to cast the erods into the fire, we should confesse: That it is not now alone that hee sheweth him selfe the gardien and Protector of this Monarchie. At that time Charles lay taken both hand and foot, his cheete seruants were dead, disgraced, and absent. The moriues of new troubles did much disquiet him. Hee did foresee infallible seeds of combustion in the coloured captiuitie of his brother, and brother in Law: in the imprisonment of the two Marshalls: in the exile of the Prince of Condé, in whose fauour the Germanians began to arme. Hee sees his subjects cruelly armed one against another, and the fire of diuision readie to wast the Realme. His infirmities had some intermission during winter, but in the end, after he had languished the months of February, March, and April, tormented with many pangs, hee kept his bed: and the thirtieth day of May, hee slept his last sleepe, in the Castle of Bois de Vincennes, after great effusion of blood, which issued out by all the passages of his bodie, the last two weekes of his sicknesse, during the which he endured all the violent assaults and combats which the vigour of youth might suffer in the extreamest pangs of death.

His successeur could not come so soone from Poland. Catherine therefore to assure his authoritie during his absence, had obtained on the nine and twentieth day, letters of Regentie from the King, directed to the Gouvernours of Provinces: and the better to fortifie this nomination, to restrain the Princes of the blood, and to maintaine her selfe in the midst of confusion, she causeth letters Parents to be sealed by the Councillor of Firague, her seruant, and by this meanes doth abolish the fundamentall lawes, the order of the Realme, the priuileges of Princes, the authoritie of the generall Estates, and the prerogative of the Parliaments.

Charles was borne the seuen and twentieth of Iune 1550. and began to raigne the fifth of December 1560. A Prince of a very active disposition, inconstant in his thoughts, violent in his enterprises, impatient, readie of conceits, the which he did exerce in good termes, a diligent obseruer of other mens natures, cholerike, secret, a dissembler, cruell, and a blaiphemer. But let vs impute these vices and others, not to his naturall inclination, but to his gouernours and scholemasters, amongst the which the historie doth especially note Martignes and Laffes, who with the consent of the mother corrupted this yong Prince, and made him take the habit of Vices and infectious, wherein they daily plunged him. They might haue pruned this yong plant better,

Charles dies.

His disposition.

1574. to haue brought forth better fruites. At the beginning he was open, courteous, diuine, sober, and little giuen to women. His speech was pleasing: hee loued musicke and poetrie: we reade yet good verses compiled by him in French. But the pleasure of hunting transported him wonderfully, and the blood of wild beasts, which hee drew with singular delight, made him with long continuance, as it were greedy of mans blood. But let vs tremble in this death, vnder the Iustice of Gods Iudgements, who suffered (after so horrible a butchery committed and commanded during his raigne) him to bee surprisid with a great debilitie in his latter dayes; to wallow in his owne blood, vomiting it out pittifully by all the condicts of his body, as an iudgement for him that barbarously shed it, throughout all the Prouinces of the realme. Doubtlesse God loues not the Prince, that thirsts after his subiects blood, for the subiects blood is the very blood of their Prince.

HENRIE the third, 62. King of France.

*I*t is a great comfort vnto mee (sayd Charles, some few houres before C his death) that I leaue no heyres males lawfully begotten, for leauing him young, he must indure many crosses, and France hath need of a man. But alas, we shall now see one aduanced to the crowne, whereto the fundamentall lawe of State and honour doth call him, insidid with

With a confused beginning, and afterwards, by an Edict of pacification, to reduce and receive his subiects happily in their obedience, vnder a raigne as lasciuious and voluptuous as the other had bene: cruell and bloudie: vntill that the house of Guise (seeing the king baren, and his successor confined in shewe, beyond the riuier of Loire) shall discover their ambition, and cause (but in the end with the losse of the liues of two of the chiefe motives of confusion) the people to breake out into a blind, vaine and treacherous rebellion, being too readie to second the ambitious desires of great men, and to runne at random vnder the libertie of a turbulent raigne, and for the last scene of this tragedie, they stirre vp a monstrous monke, traiterously to murder him, and by his death to extinguish the name of Valois, and unwittingly to set the Crowne of France vpon the head of this Henry, the first of the branch of Bourbons, whome wee shall see happily called from beyond the riuier of Loire, miraculously to take the helme of this estate, and valiantly to encounter the dangerous attempts of his enemies, who had alreadye proclaymed a triumph before the victorie gotten, safely to quench the fires of diuision kindled in his Realme: and nowe to raigne in happilie, and by the admirable fauour and blessing of heauen, to gouerne his people in concord, peace and loue. This is the man whome France had neede of, to pacifie the diuisions both of great and small, to restore their generall and priuate ruines: and vnder so gentle and milde a commande, to preserve them from the proude Emperie of Strangers. Doubtlesse France cannot bee gouerned but by a Frenchman, as wee shall see, hauing learned the beginning, progresse and pittifull ende of this Prince, vpon whome depended the estate of this great and mightie monarchie.

Postes flie with speede to carrie newes to the King of Poland, of the death of his elder brother, whilst the Queene mother attending his coming, made a truce with them of Poitou, to the end she might with lesse opposition furnish the warres of Normandie: and to stay them of Languedoc and other neighbour Prouinces, she perswaded the Duke of Alençon and the King of Nauarre, to giue them aduertisement of the death of Charles, and solicited the gouernours to write vnto the newe King, touching their zeale to his seruice, and desire (vnder her regencie) to obserue the like fidelity to him, as they had done to his Predecessors.

Matignon labored in the meane time to take Saint Lo and Carentan from certaine gentlemen Protestants, whome the breach of faith to the Earle of Montgomery, had made resolute in the defence of such places as they held. Colombiers escaped from Danfron, puts himselfe into Saint Lo with a small troupe of men, where hauing endured three assaults, and slaine nine or ten of their enemies Captaines, with three hundred of their men, in the ende hee is strooke dead with a shot: the which daunted his soldiars hearts, who vnurnished of a Commander, that might encourage them with the like authority, toyled with long fighting, they leaue the breach, and their retreat abandon both the place and the liues of two hundred men, to the mercie of Matignons men, to make satisfaction for the death of their companions. Carentan might likewise haue interred many Catholikes vnder the ruines of other wales. but Guitri and the chiefe of his company, seeing themselves aloane in Normandie without any hope of succours, went out by composition on horse-backe, with their swords, and the soldiars vpon condition to serue the King where hee should employ them.

Herevpon letters patters come from Henry, intituling himselfe King of France and of Poland, dated the five and twentieth of Iune, bearing confirmation and amplification of the Queene mothers Regencie and gouernment of the Realme. Hauing therefore taken the oath of all the Gouernours, and published the Kings letters patters, to make the way for her sonnes returne out of Poland, shee calles for the Nobility, assembles the foote, makes leuies of Reisires and Suisses: sends to the Prince Daulphin ionne to the Duke of Montpensier, and to Gordes, who made war in Daulphiné:

That

1574. That they should doe their best endeour to raine the Country which the Huguenots held: and chargeth the Duke of Vex, and the Lord of Joyeuse, to be watchfull over the Marshall D'Anville, with whom she had small credit in Languedoc. The importuning of his elder brother, the exile of the two younger, Mern and Thore, and the Regents letters being intercepted, had moued him: yet did he swim betwixt two streams, and maintaining himselfe betwixt both, he did nothing trust the Catholics: and not louing the Protestants, he applied himselfe vnto them as he had need of their helpe. These proceedings bred some ieaiousie in them of Tholouse: but especially the truce he made with the Protestants, the assignation he gaue for the assembly of the Estates of the Prouince at Montpellier the second of Iuly, and the ordinary residence he made in that Towne. So this Parliament by two decrees of the 19. of Iune, disallowed the truce, forbidding all persons within their iurisdiction, to go or send to these pretended Estates, appointed without the Kings permission, vpon paine to bee declared rebels, and breakers of the Lawes.

D'Anville suspected at Tholouse.

D'Anville associates himselfe with the Protestants.

War in Dauphiné.

Moreover, the Protestants perswaded by this truce, which gaue them some hope of peace, began to allow of their Gouuernours actions: and (notwithstanding the aduice of some who condemned this association, as threatening the ruine of their party by this coniunction) they vnite their forces with the Politiques, offensive and defensive against all that would assaile them. They enjoyed some rest, whilst that Montbrun cuts in peeces a regiment of the Prince Dauphins Foreward, and couers the bridge of Royans with foure hundred of the brauest of his armie, slaine vpon the place. For reuenge, he besiegeth Alais a small Towne, batters it, makes a breach, gives an assault, and is repulsed: but the besieged being vnable to maintaine it, retire into the Castle: the Prince surpriseth them, cast some downe headlong, and burnes the rest within it. Oste was the second of his triumphes: but Liuron stayed his course. The successful sallies of the Townesmen, and the ordinarie courses of Montbrun, who descending from Loriol, did still keepe the Prince in alarum, makes him to raise his siege, and to put his men into safety.

Int'uarais.

In Poitou.

The Protestants being freed on this side, they were fortified on the other, by the taking of Fessaux, a small Towne in Vivaraïs by Bochegude. Perigourde takes Chalencou, and S. Romain Nonnay for their part. La Noue (not to approue Katherins regencie, but rather to second the Prince of Condes forces which were prepared in Germanie) was at truce with the Regent, for the moneths of Iuly and August, in the Prouinces of Angoumois, Poitou, and Xaintonge. But the Regent hoped to subdue the Protestants of the sayd Prouinces, before her sonne should arrive. For the effecting whereof, he assembles men from all parts, to surpriseth them suddenly: that they being rooted out, the King should haue nothing to do but with them of Dauphiné and Languedoc. So the Duke of Montpensier, Chauigny, Puigassillard, Richelieu, Bussy of Amboise, and other Commanders, meete at Saumur with ten thousand men, and eightene peeces of Artillery. The Protestants flye speedily to armes: those of Lusignan in the beginning of Iuly ouerthrow the Gentlemen of Poitou: and those of Fontenay neere vnto Nantes, ouerthrow siue hundred Hargubuziers, almost all yonger brothers of the Gentlemen of Britanie.

Fontenay surprised.

These two checks thrust the Duke to the siege of Fontenay le Conte. S. Estienne commanded therein, with about twenty Gentlemen, and foure hundred Souldiers, and after some fauourable sallies, hauing valiantly maintained two sharpe assaults, and one scalado, the 16. of September, after fifteene dayes siege, beginning to treat of the composition before in question: behold Captaine Masserousse, eyther through feare, or desire to prouide for himselfe, or being too confident, for that they were vpon termes of capitulation, giues entranceto some of his acquaintance: the rest runnes thither by heapes, they force the breach being ill garded, and become masters of the Towne: they kill some souldiers, ran some others, strippe the rest, and chase them away with a white wande in their hands: but they vse the Towne with lesse rigour then a place taken by assault.

The

A The Baron of Sernignac, otherwise called Terride, recompensed this losse at the same time by the surpris of Castres in Albigois, and the slaughter of two hundred Italians being in garrison: and Langoyran gouernor of Perigueux for the Protestants by the absolute defeat of two hundred harguebuziers, whereof fixe onely escaped, to carrie newe to the rest of the partie.

1574.

Then Henry escaping secretly out of Poland, approached the Realme, where Henry Crowne attended him, desiring a farre off, to raine the Huguenots and to plant the only religion of his Fathers throughout the whole Realme. There is no sinne to great (saied the Emperour Maximilian vnto him) as to force mens consciences: and such as thinke to commande them, supposing to winne heauen; do often loose that which they possesse on earth. The like admonitions were giuen him in all places, in Aufryis, Venice and Piedmont: they exhort him in all places to pacifie the troubles of his Realme. But coming to Lions, for the first fruits of his entrie, they cause him to commit a great error: for (as Amoniac roats in his commentaries) in Steele of pacifying all things past, (as he might easily haue done, and haue giuen vs peace) they cause him to resolute vnto warre, making him beleue, that entring into Dauphiné all would yeeld vnto him, where as the least dog-hoole made head against him, & the best of his conquests could neyther recompence the blood of his men, nor the treasure he should spend in this warre.

The newe Kings arrival.

The Queene mother, the Dukes of Guise and Neuers, the Marshall of Retz, the Chancellor Birague, and some other newe bread Frenchmen, disposed of the affaires at their pleasure in the secret Councells of the Cabinet. The King did willingly giue them authority (and what might bee expected of men who gladlie would people France with newe Colonies of Italians, Lorrains and Piedmontois) carrying onely to Court Ladies, from the which he had beene sequestred almost a yeare, with this nation which is lesse lasciuious then ours.

Bad Councells 1615.

These pernicious Councellors cause him to protest by sundrie proclamations of his loue to the good of his subiects, and to abolish what was past, so as they lay aside armes, deliuer him all his Townes, and liue quietly in their houses, without any search, constraint or molestation for matter of conscience. A policy practised by them, to entertaine the fire of ciuill diuisions, to rule in this confusion, and to fortifie a third partie, which in the end we shall see will oppresse the King, and bring the Realme to a very miserable estate.

The Protestants stood then the more vpon their gards: they are full of ieaiousie, distrust, doubt and feare. All those pattents made no mention of libertie for their religion, neither of a Parliament, for the politike gouernment, nor of a nationall Councell, for matters of conscience. And what was it, to graunt vnto the Rochelais libertie of conscience, and to forbid the exercise of their religion for a certaine season, but to keepe their partie at a gase, whilst by their great preparations which were made in all parts, they should bee able to put a mightie armie to field, to raine them without hope of ryfing.

So they arme on all sides, especially in Poitou. The Baron of Frontenay, (afterwards Lord of Rohan in Brittany), being followed by threescore gentlemen and fixe hundred good souldiers, puts himselfe into Lusignan, which the Duke Montpensier threatened, and according to the leysure hee gaue him, hee provided for the fortifications and all things necessarie to maintayne a memorable seege, which might by the meanes of some succours consume an armie before the Castell. About the beginning of October, the Duke incampes before it, and with a batterrie of about two thousand three hundred Cannon shot, thinkes to draw the besieged to a composition.

Seege of Lusignan.

F Their importune them, but they answer, they will attend a generall peace for all them of their religion. He salures them with twelue hundred and fiftie Cannon shot more, makes a breach, giues an assault vpon them, and is repulsed and beaten back with great losse. Five daies after the besieged sallie forth, and to reuenge the blood of 1574. of seauen yong gentlemen, fixeteene soldiars, and twentie that were hurt: at this first assault, they cloye fise Cannons, fire their powder, kill nine Capitaines and many soldiars, bring away many Enseignes, and returne laden with spoiles, armes and prisoners. This disgrace disperfed a part of his campe, and made him to spend all the moneth of Nouember without any attempt against the beleeged. In December the Duke fortified with twelue hundred Reistres, and fixe hundred French foote, preffeth Luzignan againe, and the more to hinder them, he batters downe a mill which did furnishe them with meale. So (their hand-mills not able to suffice) they began to want bread. To ease them of some superfluous mouthes, they craue a palport for some gentlewomen and other persons vsfit for the warre, to returne to their houses, or some other places of safetie. But the hatred this Prince did beare to the Protestants had more force in him, than the ordinary curtesie which Frenchmen beare vnto Ladies. He supposed the wiues & Children should be an vrgent sting to draw their husbands and Fathers, to yeeld speedely. Nowe their horses serued them for foode, the soldiars almost starued, tooke away the bread violently as they carried it from the Owen: they brake into many houses in the night, to seeke for victualls, they had no wood but mouables and the ruines of houses, ill clothed, ill shod, ill lodged, & no cleane linnen, toyled with continuall trauell, to defend themselues both aboue and vnder ground, to frustrate the mines which the Duke caused to bee made, two of the which in their ruines buried many of the assaylants, and gaue the beleeged courageto continue firme in their resolution.

The 23. of the moneth they begin to thunder with eighteene Cannons and foure Culuerins, and the next day they continue the same furie with fise and twentie peeces. After dinner they come to the assault: the showers of musket shot comming from sundrie flankes, makes the enemy retire, and to leaue the breach full of dead bodies. The greatest force was against the ravelin of la Vacherie, which being woone by the assaylants, makes them retire to the Castell that had it in gard. At the first port of the Castell euery man did shewe his resolution: all fight in the midst of the thunder, fire and smoake, and fise houres together dispute it with a doubtfull and bloudie fight. In the end both the one and the other (being tired with so furious an assault) take breath, the beleeged remayning masters both of the Towne and Castell, being reduced to foure score cuirasses, and foure hundred and fiftie harguebuziers, resolute to liue and die both in the defence of the place and of their quarrell, hoping that la Noue would finde meanes to send them some reliefe.

Luzignan
yeilded.

Not courage, but force fayled them. So as Frontenay, the 25. of January, accepted the articles of composition which the Duke offered vnto him by the Collonel Sarrieu: Himselfe and his gentlemen to depart with their armes, horses and baggage, the Capitaines and other Commanders, euery one with a curtall, if they had any, their armes and baggage: the soldiars with their harguebuzes, their matches out, and their Enseignes wrapt vp, the gentlewomen, and all others that would depart, safely to be conducted to their houses, or else to Rochelle. Thus it was concluded. This seege caused about twelue hundred men to be slaine, a great number to bee maimed, and ruined a mighty armie. They endured ten thousand Cannon shot, with many assaults, and lost 25. gentlemen, and about two hundred soldiars. And the Duke, for a memory of his losses, caused the Castell of Luzignan to be razed, being in former times one of the goodliest fortresses in Europe.

Poussin beleeged.

Such conquests were of more difficultie in Daulphiné: the Protestants had mo places, and mo Capitaines at their deuotion. Poussin, Liuron, Prinas and others did greatly hinder the trafficke of Marsettes and Lions: and some running into Piedmont had charged the Kings baggage returning from Poland. To reuenge these insolencies, the king sends the Prince Daulphin to beseege Poussin: eighteene thousand men beseege it on either side of the riuer of Rhone, in the beginning of October: foureteene great Cannons batter it, and make a breach: Roche gude and Pierre gourd defend it with a wonderfull slaughter of the enemy, and so terrefied the rest of the army, as all were readie

A readie to runne vp their baggage: but suddenly the wall shaken with the artillery, and overcharged with earth cast vp for the trenches within the Towne, fallies downe to the ground. So the Towne lying open, and the ruines not to be repayed during the seige, the place being too straight, Saint Romuin, after many inroads and sharpe skirmishes, enters into it: and iudging that in the ende it would be forced, hee drew out off it men, women and children, and putting them into Prinas in safety, hee abandoned, and left Poussin to the beleegers mercie, who entering by heapes, spoile, sacke, burne and make the place desolate: and by the taking thereof, they recover a part off Turais, Oran, Loziod and Roimac (being vnable to endure the Cannon,) made easie the approaches of Liuron. But let vs view the estate of Languedoc.

B The Queene Mother, and these of Guisse, desired infinitely to dispossesse the Marshall of his gouernment, for hee cruised their aduancement with all his power, and stayed them from proceeding (as gladly they would) against his elder brother being a prisoner. But yet if hee had not fortified his estate with the Protestants partie, who were then strong in Languedoc, hardly could hee subsist amongst so many and so mightie enemies. He therefore in open assemblie of the estates at Montpelier, ioynes himselfe with them, & according to the declarations lately published by the Prince of condé, and the people of Languedoc, hee sets downe the causes of this his newe and forced taking of armes. The Vicent of Turone his sisters sonne, doth likewise publish his, of the same substance. Thoré and Asteru brethren and the Earle of Pentadour (brother in Law to the sayd Marshall) ioyne with him. The Duke of Alençon seemes to fauour it: but the event will shewe, whether it were fraudulent, or with a sincere intent.

This reuolte amazed the Court, and to stoppe the course thereof, the Queene mother doth presently, by gracious letters, inuite the Marshall to some agreement. But giuing the Protestants but a simple libertie of conscience, shee debarrs them of the publike exercise of their religion. The Marshall protests of his affection to the common good of this Realme, and assures the like desire to bee in his associats: but with all hee shewes, that the Councillors, who by that horrible and infamous massacre the 24. of August, had caused the deceased King to breake the last Edict of pacification, gouerning at this day the helme of the affaires, it was very difficult to establish a firme peace, the which may no way subsist, vnlesse the exercise of both religions may be indifferently allowed within the realme.

So this treatie of peace remayning fruitlesse, the Queene mother changeth her countenance, and labors by diuers practises (but in vaine, the alliance being yet too fresh) to sowe diuision betwixt the Marshall and his associats, and yet by sundrie massacres continues this pretended parle of a generall peace in France. But it could not be concluded with such conditions, as the King required: That all his Townes should first bee yeilded vnto him without exceptions, and then would he graunt his subjects peace.

E The Prince Daulphin, hauing left the commande of the Kings armie to the Marshall of B. Legarde, hee comes in the midst of December to campe before Liuron. Roesse a gentleman of Daulphiné commanded there, with about foure hundred men, but full of resolution and great valour, in a hillie place, strong of situation, but then of no fame amongst the other Townes of Daulphiné. Foureteene companies of the Kings gards; eleauen Enseignes of Suisses, twelue Enseignes of Harguebuziers and Daulphinois, nine Enseignes of Piedmont, three hundred men of the olde bandes, foure companies of men at armes, and eight Corners of Reistres beleeged it on all parts. Two and twenty great peeces of batterie, planted in threeparts, do batter it, and after eleauen hundred Cannon shot, make a breach of fise hundred paces.

Liuron honored with a second seige.

The Marshall was not satisfied with this ruine: hee will haue all battered downe, and with a generall ouerthrowe fill vp the trench. They make a greater breach with a new 1574. newe battery, of foureteene hundred Canon shot. He recouers the trench, and makes a defences for his men. All this doth nothing amaze the besegged : but contrariwise, to shewe that they haue force to defend themselves, and that they must haue great dexterity and resolution to take them : they tie to the ende of a Pike, a horse shoe, a paire of mittens and a cat ; they lift vp the pike, as if they would say : Marshal, this cat is not taken without mittens.

Such was the estate of Liuron, when as the King sojourning at Auignon, being in penury for money to supplie his exceffiue charge and prodigality, Charles Cardinall of Lorraine, (labouring the marriage of Henry with Louyse of Lorraine, daughter to the Earle of Vaudemont his kinswoman ;) and to furnish this exceffiue and stately pompe, aduising the King to sell for a hundred thousand crownes in benefices, was surprised with a feuer, and falling from a feuer into a frensie, he died the 23. of December, in the midst of a cruell tempest, and violent whirlwind, which vncouered the houles, and loosened the barres of iron in the Carthusiens Couent, in the suburbs of Auignon.

Cardinall of Lorraine dies.

Some impute this death, to the smelling of a certaine precious purse, which was giuen him full of rare peeces of gold, with the Queene Mothers priuity : whom the foresayd treaty of marriage, which the Cardinall did practise, made remember the crosses she had suffered after the marriage of Francis the 2. her eldest sonne, foreseeing that this newe alliance tended but to restore the house of Guise to the same authority they had enioyed vnder the raigne of the said Francis. Others did attribute it to the blowes the Cardinall had giuen himselfe vnder colour of deuotion, in the company of them that beat themselves in the sharpest time of winter. Others applied it to the iudgement of God vpon this Prelate, who drawing all his greatnesse, and all his meanes from the Clergy of France, would yet perswade the King to so pernicious an alienation of goods appointed for the vse of the Church, whatsoeuer it were. Notwithstanding the strict familiarity which the Queene mother had with the Cardinall, yet did she give this testimony of him after his death : That the 23. of December most wicked man was dead. And the people both faire and nere said : That this extraordinary storme in the ayre, noted that this man, hauing by cursed means filled his house with exceeding wealth, sackt, and torne France in peeces, and in wars, did then feeble the iust reward of his actions. Doubtlesse such was the end.

War in Languedoc and Dauphine.

Whilest the King becomes a new brother of these tormentors of France, his wife called Penirents, and the court was occupied some time in the ceremonies of this newe brotherhoode, the Estates of Languedoc being in want of peace, battered S. Giles neere to Auignon, and became matter of contention betwixt the Protestants making no shew to succour it. Montbrun on the other side, being assisted by his horsemen, did still catch vp some that were farthest from the place, and there was a Churchyard for the most hardy of the assaillants : where many were killed, and his life : men, women, and children, all labour in the loss of their liues, and enemies, and vnder the commaund of la Hay, (a young gentleman about dated twenty yeares of age, valiant and pleasing to the souldiars.) Foissus hauing bene there at the breach with Flancey and Bouquier Capitaines, to strowe the ruines of the cities with carcaffes, to cast many into the trenches, dead, wounded and languishing : and finally (after many assaults, and infinite Canonadoes, fortified with fifty thousand pikes, swords, stones, and such armes as necessity could yeeld to the besegged.

Thus those of Liuron withstood the fierce assaults of their enemies : the army diminished, and a certaine disease hauing wasted most part of the Piemontois, crept in among the other nations : when as the King iudging of the rest by this small Towne, found that he must seeke out some other meanes to reduce his subiects to obedience : Who were so resolute to armes, as a simple offer of liberty of conscience, might soone make them fall away. Many Couquests cause but sleight triumphes. A more stately crowne

A Crowne attended him : his Coronation called him, and the taking of Arguesmor-tes, a sea Towne and of great importance for the Protestants, inuited him to stay the course of their prosperity by some negotiation of peace.

Henry therefore packing vp his baggage, the thirteenth of Ianuarie, and approaching neere to Liuron, stayed some houres in the Campe. Here the souldiars cries and exclamations against him, and especially against his mother, gaue him to vnderstand : That the horrible disorders and vnworthie government of the latter yeares, had withdrawne that loue and reuerence to their Kings, for the which the French nation had bene so much commended : and so altered the mindes of the greatest part, as their iust grieffe transported them beyond the bounds of reason and modestie. Oh murderers (cried they with open throate) you shall not stab vs in our beddes, as you haue done the Admirall and the rest. Bring vs those Mignons, with their ruffes and perfumes : let them come to looke on our wines, they shall teach them whether it be a prey easie to carrie away. A lesson for a Soueraigne Prince, that if any diuersity of religion did make sonnes ingratefull to the Father : so all Lawes do abhorre the inhumanitie and impiety of a Father to his Children.

The Campe being dislodged, the rest of the Piemontois repassed the mountaines. The Dauphinois ashamed of the disgrace they had receiued at Liuron, disperse themselves heere and there : some Cornets of Reystres followe the Marshall of Reze into Provence, the rest with the Suisses are giuen to the Duke of Vex, to make warre in Languedoc : a government wherewith the King had lately honoured him.

Liuron raised.

Strange alterations. The Duke of Vex is nowe armed against them, for whose protection hee had often fought during the former warres : and the Marshall d'Anville lately their capitall enemy, nowe supports them. Thus great men play with religion, fitting themselves to that partie which they thinke may most auaille them, whatsoeuer it bee : and the people is still the anule, whereon all sortes of ham- mers strike.

But the Marshall did little remember the obseruation of the articles sworne in the association. And dissolutions creeping in among the Protestants, could not but pre- sence a speedie ruine of one of the parties, or of both together. Yet hee entertayned himselfe with them. So likewise did the Duke of Vex, and protesting that hee would make no warre but against the Marshalls faction, hee promised to reconcile all the Protestants to the King, if they would sequester themselves from the Politikes their associates. But hee would haue bene glad, that in ruining the one partie, they should haue ruined themselves.

Warre betwixt the Marshall, d' Anville & the Duke of Vex.

During these contentions betwixt the Marshall and the Duke, the King was crowned at Rheims, the fifteenth of February : and soone after he sent home Elisabeth of Austria (widowe to Charles the ninth) to the Emperour Maximilian her father, but with a lefetraine then her quality required. Then hee married Louyse the daughter to Nicholas Earle of Vaudemont in Lorraine, who they supposed should haue bene the wife of Thore the Constables youngest sonne. Practises of the Queene Mother, to maintaine the authority shee had gotten in France, about a daughter in Lawe of meaner quality then her selfe : and to fortifie her selfe with them of Guise, against the houses of Bourbon and Montmorency.

The Kings
coronation.

His marriage.

This marriage should haue caused as chaste and as vertuous a bedde on the Kings behalfe, as shee was chaste and vertuous whome hee had nowe espoused. And it seemed, the dissolutions and excesse of Court were come to their height in the raigne of Charles the ninth. But heereafter both King and Court (for the subiects doe frame themselves to the Princes humour) plunge themselves into more horrible dissolutenesse, then the best schoolemaster of corruption & filthinesse could inuent.

The Court is drowned in delights, and excesse : but they are at blowes in Languedoc, Warraz, Dauphiné, Perigieux, Auvergne, Xaintonge, and else where. D'Anville hath 1575. hath an enterprize vpon Bejiers: but hauing fayled, hee employed his forces against a fourescore and ten villages therabouts. Hee takes Alais, a Towne and Castell, and the Duke of Vzez, Saint Ferreol, a small Towne neere vnto Vzez, to annoy his subjects, and to force them to acknowledge their Lord. The forces on either side incounter often, fight, and by their common defeats weaken one an other, whilst the Protestants keepe the stakes and vewe the sport. Those of Viunarsis surprise the Towne of Beys and the Castell of Poussin, and kill the Capitaine and his garrison. Montbrun runnes through Daulphiné, and becomes master of many places. The Vicount of Turenne adds to the victories of his party, Perigieux, Brioude, la Gaillarde, serzie and some other places.

The Xaintongeois and those that lay neere vnto Rochelle, beganne to hold vp their heads, and go to armes. The Prince of Condé filled all his partie with great and speedie hopes. All rise, all dreame of newe forces. They must therefore decide by some practise to quench this great flame which was like to set the whole Realme on fire.

Negotiation
of peace.

Katherin amazed with this prosperous successe, hastens the deputies of the Prince of Condé, of Daulphiné and Languedoc: they come to Paris the tenth of Aprill, they present letters to the King from the Prince and Marshall, and demande free exercise of their religion throughout all France: newe Chambers in the Parliament for the administration of iustice, punishment of the murtherers, ease of impostes: a free assemblie of the Generall Estates, and an assurance for the entertainment of the pretended peace. Fifteene dayes are spent in disputes, wordes and discourses.

The King promisseth to content them all: but hee will haue them referre these demands to his will. Finally hee grauntes vnto the Protestants, To remaine where they pleased within the Realme: safetie for their persons without any search for matters of any conscience, lyuing in peace and modestly vnder the obedience of his Edicts: Exercise of their religion in those places they held, except at Montpellier, Castres, Aiguemortes and Beaucaire. The like priuileges for Lords of fees, for themselves their house-hold seruants and all other in their houses. And as for other gentlemen that haue no such fees, exercise for them and their families, but without the Townes and suburbs, ten Leagues from Paris and two Leagues from Court.

Too weake articles to content them, whose affaires so successfull, or to stay such as seeking innovations, were transported with future hopes. The Council considered it: neither were they other then wordes without effects. And vpon refusal made, to giue vnto the deputies a coppie of the Kings answeres to the petition and articles, pretended by them, to the ende they might shewe them to the assemblie of the Confederates, the treatie vanished into smoake, and serued onely to bring forth moones of newe confusions. Rochebude begins in Viunarsis. Those of Lions had recovered Anduze a small Towne vpon the Rhone, and fearing least Nonnay would likewise be lost, hee marcheth to supplie it with men. Vpon the way hee incountreth the enemy, chargeth them, and puts them in route, but hee gettes a great and a deadly wounde.

The death, and the approach of the Duke of Vzez to the siege of Beys, troubles them of Viunarsis more then before. Pierregourde succours them, and with the aide of a hundred and fittie men giues meanes to the gouernour of Beys to defend the Towne against the Duke that besieged it, vntill the beginning of May. The Duke hauing left it, they within the Towne issue forth: they kill aboute three hundred, and nothing staies them but the resistance made of the Suisses, from carrying away or cloying of his artillerie.

If the Dukes forces and threatens preuayled little against these men, his money and promites did lesse. Hee shippes his artillerie vpon the riuier of Rhone, raiseth 1575. raiseth his Campe, and by the houses which he burnt to ashes, he gets the ill will and hate of the people both farre and nere, for that hee grew so bitter against them, whilst lately he maintayned so courageously.

These parties thus diuided, bred newe seditions. At marceilles the people being risen against the Customers and Tollegatherers, runne to the Custome house, take their bookes of accounts, registers, weights and measures, and cast them into the sea. Some other Townes of Prouence followed this example. Some, called the thauen (being a troupe of malcontents, shauen after a certaine manner to bee knowne) arme against Treasurers and receiuers. The Baron of Alemagne, Orezon, Eslablon, and other heads of the Protestants, held Lourmarin, Riez, Seine and some other small Townes in the Prouince. To conclude, there are so many factions, so many parties, as one destroyes an other. The Lord of Vins goes to field, and reduceth to the Kings obedience all these last conquests, except Seine, and some other places thereabouts.

Montbrun, on the other side, made his forces fearefull in Daulphiné, but his too great lenitie to his souldiars, made him to purchase much ill will and manie enemies. Chastillon, a village neere vnto Die, strong by reason of the Castell, did annoy it. Francis of Bonne, Lord of Diguières (who commaunded in those parts,) resolves to pull this thorne out of their foote. Gordes gouernour of Daulphiné for the King, makes haft to crosse his attempt. Montbrun postes theier through the mountains, and descending into the plaine, hee chargeth Gordes thrice. The night comes and endes the conflict, Montbrun hauing lost eight men, and Gordes fixe and twentie.

Les Diguières approacheth in haft, but the next day, the thirteenth of Iune, Montbrun not satisfied with this aduantage, forceth his enemies to fight, and puts them to route: Gordes saues himselfe within Die. Two and twentie Enseignes of Suisses which hee had drawne from the Duke of Vzez after the siege of Beys, performe wonderful feates of armes: they make it good, and rather die then giue backe: but they are encountred by a generous resolution, who no lesse couetous of glorie, then they were enemies of a shamefull flight, strewes the place with nine hundred carcases, carrie away eightene Enseignes, and by the death of Freulich their Colonel, and of sixteene braue Captaines, Montbrun winnes an absolute and famous victorie. Du Bar and Gouuernet his Lieutenants, seconde him by the defeat of the whole companie of the Earle of Beine.

Such is the daylie change of humane things, which makes him by a pittifull Catastrophe to fall suddenly, who lately seemed to bee raised vp to the highest degree of honour. Gordes being prest within Die, calles for all the forces of the Countrie. Montbrun charged the first that shewed themselves in a straight: whereof part being slaine and part flying, they giue the alarme to the whole armie. But whilst the Argoletiers of Montbrun are busie at the spoile, a huge troupe of horse environ him, where (vertue yielding to the multitude) after a long conflict, they force through his troupes. His men being disperfed fle, some heere, some there. Himselfe thinking to leape a ditch, his horse falles and breakes his thighe.

So being forced to yeeld, Rochefort his Cousin, and Vrche, who commaunded the troupes, sweare to saue his life, and cause him to be carried to Crest. Hee lost in this hot skirmish two and twentie men: Du Bar among the rest, a braue and gallant young Gentleman: the others lost two hundred, whereof, some of them, by their most famous valour, left a wonderfull grieve to them that suruiued. Two and thirtie prisoners were taken with Montbrun, the which were freed for their ransom: but hee being tryed by the Parliament of Grenoble, (but after a double charge from the King and Queene Mother) not according to the Lawe of armes, but as one guiltie of high Treason, ended the remainder of his life vpon a scaffold, whome 1575. already the griefe of his hurt had halfe mortified. The historie commends this gentleman to haue bene valiant, modest, iust, not couetous, no exactor, but (as we haue noted) too milde to his souldiars, who for an vndiscreet reuenge of his deare, did afterwards commit wonderfull spoiles about Grenoble.

The wisdom, valour, age and happinesse of the Lord of Diguieres, hath since giuen good testimonie, that they had reason to chosse him to succeed Montbrun, and to bee Lieutenant to the Prince of Condé. For the first fruits of his gouernment, hee restored martiall discipline, as much as the time would suffer him, provided for the garriſons, and by composition, surprises, and force, brought many newe Conquests to the partie.

Xaintonge was likewise dismembred by the enterprises and ordinarie courses of two parties. Amongest others, Landereau had gotten the Ile of Ré: but loosing it the same day, hee gaue the Rocheleois meanes to enlarge their limitts. Such were the confusions which diuided both the Prouinces and the affections of this Realme. But the time nowe calles vs to a strange consideration, happened eyther by policie and of purpose, or else accidentally, as it chanceth often in worldly affaires, whereof the wise of this world can make their prouident commoditie, to drawe forth all such fruits as mans wisdom giues them hope to produce at all euill. But hee that towndes the botome of mans heart, laughes from aboue, and when hee pleaseth, (euen when as man dreames not of it,) hee confoundes the wisdom of the wise, the fooles in their follie, and the malicious in their owne malice.

The Duke of Alençon seemed to liue in great familiarity with the King, since his returne from Poland into France. Katherine sayed, that this reconciliation of the two Bretheren was the meanes to maintayne the Realme in peace. But the Councells, practises and negotiations, tooke an other course then was expected. The Prince of Condes affaires prospered on the other side the Rhin. Those of Languedoc preferred the defence of their liberties with the hazard of their liues, before the yoke of a doubtfull and disloyall peace.

Therefore, to destroy at once the generall forces of the Protestants, which threatened most dangerous effects to come: the Court (a good schoolmistress of dissimulations) must take an other vnaccustomed habit. Doubtlesse Katherine gaue many of these instructions to her Children: and the issue will shewe, that there were many of her deuises in the managing of the following affaires. Soderly the Duke of Alençon seemed discontented. Hee cannot (sayeth hee) haue iustice of the outrages were done him in keeping him prisoner: they disdain him: those of Guise are preferred by reason of the Queene their Cousin the Kings wife: his presence seems offensive to the King, who can endure no companion, nor any great man nigh him.

Thus it is bruted in all parts: That the Duke of Alençon is in verie bad termes with the King. These horse-leeches of the Court, who by publick troubles aduanced their priuate affaires, buzzed in his eares: hee beleeueth them, and many of the Nobles ioyned with him: the King and Queene mother, and the Council seeme to bee amazed thereat. In the ende hee leaues the Court the sixteenth of September, and meeting manie Gentlemen halte a League from Paris, hee retires to Breux: whether repaired daylie vnto him newe troupes of the Nobilitie of both religions, and amongest manie, some inwarde seruants to the Queene mother, namely Buffy of Amboise, a bloudie, wicked, and a furious man.

This departure causeth newe broyles and murmuring in Court. Every man thinks, euerie man speaks according to his owne imagination or desire. Some beleue verilie, the two Bretheren are at discorde: that the Duke not able to endure the brauadoes of them of Guise (whome hee abhorres and loues not, as the authors of publike confusions,) goes to ioyn with the Protestants and Politikes, to augment his portion, and by their common forces to plant a peace in France. Most of the Protestants were filled with pleasing hopes, promising themselves a golden world vnder this pretended reformer. But the cleere sighted remember what was past, and by the present estate iudge of the future. They knowe well the strange and variable humour of the Mother: and say, that shee vieth the dissembling of her Children as a laste for all feere: that hauing preuailed little with the Lions Kinne, shee will now put on the foxes: that shee finds the Duke fit to intrap them, seeing that both Protestants and Politikes seeke him ioynly, to vndertake their quarrells, and to make him their head: that being yong, and of small iudgement, neither greatly carefull of religion, or the reformation of the state, there was no likelyhoode hee should runne this course without their instruction, who had kept him so long in their power.

Thus men discoursed: but we commonly beleue that for certaine, which we most desire: All other aduice is reiected. They hope from the Duke of Alençon both the safety and the protection of the Realme. Hee, to maintayne so commendable a reputation, giues an account of his actions by a publike declaration, protests to imploy his forces, meanes and life, to banish the troublers of the publike quiet, to pursue iustice for all robberies, thefts, murders and massacres, to restore Noblemen, gentlemen and others, beeing prisoners or wrongfully banished, to their goods, offices and honours, to abolish all taxes, imposts and extraordinary subsidies, to maintayne the ancient lawes of the Realme, to defend the Nobility and Clergie in their priuileges, freedomes and liberties, and by a generall and free assembly of the three Estates, to constitute a good, firme and sure peace in France: hee takes all naturall Frenchmen of both religions into his protection, and vntill that a holy Councell may decide the controversies which diuided their soules, he exhorts them to liue in brotherly loue, and to suffer euerie man to enioye the exercise thereof.

This declaration is followed by letters to the Prince of Condé, the Marshall d'Anville, to the Earle of Vendadour, Viconte of Turenne, and to the chiefe among the Protestants: the most part of them receiue leaues of paper for an vndoubted oracle. Whereof some saied, they should shortly haue all things at their wil: but it was without effect, and contrary to promises.

The Prince of Condé, labored then for great succors in Germanie. This publication comes happily to dispose Frederic Elector and Conte Palatin to make a league with him: That they should not lay aside armes vntill the King had giuen the gouernment of Metz, Toul, and Verdun to Duke John Casimir his sonne, the places and reuenues depending on the sayd Bishopricks for the entertaynement of the necessary garriſons vnder the Kings authority, and free exercise of the reformed religion. That the King should giue him an honorable entertaynement, and to the Protestants of Languedoc an annuall pension of sixethousand Crownes: And a mutuall protestation both by the heads of Germanie and France, to do their best endeauour for the good of France. All this must needes feede the people with hope, to preuent all future troubles. But the Prince had some horse-leeches about him, who emptying their Compaions purses, filled their owne Coffers with golden Crownes: and the Protestants improved many perions in the affaires of their religion, that had neither faith, piety, nor religion.

The Court was wonderfully disquieted. The King sends many posts to the gouernors of Prouinces, conuies them to keepe their faith, accuseth the Protestants & Politikes, to haue withdrawne his brother from him. forbiddes his subiects to giue any aide, fauour or support to the Duke of Alençon: calles the gentlemen together, and besides his bands of Ordinarie, hee makes newe Cornets of horses, and for their entertaynement hee imposeth newe taxes. And to moue the people, and retayne them in obedience vnder the shewe of deuotion and pietie, hee ordaines processions, fasts and prayers, celebrates voves and pilgrimages.

1575. But being returned to the Louvre, the Ladies, and his little dogges (which he kept very daintely), made him to forget the care of affaires, and to leaue the managing thereof to his mother and some counsellors. She makes a journey to the Duke her sonne, to reconcile him (sayd she) vnto the King. But the suspicious held, that her going was to furnish him with new instructions: that being declared General of these bands, both forraigne and French, and of diuers religions, and hauing ratified (as he did soone after,) an accord made with Casimir, she might agree at her pleasure with him, and so disappoint the great desseignes of the armie.

After this parlee, the Duke marcheth into Poitou, the Earle of Vendour comes vnto him with three hundred horse, and twelue hundred Harguebuffiers: many great Noblemen and Gentlemen repaire vnto him. During these confusions, the Duke of Guise and his house, deuise to build a third partie, the which we shall soone see breake forth. For the present, hee assembles twelue hundred maisters in Champagne, vnder the Kings authoritye, and Stroffy twelue thousand foote: the Duke of Vex lends vnto them the rest of his horle, and the Duke of Montpensier sends his troups of Poitou.

The Marshall D'Anuille had required some Cornets of Reistres from the Prince of Condé, to fortifie him in Languedoc. But seeing these last desseignes had called away the Kings forces, to keepe the Germane Armie from entring: the Council decreed, that attending Casimir's coming, these Reistres appointed for Languedoc, should go to the Duke of Alençon, being already chosen to bee their chiefe and General. This did weaken their party: and this first check brought the most part of his Counsellors into a bad reputation, and confirmed the Protestants in the iualousies they had conceived of the Duke of Alençon. Thoré lead these troups, being about fiftene hundred: some French Gentlemen ioyned with him, with five hundred shotte. The Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, Biron, Feruaques and others, compassed them in. Some retyre and crye for money: some fight, imitating the French, but the greater number pretyles. Husking the Colonnell, with his Lieutenant and some Reistres, and French, are slaine vpon the place: the rest flie.

Cleruant and many others being taken, with some Cornets, serue as a triumph for the Duke of Guise: five hundred Reistres ioyned with his troups, he himselfe following them that fled) receiued a shotte with a Pistoll in the cheeke, and by his fall gaue meanes to many to escape the fury of his victorious armes. Thoré lead the remainder of this snipwracke to the Duke of Alençon, being blamed as a bad man of warre, and not capable of counsell. This wound is a ladder for the Duke of Guise to climbe to wonderfull credit with the Catholics: the Kings actions both publicke and priuate, beginne to displease them. The King (say they) takes his ease, and drownes himselfe in delights and pleasures: his Brother troubles all France, and the house of Guise beares the burthen of the affaires of the whole common-wealth. And vpon these fauourable repinings, the Duke hereafter grounds most terrible desseignes.

His forces were not able to encounter the power of Casimir. The King therefore calls for Mansfeld, Schomberg, Bassompierre, and other Colonnells, who promise to bring him eight thousand Reistres within fixe weekes, giuing them three hundred thousand Frankes downe, and foureteene hundred thousand when they were entred. The King was wonderfull needy: all was spent in vnprofitable sumptuousnesse, and vnworthy dissolutenesse: and part of this money could no where bee so easily found, as in the Parisians purses. To induce them therevnto, they obteine Bulles from Pope Gregorie the thirteenth, and foure Churches appointed within Paris to obtaine pardons for many yeares, vpon condition to ayde the King, to roote out heresies. And to drawe the Parisians by others example, they gaue it out, that Piennes sold his inheritance, to lend the King foure hundred thousand Frankes: that the Italians of Paris did furnish the like summe: and the Duke of Neuers, the Cardinall of Ferrara, Condé, Gordis, and Birague, nine hundred thousand frankes. Neither the first, nor the second bayte could make the Parisians to bite. They say, that within fiftene yeares their Cittie hath contributed twelue millions of gold, not comprehending the loanes and extraordinary impossibillities leuiued at Paris, and throughout the realme: that these ciuill dissensions, wast both their men, and money: they beseech him that (according to the notable aduertisements of Saint Lewis, to his sonne and successor, hee would mayntaine his subiects in peace and concord, by the bonds of pietie and Iustice.

Hee must haue money, and not wordes: and that by force, seeing loue cannot preuaile. Paris therefore is todaynly beset with garnisons: the King of Nauarre at Saint Cloud, the Duke of Guise at Saint Denis, the Duke of Neuers in the suburbs of Saint Germain. Biron at Montmartre, the Marshall of Rez at Pont Charenton and Ecis des Innocentes. Thus the Parisians are restrayned of their victuals, and force extorts from them the money, which kindnesse could not winne. In the meane time, the pretended Reistres were farre off, and Duke Casimir marched with the Prince of Condé.

To diuide the Duke of Alençon from these two heads, and frustrate the desseins of the Prince of Condé, the Queene mother comes againe to the Duke: shee treats a surceasing of armes for six monethes, and during the same, shee giues him for hostages, the Townes of Angoulesme, Niort, Saumur, Bourges, and la Charité: and for the Prince, Mexieres. The King doth ratifie this truce: but the gouernours of these places, for the most part refuse to yeeld them: neither will the Prince allow of it: for already there marched tenne thousand horle, fixe thousand Suisses, two thousand Lanquenets, three thousand French harguebuffiers, with foure great peeces of batterie, and sixteene leffe: the which threatned to make their passage easie.

This armie made chiefe account of the money which Languedoc should furnish, and the Marshall d'Anuille had promised the Prince to meet them with good troups, and to bring the pay vnto the armie: but no man appeares, neither is there any newes of money. An affront which then had made them yeeld to any possible conditions of peace: if they had beene offered it in the beginning of these first confusions: and might haue transported the men of warre beyond the bounds of modestie and reason, if by a good and commendable discipline the Prince had not restrayned the souldiars inolencies.

At their entrie, those of Langres (seeking to crosse their passage through their territories) did presently see the Reistres to spoile all, to loade their carres, and to burne the neighbour villages to ashes. Those of Dijon made some sallies, but they were fatall to some: others were content to salute them with their Cannon, shot into the ayre. Cisteaux, Gilly a Castle depending on the said Abbaie, and Nuis a small Towne in Bourgoigne, were the first conquests of the Reistres, the Prince, and Lanquenets: where they learned by the slaughter and spoyle which was made at Nuis, how troublesome a thing it is, for a Prince (emie to blood and spoyle) to be mastered by the greater number, being strangers in his armie.

At Lourdon the Reistres threaten the Prince to take an other partie, if hee giue them not readie money. Hauing contented them with hopes of good wordes, the armie passeth Loire, marcheth directly to the ruer of Allier, and takes Vichy by composition, a small Towne vpon the passage. Thus these strangers did forrage, whilst the King by a proposition of truce gaue hope of a future peace: and to preuent surprises, hee studied to fortifie the places about Paris, whether the whole armie threatened to come: for the effecting whereof, hee finds his ordinary let, which was the want of money. The Parisians remembred with what violence the King had lately forced them to yeeld to his demaunds: they now promise for their contribution foureteene hundred thousand frankes.

The King of

Court.The Duke of Alençon chief of the Protestants armie.The fifth Edict
of peace.

The Queene mother pursues this surceasing of armes, she furnissheth the Duke of Alençon with very exquisite meats, sends him his great hories, and causeth them to bee proclaymed traitors, that would not yeeld to the Duke her sonne amongst others the inhabitants of Bourges and la Charité, offering Tours and Blois in exchange of the said Townes. Those of Guise haue their dessein apart. He speaks boldly, that France hath no need of a truce: that they wil fight with the forraigne foe: & vpon this hope published, they build the proiects, which we shall see them shortly to vndertake. Amidst these common diuisions, a new confusion troubles the Court.

The King of Navarre, vnder colour of hunting, escapes from Paris with a small traine: and writes to the King from la Fere in Picardie, a Towne belonging vnto him. That the apprehension of a new Captiuitie: and the ordinary slanders of his enemies, are the causes of his absence. The King excuseth himselfe, and would haue him returne: but hee had the fields at libertie. And seeing this proiect will not preuaile, he must trie another. Some bad Councillors, which gouerned the Prince of Condé, aduised him to passe the riuer of Allier, and speedily to ioyne with the Duke of Alençon, leauing Duke Casimir on the other side the riuer, who should followe his ordinary march. In the meane time the Duke of Maïenne, attends them at the passage with the Kings armie. This trick left the Reistres to the slaughter: but Casimir an aduised and couragious Captaine, lodgeth his men with aduantage, and attenueth the enemye. The Prince discouering their dessein, turnes towards them, and makes the Kings troups retire to their lodging. The Auuegnats fearing least this armie should passe the rest of the winter vpon their marches, make them to take the way of Bourbonnois, giuing them a hundred and fiftie thousand franks. Here began the first parle of peace: and to this effect, letters and instructions were sent into Guienne, Languedoc and Dauphiné. Charoux a little Towne in Bourbonnois, besides money lent paid the charges of some daies that the armie stayed there, whilst they made question to yeeld.

The eleuenth of March, the Duke of Alençon comes to the plaine of Sone, where, in a generall muster, they numbred thirtie Cornets of German horse, tenne of French, tenne of Suisses, seuen of Lanquenets, eight of French, and the Prince of Condé, deliuering the white Cornet into the Dukes hands, according to the articles of their capitulation, he was sollemnly proclaymed Generall of this Noble and mightie armie. The King in the meane time, with the Queene mother and their Councillors, omitted no practises to corrupt Duke Casimir, and to breake the treatie betwixt the Prince and the Duke. On the other side, the French, Reistres, Suisses and Lanquenets, demaunded nothing but battaile, or to march towards Paris, but the Duke of Alençon was alreadie assured of the best part of his demaunds: and the armie without any memorabile exploits of warre, did onely spoyle and destroy France. At length the Queene mother seeing matters almost brought to a desired end, shee comes to the armie the seuen and twentieth of Aprill, where after diuerse Ambassages and contestations, shee granted in the end, to the Duke Casimir a company entertayned of a hundred men at armes, fortie thousand franks yearly pension, and two thousand Crownes for the entertaynement of a certaine number of horses. In consideration whereof, hee did renounce the article concerning Metz, Thoul and Verdun: That of eleuen millions of franks that were due vnto him, hee should receiue two millions within fixe weekes, and a sufficient payne of Jewells for the rest, and the reuenues of Chasteau Thierry. The Duke of Alençon should haue for his part, Aniou, Touraine and Berry, for an increase of his portion.

The Prince of Condé should haue the gouernment of Picardie, the Towne of Peronne for his abode, and two hundred souldiars in garrison: free exercise of the pretended reformed religion throughout the realme, attending a free and generall Councell: Chambers in the Parliaments of both religions, for the administration of Iustice: and at Montpellier for Languedoc, leauing them eight Townes in gard, for the assurance of these articles, and of their persons: Aguet-mortes and caire in Languedoc, Perigoux and le Mas of Verdun in Guyenne, Nions and Serres in Dauphiné, Iffoire in Auuegne, Seine, with the great Tower in Frouence. Restitution to the King of Navarre, Prince of Condé, Marshall D'Anuille, and diuers others, of their goods, offices, and honours, which they enioyed before the foure and twentieth of August 1572.

Moreover the King did auow by a sollemne declaration: That the massacres of the said yeare, had beene committed against all right and law of armes. He ordeyned, that the children of such Gentlemen as had beene murdered, should bee freed from all charges of warre: and such as were no Gentlemen, should bee eased of Subsidies for fixe yeares. Hee disanulled all iudgements giuen since the decease of Henry the second, in hatred of religion: and lately against the Politickes. Hee freed the Admirall, and all others murdered, from infamie: restoring their children to all their goods. Hee restored La Motte, Cocornas, and others, executed, or condemned, for contempt to their honours. Hee aduowed the taking of Armes by the Duke of Alençon and his associates, as taken for his seruice; giuing him the Towne of La Charité for two yeares. Hee appointed a Parliament at Blois in Nouember following. Hee cleared the Marshalls of Montmorency and Coffé of all accusations, held them for innocents, restored them to their former libertie, and acknowledged them for faithfull seruants to the King, and officers of the Crowne. The Edict conteyned many other articles depending vpon the former, and was allowed by the Parliament of Paris, the 14. of May.

So the Queene Mother granted much to many, to giue nothing to any, but to the Duke her sonne, who alone gotte more, then all the rest together. Altho Duke Casimir had no sooner turned his backe from France, but they began to finde this peace to bee counterfet, beeing made onely to disarme them, and to diuide the Commanders.

The Prince of Condé did first feeble the breach of these promises. They denie him his gouernement of Picardie: some seize vpon Peronne, and put in practice a strange peece of worke. Diuerse enterprises vpon the Princes person, make him to leaue the Duke of Alençon, and to retyre into Guyenne, to the King of Navarre, whom those of Rockell receiued into their Towne, with much honour and great triumphing, the eyght and twentieth of Iune. All such of his traine as they suspected were excluded.

Vpon deniall of Peronne, the King granted to the Prince the Towne of Saint Ieand Angely: but the inhabitants had a watchword, and a mutuall othe (after the example of a priuate league made by three score Gentlemen of Foison, who would haue no exercise but of the Catholike religion) to maintaine one another, and not to giue access to any one, of what religion soeuer, to the ende their quiet might no wayes at all bee disturbed or molested. The Prince seeing himselfe to haue this repulse, hee caused some Captaines to enter secretly, and then assured himselfe of the place.

It was then found very weake for the assurance of his person, against so many enemies that sought his death. Hee therefore discouers a certaine practise against him, but fatall to the Author alone. In the ende of October hee takes Brouage, a strong place neere vnto Rockelle. The Catholickes murmure against him, and accuse him as a disturber and breaker of the peace. Contrarywise, hee demanded Iustice against them that had seized on Peronne, as troublers of the publicke quiet, and guilty of treason. The Protestants likewise complaine vnto the King. That in diuers places they are disquieted in the exercise of their religion, granted by the Edict. That many Preachers moue the people to sedition. That the Chambers of both Religions are not erected. That Iustice is denied them. That both great and small bandie against them. And they produce ample and certaine proofes of these complaints and griefes.

Then

1567.

The protest
of the house
of Guise.

Then those of the house of Guise studied to discover those terrible projects which they had long hatched. The cloake of religion was a plausible and favourable pretext, to advance the designs of their pretensions. They had of many yeares, (especially vnder Francis the 2.) disputed of their beginning, and of the rights which fallie they pretended to haue vnto this Crowne. Charles and Henry were become odious: the first by his violences, the last by his dissolutions. Francis Duke of Anjou (for hereafter he shall carry that title,) had lately troubled France, and was taken for a turbulent Prince: a title vnpleasing to the people. The diuision for matters of conscience, seemed sufficient to keepe back the chiefe Princes of the bloud: the rest were weak both of age and power. Those of Guise in the meane time, had neither forgotten liberality, curtesie, nor shew of zeale in piety, to winne the Catholikes hearts. The Queene's Mother vsed them for a purpose, that by the mutuall ruine of the one and the other, she might maintaine her authoritie.

At Rome and in Spain.

But their fauours within the realme were not auailable. The Protestants crossed them infinitely: they must seeke a forraigne support. They finde it fitly at Rome, and in Spain. The Pope gouernes Catholikes consciences, and great men do still finde in religion a well coloured pretext to trouble the State. The King of Spain feared, lest the peace of this realme should breed him warres. The Prince of Auranges, and many Townes of the Lowe Countries, cast themselves already into the Kings protection, against the Spanishe tyrannie. They sollicite the Duke of Anjou instantly, and propound conditions vnto him, which make him to open both eares and mouth: and already many Gentlemen and Captaines, armed for this quarrell. So both the Consistory at Rome, and the King of Spain might well countenance these designs, grounded especially vpon the defence of the Catholike religion: the one for the zeale hee carries to the rooting out of heresie: the other, for the profit he reapes by our common diuisions.

And therefore those of Guise send their Agents to Rome, with instructions, and they that by the negligence of Kings issued from the house of Valois, descending from the line of Hugh Capet, (in the which there appeared none, but were dull or heretikes,) the Catholike religion decayed in this realme: whilst that the race of Charlemagne honoured with the blessing of the Romaine seate, the which subsists not but by that race (from the which they will make the world beleue, that they are descended in the direct masculine and lawfull line) remains despised, although it be ready to serue the Church faithfully, and that there liue at this day Princes of that race, commendable for their vertues, ready to spend their bloud and meanes, to augment the dignitie of the Church, and for the destruction of hereticks. And therefore they beseech the Consistory to approue and fauour their designs.

Their designs.

Their chiefe designs were, to ouerthrow the succession brought in by Hugh Capet, in the full assembly of the Estates, and to make the naming of a successor subiect vnto the sayd Estates: to cause the Princes of the bloud, that should oppose against the decrees of the Estates, to be declared incapable to succeed vnto the Crowne. And the residue, of what qualities soeuer, Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, degraded of their dignities: the money growing of their confiscations, to be employed for the warre, and their bodies to be executed. A reward to be appointed for them that should roote out such as could not be apprehended. To make the Estates protest to liue and dye in the faith, set done by the Council of Trent, to cause it to be signed in the open Parliament: To reuoke and disannull all publike Edicts, in fauour of the Protestants and their associates, and to pursue them to the death that should hinder the extirpation of heresies. To cause the King to reuoke the promises made vnto the Protestants: and to prescribe a certaine time vnto their associates, in the which they should present themselves before the Ecclesiasticall Iudges to be abolished: and then to be sent vnto the King, to purchase pardon of the crimes committed against his Maestie. To cause the King to name a Lieutenant generall, a Prince capable of experience, and fit to encounter the rebellion of Princes, that should seeke to hinder the effect of the precedent articles:

Articles: and who neuer had had part, societie nor communication with heretikes, to whom both hee and his Ancestors had euer beene professed enemies: And to require his Maestie to honour the Duke of Guise with that charge, being indued with all the perfections requisite in a great Captaine, and worthie of that Commission. To cause Iudges to be appointed to examine the crime committed by the Duke of Alexandre, declaring himselfe cheefe of the Heretikes, authorising the exercise of heresie: and forcing his Lord and brother to augment his portion. To cause the sayd Duke to come to Court, with the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé: and by ordinary and extraordinary forces, to seize vpon the said Duke, King, Prince, and all other that had accompanied them, and followed them in their enterprises. To cause such Captaines, as the parishes should giue to the Duke of Guise, to put all Protestants their adherents and complices to the sword, both in the Countie, and in walled Townes. To subdue by force or intelligence, the revolted Prouinces: to be masters of the field, to blocke up the Townes that were opposite, and to put all to fire and sword, that would make head against them. And after this goodly and infallible victorie, hauing wonne the loue of the Clergie, Nobilitie, and people, to take exemplary punishment of the Duke of Anjou, and his complices: then by the Popes consent and permission, to put the King and Queene into a monastierie, as Pepin his Ancestor did in former time to Childeric: and for an acknowledgement, and in fauour of the Romaine Sea to abolish the liberties and priuileges of the French Church.

These highe and great projects were harkened vnto, receiued and fauoured in the Court of Rome, & from that time those of Guise did not cease to dreame of the meanes to advance the effects. But this was to reckon without their host. They haue compassed some of their conclusions, but the end proued quite contrary to their meanings: wherein wee admire a most singular prouidence of the King of Kings, whereby hee hath vnto this day miraculously balanced: and in the end by his singular grace settled the estate of this Realme. The articles of this association were first drawn at Pronne in Picardie: but disguised with goodly shewes, to blind them that would examine them more exactly: which were to maintaine the Law of God, to restore the holy seruice thereof: To preserve the King and his Successors in the Estate, dignitie, seruice, and obedience due vnto him by his subiects: To restore vnto the Estates of the Realme, their rights, preheminences, and ancient liberties. And for the execution of these articles, a certaine forme of oath was propounded, inflicting paines of eternall damnation to the associates, that for any pretext whatsoever should withdraw themselves from this League, and a bond for such as should be enrolled, to employ their goods, persons, and liues, to punish, & by all meanes to ruine the enemies and perturbers thereof, and to punish them that should faile, or make any delays by the authoritie of the head, as he should thinke good.

The first League at Pronne.

This done, there were nothing but posts carrying the first newes of these designs. They cast many libels throughout the streets, in many good Townes: they murmur that they are too much supported by the Edict: they practise some to serue as firebrands, to kindle a new warre: and vnder this plausible, and commendable title of the name of the Church and diuine seruice, the people (a fit matter to nourish ciuill diuisions) giues eare to such as seeke to thrust them into mutinie. The King was daily aduertised of new complots. Hee found that this match did kindle a fire of perpetuall combustions within his Realme. On the other side, hee hated the Protestants, and would ruine them by degrees, but not by such instruments as wrought without his authoritie. His mother likewise hated them to the death, and greatly desired the ruine of the heads, being well content that these confusions should still diuide the French, so as holding the staffe in her hand, shee might terrifie her children, and maintaine her authoritie, make warre, and giue peace whensoever shee pleased.

Thus the causeth the Duke of Alençon to come to the Court, and the King to certaine his subiects of both religions, in hope of better concord, by meanes of reconciliation: and to cut off all new factions, he deferred the generall assembly of the Estates vnto the fifteenth of December following. He presumed likewise, that all his subiects abhorring the ruine of Townes, the desolation of Countreies, and the spoyle of Strangers, would gladly preferre the entertaynement of a peace solemnly forme, before the continuance of warre: and by this meanes, hee should prevent all turbulent persons, and bridle the Protestants, whome he ment to consume otherwise then by open warre: whereby neither his predecessor, nor he himselfe had gotten any honorable triumphes.

The day (appointed for the Estates) comes, the King himselfe begins it. Hee la-ments the calamities of his realme, whereof the tender age in the which he is brother, and himselfe were in the beginning of these ciuill warres, may well iustly frowne, that they were not the authors and motiues. Hee protests, to haue no desicme nor desire, but for the safetie and quiet of his people, whose miseries hee would redeeme with the price of his life. Hee coniures the assembly, to assist him in his ho'y resolution.
To deuise some meanes to redeeme the lands of the Crowne, engaged for above a hundred millions of gold: to vnite themselues firmly together, to roote out all seeds of partialities, to reforme abuses, establish iustice, and to restore the Realme to the ancient dignitie. Biraque the Chancellor, adds the rest: but the two maine points of his speech, were to iustifie the Queene mothers gouernment, and to demand money. Peter d'Espinae Arch-bishop of Lion, and the Baron of Senecy, are spekers: the one for the Clergie, the other for the Nobilitie: and both conclude a publike exercise of one onely religion in France. Peter Versoris, Advocate in the Court of Parliament at Paris, Orator for the third estate, insists especially for the vnion of all the kings subiects in one religion, but by mild meanes, and without warre: he beseecheth the King, to maintaine his people in peace, to reconcile his Princes, and exactly to examine the bad go-uernment of his treasurer.

The King seemed to incline onely, to alter some articles in the last Edict of pacification, and not to abolish it quite: but he was needie, and feared that where with they threatened him: That no man would assist him, but vpon condition to make warre against the Huguenots. Thus the perswasions and promises of the Clergie, & Nobilitie, prevailed more then those that preferred peaceable proceedings before violent, making him resolute to armes, to roote out all other exercise of religion but the Catho-like, to banish all ministers, deacons, and ouerseers of the pretended reformed religion: and yet to take all his other subiects of the said religion into his protection, attending, that by better instructions they might be reclaimed to the bosome of the Church.
But the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, the Marshall of Montmorencie, d'Antille and other Noblemen, both of the one, and the other religion, had well foreseene these conclusions, and refusing to assist at this pretended Parliament, conclude a No-lity of all that should be decreed to preiudice the Edict of pacification, protesting that they were resolute to maintaine themselves in the rights, liberties, and freedomes, which the last Edict had granted them: That the troublers of the publike quiet, and the sworne enemies of France, should find them in a iust defence, and they should answere before God and men, for all the miseries that should ensue thereby.

For answere, it was ordained, that men should be sent to winne some to the Catho-like Church, and all to the obedience of the Kings new Edict; tending to maintaine the Romaine religion, to roote out all other exercise, to defend the King, and to preserue his people. The King thought by this opposition to stay this new faction which fortified it selfe daily. It was a great indiscretion to countenance an association and League, which vnder the ashes of the last warre being yet hot, couered the coales of a generall flame. The King of Navarre beseecheth the Estates, by the Duke of Mont-pensier (who was sent vnto him) not to infringe the Edict of peace, and to suffer them of the religion to intoy that which had beene so solemnly granted. He offers to submit him-

A tette, if they shew him how he erres: but he intreats them, that in a matter of to great importance, they will giue him time to thinke seriously thereon, and to attend the opinion of an assembly of those of his religion, and of the Catholicks associates, which shortly shall be made at Montauban.

The Prince of Condé answers more sharply: That he doth not acknowledge them that are assembled at Blois, for the Estates of the Realme: but a conuenticle of persons corrupted by the sworne enemies of the Crowne, who haue solicited the abolition of the Edict, to the ruine and subuersion of the realme. That, if they had beene lawfully called, he would haue assisted, for the sincere affection he beares to the Kings seruice, and the quiet of his country. That hee will neuer giue his consent to the counsels of the Authors of so many confusions which hee foresees, wherevnto hee hath alwayes knowne the Kings disposition to be repugnant, and a friend to vnion: being the sure and principall meanes to preterue his Crowne. That hee hath alwayes honoured the Clergie and Nobilitie, and will maintaine them with all his power: but he pisseth the people, whom these pretended Estates of Blois seeke to ruine.

The chiefe of the Politicks protest: That they doe not cleaue to any other religion, then that of their Fathers: but as touching a generall peace, they cannot allow of this resolution. To take from the Protestants the publike exercise which had beene so solemnly granted them. The Duke of Montpensier (being returned) perswaded the third estate presented a new petition vnto the King, beseeching him to vnite all his subiects in one religion, but without violence. Doubtlesse a King may well destroy euery priuate man: but not all mankind in generall.
One succeeds another, and the children (whose age and innocency doth naturally free from the rigour and violence of armes) doe inherite the humours, passions, and quarrels of their fathers.

The Protestants ioyntly beseech the King, not to suffer this assembly (which they cannot allow for a generall Parliament) to consult vpon the point of religion due vnto a free Councell. The Estates (sayd the King) should neyther be free, nor generall, if I should make this prohibition. And as they may demand what they please, so may you doe the like: and I promise you in the word of a King, and of an honest man, that whatsoever I ordaine, shall bee for the contentment of all my subiects, and the quiet and peace of my realme. In the meane time, they consult how to leaue money for the warre. The King giues notice to his Gouvernours, and publisheth by his Letters Patents: That he is resolute to grant the Estates their requests, touching the exercise of one onely religion. And Villequier is sent to the Princes of the Empire, to diuert some from their affection to the Prince of Condé and his adherents: and to obtaine from others a leaue of Reistres. Thus the warre begins in Guyenne.

The King of Navarre attempts vpon Marmande, a Towne of his gouernment, but without effect. The Duke of Mayenne comes for the King: and whilest hee is the strongest in field, hee batters, takes and sackes, Thone-Charante, Marans, and other places thereabouts. During the Parliament, the Deputies of the Lowe Countries came to demand succours of the King, and the Duke of Anion for Protector of their liberties and priuileges, against the tyrannous gouernment of the Spaniards. He is now declared the Kings Lieutenant general. They deliuer him a mighty army: with the which (contrary to the orthe taken by him in the obseruation of the accord and promise past, with the Prince of Condé and the Duke Casimir,) hee besiegeth and takes La Charité by composition, and Yssire in Auvergne by force, where the bloud of the inhabitants shed without pitty by the Duke of Anion, confirmed the Protestants in the bad opinion they had conceiued off him.

Rochelle crossed the practises of the contrary party: whose happy exploits caused the Duke of Mayenne to send forth a Nauie to Sea, vnder the command of Laforest; which presenting it selfe Before the Isle of Ré, repyred, seeing the Islanders refused to fight if they approached: The Rochellois, to encounter them, arme seuen

The Nobilitie, by their example, invites all others, and of all qualities, to charge themselves willingly for the maintenance of this armie.

Siege of Brouage.

The Duke of Mayenne first conquests make him proceed. And to make his enterprises vpon Rochelle more easie, he comes before Brouage the 22. of June. It is a small square Towne, built in a Marsh recovered out of the Sea, fortified during the last peace: and at that time ill furnished with men, victuals, and munition, and beset, all beloued of the Islanders about it. Those of Rochelle, whom it doth greatly import for the preservation of their Estate, did greatly indomage the assailants, and cut off about sixe hundred of their men in a short time. But a diuision happened, & was cunningly maintained betwixt the Nobilitie & the Rochelois: the Prince of Condé hauing since the conduct of Clermont Admirall for the Rochelois lost some vessels, being come on ground, the rest being disperfed, and thereby the Isle of Oleron lost. The Kings approche to Poitiers: the supply of Sussex in the Campe: Lansacs coming into the roade of Chef de Baye neere vnto Rochelle (where hee burnt one of their principall ships, and tooke another, but without the losse of a man) the death of Seré chiefe of the besieged, slaine with ten or twelue others in a sallie by night, the number of sicke and hurt which they had to feede, the ruine of their Fortes, the enemies approche, the wants of victuals, and the threatens of the Duke of Anions coming, who would intreate them as hee had done the inhabitants of Issoire: all these considerations made them enter into capitulation, by the which they departed the 28. of August with their armes and baggage, leauing the place at the victors deuotion.

Brouage yeeld-
ed.

This happy successe should haue made the Duke of Mayenne aduance with his armie: but the progresse was dangerous for the Kings Estate: who to mainteine himselfe, must proceed after an other sort. His manner of life was contrary to the violence of armes: hee was of a soft and delicate nature, impatient of labour, aind to rest, feasts, dancing, and other pleasures, which peace brings to them that are giuen to delights. So the peace which had beene plotted during the siege of Brouage, was concluded at Poitiers, and was received in the end of September with so great ioye of eyther party, as the Prince of Condé caused it to bee proclaimed by Torchlight in Rochelle, the same night it came: although it were not so beneficiall for his party as the first. This last Edict cut off some articles of the former, made no mention of Strangers: left their consciences free, yet without exercise, but in Townes and places where as then it was publikly vsed, in Gentlemens houses that had high Iustice and fees, in what assemblies they pleased: for others of meaner qualitie, a certaine number: and in euery Baylywike a fite and commodious place for the publicke exercise of the pretended reformed religion. So the proud defeignes of the Duke of Guise, were made frustrate for this time, and stayed for some yeares, vntill that by the death of the Duke of Anion, wee shall see them renewed, but in the end to the Authors confusion.

Articles of
hard execution.

The partialities and leagues made within the realme, in the which many, both great and small, had farre engaged their goods and reputations, were the cause of great difficulties, in the execution of the Edict. Those of Languedoc especially, (from whom the Marshall D'Anuille had estranged himselfe) did ioyntly with the other Prouinces, sollicite the King of Nauarre, to obtaine an explanation of many ambiguous and doubtfull articles. So a whole yeare was spent in instances, pursutes, and declarations.

Explained by the conference of Nerac.

The conference at Nerac betwixt the Queene Mother and the King of Nauarre, decided many difficulties: but their spleens could not be so easily tempered: and sometimes in one Prouince, sometime in another, the Edict was diuersely and many waies broken. The most fastious were very loth to laye aside Armes: the Politikes did daylye diuide themselves from the Protestants: the Protestants sought to keepe them-

A themselves from surprises, and full of distrust, maintained themselves quietly in the midst of many stormes which threatened them.

As for the King, experience hath now taught him, that the power of man cannot force mens consciences: that spirituall diseases must haue spirituall cures: that faith is not planted in the heart by violence: that wee must attend from heauen the conuersion of them are strayed, and that the Prince is a patterne whereto his subiects willingly conforme themselves. He therefore shewes himselfe in publike, for a myrror of reformation and piety, and as a testimony, that his greatest desire is to consume the diuisions in his realme: he builds many Monasteries, Chappels, and Oratories, vndertakes many pilgrimages on foote, confirms the Brother-hood of Perrems, erects the order of Ieronimites, is dayly conuersant with the Capuchins and Faciillans, called Iesuits: and by their instructions erects many congregations: hee carries a Crucifixe and Beads in procession, with a whippe at his girdle: hee causeth many Bookes of deuotion to bee printed. And to conclude, hee leads a life more bustling a Cloyster then a royall Court: and following the example of Lewis the 12. his predecessor, he institutes the order of the Knights of the Holy ghost, binding them to conditions, which carry a strict bond to the Church of Rome.
The Kings

The order of

Hee pretended to giue diuers blows with one stone: To vniue great men by an inuolable concord and amitie, for the good of themselves, the State, and their Countrey: To please the Clergie men, and to lead all the Clergie in a leath: to vniue the peoples hearts, who are tedde with shewes: To suppress the grudging and the ill will which the intolerable oppression of his subiects bred: to remedy the extraordinarie expences of his Court, in vsuall excesse, and for the entertainment of a number of mignons and Horie-leeches, to whom they must rather weigh, then tell money: But chiefly, to pull downe the Protestants, to vndermine them, and by this lure of worldly greatnesse, to withdraw the chiefe heads, who could not attaine to this high and stately degree of Knight hood, but in renouncing of their religion.

Henry (for trumpets of his deuotion) had the Fathers of the Capuchins, Faciillans, and Iesuits: Dom Bernard Feuillant, and Emond Auger a Iesuit, gaue him pulchritude in their Sermons, and primarily in confessions and companies, the testimonie of the most religious Prince, the most courteous, and the most careful to vniue his subiects in their obedience to God, and then to him, that euer France hath knowne in many ages. But we shall see in the end most of their tongues tolde for money, and others, who making profession to come into the Pulpit to instruct the people, shall bately contrbull the goodly Orators, and by a contrary language, suborne the peoples affections, subuert their senses, and as it were with little linkes of golde, drawe them after them, tyed by the nose, tongue and eares.

The feasts, maskes, stately marriages, sumptuous pastimes, and the new impositions to maintaine them, lead the first dance of rebellion. The Queene Mother, and those of Guise, seeing the King drowned in these delights of Court, did willingly entertaine him in that humor, that eyther busying himselfe to number his Beads, or to tread the measures of a dance, they might holde the reynes of government, and dispose of affaires without controule. But hee knew well the ambition of these men. Hee was iealous of his royall authority: and in the midst of his delights and pleasures, their presence was suspect vnto him. Hee was more pleased with the familiaritie of meane men, whom hee had aduanced to exceeding greatnesse: and so hee set some mignion in Sentinell, to watch if they should attempt anything against his royall dignitie. Those of Guise are not idle, they watch for occasions, they receive such as are malecontents, they practise men of their owne humours and dispositions, and fitte for their desseignes: and can cunningly promise cure and hope for those vicers and sores, which the people of France shew them on all sides.

rebellion
against the King.

These first discontents of subiects, oppressed with insupportable charges, and the 1581. impatiencie of the Clergie, who see their enemies to enioy a firme and solide peace, which did newly strengthen and clofe vp that old wound, which had lately imbrued all France, made them easily to reuiue the league of Peronne, and vnder two goodlie pretexts, (religion, and the ease of the people) to discouer the desseignes which they had long before conceiued.

All encounters made the way easie, both within and without: within, their hearts disposed to reuolt: without, the Spaniards greatnesse, who had now inuaded the realme of Portugall, and by this vsurpation, had a great meanes to disperse his Indian golde in France. And the Duke of Aniou made warre for the Estates of Flanders and other vnited Prouinces, which had called him to free them from the tyrannie and domination of the Spaniards. But these discourses belong to the Spanish, Portugall, and Flemish Histories, and may not enter into this volume, which inuites vs to an end.

Prolongation
of Townes

Protestants.

New motives of rebellion.

The last Edict had, as the former, accorded some Townes vnto the Protestants, for hostages and sureties of his word, during the terme of fixe yeares. Now the King summons them to deliuer them, seeing the time prefixed was almost expired. But the peace had bene so often broken, as so short a time could not quench the fire-brands of warre, nor giue a full execution to the Edict. To content them, the King grants a prolongation for the reteining of these Townes for some yeares. This grant serues the Princes of the League for a new motiue of troubles and disobedience. They giue it out generally: That the King fauoures heretikes: that hee will bring in heresie. They consider not, that hee could not but by force (the euere whereof was doubtfull) recouer the sayd places, being strong, and peopled with numbers of Protestants.

The King of Navarre solicited to ioyne
with the league.
1584.

The King of Navarre sees a farre off, that the heauens are ouercast, and foresees that this storme doth threaten his Estate with a horrible tempest: they sollicite him to ioyne with this party: they make him goodly offers in shew, but all was but to lull him a sleepe, or to cast vpon him all the causes of the future miseries, and to make him more odious and detestable. Hee giues the King intelligence thereof, and puts him in minde of the aduertisements hee gaue him in the yeare 1576. vpon the treaties of the League in Spaine, and at Rome. Hee sees this mine is ready to breake, and that it is now time to thinke of his affaires. Hee assures himselfe of the amities of England, Denmarke and Germanie.

The Duke of Aniou dyes.

But sodenly there fallies a new accident, which breakes vp all the bankes that restrained the ouerflowing of the League. The Duke of Aniou, whether his ryot in the Lowe Countries, or griefe to see his desseignes ouerthrowne, or the wicked practises of Salcedo, (drawne in peeces since by foure horses) or some other secret attempt against his life, had shortened his dayes: hee dyes at Chasleau-Thierry. Whatsoeuer it were, such as were employed to see this man tortured, and to discouer the secret intentions of his masters, were afterwards vnworthily intreated, and ransomed by the chiefe of the League. This death aduanced the King of Navarre one degree. The King suffers the Court of Parliament to receiue the Roses in May, that were presented vnto him, (according to the custome of the Princes and Peeres of France) in qualitie of the first Prince of the bloud, and first Peere of France. Most part of the realme cast their eyes vpon him, as the Sunne rising. This on the one side doth amaze the Authors of the League, and on the other side, it preseth them to trie their fortunes now, whilest the King remains alone of his line, without hope of issue, and the King of Navarre farre off, as it were exiled, and in shew excluded from euer passing the Loire.

The proceedings of the league.

They assemble the heads of their house at S. Denis, and presently make the seeds of their counsels to appeare in Picardie, Champagne, & Bourgogne. They make the townes to abhor the Huguenots yoke, which (say they) the King of Navarre prepares for them. They talke not of the King but with contempt: they cast forth libels and shamelesse

Paquils:

A Paquils: they disgrace him in companies as a Sardanapalus, and idle Chilperie, drunke with prodigalities and dissoluties, and for a third Crowne (his deuile shewing, that he attended the last in heauen) they were ready to shauie his crowne, like vnto a Monke into a Cloister. The people being corrupted, and drawne from their obedience, by the disorders of the Court, suffer the poison of audacious mutinies to creepe into their hearts.

But let vs in few words see the conception, the deliuerie, and the growing of this league in Paris, which shall cast forth store of branches into all the quarters of the Realme. Rocheblond a Cittizen of Paris, a turbulent and factious man, the first Tribune of this league, encouraged by some great men, and supported by the chiefe ministers thereof, ioynes with Preuost the Curat of S. Seuerin, Rucher Curat of S. Benoist, and Launoy a Chanon of Soissons, sometimes a Minister, but fled from Sedan for adulterie. These foure Archeleaguers, hauing banded all their wittes to ruine the house of Bourbon, and to aduance that of Guise, sowe a pernicious seed of rebellion throughout the Citty, and frame a petty Councell of the chiefe Cittizens, who take the charge of the sixtene quarters of the Citty and Suburbes, to practise all they could, and to entertaine them with discourses, grounded vpon the malice of the time, full of schisme, heresie, and tyrannie. This petty Councell, compounded of Rocheblond, Compans a Marchant, Cruce a Proctor, La Chapelle, Louchart a Comissarie, and Buffy le Cloe a Proctor, brought their deliberations and proiects to the grand Councell, which consisted of Doctors, Curats, Preachers, and other men of marke.

In short time they make a great brotherhood, and finding themselves strong, they aduertise the Duke of Guise, of the affection of the good Catholikes of Paris, (that is the name which the Leaguers challenged to themselves) and their zeale to the preservation of religion, and the rooting out of the contrary, and the ruine of tyrannie. Hee conferres with his bretheren, and sends both to giue and to take an othe in an assembly held in Reims, a place at Paris. Then the most factious are sent to the Townes and Prouinces of the realme, with good instructions, to ioyne new confederates to their body, vnder a pretext to fight against heresie and tyrannie. Then might we haue seene the chiefe pillars ouerthrowne that support a Prince: loue and authoritie, and hatred and contempt to supply their places. The Preachers publicly in all places, called the King a tyrant, and fauourer of heretikes. The people did applaud them: and from this deadly hatred which they had conceiued against the King, his Councell and fauourites, sprung that fury which was soone after disperied ouer all the body of France.

The better to countenance this League, they present it to Pope Gregorie the 13. that he might blesse it, and declare himselfe the God-father, as made for the ornament and support of the Catholike and Apostolike Romane Church. Gregory was well pleased they should attempt any thing against the Huguenots: but he did not approve those popular rebellions which were made against a most Christian and Catholike King, neither would he be the fire-brand of a warre which he could not quench. And to he sent the Deputies back without any answer. The League impatient to attend the resolution of Rome, layes open his desseignes, and makes them plausible, causing one of the chiefe Princes of the bloud, to be an actor and carry the bable. They publish, that the King dying without children, hee hath no heyre nor successour but the Cardnall of Bourbon, a Prince broken in yeares, without hope of issue, or to suruine the King, who was sound, lustie, and yong. But they secretly season the simple peoples mindes, with that vnjust vsurpation of the Capets, vpon the heires of Charlemagne: they Print Bookes, they cast forth diuors Libels, yea some Preachers make it the text of their Sermons. Two principall fire-brands inflame the League. The assembly made by the King of Navarre, and the Deputies of that party at Montauban, to resolve of the meanes to maintaine themselves: if the League (abusing the Kings name and authoritie) should aske to offend them. And the voyage of the Duke of Espen to the King of Navarre, to confere priuately with him in the Kings name.

Motives of the League.

The chiefe of the League presume, that the King meanes to arme, and to imple the King of Nauarre forces against them. They seeke to preuent him, and to that intent they send forth many Commissions: but least any should controule them, they cloake them with the Kings name, wherewith they maintaine themselves to be well allowed, as a thing done for his Maiesties seruice. The King in the end of March deuoues them, and forbids all leuies of men of warre.

To iustifie themselves and their ryfing, they publish the motives of the Cardinall of Bourbon (who notwithstanding serued them but as a Cipher) with the Princes, Noblemen, Townes and Catholike Commonalties to oppose themselves against heretikes. That they had contemned the resolution of the Estates, to make warre against heretikes, and to disanull all Edicts made in their fauour. That the succession of the King of Nauarre (whereof hee hath conceiued a great hope since the death of the Duke of Anjou) would cause great confusions within this realme. That preparations were already made, both within and without. That by an accord made at Magdebourg the fifteenth of December last past, the troups of the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Condé, the Queene of England, the King of Scottes, the Count Palatin, the Dukes of Saxony, Pomerania, and Wirtemberg, of the Landgrau of Hessen, the Suisse and other Protestants should ioynly enter into France before the fifteenth of Aprill next following. That the Huguenots would not yeeld vp the Townes, which they held for the assurance of the last Edict of peace. That there is great abuse in the prouision of offices, in the leuies of money, in the inuention of excoessiuimposts.

Then they complaine of the mignons in Court, who abusing the Kings name and bountie, keepe the Princes and Noblemen that were truly Catholike, from all access to his Maiesty, perswading him, that it is necessary for the preseruacion of his Estate, to diminish their authority: they braue the Nobility, dispose of gouernments in fauour of their followers, waste the treasure, oppresse the people, restrayne the libertie of Iustice, ruine the Clergie with tenthes and extraordinarie charges. And then they declare: That these iust motions, and the sodennesse of the mischiefe, had thrust them into armes: the small credit they had with the King, hauing no other meanes to let him vnderstand their complaints: and in the end they protest, that their taking armes, was onely to restore the Church of God to her true and auncient dignity, vnder the exercise of one religion throughout the realme: To restore the Nobility to their honour and freedome: to ease the people of extraordinarie charges inuented since the raigne of Charles the ninth, and not to imploy the money leuied thereby but for the Kings seruice. To require the King to prouide for his succession against the publike and priuate calamities, which the pretensions and contentions for the same might cause: and to chafe from the Court such as abused his fauour and authority. In the ende they protest and vowe, not to laie downe armes, vntill their proposition bee fully executed: and that his Maiestie had preuented the daunger, the feare whereof hath made them to take armes.

These false impressions had wonderfully incensed the people: but when as they talke to them of a sinode held at Montauban, and of a Diet in Germanie, where they plotted to inuade France, and to chafe away both masse and Priestes: they take the words of these passionate men for Oracles of truth. They presse to enter into the League, such as demanded nothing but change, bankrouts, men indebted, malefactors, and wicked persons.

To conclude, such as had neede of ciuill warre to liue vpon the Common, followe the Guisans Enieignes. The double pistoletes of Spain begin to shine, the Capitaines arme and go to field. But the Huguenots are at Rochelle, in Languedoc, Guyenne and Dauphiné: and they go to seek them in Picardie, Champagne, Bourgogne and Prouence. Marseilles is surprisid the ninth of Aprill, by the practises of

Daries

A Daries the second Confull: but sodenly recovered, and Daries hanged. Mandelot seized 1585. on the Cittadell of Lions the second of May. Orleans shuts her gates against the Duke of Montpensur, sent by the King, to assure himselfe of the Towne. The other Townes rise: the factious worke, and the armie of the League growes towards Paris: euery day they are fortified with some new troupe, and euery day some Towne declares it selfe enemie.

The King in the meane time, made no warre but by writing, thinking by milde and gentle meanes, to pacifie them that spake too proudly. Hee shewes by his declaration, the zeale hee hath alwayes borne to the Catholike Religion, and the necessitie that forced him to a peace, finding all the Estates of his Realme tyred with the calamities past: that peace was the onely meanes to vnite his subiects in one religion, to establish Iustice, to reforme abuses, and manners, to ease the Clergie, honour the Nobilitie, and to free the people from oppression. That hee giues no benefices but to Prelates indued with learning and pietie. The Nobilitie should bee reconciled, leauing their spleene and distrusts. The people freed from deuouring warre, should care their bread in peace: and yet many both impudent and rashe, more hypocrites, then religious, gather by this peace, that hee secretly fauours heretikes: the which neuer entred into his thoughts. That hee neuer fauoured the succession of a King, who may preiudice the Catholike religion. But to vndertake a quarrell for the royall succession, whilst he is yet aliue, and in hope to haue issue: that were to distrust of Gods bountie, and (as it were) degrade him from the estate, whereunto God had called him. That he hath honoured (with the greatest, and worthiest offices of the Crowne) those Princes that complain to bee debarred his fauour. (And in deed, the Duke of Guise was Lord Steward of France, Gouernour of Brie and Champagne, and euery one of the same house aduanced to a gouernment.) Then hauing promised to restore the Church to her beautie, to giue content to the Nobilitie, and to ease the people, hee increates, coniuers, exhorts, and commaunds, all Clergiemen, gentlemen, Parlements, and Townes corporate, to separate themselves from that which may hinder so holy an intention, to abandon all Leagues, and associations, and to vnite themselves vnder his obedience.

D Moreover, the King writes to the King of Nauarre, That hee should containe himselfe with patience, to the end the people may know whome to blame, as the motives of these new combustions: assuring him of his loue, and that hee will neuer forget his interest no more then his owne: against them who (vnder goodly shewes) attempt against his person, and Crowne, to make them great with his losse, and the whole ruine of his estate. The King of Nauarre obeyes, and letting passe all occasions to arme, hee protests notwithstanding, That (seeing the sword readie to strike his Lord and brother,) hee will preuent the danger. And whereas he is accused of heresie, hee answers. That hee was borne vnder the tolleracion of two religions in France: that hee will leaue that wherein hee was bred, when by a lawfull Councell they shall shew him an other truth then that which hee beleues: and therefore hee is no heretike. nor yet relaps, seeing hee was not fallen from his first opinion. That he is no enemie to the Catholikes, for that when the Edicts had granted libertie of conscience, he presently layed downe armes: that in all places he maintaines his subiects in the same libertie, as he found them after the decease of his mother. That at the pretended accord of Magdebourg, which the preachers of the League publish in their pulpits, as an imaginarie assembly, and fit to be spoken by a Montbanke, the deceit appeares plainly, in that they name (in the extract published by them,) the Ambassadors of the Elector Palatin, and of the Prince of Auranges, whereof the Elector was deceased aboue a yeare before the terme they specified, & the Prince slaine at Felise, foure monethes before. That he hath requested of the King a prolongation of the Townes which hee holds for assurance of the last Edict: and will deliuer them before the time, so as the League lay aside armes, and yeeld vnto the King the places they 1585. they had seized. That whereas they declare him incapable of the Crowne, it is to make him very neere: yet doth he thinke least of it, hoping that God by his bountie will preferue the King, for the good of his realme, and will giue him issue, to the greier of his enemies. That those which by their declaration terme him desirous of the Crowne, death, a troubler of the State, and an enemy to the Catholiks, haue falsly and vnjustly lyed, beseeching the King to giue him leaue to end this quarrell with the Duke of Guise, one to one, two to two, or tenne to tenne: without any troubling him else, or afflicting any of his people: but no man vndertakes this lye, no man accepts of this challenge.

A great error
of State,

Against this first insolencie of the League, hee should oppose other armes then a pen: an other cuirasse, then a penitents weeds: an other countenance, then doubt and trembling. The authoritie of an assured browe, the constancie of a manly courage, a resolution fit for a royall Maiestie, should haue dispersed this warre of Guise, and suppressed these mutinous Legions. But the Queene mother (accustomed to fish in a troubled streame) winkt at the Duke of Guise. She was well pleased with the boldnes she was contented the Duke should terrifie the King, to make him abandon the Protestants, and to force him to banish his new minions from Court, who had brought in disgrace with the King her sonne: (hee had now sequestred her from a great part of the affaires, and held her as it were confined in her houses without the Louure, to the end she might bee fought vnto, to auoyd the blowes of him that was ready to strike. Her ambition moued her thereunto, rather then any desire shee had to aduance the Duke: to crosse both the King and Duke, and to bring disorder, and confusion into the State: and to stand alone, in the midst of these furious tempests.

The League
weake,

The League might easily haue beene ouerthrowne. In the beginning they had but a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot in field, and the greatest part knowing that these troubles concerne the King, and his estate, retyned themselves in tyme. Most of the Townes wauered betwixt obedience, and rebellion: some retnayned in their fidelitie, the rest might haue beene assured with small force. But Catherine terrifies him most of all. You haue (saith shee) to do with the Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spain, the Duke of Sauoy, with some Princes of Germanie, with the Catholike Cantons of the Suisses, who renounce your alliance (and with al the house of Lorraine). They number fife and twentie Prouinces, and great commaunders in this part: your best Townes are ingaged, all are resolute to hazard goods, persons, and liues, to further their religion from shipwracke. Thus this poore Prince is terrified: hee thinke the Duke of Guise is at his heeles, & holds the Capuchins Cloister to be more safe for him, then his Louure. He is not the same man that vanquished his enemies at Jarnac, & Montcontour, hee wants courage, hee desires nothing more, then to purchase the Dukes fauour, and promiset, that for a peace he will giue him a good part of his Kingdome. The Duke of Guise, a Prince of great experience, discreet, valiant, and worthe to be numbred amongst the brauest Captaines, knowes the King is seized with fright, and sees that the lustre of his armes shines ouer all. His courage swels through the Kings childish feare: hee continues his course, and begins to hope for more then hee had pretended. Hee therefore demaunds much, and his request ioynes his owne private interest with the publike: hee beseecheth the King to make an irrevocable Edict, for the extirpation of heresies, to take away the Townes held by the Huguenots by force, to renounce the Protection of Geneua: to allow of their armes, & to ioyne his vnto theirs. Which was as much to say, of a King to make himselfe a partizan.

The Duke of Guise fortified
by a peace.

The peace re-uoked by the Edict of Iuly.

The King makes a counterfeit peace with them: and by his Edict of the 18. of Iuly, reuokes all other made in fauour of the Protestants: hee commaunds their ministers to depart the realme, and to all his subiects within six monethes, to make profession of the Catholike religion, or to auoyd the countrie. He approues the Leaguers armes, as leuiued for his seruice, allowes of their pretexts, and by secret articles concluded at Nemours, contents them in all matters, onely with this condition: To leaue the League, and instantly to lay downe armes: a trappe whereby they should in the end ende be taken. As for their security, they left it to the Kings good pleasure: yet would they haue in their powers, the towne of Chalon, Thoul, Verdun, S. Disier, Reims, Soissons, the Castell of Dijon, Beaune, Rue in Picardie, Dinan and Concq in Brittaine: they caused the King to pay two hundred one thousand fixe Crownes, and two third parts, for the strangers which they had leuiued: they had a discharge for a hundred fixe thousand three hundred and fortie Crownes eight sols and three deniers which they had taken vpon the generall receites. They obtayned a hundred thousand Crownes to build a Citadell at Verdun: and entertaynement for gards on horse-backe for all the Princes of the League.

To conclude, the extorsions, robberies, burnings, profanations, and other insolencies which such armes drawe after them, deuoured more flesh in three moneths than this warre continued, wasted more far, and sucked more bloud from the poore people, (for whose ease they had so often protested to haue taken armes,) then the ordinary charges could haue consumed in many yeares. This outrage was the cause of seauen and twenty Edicts, to discharge those millions of gold, which this furie had wasted, to the peruerting of Iustice, policy and the treasure.

A rash enterprise ruines it selfe, when it finds resistance. but if the attempters finde that they are feared, their impunity growes confident. This peace had made a great breach in the Kings authoritie: but they had extorted it by force, not three daies before hee had proclaymed them rebels and guilty of treason: they might then easily iudge, that hee would hatch an egge whereof should spring some notable reuenge. Doublelesse Henry determined it: but the three bretheren, who were the chiefe architects of this conspiracie kept themselves apart, and could not bee catcht in one net: and to maintaine themselves, they had no better expedient then by armes. They make the King resolute to warre against the Protestants: they shewe him the facility thereof, three mornings (say they) will ende it: We haue the assistance of all Christian Princes, the Germanie forces will march no more for the King of Nauarre, a poore Prince, without money and without credit. The Queene of England shall haue worke enough to resist the Spaniards attempts (the Spaniards prepared then that great armie against England, which wee shall see dispersed with small resistance, like a puffe of winde) and their strongest places will parle at our first approches.

Let vs make warre (saith the King) against them in Gods name. I will enter-tayne three armies: one in Guyenne, an other about mine owne person, and the third vpon the frontier, against the strangers whome the Huguenots expect out of Germanie: there wants nothing but money: the charge amounts to foure hundred thousand Crownes a moneth. I haue by your aduise broken the peace, (saith hee to the best of the Clergie, of the Parliament and of the Citizens of Paris beeing assembled at the Louure) assure me nowe of meanes to make warre. And afterwards he saied to the Cardinall of Guise. The heads of the Clergie are they which haue most importuned mee to warre: it is no reason I alone should beare the charge of that which re-
E dounds to the publike.

I assure my selfe, you will not faile to assist mee. And to the first president, (notwithstanding the Parliament had lately verified the letters pattents, whereby the King condemned the authors of this rebellion as traytors) I haue found so much zeale and affection in you, to cause mee to reuoke the last Edict of peace, as I assure my selfe you will finde reasons sufficient to perswade them of your facultie, to forbear their entertaynements, so long as the warres shall continue. And then to the Preuost of marchants, he saied. The Citie hath shewed it selfe most affectionat to the breach of the Edict: they must be as willing to contribute the charges of the warre. Go presently, and assemble the bodie of your Citie, and make mee
F an imposition of two hundred thousands Crownes.

Without doubt euery one of these was verie willing to haue warre, but loth to feele the discommodities it brought. They begin to finde that the most preiudiciall peace

1585. peace is better then the most triumphant and victorious warre. Yet the League and haue warre: and euen they, whose forefathers were wont to carrie it beyond the seas, into Asia, Affricke, and to the end of the world, do nowe nourish it in their owne Countre. But the authors thereof could not stand but in the midst of a generall confusion.

The King of Nauarre seeing this cloude readie to breake vpon his partie, complaines, that the King, without consideration of the priuate interest he hath in this late reuolt, hath made a peace with his enemies, and hath armed them with his own forces, and authority, against his estate, his blood and himselfe. He laies open, by a publicke declaration, the causes which moued the League to take armes, the vanity of the pretenses, the hurts which all France may expect by the treaty of Nemours, and then with the Prince of Condé his Cousin, the Marshall d'Anville, (hereafter Duke of Montmorency, by the death of his eldest brother, and in the following raigne Constable of France) and other Noblemen, gentlemen, Prouinces, Townes and Commonalties of both religions: hee protestes, by a lawfull and necessarie defence, to maintaine the fundamentall lawes of families, and the Estate and libertie of the King and the Queene his mother.

As it not sufficient for these Princes, to haue the King and League against them, but they must bee charged with a new assault from beyond the mountains: Sixtus the first excommunicates the King of Nauarre and Prince of Condé, the first, a more violent man then his Predecessor, castes out his lightning against the two Henries, King of Nauarre and Prince of Condé: he excommunicates them, degrades them and their successors, from all dignities, namely their pretensions to the Crowne of France, exposeth their Countreies and persons in prey, to the first that should teile on them.

The Court of Parliament findes this act to bee rash, insolent, strange, and farre from the modestie of former Popes, and saies vnto the King: That therewith they finde nothing like to the Apostles successor. The Registers of the Concill, forer antiquity did not teach this: That the Princes of France were euer to seeke millice at Rome or that subjects did euer take knowledge of their Princes religion. Seeing then that now Popes, in stead of instruction studies nothing but destruction, and that hee changed his holie into a fearefull fire-brand, to ruine those vnto whom he should haue bene the Church, the Court could not admit this Bull, so pernicious for all Christians, and derogating from the souerainty of the Crowne of France. The Princes likewise protest against the said Bull, and appeale from it as abusive and scandalous, to the next free and lawfull Councell: where they will prooue (said they) that Sixtus the first, calling himselfe Pope, terming them heretikes, hath falsely and wickedly acted. This opposition was set vp in Rome the sixt of November.

Thus the Parliament grewe resolute against this Bull: but it yeelded easily in other matters, which did but impair the affaires. For the fiftenth of October they allowed of the Kings declaration, which imposed confiscation of bodie and goods, against such as without the warrant of the Catholike Princes had opposed their forces against the League: and reuoked the terme of fixe monethes graunted by the Edict of Iuly, to fiftene daies after the said declaration.

To enforse this Edict, the King of Nauarre, by a declaration of the last of November, doth seize, and giues commissions, to sell all the suites, rents, reuenues, mouables, debtes, and all other profits whatsoever, of the Inhabitantes of Townes where the Edict of Iuly, touching the fixe monethes, and of October, touching the abbreviation to fiftene daies, had bene receiued, published and executed: and likewise of gentlemen and others, carrying armes, with the Leaguers and their adherents: as also of the Clergie resident in the said Townes, or continuing for their partie: and to leat out their Landes to them that would giue most.

His wordes and deedes were all one: for presently his people lay their handes to worke, Saint Mesmes keeps the Marshall Matignon in breath. Lanul chargeth him

1585. A in Xainlonge, and ratieth the teage of Taillebourg, where the Ladies of Tremouille (the mother, and daughter) were beseege. The Vicent of Turenne ouerruns Lamouille, and for a gage of his inroades takes the Bishoprick of Thules. The Duke of Mercaur, on the other side, thinkes with two thousand men to doe wonders in Poitou: but there must bee a proportion betwixt him that forceth, and him that hee meanes to force. Else hee that furiously or rashly thinketh to daunt another, and insult ouer his possessions, may soone loose both his courage, and what he possessed. The Prince of Condé makes head against him, and not onely driues him from Fontenay, but also makes him, for his better safetie, retire farre into Brittanie with losse and disgrace.

B Being freed from this incombrance, hee beseegeth Brouage, and had already brought it to that necessitie, as the most resolute were readie to yeeld. when as newes came vnto him, that three Captaines, du Halot seruant to the King, le Fresne enemy to the Earle of Brissac, Gouernour of Angers, and Rochemorte, a partisan to the King of Nauarre, had seized on the Castell of Angers, one of the strongest places of the Realme, garded by a Captaine, and twelue souldiars. The enterprise was well made, well executed, but not so well pursued: for du Halot came too soone into the Towne, protesting that hee had taken the Castle for the Kings seruice. They decayne him prisoner, and belegar the Castle, whether the whole Countre comes.

C At night they demand to parle with Fresné. Hee as ill aduised as the first, comes forth vpon a little bridge. A hargubuser makes an offer to shoot at him: whereupon hee offers to returne: but Rochemorte with his companie, fearing to bee forced by the multitude that came running, drawes vp the bridge. Le Fresné hangs by the chaines to pull it downe: but the Townsmen cut off his hands, and hee falls into the ditch, where hee was slaine by a stagg they kept there. du Halot was presently executed within the Towne. These two being dead, they demand of Rochemorte, for whome hee holds? For the King of Nauarre, sayd hee. Hereupon they cast up a trench against the Castell, attending the Duke of Joyeuse the Kings brother in law. During these broyles and troubles Rochemorte (slumbring one day in one of the windowes of the Castle,) was there slaine with a hargubuse shot.

The Prince aduertised of the surprize of the Castell, and of Rochemorts answer: but not of that which happened since, leaues Brouage: and to oppose sufficient forces against the League, hee marcheth with about eight hundred masters, and twelue hundred hargubusers on horsebacke, passeth Loire at Roisiers betwixt Saumur and Angers, chargeth home to the suburbs, forceth some barricadoes, and spends a whole day in skirmishes: but hee heares no newes from the Castle, neither for the alarume in the Towne, nor the noyse of his troupes. No man appeares: no answere, no signe is made: the Actors were buried in their enterprise, and sixe score souldiars remaying had already capitulated. Doubtlesse too much courage and too little consideration (a dangerous ouersight in any great commander in the warre: where too much headstrongnesse, is no lesse perillous then faint-heartednesse) had ingaged the Prince on this side the riuer of Loire, amongst many rimyes of enemies, hauing no bridge at his deuotion, without boates to repasse, or any hope of succour.

Then that cheerfull hope which had brought that little armie, turnes into confusion and disorder: for the Duke of Magenne had passed the Loire at Orleans, with sixe hundred horse, Reistres, and French, to cutt off the Princes way, if hee repassed the water. The Duke of Epernon, and the Marshall Biron kept Beauvais towards Beauuall, to meete with him. La Chastre had drawne vp the mylls, and boats, and kept the passages of Loire. The Duke of Joyeuse marched at his backe. Entragues Gouernour of Orleans came to crosse him, and all the Commons did rise. On the other riuer, whereof hee made account, betwixt Blois and Amboise. The amazement increaseth, and his number decreaseth: such as had friends in Beauisse, Dunois, Perche, Vendosme, or Maine, steale away. The Lord of Rohan (aduising him, not to thrust himself into an apparent ruine,) had turned head towards Brittaine. At the foresaid enemies forces would within few dayes charge him. Being neere to Vendosme, hee leaues the cheefe charge of the retreat to Clermont, and Saint Gelas, ordereth the companies, prouides for his household seruants, and at eleuen of the clocke at night, he parts, accompanied with the Lords of Tremouille, Auentigny, and few others. Finally after infinite toyle and dangers past, he recovered the Isle of Greneze, lying in the English seas: and so Lon- don, being receiued by the Queene, with all the honour, and fauour hee could desire: B and then by her commandement accompanied with a good number of the Nobilitie, and men of warre, in ships well appointed, he repassed the seas, obtaining a sufficient conquest to haue saued himselfe, and a rich spoye to haue returned with his head to Es- chell, rather then to the Greue or the Hales at Paris.

The Duke of Mayenne
arrives.

Saint Gelais, Fois-Dalie, Aubigni, la Tifardiere, and some others are commended to haue wisely preferred these broken troupes neere to the forest of Marchenoir, diuided into small companies, of twelue, and fiteene, whereof (notwithstanding the Townes of Orleans, Blois, Amboise, Tours, and others thereabouts, were straightly garded) many repassed the Loire. Saint Gelais and others taking the high way to Paris, crossed many companies dispeised in Beauisse, and hauing wandered long in the forest of Orleans and the end they passed the riuer neere to Cyen, and at last recovered Rochelle, where the Prince, the cheefe of the armie, and the most part of the troupes were already in safety.
The lightnings of Sixtus, and the second Edict of October had wonderfully moued the King of Navarre. Now he complains to the Clergie, to the Nobilitie, to the third estate, and to the Parliament of Paris, of the breach of the last Edict of peace, and that they had caused the question of succession to a King yet liuing, to bee decided at Rome: that they would make a Prince of the bloud of France subiect to the Pope, that they suffer the Consistory to giue that which belongs not vnto it: and that the Pope disposeth of realmes, and principalities at his pleasure. Then hee sheweth the miseries which these vniuersall warres will breed: he exhorts them, not to serue as instruments to the Leaguers, to ruine the King and his Realme. And finally, seeing they are ill advised, he protests as before: That both he and his, will vse all lawfull means to resist the violence of their enemies, and casts all the miseries that shall ensue vpon the authors thereof.

Strangers deale earnestly in the cause. The Princes of Germanie make intercession to the King, at the King of Navarre instance, that hee would be perswaded, at the humble petitions of his neighbours, and that opening his eyes at the teares, and his cares at the complaints of his subiects, he would maintaine his owne good, quiet, honour, and faith, his Crowne and reputation, and preserve a body wounded vnto death. But those of Guise kept him in awe. He speaks not but by the mouth of the League. I make and change (said he vnto the Ambassadors) my ordinances as necessitie doth require, for the good quiet of my subiects: and leaue the care to all Soueraine Princes, to gouerne their people as they shall thinke fit. I haue the feare of God liuely graven in my heart: neither will I do any thing against the honour of my conscience, and the fatherly care I haue of my people.

This pleased the League: they are now on horsebacke. The Duke of Mayenne marcheth with about two thousand horse, French, and Reistres, twelue regiments of foote, and sixethousand Swisses. He must bring the Princes of the bloud prisoners to Paris in triumph, their Captaines chained, and couer the fields of Xaintonge, Poitou, and Guy- enne, with their slaughtered souldiars, retume victorious, and bring to the King the conquest of all the places, that made resistance. But what exploits, what triumphes?
The wrath of God ruines his men in those Countries. He besiegeth, batters, and takes some silly places, which are scarce noted in the French map, as Montignat, Beaulieu, Gaignac, Castels, and saint Bazille vpon Garonne: Montsegur, Castillon, Fuynormand in Periguenx,

A Periguenx, and the most part by composition (but badly obserued) leauing behind him Figeac, Cadaillac, Casor, the houses of the Vicount of Gourdon, Montfort, Bergerac, and Saint Foy, places of importance, all held by the Protestants. The difficultie of passages, the overflowing of riuers, the vehement cold, the continuall raine, want of money, munition, victuals, and supplies of men, withdraw him from this warre, to go winter at Bordeaux, there (in the midst of his loues) to make some enterprises vpon the Castels, to the preiudice of the Marshall of Matignan. So the most of his Sol-diars detained long, without either honour or profit, disband of themselves: and the Duke brings from this voyage a more famous spoile, the heire of Caumont, being but twelue yeares old, to giue her to one of his sonnes. Hee had before time done B better in Daulphiné, where keeping his faith inuolable, hee had happily preferred his reputation and credit. Indeed hee then liued onely vnder the Kings lawes and obedience, and now hee spends much time, labour and money, to effect little in Guyenne.

In the meane time the Prince of Condé renewed the warre, assisted notably by the Earle of Lauay, and Saint Gelais, who commanded about foure hundred and fitye men, and by the new conquests of Dompierre, (a Castell neere vnto Saint Jean, belonging to the Marshall of Rez, where the booty repayed the losses late suffered by the souldiars) of Royen, a strong place neere vnto Brouage: of Soubize, Mornac in Alle- uert, Mondeuis, and others, defaced the greefe of the former crosses. In the midst
C of these prosperities, hee tooke to his second wife in Taillebourg the 16. of Marche, Charlotte Katherine of Tremouille, sister to Claude of Tremouille Duke of Thouars, &c. by whom hee had Henry of Bourbon Prince of Condé, the first Prince of the bloud at this present, and first Peere of France.

The Prince of Condé's second
marriage.

Within few dayes after, Tiercelin with his regiment of about fixe hundred and fiftie men, returned from an enterprife, which Saint Luc the Gouverneur of Brouage had made (but in vaine) against the Isle of Oleron. The Prince aduertised of his passage, followes him, with La Tremouille his brother in lawe, La Boulay, Auantigny, and some thirty others: hee chargeth them in the taile neere vnto the suburbs of Xain- tes, and killes thirty or forty of his men: the rest put themselves in battaile through D the fauour of the hedges and the high way. The Earle of Lauay comes galloping, with about foue and thirtie horse of his company, which had bene lodged a little from thence: and seeing the Prince & the rest of his company ingaged in the combat, hee goes directly to the Colonels enseigne, couered with a battalion of pickes: hee breakes them, fights with him that carried it, pulls it from him, puts him to flight, kills three score souldiars vpon the place, and chafeth the whole regiment. Tiercelin resued himselfe, carrying to Xaintes a hurt in the arme, and many others being may-
med. Tremouille had a horse slaine vnder him: and some were hurt, but the Earle lost Sailly and Rieux his brethren. Tanlay was lately deceased of sickness at Saint Jean, and himselfe surprised with a fever: and wonderfully grieved for the losse of his three bre-
E thren, followed them to the graue within a few dayes after, and all foure were interred within the Castle of Taillebourg.

of Lauay.

But what did the King of Navarre in the meane time? he hath vntill now maintaned himselfe vnder the obedience of the Kings comandements: hetherto hath bin nothing but mutual writings, Edicts, declarations, comandements, directions to the officers of the Crowne, for the execution thereof. Hereafter he displaies other armes then paper & inke. The Marshall of Matignan had besieged Castels in Februarie: the king flies thither with about three hundred masters, and eightene hundred harguebusiers on horsebacke: hee rayseth the seerge, disposeth of his affaires in Berne: comes to Nerac, and assures the Towne: passeth the Garonne at Saint Bazille, (notwithstanding the Duke F of Mayenne who lay within two Leagues of his passage): crosseth Perigord and Angoulmois, and so comes into Poitou, where the Marshall of Biron, with about twelue hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, molested and troubled the Coun-

1586 He came vnto Rochelle, besieged Marans. The arriual of the said King, and the resolution of the besieged, commaunded by la Tarrie, made the Marshall to passe the river of Charente, and to leaue Marans to the free exercise of both religions. The King of Nauarre went to Rochelle to visit the armie at sea, and by a palissado, to keepe in them of Brouage.

The Cardinall of Lenoncourt, and the President Brulart, were sent the yeere before from the King, to assure the King of Nauarre of his Maiesties loue: and to exhort him againe to vnit himselfe to the Catholike Church, as well for the good of his conscience, as also to make his way to the succession of the Crowne more easie: to shew vnto him the causes that had moued him to breake the peace, and to intreat him to yeeld the Townes of suretie. The time would not suffer these propositions to take effect: but contrariwise, after the example of the League, (sayd the King of Nauarre) we should demand better Townes. So the Ambassadors ended their charge, beseeching the said King, to enter into some treatie, wherein the Queene mother should deale to his content, so as hee would stay the leuie of Reisires, Lansquenets and Suisses, which Clermont, Seger and Guitri had procured.

Hee accepted of this conference, the which breeds a truce in the end of the yeare, but with pretestation, not to stay the good will of such as in so important an occasion, and extreame necessitie, had gone to field: that (raising the Kings authoritie troden vnder foote, by the breach of his Edict,) they might preserue him from the forcible inuasion of the League. Hee was better affected to a good peace, then to a bad truce. But the Queene mother telling him, that the King would make no peace, nor truce with him, vnlesse hee would become a Catholike, she made this conference altogether fruitlesse. Shee lets him vnderstand, that this change would make his condition more free, more assured, and more fit for his calling: that his conuersion would bring him in grace with the King, leauing to count a Maior of Rochelle, whome hee did not commaund absolutely. But this Prince had his cares too much beaten with this proposition, and could not yeeld thereunto, but by due forme, which was by a lawful Councell. And the Duke of Neuers, thinking to adde some more perswasive reasons then the rest of the assemblie: you cannot (saith hee) leaue any impossibility there. A Prince doth what hee will, when as hee wills nothing but what hee ought. You shall ere long, answered this Prince, being free and of a quick conceit) for me haue no Italians among vs.

1587 This conference bred a ialousie among the Parisians. They were more inclined to warre then euer. The Duke of Mayenne aduertised that the Queene mother aduanced towards the King of Nauarre, to mediate an accord, hee makes halt to Paris, to reppell the King, that this negotiation was contrary to his Edict: that such a peace could not be good, breeding effects in religion, contrarie to the tranquillitie of Catholike Conferences. Being armed there, the sixe Arch-leaguers impart vnto him their secret articles: To suppress heresie, reforme the Court and the interuention of Mignons: and for a fatal wound to the Estate, To seize vpon the Kings person.

Hee allowes of these counsels, and soundeth their desseins, but finds the execution difficult. So the rats in the Fable found this expedient to bee very good, to be advertised of the Cats approach: and to saue themselves, to hang a bell at his ear: but none durst vnder take to doe it. The Queene mother aduertised of this designe, tooke her way to Court. Her arriual, with the irresolution of the commaunders, left the Parisians wavering, in the midst of so dangerous an enterprise. The Queenes departure kindled the warre in Poitou. The King of Nauarre goes to field, takes Cressay by composition, Saissy by assault: forceth Saint Maixant to yeeld, and marcheth on only to his obedience: besiegeth Mauleon, and during the batterie takes it by escalade.

Whilst the King of Nauarres armes prosper in Poitou: & the Duke of Mayenne treats with the leaguers at Paris, & the mouth of his mutinous preachers, disgraceth the Kings authority

A authority with the people: the Duke of Guise, continues to make warre against them of Lametz, the which he had begun against the Duke of Bouillon, from the first beginning of the League. Sedan and all that Principallitie serued as a retreat for the neighbour Protestants, and as a Port for strangers to enter into France. These are the Pretenses wherewith he couers his desseins, but hee had another principall motiue: from Sedan the King had intelligence of all that was practised in Champagne and Lorraine, in the yeare 1585.

When hee sees himselfe master of Douzy, Recroy, and Kaucourt, hee passeth the Meuse, & enters into the foweraintie of Sedan, afflicts the countiemen with all the cruelties that warre could imagine, whilst that famine presseth them within the Towne. To ouert this storme which threatned Sedan, the Duke of Bouillon caueth Schelandre Governour of Lametz, to sett vpon Verdun, a Towne on the side of Champagne, which had tumultuously runne into the League. The Duke of Guise runs to succour it, and by his abience giues the Duke of Bouillon meanes to succour Sedan. Thereupon the Queene mother, at the request of the Duke of Montpensier, vncle by the mothers side to the Lords of Sedan, procures a truce for fiftene dayes, betwixt the two Dukes, during the which, the enterprise vpon the Castle of Lametz, for the Duke of Guise proving fatal for the vndertakers, disposed their wills to a second truce of a month.

This fell out happely: for the Germaine armie, whereof hee was named Lieutenant generall vnder the Duke John Casimir (who substituted in his place the Baron de Onaw, the minoritie of the Elector Palatin nephew and pupill to the said Duke, hindring him from marching in person) prepared to make their musters in the plaine of Strasbourg. So the Duke of Bouillon goeth into Alsitia with foure hundred horse, and eight hundred harguebusiers to make them aduance: and the Duke of Guise comes to the King to Meaux, to receiue (saith hee) his maiesties commaundements in so great and so important a cause: but in effect, to complaine, That since the reuocation of the Edict of peace, hee had followed the warre against heretiks with so small fauour, as the King had suffered them in their howses to enjoy their goods and estates peaceably. That in stead of selling and employing them to their ruine, hee caused the reuenues of the Cardinall of Pellené to be seized on (a man borne in France, but Espaniolized at Rome) for that in open consistorie, hee had vertuously maintained the iust motiues of the taking of armes by the Catholike Princes against the Huguenots.

That this warre had more aduanced the Mignons, then ruined the Heretikes, and that the money rayfed by the subuention of the Clergie, serued to entertayne the said Mignons. That neither the Kings Councell, the Parliament of Paris, the inferior Iudges, nor the Prouost of Paris had sworne this last Edict. That the Townes which had demanded the extirpation of heresie, and the reuocation of the last Edict of peace, were treated like enemies. That hee had caused the Cittadells of Lions and Macon to bee beaten downe, surprised that of Valence, disgraced Brissac, Cruissilles, Cessis, Entragues and others, and, peruered the assignations which he had giuen him, to be repaid the money the which hee had disbursed in this last leuie of men of warre.

But the King knew well how to counter-balance these complaints of the League, with their owne breach of the articles of Nemours. Hee had well obserued, that their intolent passions aspired to some greater desseins then the articles made mention of. Those of Guise had demanded Townes of assurance against the Protestants in those Prouinces where they were not at all to bee feared. The Duke of Anna's had newly surprised Dourlans and Pontdormy, but hee had failed of Bouillon through the fidelitie of Saint Marta. They had lodged in their Cittadell of Vitry le Francois an Italian at their denotion, and toke an oath of many Gouvernours to hold their places for the Duke of Guise.

But the Kings meaning was to lue and reigne: yea though he did buie a good peace

1587. to the contentment of both parties. But the contrary desires of the King of Navarre and the Duke of Guise, could not be reconciled: and hee had no meanes to settle betwixt both, but must lean to the one, or the other side, nor oppress the one without rayeing of the other. To conclude, not daring to shew himselfe a King, hee offers all the cheefe of the League, to become counterfeit Kings. Hee exhorts the Duke of Guise, not to expose the Estate in prey, to procure the contentment of the King, the libertie of the Clergie, the dignitie of the Nobilitie, and the peoples ease by other meanes then that which destroyes the honour of the Soueraigne, trayles the Churches, sacks the gentlemans bloud, and driues the people into despayre and inuites him vnto peace, by promises of aduancement for his houte and partie. But a warlike mind will haue nothing but warre. The Duke could neither endure the feare, nor the cure thereof. Thus peace is banished. The Duke seeks all meanes to assault the Huguenots: and beseecheth the King to stoppe the armie of strangers, which were euen now upon the frontier that they might not returne into Germanie, with a victorie over France, and a triumph over the Catholike Church. Still must this venerable pretext of religion serue to colour the wicked passions of men. He procures many commissions, especially for his brother the Duke of Mayenne in Dauphine, for the Duke of Joyeuse in Poitou, and for himselfe against the Protestants armie.

The King desires peace.

The Duke will haue war

Warre concluded.

The Kings forces.

If the King had not shewed the like care on his part, the people would haue sayd, that as long rest doth dull the courage of a horse: so since the Duke of Joyeuses marriage, the pleasures and delights of Court, and the solitarines of Vannes, had much decayed his accustomed generositie. He therefore diuides his forces into three armies. The first at Chaumont in Bassigni, consisting of five and twentie companies of men at armes, twelue ensignes of foot, in the regiment of Feluseaux, six of Ioannes, six of Gis, with many other blankes signed for other commissions, at the will of the Duke of Guise, who increased this armie with foure hundred Lances, and two thousand Italian foot, sent by the Duke of Parma, & the Duke of Lorraine (suffering himselfe as the eldest of the house, to be carried away with the vaine hopes that were giuen him, of a good portion in the pretended succession of Charlemagne) held also goodly and great forces upon the frontier, at the Duke of Guises deuotion. The Duke of Montpensier commanded the second at Saint Florentin, neere vnto Troyes. The King with his presence honoured the third at Cyen, stretching along the river of Loire, to keepe the King of Navarre from ioyning with his strangers on this side the river. The Duke of Joyeuse presuming of an assured victory, lead an other army into Guyenne against the King of Navarre, and the other heads of the League, armed euery one of them by himselfe.

The Protestants armie.

The armie that came for the Protestants, consisted of five thousand Reisires, five thousand Lansquenets, twelue thousand five hundred Suisses in three regiments, eleven Cornets of Trench, ten companies of Harguebuziers on horseback, the which in all were about thirty thousand men. The King of Navarre assembled his forces in Gascogne. The Prince of Condé, the Conte Soissons, the Vicont of Turenne, the Conte of Rocheaucault, the Lord of Tremouille, and others, made great preparations. The Lord of Chastillon gathered an armie in Languedoc: les Diguieres held himselfe readie to passe at need.

The cause of the afflictions of France.

Thus this poore and miserable realme, is readie to serue as a prey to people differing in tongue and maners. Without doubt, men iudge of the offence, by the punishment. The witchcraft and diuination (whereof some make open profession) blasphemie vnpunished, lust, dissoloution, prodigality, ambition, discord, and cruelties: but above all, impietie, licentiousnes, Atheisme, superstition, & iniustice, the root of many which are crept into France, haue filled vp the measures of her iniquities: and now she is ready to drinke euen vnto the lees. In former ages the Court was a schoole of vertue for the French Nobility: now it abounds in dissolutes, disorder and excess. The most modest grow insolent, the excess of great men breedes it in the meanest. And do wee wonder, if the same scourges, whereby the fearefull wrath of God iustly

A iustly kindled, haue ruined more flourishing Estates then this, doe now wast our fields. 1587. The armie of Strangers now enters into Lorraine, whose errors at their entrie will cost them deere that commit them. The Duke of Bouillon is yong, little respected, and ill obeyed. Cleruant, Guitré, Beauuais, La Nolle, Digoines, Montlouet, Vezines and others assist him: but most of them are more fit to carrie an Ambassage, then to vnder take a charge. The cheefe of Germanie is but a meane gentleman, valiant out of doubt, but too weak for so great a charge, hauing no reputation but what hee hath gotten vnder Duke Casimirs autoritie.

Errors of this armie.

In the beginning of August, discord (a dangerous plague,) bred a great confusion in their proceedings. The Duke of Bouillon would haue imployed this armie to victual the places of his soueraintie. The Generall of the Germanes desired to haue a Porce of the bloud to march before him. The Reisires and Suisses looke a goodly occasion at Pont Saint Vincent, to fight with the League, who made a shew to ioyne with them. The Lansquenets are commended to haue resolutely cast themselves into the warre, to passe and come to battaile. Some would spoyle Lorraine, others would carrie their reuenge into the heart of France. The Germanes chose the way along the river of Seine, and so to passe into Picardie. The French had more reason: That they must ayme at a passage ouer Loire, and fauour the King of Navarre approach. In the end the way of Loire was resolued. They fire some villages in Lorraine: the Counties lying vpon the passage are wasted, the armie finds neither mills, nor ouens standing, which bred a generall discontent among the Reisires and Suisses. As the armie passed through the countrie of Barre, and Gnuillois, newes comes that the Lord of Chastillon is beset in Gresle in Lorraine, with foure hundred horse, and fiftene hundred harguebuziers. The Duke of Bouillon makes hast to vngage him. The Earle of la Marke his brother so tormenteth himselfe in this action, that hee falls sicke, and dying, leaues the conduct of the forward to the Lord of Chastillon. The armie is turnoyled with continuall raine: they want victuals, and the grapes & other fruit being not ripe, breed many fluxes: yet did they surmount all these difficulties, and hauing passed the riuers of Marne, Aube, Seine, la Cure, and Yonne, they approached neere vnto Loire.

The Lord of Chastillon arrives.

The Earle of la Marke dies.

Here the Reisires & Suisses make a second complaint. The King of Navarre appeares not, the water is low, but the Kings forces are lodged vpon the riuers side, and threaten to fight with the first that shall approach. The ruine of the strangers armie was to keepe the King of Navarre from ioyning with them: and therefore, the Duke of Joyeuse stated the sayd King with an armie, strong with men, munition, artillerie, and other meanes. For their first exploits, the King of Navarre had defeated some Companies which had aduanced too farre into the Countrie. And Charbonieres and Bori remaining with their regiments, at la Mothe Saint Eloy (being beaten by the fauour of the Captaine of the Castle, who lent some peeces, to breake their barricadoes: against the oth which hee had giuen, not to commit any act of hostilitie) were defeated by Joyeuses troupes.

The strangers second complaint.

The taking of Saint Maixant, was the second of his triumphes, Thonne-Charente the third, both by composition. But the defeat of the companies of the Duke of Talbot: where some being taken after the furie of the fight, others yeelding vpon their enemies faith, were in a manner all insolently slaine in cold bloud, together with the Abbay of Maillezay to his first conquests, he left Lauerdin to command the armie, and returnes to Court, to demaund the palme of his victories, and a supplie of greater forces, the plague hauing much wasted his armie. In his abtence the King of Navarre defeated three of his companies of men at armes, tooke their Cornets and many gentlemen prisoners, pursued Lauerdin vnto la Haye in Tourraine, chased the Duke of Mercur, & by the conduct of the Vicont of Turenne, tooke all his rich baggage: then at his returne he receiued the troupes which the Conte Soissons brought, and those of Normandie led by Colombieres.

The exploit of the Duke of Joyeuse in Poitou.

The King of Navarre exploits.

This repute gaue the said King meanes (as wee haue noted before) to gather together

1587. gither his forces in Gascogne, and so to ioine with his armie in Xaintonge. On the other side, the Duke of Jouenze, supplied with horse and foot, repasse the Loire, and with twelue thousand fighting men, comes to encounter the King of Nauarre. The King of Nauarre had two riuers to passe, to come into Xaintonge, Drougne and S. l. Isle. The Duke of Jouenze, dronke with prosperitie of a hasty aduancement, who of a priuate gentleman was made a Duke, and of a Duke brother in law to the King of France, and charged (but not so much by the King, as by the League, whereof hee was a partisan, hauing married the Queenes sister) to giue bataille at all euents, would cut off these passages, presuming that hee which passed first, should haue an aduantage ouer his enemye.

The bataille
of Contras.

The King of Nauarre knew it well: yet, did he not loose any tyme in curling of his haire. The nineteenth of October, accompanied with the Prince of Condé, the Conte Soissons his brother, the Viconte of Turenne, and other good commanders, hee takes his lodging at Contras, to passe the riuier of Drougne at a ford. The Duke supposing to haue him at his deuotion betwixt two riuers, giues the rendezvous to all his forces the next day, betwixt Roche-Chalais and Contras, and there made choise of his place of bataille to his best aduantage, halfe a League from Contras. The King of Nauarre and his souldiars, had swet more in skirmishes, then in tennis-Courts, and did take more pleasure in the dust of their enemies chase, then in feasts. The inequalitye of the number doth not amaze them. Hee marcheth before: resolues his men to fight, makes them to fall on their knees and pray to God, puts his horsemen into foure squadrons, his owne, that of the Prince, the Earles, and the Viconts. The souldiars inflameth their courages by mutuall skirmishes, and reprochfull speeches: from words they goe to blowes. The King of Nauarres artillerie thunders first, at eight of the clocke, and at the first volle sweepes away seuen Captaines of the regiment of Picardie. The Dukes answeres him, but without effect. The ignorance or malice of the Cannoniers hauing planted it so low, as it fell vpon a litle hill betwixt both armies. The Dukes horsemen led by Lauerdin, and Captaine Mercœur giue the charge, and at the first encounter force through the King of Nauarres squadron, and passing on, the Vicont staves him, and beates him backe. The Duke presuming by this first good happe, to obtaine a totall victorie ouer three cheefe heads of the house of Bourbon, aduanceth resolutely, flanked with two hedges of armed men to charge with the Lance. The foure commanders march euery one in the head of his troupe, first easily the pace, then the trot, and after in their full carier.

Defeat &

They charge and breake them. This conflict, which consisted for the most part of Leaguers, was almost as soon dissolued, as it was resolued on: it began at nine of the clocke, and at tenn not any of the Dukes men had any offensiue armes: some are ouerthrowne, some taken, and some seeke their safetie in flight. The victors pursue them three Leagues, and strew the fields with men, horses, and armes. The Duke is compassed in, by a squadron of men at armes. A voyce reuiues the memorie of the slaughter made at Saint Eloy, and of the Companie of Pueithes: at the brute whereof he is slaine presently, without any respect of his qualitie. His brother Saint Sauueur, Bresay who carried the white Corner, Roussay the younger brother of Piennes guidon to the Duke, the Earles of Suze, Ganuelo, d' Aubioux, the Lords of Fumel, Neufui the elder brother of Perigord, yong Rocheffort, Croissete, Gurat, Saint Fort, guidon to Saint Luc, du Bordet his enseigne, de l'aux Lieutenant to Bellegarde, gouernour of Xaintonge, Montigni enseigne, Tiereclin master of the Campe, Pluuisault, la Brangerie, Campelis the yonger, la Pallade, Bacullard, with many other Captaines, and a great number of men of account and qualitie, with about halfe of the armie, made the bataille of Contras famous by their deaths, as the most memorable of all that haue been giuen for religious cause in France. Many rich prisoners, and a very rich spoyle. All his Cornets taken, his cannon carried away, and his baggage seized on.

At

At their returne from the pursute, thanks were giuen to God vpon the place of bataille died with bloud, and couered with carcases. But that which honoured the King most: in the midst of this so commendable a moderation of his victory, hee shewed himselfe no lesse milde and courteous to the prysoners and the wounded, then wise and valiant in heate of the fight. He caused the dead to be buried, cured the wounded: sent home almost all the prisoners without ransome, gratified most of the Commanders, caused the ensignes to bee deliuered to Montigny about the rest, commended him to haue behaued himselfe valiantly in the battayle: whereby hee began to purchase fauour with the King of Nauarre, and afterwards gotte great reputation with him for his valour and fidelity, when as hee vnited both Crownes into one.

The Prince of Condé, at the first charge had a blowe with a Lance on the side, and being ingaged vnder his horse, it did so preiudice his health, as the griefe thereof did soone hasten him to his ende. This is the greatest losse of the Protestants army in this combat, in the which there was a very small number slaine, and not one of account. The King of Nauarre is now freed from the snares that were layed for him: now hee aduanceth towards the spring of the riuier of Loire: and giues aduice of his dessein to the army of strangers, which then was in Hurepois about the Lands of the Lord of Chastillon. The King camped vpon Loire betwixt Cosne and Neufui, and by aduice of the Duke of Neuers hee cloyes the passages with trees, stonnes and other hindrances where the horses should passe. The second cause next to God of the rume of this army, to whom they thought the King at his entry would haue presented a blanke to prescribe what they pleased.

The Duke of Guise followed them at the heeles, and the Duke of Mayenne on the one side: and yet both of them could not keepe them from surprising of some small Townes to refresh their army. But when as they see themselves frustrate of all hope to ioine with the King of Nauarre, or to passe the riuier of Loire, that they must eyther retire, or march forward to meete with the King of Nauarre, or ingage themselves farther within the realme, to seeke bread for themselves and forrage for their horses, or else march on the left hand and wander into vnkowne Countries, they growe amazed, they mutine, they faint.

Some Frenchmen attempt la Charité: but their enterprise succeeds not. In the ende they leade the army into Beauisse, where they should finde meate both for man and horie. The seauen and twentieth of October they lodged at Vimorry, and places there abouts, neere to Montargis. To take from them this lodging, the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, (taking aduantage of the passages of the riuier of Loing,) come at supper time with fiftene hundred horse, and fise thousand foote, and charge the Baron Donneau, being lodged in Vimorry with seauen or eight Cornets of Reisfres: but they had almost verified the saying of the King of the Epirots, vanquisher of the Romaine army. We are vndone if we get such an other victorie: for three hundred horses of baggage, the Barons two Cammells, and the death of fiftie souldiars with a hundred seruants, was not sufficient to recompence the bloud of fortie braue and gallant Gentlemen, and two hundred good souldiars slaine vpon the place by the Reisfres, who speedily repayed to their Cornets, whilst the Dukes men were busie at the spoile. The Duke of Mayenne receiued two pistol shot on his cask, by the Baron, and in exchange, the Duke gaue the Baron a wipe on the forehead, with his courrelas, but with small hurt.

This losse of horses and baggage, makes the Reisfres to mutine againe, growing impatient, neither seeing their pay, nor the King of Nauarre: for a bayte, they force Chastillon, and spoile it. The Prince of Conty arriuall neere vnto Chartres, where the Duke of Boutillon resigned him the charge and the white corner, pacified this mutinie.

Then the Swisses treated with the King, by the Duke of Neuers means: his Maiesty hauing 1587. Defection of the Swisses. hauing now conured them by their alliance with this crowne, to serue him, or to re-tire themselves: some of the Captaines followe the Kings party, others receiuing foure hundred thousand crownes, returne to their country: but some of them, at their arriuall lost their heads.

By this defection, the army is halfe decreased: the toiles of the warre tire them: the discomforts proue at length insupportable: many of the troupes disbande: they foresee an apparent danger, if they giue battell. They take Councell the 24. of Nouember, to turne head, and to draw this languishing army vp to the Springs of Loire. But the Duke of Guise had well obserued from the beginning, that striking the shepherd, he shall disperse the flocke. The Baron lodged at Auneau neere to Chartres, with seuen Cornets of Reistres: but he trusted too indiscreetly to a promise made by the garrison of the said Castle, not to commit any acte of hostility, and to furnish him with victuals for his money. The Duke manned it with good store of harguebusiers: and and at the first sound of the Trompet, to horse, he enters the Towne with all his forces, euen as their Carts stopt vp the streets and gates in the morning. Being thus surpris'd, and hauing no meanes to recouer the fields, they are forced to returne into their lodgings, and to remaine at the Conquerors mercy, either slaine or taken. The spoyle was great, eight hundred Wagons, great store of armes, Jewells, and chaynes of gold. Two thousand horse of combat, and of carriage. So as in one night, all the Dukes footemen were in a manner horsed, rich in spoiles, and rich in prisoners. The Baron, with some fewe other, leaped ouer the walles, and sau'd themselves, through the fauour of the night, and in a marishe. He makes a stande halfe a league from Auneau, and rallies them together that escape. The Swisses that remained, come vnto him: all determine to breake. The Prince of Conty, the Duke of Bouillon, Chastillon, Cleruaut, and the rest, become answerable for what is due: so as they will marche on. They might easily haue forced through the Duke of Guises army, but they were surpris'd with feare, a passion which doth easily vanquish the quicknesse of mans iudgement,

The army hath now but one wing to flie withall: it is a body without armes or legges: yet the hope of paiement makes them continue their course vp against the riuer. But the disorder was great: feare accompanies them, many Gentle-men slip away dayly to their houses: and most of them which remained, could not easily resolue to fight. They must make long marches to auoide the enemy: they had no guides, no smiths for their horses, who were spoiled for want of shooes, no bread for the souldiars, no forrage for their horses, their troupes wasted, most of them were without powder, without bullets, and without meanes to recouer any: the Lanquens are reduced to two thousand, and most vnarmed, and the Swisses haue changed party. The Reistres thinke of nothing but of their returne into Germany: the French slippe away hourly. The Duke of Espenon coasts them with the Kings armie, and wisheth they would accept of a capitulation, to disapoint the Duke of Guise of an absolute victory, which he did expect. The Duke of Guise pursues them, yet is it not fit for the Kings estate, he should wholly vanquish these maimed troupes: the seruant would then presently attempt against the maister. Moreouer this army still holding the field, the Reaime should be much impouerished: and ioyned with the King of Nauarre, they might effect great matters.

The King offers them a safe conduct, to returne, vpon condition that the French should deliuer vp their colours: that the Reistres trusse vp their Cornets, and that all sweare, not to beare armes in France, without the Kings expresse command. The eight of December they accept of this capitulation, at Lency in Masconois, and so disband.

The Lord of Chastillon protests neuer to deliuer vp his Ensignes, but to the King of Nauarre. He vnderstands, the Reistres threaten to carry him away as a pledge: but hee frees himselfe from their mutiny, like a gallant Gentleman: hee assembles treat.

Chastillon res-

1587. Assembles a troupe of a hundred horse, and some shot on horsebacke, and takes the way of Ruanne towards the head of Loire. Mandelot Gouverneur of Lionois, Cheurieres, the Earle of Tournon, and others, seeke to stoppe his passage: hee is beset on all sides by his enemies, hee makes his way with his sword, and passeth through them like a lightning, and forcing his enemies to flie: he causeth the children of that Country, to call it the battaile of Turne-taille. The Strangers thinke to refresh themselves at Geneua, but the most part were not able to get thither: and many of the Commanders, eyther with languishing and grieve, or as the common saying was, with the sweete Wines they drunke with the Duke of Espenon, gaue vp the ghost. The Duke of Bouillon dyed the xi. of Ianuary, in the 25. yeare of his age, leauing Charlotte his siter for his heire, marryed since to the Vicount of Turenne, now Duke of Bouillon. Death of the Duke of Bouillon. Louillon, and Marshall of France.

Another troupe of Reistres marched towards the French Conté: the Marquis of Tont, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Guise, pursuing them (against the publike faith) vnto the Mountaines of Saint Claude, enter the territories of Montbeliard and Hericourt, where by a lamentable reuenge vpon a poore innocent people, by the burning of two hundred Villages, by the forcing of many wiues and maides, and by the murder of a great number of all ages, all sexes, and all qualities, they leaue the markes of the inhumanitie, and the brutish fury of the League, and carry the spoiles of their triumph into Lorraine.

All the chiefe of the League assemble at Nancy, where they resolute to make the lasttall of their ambition. The season inuires them, mens humours are well affected. The Catholikes consciences, fired from the fume of strangers, confesse themselves wonderfully bound to the Duke of Guise: the people extoll the victory of Auneau, and the dispersing of this great armie: the Nobility of the League looks bigge, the Clergie reioyceth, the Preachers tongues are fire-brands of sedition, they speake inder sion of the King in their Pulpits, (before time the Pulpits of trueth,) are now become the Chaires of Iuglers: they make the King a Saul, and the Duke of Guise a Dauid, Saul slew his thousand, but Dauid his ten thousand.

They publish generally in their Sermons, that the King had leuiued the Reistres, to oppose them against the Dukes holy enterprises, and to expose Paris as a prey: but by the Dukes valour and constancie, religion had now triumphed ouer heresie. The Prebends vnto the Duke a Sword grauen with flames. The King of Spain, and the Duke of Sauoye, conceiue great hopes. The Duke of Parma salutes him, and Amongst all the Princes of Europe (saith he) Henry of Lorraine alone deserues to command in warre. They make bonfires in all places, and sing the wondrous workes of the Duke of Guise, to the Kings disgrace. The people of Paris especially (possessed with the prailes of the house of Guise, & the disorders of the King, the dissolutnes, leachery and hypocrisy of the Court, vnder a shew of penance) leane to the party which they hold most certaine: they disdain the present estate, apprehend what is to come, and thinke to loose nothing by the change.

Henry of Lorraine discouers all this, and thinkes to make his profit of so goodly an opportunity. He knowes moreouer, that Toubert and Miron haue giuen their opinion of the Kings disability to haue children. Hee makes himselfe more pleasing to the people, who feare the succession of a Huguenot Prince: hee entertaynes them with great familiarity, but with an humour aspiring vnto tyrannie. Hee sees the miserie of his Soueraigne disgraced, his enemies retired to Rochelle: England ready to bee invaded by a proud Armie from Spain: hee giues eare to the counsell of the Arche leaguers, increased to the number of sixteene, by reason of the sixtene quarters of Paris. He is crafty, aduised, foreseeing, generous and valiant, but variable, corrupt, a dissembler, secret and patient. Hee will by no meanes vie his owne name in any thing, yet will hee effect that by another which hee attempts or takes in hand. He aduertiseth the Cardinall of Bourbon (who goes but as he 1588 as led) that this goodly opportunity must not be lost. But the secrets of his heart contrary to his outward shewes.

This assembly at Nancy tended only to force the King to make his will, and to the regencie to them. It was therefore concluded, That the King should be to ioyne his forces effectually with the League. To displace such from their offices should be named. To bring in the inquisition of Spaine, and to publish the Councell of Trent, but with a moderation of such things as derogate from the privileges of the French Church. To consent to the restitution of the goods sold by the Clergie for the charges of the warre. To giue them Townes to be manned and fortified as the time and necessity required. To forbid the Huguenots bodies & goods, and to entertayne an army upon the frontiers of Lorraine, against the Germans, who threatened reuenge for the insolencies committed in the Countie B of Montbelliard.

But to subiect the Kings authority to the desseins & practises of the league, what was it, but by this means to aspire to the Crowne? To haue him ruine them he loued, and that were alied vnto him in bloud, what was it, but to make a bush of a forest, and a desert of a goodly kingdome? And this word of Inquisition, is it not hateful vnto all men? It was necessary for the Spaniards, who had no better meane to plant and maintaine Christianity. But the tediousnes and manner of their proceeding is horrible, the malice and Calumination of their spies and informers abominable, their prisons vnder ground fearefull: their racks and tortures intolerable, the yellow gowne without sleeves painted all ouer with deuills, the Miter, and Corde: and for the last act of this pittifull Tragedie, the fire, haue made it detestable to the Flemings, and execrable to the French. As for the reception of the Councell of Trent, the soueraigne Courts of this realme haue neuer so aduised our King, for the preiudice they should do vnto the Crowne, and the privileges of the French Church. To require redemption of the Clergie goods, and to haue the King force them that were benefited to redeeme them, was it not to haue him make warre for the Church, and the Clergie should giue the alarme, and shadow themselves vnder the temporality, whilst that the Nobility should go to fight, and the people languish. The League had obtained some townes of assurance, and the Parliaments labored to put downe the Huguenots. To conclude, the King had not refused the chiefe of the League any demande that he might lawfully graunt, and had yellected them many things which he might by his authority refuse.

Besides the motions of the Kings apprehensions, the first beginning of his misery is, that almost all his counsellors of state are corrupted, they conceale the truth, they fit themselves to his humors, they are fearefull, weak and inconstant. Without doubt that Prince is miserable (saied an Emperour) from whome they conceale the truth. They perswade him, the Duke of Guise partie is strong, that the Townes and Provinces looke onely after him: if hee enters not into it, hee must be subiect both to League and Huguenot. Yet he meane to be master ouer both, but hee takes not the safest course. Hee becomes the head of the Guise party, and talking of nothing but of the voyage of Poitou, thinks to winne the peoples loue, and to stoppe the murmuring of the League.

The Prince of Condes death made the enterprise easie. A great debility of the stomacke, a difficulty of breathing, a great costiuenes, a continuall vomiting, with an alteration and extreame paine, surprised him the third of May, halfe an houre after supper, and the second day of his sicknesse, a suffocation of all his viall spirites, sent him from the bedde vnto the graue. Hee was a Prince indeed with all the qualities fit for a great Captaine, vnder whose magnanimity the Protestants conceiued great hopes. The bodie was opened, and the iudgement of Physicians was diuers. The botome of his bellie was pale and burnt: his bowells ouerflowed with a reddish water: the stomacke about the orifice perced through with a round hole, & the vitall parts being vlcered, made some suspect poyson, others held that it was the remaynder of the potion he swallowed in the yeare 1572. which making an impres-

The schoole of Montpellier did subscribe to this last opinion.

In the meane time the King doth not greatly affect this enterprise against the Huguenots: hee desires to diuert the warre which the League would make inmortall. But the Commander vnder whome he assembles his forces, makes him fall from a feuer to a stensie. They had long before made the Duke of Espernon an aduancement odious to the people. The League made him the onely author of all disorder: but the succession to the office of Admirall, and the gouernment of Normandie, wherein the King had installed him since the death of the Duke of Jouenne, and their disdain for that he had crossed the Duke of Almalein in his enterprises vpon Boulougne, and other places in Picardie, shall soone discover the violences of an ambitious spirit, who thinks that the very heauens should giue him place.

The Duke of Guise findes, that the warre which he made against the Princesse of Sedan, by Rosie his Lieutenant, did but blemish his newe trophies. She had already chased him from Douray: hee had by the Lord of Nueil laine seauen score of the most select prisoners to Sedan. The consideration of an innocent pupill, makes this warre execrable, and makes them odious that attempt to take from an other without any iust cause. The Parisians faint, if he come not to confirme them. They call him; and he leauing Sedan and Lamets, thinks it is nowe high time that the King either yeeld or breake, and that nowe they must shewe the effect of the Conclusion of Nancy.

He comes to Soissons. The King is very iealous of this approche: and knowing the Parisians humor and deuotion to the Duke, he sends him word by the Lord of Belieure (a man of great and sound iudgement, who for his great employments both within and without the realme, was then one of the chiefe of the Kings Councell, and now the most worthy Chancellor of France) that he should do him apcassure, not to come to Paris in a time so full of troubles and factions. If hee come against his will, hee will lay vpon him the cause of all the miseries, which his presence shall breede. But to loose all, there is but one hazard: Pompee thinks, that striking the ground with his foote, hee shall raise vp a hundred Legions. He comes to Paris at noone the ninth of May, followed onely with eight gentlemen, not to amaze the King. He lights at the Queene mothers lodging, and goes with her to do his dutie vnto the King. The people follow him by troups with great ioye: euery one blesteth his comming, euery one makes new wishes. The Parisians had long forgotten that ancient and cheerefull salutation of God saue the King. When they see him passe, they change it into, God saue the Guise, God saue the pillar of the Church. A doting gentlewoman sitting vpon a stall, pulls downe her maske. Good Prince (saith she) seeing thou art here, we are all eased. Hee makes his reuerence vnto the King: but not so assured as hee was accustomed: hee opens the causes of his comming, and iustifies his actions as well as hee could. Then seeing the King readie to dine, he retires to his lodging, & not one Courtier accompanied him.

At dinner he growes more resolute. They meete both after dinner at the Queene mothers lodging. The King full of ialousie & feare. The Duke with a braue and resolute countenance. The people attend the issue of this conference. The next day the Archbishop of Lyon (the chiefe pillar of the League) arriues: the Dukes friends and seruants enter the citie bringing and carrie away sundrie intelligences. To conclude, all were prepared to execute that wherof they sayled the last yeare.

A notable error of state: for destroying the principall, the accessary perisheth of himselfe. The King had sufficient forces to suppress these first insolencies. He had the names & seruantes of his enemies: most of the were daunted with feare, with these long priues & longings & to one to an other others did hide themselves: & some dreamed of nothing 1588 nothing but of flight. The multitude is apte for tumults. A cheertull and resolute countenance of the King might easily haue dispersed this tempest. But in steede of confirming him, they make him more irresolute: they talke of nothing to him, but of the Dukes prauiſes with the Parisiens, and that by his long delay hee will bee preuented.

Barricades at Paris.

He meanes to anticipate the houre, and thinks it sufficient to terrefie them: for the effecting whereof, hee commands the Marshall of Biron, to drawe his gards of Swisses and French out off the Suburbes into the Cittie, and lodgeth them in diuers quarters, to feare the people, if they stirre. Le Gast with his companie, held the little bridge neere to our Ladies Church. Grillon, Saint Michels bridge: the Marshall d'Aumont mans our Ladies bridge with harguebufiers: the Swisses are diuided into diuers places, before the Towne house, in the new market place, & at S. Innocents Church. But eyther through want of iudgement, or for want of men, they had forgotten the place Maubert.

The people growe amazed: the chiefe of the League terrefie them with the apprehension of a spoile: they shut vp their shoppes. Their trafficke, tooles, pens and paper, are conuerted in halbards, pertuisans, harguebuffes, & swords. The schollers come to the vniuersity, and ioyning with some multitudes of the people, they seize vpon place Maubert: the neighbors arme, all the Cittie is in combustion: some crye out for Barricades, there is nothing but stopping of the waies: they flanke them, and man them, they make them from thirty paces to thirtie, euen to the sentinells of the Louure, they drawe the chaines. no man passeth without the word, or a passe-port, from the Colonels or quarter masters.

The Earle of Brissac, Bois-Daulphin, Chamois, and other heads of the League, charge the swisses, and kill some: the rest beeing terrified with this vnexpected furie of the people, without Commanders, without conduct, and without assurance of the Kings intention, choose rather to yeeld their pikes, then to charge them in this violent occasion. Without doubt a more manly courage and constant resolution, had forced the Parisiens to fortifie themselues in the bottome of their cellars. Citties begin a mutiny boldly, but they execute it faintly, if they see any resistance, vsing still more words then deeds. The consideration of wife, children and shoppes, do easily quail their first heate. Saint Paul, (a simple gentleman, but a chiefe man in this party) causeth the Kings gards to retire with their hats in their hands, and their armes downe. They crye out generally against the Tirant, against the Hueguenot, against the Politiques. It fares with them in a manner as it did in former times with the Englsb and Bourguignons.

The Queene mother had alwaies made her profit of the variety of factions: she is nowe deceiued, the Duke of Guise will not imploy her in that hee hath deſeined: she takes her Coach and comes amazed, to intreat the Duke to pacifie this tumult. Belieure followes to the same ende. But the Duke answered: These are wild bulls broke loose, whom I cannot stay. So great a deſeigne was not attempted to faint in the midst thereof. It was no longer time nowe to dissemble: the maske vncouered, and the ford founded, they must go on, and seize vpon his person, without whose ruine their victory should be imperfect: for the effecting whereof ten or twelue thousand men were readie to enter by night at the newe gate, to beset the Louure, and to shut vp all the passages.

Fourre gentlemen familiar with the Duke, aduertise the King hereof: yet canne hee hardly beleue it, but that the people will alwayes willingly yeeld to the Kings clemency. Yet his Councell desired to be out of Paris. They lay open before his Maiestie the generall reuolt, in the which Philip the faire was forced to saue himselfe among the Temples: The partie-coloured hooode of redde and skie coloure, wherewith Charles Duke of Normandie, and afterwards King of France, the sist of that name, and surnamed the wise, was hooded, to saue himselfe from the peoples insolencie, during the captiuitie of King Iohn his father in England: The reuolt of the Maiotins: The mutiny

A mutinie of the Caboches: the crosses of S. Andrew: the deposition of Salcedo: the aduertisements of the King of Nauarre, and the conspiracies of the last ycare, which now hath broken the bankes, and ouerflowed all.

His feare increaseth, yet he settles his countenance. It is reason (saith he) to provide for these disorders, to assemble the Councell, and to giue all men contentment. And the better to disguise his intent, he sends back the Queene Mother vnto the Duke, to perswade him to come vnto the Louure, and to assure him, that he shall returne with such satisfaction as hee can desire. She intreates him in this vrgent necessitie, to make knowne vnto the King, that he hath more will to preferue, then to ruine his Crowne, and to settle the Estate which this mutinie hath wonderfully shaken. To intreate an enemy, is to shew that he feares him. The Duke seemes colde: he layes the motiues of these tumults vpon the people, to whose assistance he is drawne, more by the violence of necessitie, then by his owne desire. It were a great indiscretion (sayd he) for me, to cast my selfe naked into a suspected place, at the mercy of my enemies. The King vnderstanding by his Mother, the Dukes obstinacie in his deſeigne, resolues for the safety of his person. He goes from the Louure with a small traine, with a shew to walke in the Tuileries, and from thence hee goes to lodge at Trapes. I giue thee my curse (saith he, turning at Chalot towards Paris) disloyall and ingratefull Cittie: a Cittie which I haue alwayes honoured with my continuall aboad: a Cittie which I haue more enriched then any of my predecessors. I will neuer enter within the compasse of thy walles, but by the ruine of a great and memorable breach. Cursed likewise bee you all, for whose content I haue purchased the hatred of so many.

The King retires from Paris.

O Duke, thou hast drawne thy sword against thy Soueraigne: but God hath stayed thine arme from striking. It is a folly, onely to terrifie him, who may finde meanes of reuenge. Many of his faction blame him to haue erred in the maine point, wherein consisted the perfection of his victory, By this attempt he hath blemished his reputation with all Princes. All Kings are bretheren, one royall blood summons an other: they haue an interest in this cause, they affect troublers of anothers Estate, but they cannot endure them in their owne. Without doubt the prouidence of God had prepared a strange Catastrophe for the Duke, for the King, and for his Realme: who at this time, by his singular loue to this Crowne, did diuert the successe which they expected of this shamfull and reprochfull mutinie.

O Paris, King Charles the eighth had in former times made the 12. day of May famous, by the absolute conquest of the realme of Naples: and now thou deuilest to haue this twelfth day noted with red letters, and hereafter to bee celebrated, for that in the same day, thou hast presented vpon the Theater of thy rebellions, a King dispossessed of the capitall City of his realme. Nay rather what coale can sufficiently note to our posteritie, this mournfull and vnfortunate daye? What lawe of forgetfulness, may wipe out the remembrance of thy shame, ingratitude and treachery? what lotion can wash away the spotted of thy pollution, filthinesse and villainies? what fire shall euer consume the memory of the rebellions, tyrannies and seditions, of this fatall and abhominable League? O Barricadoes, you are the spring of those floods, which shall for a time drowne this Estate: and the instrument wherewith that inferutable wisdom would chastise, both the King and the realme.

The sixteene did presently qualifie this cursed conspiracie, with the title of a iust defence against the King. They aduertised other Townes, that God had preserved that holy & religious Cittie from a great massacre, and a fearfull spoile. That the Duke of Guise had subuerted the Councell of the Politiques, namely of the Duke of Espernon, by whose counsell the King had resolued the ruine of the chiefe and most Catholicke families in Paris: as if the peoples suppression were the chiefe meanes to keepe them in obedience.

And the Duke of Guise at the beginning of this bold and insolent attempt, writes prently to his most trusty friends, to repaire speedily vnto him with armes and horses: bur

1588 but no baggage. I have ouerthrowne the Swisſes (ſaid he to Entragues Governor) and I have leaues cut in peeces ſome part of the Kings guards, and hold the Louure ſo ſtraightly beſet, that I can give a good account of what is within it. This victory is ſo great, as it will be remembered for euer.

But oh Duke! is it preſumption that bandies thee againſt the rules of reaſon, or weakeneſſe which abates thy courage and reſolution in ſuffering him to eſcape, who within ſewe moneths ſhall heape this thy victory vpon thy head, and by thy victorie con- fuſion ſhall make it memorable for euer? Both the one and the other brings a true daine repentance vnto man, and makes him wiſe too late. Thou ſeekeſt oh Duke! to touch the heauens with thy forehead, and hell with thy foot: but learne, that our hi- ſtories are full of the violent deaths of thoſe proud ſpirits, who ſeeke their glory and profit with the ruine of their Country, the preiudice of States, and the ſubuerſion of common peace. That great God which reuengeſ the iniuries of Kings and people, laies publicke ruines vpon them that doe them. The ſlaughter at Vassy kindled the fire of the firſt ciuill warres. So thy Father died, ſoone after the newe troubles which followed. Euen ſo the like ſtorme threatens thy ruine in the middeſt of thy violent paſſions.

Entragues had aſſembled the Nobility of the League at Baugency: but the 14. of the moneth, he writes vnto them. Our great, could not execute his deſeine, the King having ſaued himſelfe within Chartres: I wiſh you to retire to your houſes, as quietly as you may, making no ſhew to haue ſeene any thing. And in the ende: I am ſo amazed, as I knowe not what to doe. I beleue him: Kings haue long hands, they catch a faire off, and their blowes are dangerous. So hereafter the King ſhal free himſelfe from the leagues party, but he ſhall be little the better. The Duke is no leſſe troubled in minde, ſeeing the Sunne of the royall Maieſty eclipsed: hee ſeemes grieued, rebukes the people, cauſeth outrages to ceaſſe, deliuerſ the French companies their armes, and puts them out off the Citty, but at Saint Anthonies gate, quite contrary to the waye which their Maſter tooke.

In ſuch mutinies, no minde, (bee it neuer ſo reſolute) continues ſtill conſtant in one Eſtate. The Duke of Guiſe ſees now, that the greateſt of the Clergy approve not theſe newe inſolencies: their callings haue more grace vnder the beauty of a King, then in the conſuſion of a Democratic. The French Nobility (at the leaſt of ten parts, nine) cannot fit themſelues to the humors of the Princes of the League: their proper and eſſentiall forme is, to oppoſe themſelues againſt the ſubuerſion of this Eſtate. The Gentlemen hold their honours, dignities, charges, fees, and iuriſdictions, by homage of the King: and foreſee, that a royalty cannot be ſuppreſſed, but the Nobility muſt likewiſe periſh: there is the like reaſon (but without proportion) of the obedience, and taxe due vnto a King, as of a rent due vnto the Lord of a Mannor. hee that hath withdrawne himſelfe from the firſt, will likewiſe free himſelfe from the laſt. Hee ſees that the learned & men of honour abhor this diſgrace lately done vnto the King. The Court of Parliament reſolues to abandon Paris. All France is offended with the Kings departure: and without the Kings perſon, the Tragedy of Chilperic cannot well bee played, nor the inſtructions of the Aduocate David perfectly effected. It is therefore better to play the dutifull ſeruant, and making vnto the King ſome ſhew of reſpect, ſerue and obedience, to labour to returne into Grace, and at the firſt opportunity to effect their purpoſe.

So the Duke of Guiſe, not able to ſupport himſelfe in theſe high attempts, falls flat downe. Hee proteſts of his innocencie to the King, and of his endeavours to checke the peoples fury: hee offers to proſtrate himſelfe at the Kings ſeete, to iuſtifie his honour, the which hee ſaies is ſtrangely wounded by his enemies that are about his Maieſty. But on the other ſide, the gloſſie doth ill agree with the text: hee chooſeth a Prouoſt of Marchants, and Sheriſſes at his pleaſure, receiues the Arcemall, the Baſtile, and other places of ſtrength: depoſeth many quarter maſters

The Duke ſeekes to re- turne into grace.

1588. A maſters and Captaines, takes an oath from ſuch as he inſtalls: ſeizeth vpon the Kings treasure, as he had done at Chaalons, Reimes, Soiſſons: and through all the towns of his obedience. And if this miſchiefe continues (ſaid he) I proteſt to preferue both the Religion and the Catholikes. Then by other letters written to Baſſompierre a Lorraine. The King leaues forces, and ſo do we. He is at Chartres, and we at Paris. Eſpernon is chaſed out off Normandie: the kings ſeruants are imprifoned in many great townes: the leſſer ſend to ſubmit themſelues to Paris and vs.

Whileſt the Duke prepares a ſalue for the ſoare which he had made, and the Parisians perſwade their aſſociates, to mainteine themſelues ioynly againſt the King of Nauarres with whom (they ſaid) the King had made himſelfe a partiſan, to the preiudice of religion, and the Catholike Church, his Maieſtie exhorts his Lieutenants and Governours of his Prouinces, to retaine the Nobility, and people within thoſe limits of duty and reſpect, which tie them to their Soueraigne: and the chiefe cities, not to frame their affections after the modell of Paris. But he ſpeaks no more like a King: his ſtile is the ſtile of a man that flies, that feares, that intreats. And to repaire this diſorder, he employs the Queene Mother. But how could this turbulent ſpirit cure the infirmities of the Eſtate, being irreconcilable in her hatred to the princes of the bloud, and tranſported in her affection to the children of her daughter, the Duchefſe of Lorraine? She aduiſeth the King, to paſſe ouer quietly the inſolencies of the league: but there is no likelihood, ſhe ſhould more regard the profit of her ſonne, then the advancement of the Marquis of Pent her grandchild. She brings to this newe common weale (for the royalty ſeemed now to be changed into a Democratic) complaints and teares, againſt the brauings and force of a couragious Prince, and a furious multitude. And promiſing effects of greater zeale to Religion, more reſpect in the diſtribution of offices, and more moderation in the exaction of ſubſidies, ſhe preſumed to giue contentment to thoſe, who made ſhew to imploy themſelues for a generall reformation, and to reduce the moſt violent to their obedience. But this ſerues but to breed a ſecond treaty like to that of Nemours.

Paris without the King, is a body without forme: the moſt iudicious find it, and lament his departure. The late orders of religious men haue great credit with him. They ſend the Capuchins in proceſſion vnto Chartres, to mitigate the heat of his choller. and then the chiefe of the Citty, went to excuſe the motiues which had forced the people to defend themſelues, and to beſeech him to returne to Paris, (where hee ſhould be receiued with as great ioy, as his ſubiects were grieued, to vnderſtand of his departure: and ſhould finde better ſeruants, then thoſe which had counſelled him to ruine, and then to leaue them: and to graunt them ſeuene principall points of their petition: The extirpation of hereſie, by the forces of his maieſty, and the holy vnion: The baniſhment of the Duke of Eſpernon, and of his brother la Valette: Warre in Guyenne, by the King in perſon, and by the Duke of Mayenne in Daulphiné: Abolition of the tumults of Paris: Confirmation of officers choſen for the managing of ciuill cauſes ſince the Barricadoes: A reſtoring of the goodly and auncient ordinances of the Realme: And an abolition of parties, gifts and abuſes brought in by Eſpernon and la Valette.

The Queene mother preſents theſe Deputies: and the King vrged by the league to graunt their requeſt, lets the Card-nall of Bourbon, and the other Princes vnderſtand: That the peace and warre, the battells wherein he hath ſo willingly expoſed his perſon, and the laſt ouerthrow of the Proteſtant Reiſtres, haue alwaies beene ſufficient re- ſtimonies of his zeale to the mainteynance of the onely Catholike religion with- in his realme: to the extirpation of hereſie, and falſe doctrine: but iealouſyes and diſtruſt had preuented him from reaping the fruits of the aduantage which he had ouer the laſt heretikes.

That for a preſent reformation of affaires, and to preuent the feare the Catho- likes had to fall vnder the commaund of hereſikes, he would call a Parlement of the three Eſtates of France: and reſolues preſently to reuoke many impoſiti- ons

1588. ons which oppresse the people. As for the priuate complaints against the Duke of Espernon, and his brother: I will (saith he) alwaies make it knowne in all occasions, that I am a iust Prince, and will preferre the common profit of my Realme, before any other consideration.

The duke of Espernon is
disgrace.

But the two brethren, Espernon, and la Valette say: To what ende should they make an enterprise at Paris, to take the Duke of Espernon, who was then in Normandie? and why made they arricades, euen to the gates of the Louure: armed the people, and seized vpon all the chiefe places of the City: to chase la Valette from Valence, and other parts of Daulphiné where he remained? And if the confusions of former ages haue kept other Kings from acknowledging our fathers seruices: and he hath rewarded his merits in his children; what bee those iealous and malicious heads, that enuy our fauours with his maiestie? What censure, what rigour, what lawe may keepe a King of France, from aduancing to authority some fauourites, who reuiue in them the vertues of their ancestors.

Moreouer the League makes mention in what places our fauour hath beene imployed: the treaties of the Duke of Espernon in Guienne: his being acquainted with Clermonts negotiation for the Huguenots of Metz: the enterprises hee hath made vpon Cambray: his late fauour to the Reistres in their returne: his secret conference with Chastillon: the consultations of that tumult, which hath lately happened in Paris: the taking of Valence, Tallard, Guise, and other places, from the Catholikes of Daulphiné, and his practises to stay the yeelding of Aussone. But we say, would to God we had in like sort taken, Chalon, Eijon, Montruel, Cambray, and all that are subiect vnto his Maiestie within the heart of France. They tearme vs fauourers of Heretikes. And yet we haue in fixe moneths taken from them by the sword, all their conquests in Provence (the King, since the death of Henry the bastard, and Grand Prior of France, had giuen this gouernement to the Duke of Espernon) which former Gouernours could not do in twenty yeares. The taking of Sorgues in Daulphiné by vs two, during the frozen time of winter: and the ouerthrow of the Huguenots Suisses, by la Valette: but especially the last diuision of the Suisses from the Reistres, which made the way for the Duke of Guise, to defeat them at Anneau: and the discontent, wherein the Duke of Espernon left the King of Nauarre, at his departure out of Guienne: are not these sufficient testimonies, that their accusations are as frivolous and malicious, as the sale of offices where-with hee charge them: for iustification whereof, the Duke of Espernon offers to present his head at his Maiesties seere, if it be proued that he had euer any such thought in his soule. Contrariwise, who hath during the reignes of Henry the second, and Francis the second, managed the treasure without contrioll: but the house of Guise, whereof the latter follow the steppes of their Predecessors? Who haue forced the King to exact vpon his subiects, but the warre which they haue kindled and drawne his Maiesty into? what house did euer from so small a beginning grow to so fearefull a greatness? To concludemo man shal blame vs for being Pensioners to the King of Spaine, to haue hindered our King from the recouery of the Seigneuries of the Lowe Countries, nor to haue stolen away the reuenues of his generall receipts. Wee will no wayes hinder this goodly reformation: we are not in Court, nor in the Kings presence.

Let vs see the first fruits of this so commendable a gouernement. Haue you left Paris? haue you yielded it to the King your Lord, and naturall Prince? Nothing lesse: you haue reuolted Cerueil, Melun, and Pontoise: you haue (with false persuasions) withdrawn the best Citties of the realme. But we will (in protesting to bee ready to deliuer it to his maiesties hands, with our liues and honor, all the offices, charges, gouernements and places which it hath pleased him to commit vnto vs) inuite our accusers to doe the like. And if they will pretend in quality of persons: let them vnderstand, that whatsoeuer euer party holds, it appertaines vnto the King, neyther can they keepe it, but at his pleasure.

Thus the two brethren iustified themselues, whilest the Court of Parlement makes makes knowne vnto the King by their Deputies, their grieve for this insolencie, which had forced him to abandon Paris. They appeale vnto his clemencie and bounty. They present for an humble excuse of his officers, the weaknesse and feare which had forced them yeeld to so violent a reuolt: beseeching him to returne into his City, and to giue rest and content to his Maiestie, order to his affaires, grace to their purple robes, and authority to their offices: and by his presence, to disperse the mutinies which diuisions had bred.

Deputies of the Parliament with the King.

For answer. I doubt not (saith the King) but you would willingly haue reformed this disorder, if it had beene in your power: neither of your persisting in the same affection and fidelity which you haue testified to my forefathers. I am not the first that hath beene toucht with such afflictions, neither will I leaue to be a good father to such as shall be good children. I will alwayes intreat the Parisiens with the quality of a father, as children that haue strayed from their duty, not as seruants that haue conspired against their maister. Continue in your offices, and receiue from the Queene my mother the commandements and intentions of my will.

The Kings
answer.

This answer was lost and colde: but after dinner, he addes a sharper part, and calling back the Deputies. I know (saith he) wherefore garrisons are set, either to ruine a Towne, or for distrust of the inhabitants. But what cause had the Parisiens to presume, that I would destroy a Towne, wherevnto I haue brought so many commodities by my presence, as ten or twelue townes would thinke themselves greatly benefited thereby? and what distrust could I haue of a people whom I loued? of a people in whom I trusted? Haue they lost a loose, or any thing whatsoeuer by means of these pretended garrisons? I sought the preservation of my good Cittie of Paris, and the safety of my subiects, meaning by a strict search, to put out a great number of strangers, whom I knew to be secretly crept in. They haue offended me, yet am I not irreflexible, neither haue I any humour to ruine them: But I will haue them confess their faults, and know that I am their King and maister. If not, I will make the markes of their offence remaine for euer. I will reuoke my Court of Parliament, my Chamber of accounts. Aides, and other Courts of Iustice. I will take from them the Vniuersitie, their honours, freeddoms, and Præiudges. I will omitté no means to bee reuenged. Not that I am reuengefull, or accustomed to vse severity: but I will haue them know, that I haue as much resolution and courage, as any my Predecessors. I am no Usurper, but a lawfull King by succession, and of a race that hath alwayes commanded mildly. Let them not take religion any more for a pretext. There liues not a more Catholike Prince, nor that desires more the extirpation of heresies, then my selfe: I would willingly loose an arme, that the last Hereticke were painted in this Chamber. Returne to your charges, and bee of good cheere; I will bee for you and let them vnderstand what I haue sayde vnto you.

Now the most desperate Leaguers found; that the absence of the Court made their fare but simple, made their shops without Chapmen, and their trafficke colde: the shame to be without a King, made the most audacious mutinies to hang downe their heads: the violence of rebellion quailed many found the dealing of Paris too audacious. And now Paris studied to returne to the Kings obedience: when as the Duke of Guise fearing the losse of many of his friends and seruants, resolves to make his peace. He now speakes of nothing but the Kings seruice, the obedience of his Maiestie, the preservation of the Estate, the reformation of disorders, and the subiects ease; and by the intercession of the Queene Mother seeks his fauour which he had lost. The Queene Mother certifies the King: That of his Councell, (who for the most part are seruants to the League) keeps him in this humilitie, and propounds vnto him a generall requite of his subiects, with the intelligence and fauour the League had within Charyen, the which fauoureth him, for his greater safety, to go to Roan. Finally, they set out against the Huguenots. My Liege (say they) will you loose the name of most Christian, in winking at these heresies which vndermine the truth?

The Duke seeks to make his peace.

1588. will you alone among threescore and one Kings, your Predecessors, suffer so detestable a medley of truth and falsehood?

Edict of reunion.

This Councell carries him away against them in whome hee should most trust, who lamenting the decay of his authoritie, and the weakning of his forces, see that his intentions inclined to his owne ruine. Hee seemes to bee in choller with the King of Navarres partie, to haue the League on his side, (but hee telleth no man, that hee pretends to vse his forces against themselves) and drawes certaine articles of the reunion of Iuly, whereby hee frames his Edict, not so much against the King of Navarres religion, as to exclude him, in fauour of the League, from that, which none but God could take from him. But whilest they finish these accords, hee suddenly surpriseth the Isles of Charon and of Marans.

The King by this Edict admits no religion, but the Catholike: hee promiseth neuer to make a peace nor truce with the heretikes, nor any Edict in their fauour. Hee will haue all his subiects to ioyne with him, that by their common forces they might root out the said heretikes: Hee binds his subiects to sweare, neuer to yeeld obedience after him, to any Prince that shall bee an heretike, or a fauourer of heresie, degrades from all publike charges, either in peace, or warre, those of the pretended reformed religion: promiseth all fauour to the Catholikes, so as they shew themselves obedient and faithfull, and depart from all vnions, practises, intelligences, associations and Leagues, contrary to the vnion which hee made by this Edict: hee declares them guiltie of treason, that shall refuse to signe this new vnion, or shall afterwards depart from it: and finally hee abolished all that was done and past, but (signing this forced Edict) hee wept.

Two things trouble the League.

The Leaguers are now wonderfully puffed vp with hope: yet this reuerence of the royall maiestie is so naturally grauen in the hearts of men, as the onely remembrance of the twelfth of May makes their hearts to tremble. They feare the Scorpions stail, & that the King by his great facilitie, should determine against them some mournfull Catastrophe in the last act of the Tragedie. And thereupon two things amaze them suddenly: newes comes, that the fearefull and huge Spanish armie, wherein were a hundred and thirtie great shippes, and twentie thousand fighting men, vnder the command of the Duke of Medina Sidonia, had by fortune of sea, after their departure from the Grangne in Gallicia, lost three gallies of Portugall, many were scattered, and many bruted and made vnprofitable for the voyage, and were afterwards encountered by the Admirall, and Drake the viceadmirall, thwart of Portland, vpon the English coast, as they forced them to turne head, and to retire in disorder towards the Towne of Calais, (hoping there to ioyne with the Prince of Parma) with the losse of one gallion, which caried some part of their treasure, and also the instructions for the order which the Generall should follow, hauing conquered England.

The defeat of the Spanish armie at sea.

A bad beginning, for so braue and proud an ostentation, where they promised themselves an absolute victorie. But the progresse and end was yet more fatal. The English fleet preleth them so neere, as they force them to leaue the Bendings in confusion: their generall Gallies pestered with other shippes, was cast by the current vpon the sands, neere to the Port of Calais, and remayned with the artillerie in the Gouernours power. The rest were scattered by the English artillerie. The Spanish armie lost twelve shippes, and aboue five thousand men, who had no other sepulchres, but the vast Ocean, and the bellies of sea monsters. Finally, taking their course to the North, bending towards Scotland, and Ireland, those seas were no lesse fatal to the Spaniards, for seuentene of their great ships were sunke, and many others cast vpon the sands and rocks, and the rest of this armie was so miserably shaken, as of a hundred and thirtie shippes, hardly thirtie recovered Spain. Where the Duke of Medina had no other excuse vnto his master, but the ignorance and treacherie of his martyners, with the small experience they they had of those Northerne seas: the want of succors from the Prince of Parma, the tempests, ship-wracks. finally all fortune, but not one word of the iudgements of God vpon this giantlike attempt, to bring all England slauies to the mountaines of Gre-nate, or to the mines of Peru.

The second terror for the Leaguers, is that the King will not returne to Paris, how-soeuer they importune him. I will prepare my selfe (saith hee) for the warre against the heretikes: and for the Parliament which I intend to call, and to giue all Princes, that are vnited, contentment and satisfaction. They doubt the barricades haue left much splene in the Kings heart: and to preuent all contrarie events, they thinke it not yet time to satisfie the oath which they had made, to renounce all intelligences & Leagues which they had made both within and without the realme.

Th-King refuseth to go to Paris.

They take newe Councells and resolutions at Paris, to maintaine this authority and credit gotten with so many crosses and disgraces vnto the King, and so to presse him, and to subiect his will vnto theirs, as he shall not see, speake nor moue, but by the eyes, tongue and sinews of the League: to haue the Deputies of the Parliament house of their faction, with instructions drawne out of the articles of Peronne, Nancy, Nemours and Ginulle: To vrge the King against the Huguenots, and to sollicit him to ease the people by the discharge of taxes, thereby to make him odious, if he refuse the first fruits of their vnion: To make them strong at the Parliament, and to that ende to send for all the Nobility of their owne faction, and their adherents, to assist with their armes. To hold good correspondence with the Duke of Parma: and to aduertise the King of Spain, that thus accord made with the King, tended onely to effect their common desseins: To retaine Pisier Colonell of the Swiss, ser, and Kalagny gouernour of Cambray, with the priuate conventions passed betwixt them. To preuent, least the Duke of Neuers, whome the King resolved to send into Picardie to suppress the violences of the League, should winne away their most trusty friends. To binde the Cittie of Paris vnto the Lord of Villars, gouernour of Nemours, for the summe of thirtie thousand Crownes yearely, to haue him fauorable to their partie.

Newe resolutions of the League.

These newe Councells bred newe teares. The King cannot conteine from subscribing of these newe articles: but his misfortune forceth him to hazard his Estate, to preserve his person. Hee knowes well, that these are but imaginations: that his Edict of reunion wilbe obserued by none, but by himselfe: or so farre as it toucheth the subuersion of his Crowne. And yet too much bountie, or too great an apprehension makes him scrupulous to preuent it. The Protestants offer to trie this greare quarrell at their owne perilles, so as hee will remaine a neuter, and suffer them to oppose against the mutinies of the League. Hee rejects this aduice. For there is lesse danger (saith he) to remayne with those which persist in the vnitie of our religion, then with them which are diuided and becommen heads of newe opinions.

So, whether it were of a good meaning, or of purpose, hee returnes to Chartres. He sees, imbraceeth and maketh much of the Duke of Guise, and there all his fauours and bounties are liberally bestowed on the chiefe pillars of the League. Hee giues the Duke of Guise the generall commaunde ouer all the men at armes of the Realme. This was not the name and title, but in effect the office and charge of Constable. He makes the Cardinal of Guise Legate of Angion, the which hee promiseth to obtaine for him of his holinesse. To the Duke of Moyenne, a goodly army for the warre of Dauphine. To the Duke of Nemours, the gouernment of Lions, as his father had enioyed it: and hee determineth to giue the seale to Peter of Epiphan Arch-bishoppe of Lyon, to winne him vnto him by this great bounty, promising to procure him a Cardinals hat of Pope Sixtus, by the meanes of the Cardinal of Corby, who he had sent to Rome. Without doubt he had receiued more honor by being Chancellor, 1588. cellor of France, then in being Chancellor of the vnion. (The Chancellor Hursault A Earle of Chyuerny, and the Lord of Belieure, and Villeroye, had then leaue to attend the Kings pleasure at their houses) He declares the Cardinall of Bourbon the first Pance of the bloud, deciding (by a doubtfull speech,) that great question of prerogatiue, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew, whereon there hath bene so much written, and so much disputed : peruerting the ancient order of succession, and making the Cardinall to serue the passions of the League.

The Kings
Councillors
dismissed the Court.

Troubles
gainst the Duke of Guise in Angoulême.

They present vnto the King (being but fixe and thirty yeares of age) a successor, who had euen then passed the Climatrical yeare of threecore and three. Was it not the Leagues meaning, vnder the Cardinall of Bourbons image to raise vp a stranger, and violently to aduance his tyranny, to vsurpe the royaltie? To conclude: the King continues, renues and amplifies his fauours to all such as haue any credit with the League: he doth nothing without them, hee opens the very secrets of his heart vnto them, and (for their sakes) causeth euery one of their partilans to tast some portion of his bounty, and makes shewe to beleue whatsoeuer they say vnto him. His Councill blind his eyes, so as hee cannot discerne what is the dutie of a good King: they disguise the truth from him, and studie onely to satisfie their ambition and couetousnesse. So as to please them, euen in this, he himselfe pulls out those eyes, whereby he did see most cleere, & giues them leaue to retire to their houses, there to throwd them selues from these confusions of state.

The Duke of Espernon was out of Court: but hee had authority from the King, to command in the Prouinces of Aniou, Touraine, Poitou, Angoulmois, and Xaintonge. Being at Lockes, hee is aduertised that the League practised with some inhabitants to deliuer them Angoulême. Hee posts thither, and the people receiue him with great honour as the Kings Lieutenant. He publisheth the Edict of reuinion, his words and deeds testifie nothing but a courage resolved to preferue the Catholike religion. But behold suddenly a strange Catastrophe. Some Leaguers had perswaded the people, that he ment to drawe the Huguenots troups into the Castell, and so subdue the Towne. The Maior (beeing the head of the conspiracie) enters into the Castell on Saint Laurence day, vnder colour to present vnto the Duke certaine postes that were come from Court: he mounts vp to his Chamber, at his entry he dischargeth two pistols, D and seekes to force the house: The Duke was then in his Cabinet, attending the houre of masse: whete hee red the history of Pierce Gausson, in old time deerey fauored by Edward the second King of England, preferred before all others in Court, enriched with the Kings treasure, and the peoples wealth, but after banished the realme, and in the end beheaded at the site of the Parliament.

This slanderous libell beeing printed at Paris, not so much against the Dukes honour as the Kings, compared the Duke with Gausson, and concluded, that vnder Henry the third, hee should ende his daies by the like tragedie. Vpon the first tumult the Dukes gentlemen sie to armes, and repulse this armed multitude: the Maior beeing hurt with the shot of a pistoll through a doore, died within seauen houres after. The alarme rises into the towne. The people arme, storme, and make barricadoes. But the Duke kept the Castell: the Citadell was at his deuotion, & might by either of them drawe in necessary succors to iunge him.

The Seigneur of Tagens, the Dukes Cousin, aduanced with succors: Bordes Capitaine of the Citadell beeing prisoner among the conspirators, loued the liberty of his place, more then his owne life. Meré, Messeliere, Macquoyde and Bouchaux, summoning the beleeged, found nothing in them but a constant resolution to die rather then to yeeld: and the people were willing to capitulate, when as Tagens by his arriual pacified the sedition: armes were laied aside, and the prisoners of both parts deliuered. The Duke of Guise hauing made his peace with the King, and disapointed his most faithfull Councillors: yet one thorne troubled his foote: The Huguenots Estate. Hee therefore ceaseth not, vntill hee sees them assayed in Poitou and Daulphiné: and whilst the Duke of Neuers prepared his armie for Poitou, hee sends the regiment of Saint

A Saint Paul to the Duke of Mercur, to annoy the Protestants, and not to suffer them to reape any commoditie in the Countie. 1588.

The Duke of Mercur goes into base Poitou, beseegeth Montagu, repaired by Colombiers, whome they of Nantes had hourelly at their gates. But at the first bruit that the King of Nauarre was come out of Rochelle to succour Montagu, hee retires straight to Nantes, and left the regiment of Cersy, to make the retreat, the which was ouertaken, beaten and defeated two leagues from the suburbs of Nantes. On the other side, the Duke of Mayenne marched towards Daulphiné but hee plantd the limits of his voiage in Lions. Now are two mightie armies in field, the one vnder the Kings authoritie, the other all of Leaguers. But this is not enough. The King by a solemne oth, in the Cathedrall Church at Rouan, had sworne the execution of the Edict of vnion: he hath sent it vnto the Bishops, and commaunds them to presse the Huguenots in their diocesses, to make profession of their faith, and to abiure their errors in open Parliaments, royall iurisdiccions, and comonalities. This Edict then must be confirmed as a fundamentall law of State, and the King prest, to assemble the three Estates of the Realme, as hee had promised by the articles of the peace. Henry grants a conuocation, the first day of September at Blois: there (in the presence of the notablest persons of euery Prouince, Seneshalty and Baylewikie,) to propound freely the complaints and griefes of euery man, but not meddling with any practises, or fauouring the priuate passions of any. Cennocation of the Estates.

But amidst these Commissions from the King, the League wanted no policie to send secretly (to them that were most affectionate to the aduancement of their desseins, and to the most passionate Leaguers of the Realme) articles and remembrances which they should put into their instructions, and labour to beechosen of the Parliament. So as in a manner all the Deputies carried the badge of the League, and their instructions were conformable to those which had bene sent vnto them. The King comes first to Blois: hee giues order for the place, and for the Deputies lodgings. The Duke of Guise followes: but it was a great indiscretion for the Duke to goe to Blois, seeing the King would not come to Paris. The Deputies come one after another but the King finding not the number sufficient to begin so solemne an act, he defers it vntill October.

In the meane time, the King studies, by the credit which his authoritie giues him over the three estates of his Realme, to bring the Duke of Guise into open vewe, and to receiue punishment for all his offences past. And the Duke assures himselfe, that the most part of the Deputies would countenance his cause, and would serue him as instruments to controll the Kings power. So euery one labours to aduance his desene, and to deceiue one another: but hee which shall be deceiued, will verifie, that there is danger in delays. The sixteenth of October all the Deputies were readie, for the Clergie a hundred thirtie and foure Deputies, amongst others foure Arche-Bishops, one and twentie Bishops, and two Generalls of Orders: for the Nobilitie, a hundred and fourescore gentlemen: for the third estate, a hundred fourescore and euen Deputies, all lawyers, or marchants. The seuenteenth day, being the first sitting of the best wits of all France, raiuisht euery man with hope to heare rare propositions, and resolutions of great affaires for the reformation of the State. The Kings oration being full of liuely affection, true magnanimitie, and pertinent reasons, deliuered with an admirable eloquence and grace, without any stay, will testifie for euer, that he exceeded all the Princes of his age in speaking well, and that hee could grauely, pertinently, and very soderly make answer to the most important occasions that were offered.

Montelon keeper of the seale, continued his proposition, commended the zeale and integritie of his maiesties intentions, promised the Estates, that vnder his happie command, they should reape in this conuocation, the same effects which had bin tried in diuers raignes: hee exhorteth the Clergie to restore the beaultie and dignitie of the Church: The Nobilitie, to frame themselves after the mould of pietie, bounitie, iustice, and 1588. and other vertues of the French nation, so much honoured in all histories: The people A to reuerence Iustice, and to obserue good orders, to fite wrangling sutes, swearing, bishphemies, play, lust, v. surie, v. iust, getting, corrupt trading, and other vices, which be the seeds of troubles, and seditions, and the ruine of flourishing Estates. He layes open the Kings great debts, his charge and care to roote out heresies, his religion, pietie, and deu-otion, ending his speech with a commendation, vnder the Kings obedience, of con-union and concord, necessarie for the maintenance of religion.

The Clergie. Renauld of Beaulne Arche-Bishop of Bourges, Patriarke and Primat of Aquitania, thanked the King for his loue to his subiects: and God, to haue installed on the throne of this Crowne, a King endued from his youth, with the spirit of wisdom, to gouerne his people, who had cast the lightning of the high God, euen vpon the face of the enemies of his diuine Maiestie, hauing by diuers and dangerous voyages, through diuers B nations gotten the knowledge of affaires, who by his onely wisdom and vertue, had lately dispersed a great and mightie armie of strangers, and giuen vs hope, that vnder so good and great a King, wee shall see heresie suppressed, peace confirmed, the seruice of God established, Churches and Temples restored, Iustice and peace embraced, charitie abound among men, & by vritie of religion begin here on earth to raigne with Christ, the Idea and patterne of that heavenly kingdome, whereunto wee aspire.

The Nobilitie. The Baron of Sensci testified the Nobilities affection to the Kings seruice, confessing, that to him alone belongs to worke those good effects, for the establishment of the honour of God, the Catholike religion, things profitable for the Estate, and necessarie C for his people, offering in the name of them of his order, the zeale, faith, and dutie which the gentlemen of France haue alwayes borne vnto their Kings, their armes, meanes, liues, & persons, to maintaine the obedience, honour, seare, & respect, where-vnto the lawes both of God and man tie the subiects to their Soueraigne.

The third Estate. Michell Marteau Prouost of the marchants at Paris, President for the third estate, first thanked God, who had cast his eyes of pittie vpon this realme, in the extremitie of their afflictions, then the King to haue yeelded to the humble petitions of his subiects, heard their griefes and complaints, and shewed a great desire to restore his people to their former Estate, religion to her former dignitie, to rule and settle all orders in their ancient forme, being disordered by this iniurie of times, protesting that in so doing their most humble and faithfull seruice should not faile vnto the last breath. D
And to the first sitting ended.

The oth of the vnion renued. In the second, the twelofday following, the King at the instance of the Arche-bishop of Ambrun, the Earle of Brissie, and the Aduocate Bernard, speakers for the three Estates, to content the importunitie of the League, did againe sweare the oth of the vn-ion, lately made at Roman, and making his Edict of Iuly last a fundamentall lawe of the Realme, to bind him, them, and all their posteritie (yet not derogating from the liberties and priuileges of the Nobilitie) he caused it to be publickly read by Ruze Seignieur of Beaulieu his chief Secretarie of State. And to make the memorie of so sollemn an othe more autentike to posteritie, he commaunded the said Secretarie to make an act, that E all the orders of the realme had sworne in the bodie of the state, all with one voyce, the Clergie laying their hands vpon their breasts, and the rest lifting them vp to hea-
uen. An oth performed with great ioy, and generall reuiuing of that happie acclamation of, God save the King; so many yeares forgotten among the French nation: and followed with a singular testimonie of the Kings clemencie, remitting the Parli- sens offence, for the common good of the Catholikes of France, and the ease of his people, whose miseries made him treade vnder foote, his iust displeasure. Hold
